

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from The Institute of Museum and Library Services through an Indiana State Library LSTA Grant http://www.archive.org/details/harpersweekl00bonn

THE SECOND VOLUME

OF

THE YEAR 1858.

NEW YORK: HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has now been in existence two years. During that period no effort has been spared to make it the best possible Family Newspaper for the American People, and it is believed that the Illustrated Biographies alone—of which about one hundred and ninety have already been published—are worth far more to the reader than the whole cost of his subscription.

The literary matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY is supplied by some of the ablest writers in the language. Every Harper contains an instalment of a serial story by a first-class author—BULWER'S What will he do with it? has appeared entire in its columns; one or more short Stories, the best that can be purchased at home or abroad; the best Poetry of the day; instructive Essays on topics of general interest; Comments on the Events of the time, in the shape of Editorials and the Lounger's philosophic and amusing Gossip; searching but generous Literary Criticisms; a Chess Chronicle; and full and careful reports of the Money, Merchandise, and Produce Markets.

In fixing its price so low a price as Five Cents the price of their paper, the Publishers were aware that nothing but an enormous sale could remunerate them. They are happy to say that the receipts have already realized their anticipations, and justify still further efforts to make HARPER'S WEEKLY an indispensable guest in every home throughout the country.

TERMS

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
One Copy for Two Years	4 00

Five Copies for One Year	$9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE Subscribers.

INDEX TO ILLUSTRATIONS.

Academy, at St. John's Wood, Bridge of, 370
  On Central R. R., 325
  On Erie Road (2 illus.), 485
Accounts, a Lawless, 699
Alabama State Fair (2 illus.), 786
Albany, View of, 652
Algerian Women, 772
Alhambra, 709
Amazon, Indians Seeing in, 56
American Chestnut and Its Uses, 692
Americans, Ancient and Modern, 233
Anchor, a Sailor's, 661
Andrew, Rev. John, 661
  Islands, 261
  Mist of, 261
Anglo-Am. Monument, Hong Kong, 757
Antioch, 97
  Fountain at, 101
  Grand Cemetery at, 97
  Pipeline at, 101
Arch Camp, 564
Arctic Land, Scene in, 772
Atlantic Cable, Celebration of the Completion of the, 785
  Palace, 685
  Pioneers of the, 684
  Sailors' Procession, 701
Atlantic Telegraph, The, 804
  Anniversary (2 illustrations), 753
  Continuing Efforts to Recover, 549
  Pictures (2 illustrations), 545
Auction of Furniture, 660
Austria, Steamer, 641
  Burning, two views, 645-9
Axe, Broken, 648

Bab-el-Mandeb, Pass of, 533
Baden, Lithographic Rambling Saloon in, 693
  Gaming Table at, 696
  Way to, 684
  Gaming at, 681
  Croupier at, 681
  Gamesters at, 681
  Lucky Man at, 681
  Gods Worshiped at, 681
Ballad, the, 101
Ball, a Masked—at Paris, 628
Baltic, Loss of the Steamer, 729
  Gentlemen's Dress Overcoat, 121
  Ladies' Dressing-room, 121
Bath Bill, Trip to (4 illus.), 625
Battle, Key of the, 421
Battle, Fort Moultrie, 405
  Monmouth, 409
Beach, On the, 661
Bermuda, Grassy Bay, 782
Big Tree, Fire of California, 577
Bivouac on the Plains, 765
Blackwell's Island, Work at, 21
Boat, going on Board the, 661
Bolivia, Fording a River, 97
Boston Common,
  Elm, fruit view, 253
  ——— Rear view, 253
Boulogne, Steamer, 641
Bridges, Iron, Erection of, at Illinois, 12801, 637
Brooklyn Bridge on a Chest, 606
Brother Bill and Me, 693
Brunel's New Steamship, 392
Brush Church, 564
British Outrage on Mobile, 503
  On Trade Revd, 571
Bucking, 565
Buffalo Hunt, 833
Bunker Hill, Battle of, 393
  Monument, 393
  Plan of Battle, 392
Burlesque, a, 565
Butterfly Parks (3 illustrations), 560.

Calendar Counter, the, 561
Cairo, Steamer Sea, 633
Calcutta, Watering street of, 780
Caleph of Cairo, and Cadi, 685
Camera, Attack on, 28
Camp Chase, Ohio, Camp, near, 217
Cape Town, Steamer, 641
Capitol, Washington, 85
Catamarca Bankman, 773
Cave of the Winds (2 illustrations), 633
Cawnpore, Horse at—where Women and Children were Slaughtered, 53
Chattebury, New Battle at, 809
  Opening of the New Battle, 657
Chinese Barber, 66
  Ladies, 66
  Boat Girls, 181
  Camping Tortures, 545
  Knife Torture, 565.
Citizen, Meeting between—and Mr. Reed, 573.
Christmas Scenes: Street Scene—Gathering Evergreens—Santa Claus —Christmas Tree, 809-21.
Christopher Columbus, Cutter, 702.
Cigar Factory, 820.
Cincinnati, View at, 404.
City Belle, 85.
  Doctor, 85.
  Gentleman, 85.
  Hall, The Rotunda of the, 545.
  Gothdiary, Northumberland, 253.
  Gold, in the Valley of, 85.
  Comayagua, Honduras, 784.
  Church in, 785.
  Coast, Course of the, 615.
  Dangerous, 615.
  Constellation, 16, 32, 48, 64, 80, 96, 112, 128, 144, 160, 176, 192, 208, 224, 240, 256, 272, 288, 304, 320, 336, 352, 368, 384, 400, 416, 432, 448, 464, 480, 496, 512, 528, 544, 560, 576, 592, 608, 624, 640, 656, 672, 688, 704, 720, 736, 752, 768, 784, 800, 816, 832.
  Coming Home with the Rpa, 324.
  Counterchange, 328.
  Country Club, Exeter, 609.
  Brewing, 609.
  Corn, Drying and Shucking the, 726.
  Husking, 727.
  Corner, Illustration of the, 650.
  Corporation and French Coach, 561.
  County Belle, 85.
  Doctor, 85.
  Store-keeper, 85.
  Courtier, The Illustrious, 638-1.
  Cremorne Gardens, 581.
  Cuyenne, the Bell from the Lower, 541.
  Inhabits at bay, 260.
  Immediately Cut, 541.
  Cricket Match, 517.
  Criminals, the Secret Lady of—at Tuscaloosa, 661.
  Dispositionate, 544.
  Diver at Bathing, 637.
  Divers at Work on Ship, 20.
  Diving Dress, various, 605.
  Dog, the Fast, 56.
  Dress, 565.
  Duck-trap, 193.
  ——— Rear view, 236.
  Duel at Heidelberg, 12.
  Duelist, the, 13.

Earthquake at Naples (9 illustrations), 753.
  Education, Candidates for the Board of, 565.
  Elephant Leading, 188.
  Elephants, Trained, 684.
  Washing in India, 348.
  Emigrants, 565.
  Departure, 484.
  Man, 484.
  Houses, 485.
  Landing in New York, 405.
  Engine, New Turntine, 76.
  Ephrem, Steamer, 641.
  Explosion of the Petrel, 549.

Farms Away, 741.
  Fall, Autumnal, 741.
  Falls, the, from a New Point of View, 633.
  Fashionable Carriage, Coming out of, 233.
  Fashions, 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1865, 760.
  Fighting Snake, a Trip to the (2 illus.), 604, 605.
  Fences, Day of, 193.
  Fort Gregg, the Capture of, 29.
  Fort George, the Battle of, 345.
  Fort Moultrie, Attack on, 405.
  Fort Pitt, Remains of, 773.
  Fraser River, Fort Langley, 644.
  Fraser River, Fort Yale, 644.
  French Imperial Prince, 613.
  Railroad Train, 156.
Gambling House, Broadway (Three views), 549.
  General Admiral, Launch of, 625.
  Gold Coin Seizure, Map of Pacific Ocean showing, 604.
  Gold Hill Camp, 644.
  Gold Regions, New Zealand, 420.
  Goodly Tragedy (3 Pt'o), 713-15.
  Great Eastern, 193-6.

Harriet Lane, U. S. Revenue Cutter, 773.
  Havana, Explosion at, 693.
  Heidelberg, Student Life in (4 Pt'o), 12.
  Hindoos, Campaigning, 184.
  Hook my Frock, 301.
  Hoop, the Modern, 193.
  Hops, 244.
  Horse on the Country, 685.
  In the City, 685.
  Hotel, Office of Fashionable—in Washington, 684.
  Hottentot, 29.
  Woman, 29.
  Housework, on the, 97.
  Hudson River Road, 593.
  Hunting Cow, 733.
  Hurricane, the Recelving Congratulations, 781.
  Independence Hall, 429.
  Independence Hall, Relics, 405.
  Indie, Curs-nall in, 117.
  Mails Crossing Stream in, 793.
  Sterling Player in, 117.
  Indian Fray in the West, 293.
  Infernal Machine, the Latest, 757.
  Inhiels at bay, 260.
  Intelligent Horse, 341.
  At Gates of Hell, 341.
  At the Theatre, 341.
  Irish Jig, an, 564.
  Islam Seven, 5.

Jack the Giant-killer, a New (2 Pt'o), 564.
  Japan, Palace of Emperor of, 793.
  Japanese Ladies, 793.
  Noble, Going Hunting, 793.
  Japanese, Russian Corvette, 709.
  Jodd, General View of, 785.
  Jubilee, the Yacht, 661.

Kaiser Boys, 773.
  Kalispell, Mt., 565.
  Kaufman Prairie, a, 84.
  Commissioner's Residence at, 84.
  Court House, 84.
  Ladies' Gallery, Hours of Reparation from, 605.
  Landless, 389.
  Lay of the Cable, the (18 Pt'o), 744-49.
  Letter Writer—An Eastern, 693.
  Lexington, Steamer Sailed to her Destruction, 641.
  Liberty Bell, 396.
  Lisbon, Penitential Procession at, 389.
  Livingstone, Farewell Dinner to Dr., 197.
  Steam Launch for Dr., 197.
  Longchamps, Paris, 565.
  Longwood, St. Helena, 477.
  Longwood, Residence of, 472.
  Lookout, 34.
  Chief of Secret of, 57.
  Sharp, 57.
  The Sentinel, 292.
  The Watching, 292.
  From the River, 293.
  From the Southern Sea, 293.
  Lull Island, the Old, 156.
  Lunatics in Bengal, Burning Dowrup Law, 693; Shocking the Fall, 616; Lynch Law, 661.
  Lynching William Barker, 661.

Macpherson, C. S. Steamer, 677.
  Madison, Steamer Sailed for, 97.
  Indiana on, 97.
  Maid of the Mist, 633.
  Manure, Decerning Rapids of, 56.
  Manilla Cock Fights, 61.
  Market Women, 61.
  Streets in Rain, 61.
  Market, the Central—at Paris, 48-1.
  Martyrs, the, 377.
  Masked Ball in Paris, a, 628.
  Mermaid, a, 597.
  Mexico, Steamer Fighting in, 125.
  Morning Texas for Marketing in, 549.
  Mining Soda Water, 297.
  Mobile, Mardi Gras Ball on, 560.
  Bay of, 503.
  State-case of the Defenses at, 521.
  Monmouth, Battle of, 409.
  Monroe, Steamer—at the Grave of, 697.
  Entering Remains of President, 656.
  Obsequies (4 Illustrations), 656-7-1
  Moon, the Magnified, 633-2.
  Morris Dallas in a Store, 172.
  Mormon Heroes (2 illustrations), 753.
  Morphy, Paul, Playing Blindfold Game, 645.
  Playing Chess, 725.
  Mount Vernon Mansion, 421.
  Visiting, 421.
  Murder, Mr. Arpinwall's, 721.

Nahant, Life at (9 Illustrations), 365-2.
  Naples, Barricades at (2 Pt'o), 389.
  Strada del Porto, 776-7.
  Napoleon Bonaparte, the Son, 685.
  Natural Castle in Pennsylvania, 253.
  Needle-making, 84.
  Newspaper, an Editor at, 565.
  Niagara Falls, 633.
  Nicholas, Fort, 429.
  New York's Visiting in New York, 2.
  Niggers and Aggravations in a Gale, 621.
  Laying the Atlantic Cable, 629.
  Niagara Falls, a Trip to (12 Illustrations), 633.
  First Sight of, 629.
  Night Cars, 565.

Oppenent Tent, Interior of, 73.
  Opium Smoking Saloon, 797.
  Orchard, Fruit, 241.
  Ormond Beach, Florida, 227.
  Ottawa City, 126.
  Ouds, Burial of the Queen of (6 Illustrations), 305.
  Overland Mail Coaches Starting from San Francisco, 765.

Paraguay Expedition; Bubine at Berlin, 565.
  Officers Visiting Fort at Bermuda, 565.
  Passport Swindlers, U. S., 692.
  Patterson, Steamer, 641.
  Pea Fort, Capture of, 105.
  Pea Fort, China, 536.
  Map of, and Victoria, 516.
  Post Office, the General, 305.
  Police, Chief of, Views, 644-6.
  Porpoises, Church at, 468.
  Port Hudson, Church that was at, 633.
  Perim, Island of, 253.
  Persian Dancing Girls, 633.
  Petrel, Explosion of the, 749.
  Petroleum, the Search for, 100-1.
  Pierce, by Land, 253.
  Pilot, the, 565.
  Pittsburgh, Steamer Wooda, 629.
  Plain-dealer, a, 565.
  Planche's Grand, Church on, 764.
  Grave of Adams, 764.
  Pittsburgh R. R. Depot, 773.
  Plains, a Train on the, 72.
  Arny crossing the, 804.
  March across the—in Snow Storm, 809.
  Plowing, Eastern, 6.
  Poles, to, 565.
  Pompey's Pillar, Inscription of Pictures on, 112.
  Prairie Hunting, 773.
  Wolves at Work, 437.
  Prairies, the Great Western, 773.
  Preparing for the (2 Illus.), 597.
  Prince of Wales, 773.
  Princess Royal of England, Wedding of, 141.
  Bridesmaids of, 193.
  Prisoners, 565.
  Puleys, the, 809.

Quakertown, Army of Occupation at, 673.
  Soldiers' Tents at, 613.
  Attack on the N. Y. 851.
  Relief of the, Establishment, 701.

Railway Bedchamber, Imperial, 716.
  Raley, Mr., Performing before the Queen, 133.
  Reception, an Eastern, 101.
  Regatta, Boston, 429.
  New York, the Gaza, 321.
  Kowling the B. W., 809, 831.
  Representative, the New Hall of, 68.
  Richmond, Landing in, 497.
  Rice, a Stupendous, 709.
  Rock, on the, 565.
  Robbery, Old and New Style (2 Illustrations), 809.
  Rosses Dervasia Gate (Lucknow), 25.
  Rosser, Governor, 685.
  Rotten Row, Hyde Park, 393.

Sailor-cap, Imperial, 716.
  Salt Lake City, 644.
  Calchoun's at, 709.
  General View of, 212-13.
  Sanatoria at Saratoga, 662.
  Social Hall, 781.
  Street in, 645.
  Tabernacle at, 665.
  Sanitary, H. C. Kimball at, 693.
  Young's Harem, 664.
  Santa Claus, Visiting American Children, 821.
  Saratogian, Washington's, 421.
  Sea Fight, Grand Battle of, 840.
  Scenalia, a, 253.
  Scene, a, 565.
  Scenes, a, 565.
  Sepoys Arresting Missionaries, 53.
  Shelling Fort Sumter, 29.
  Section of Gridiron, Paris, 793.
  Shaft, Section of, 793.
  Shark, a, 565.
  Shell, Section at Bottom, 29.
  Shipwrecked Crew, a, 764.
  Shoe, the Modern, 193.
  Shooting Cubans Who Convict, 693.
  Skating in Europe, 141.
  In New York, 141.
  Skelphing in Bromberg, 345.
  The Start, 345.
  Racing on the Hill-side, 132.
  Slaughter House, 252.
  Smiling Morn, 393.
  Smith, Funeral Honors to Gen., 373.
  Smyrna, Landing at, 164.
  Smoking, 565.
  Sportsman's Hall, 253.
  Spring in the Country, a, 628.
  Spring in the City, 629.
  Spring Scenery, 549.
  Stanton, Edwin M., Funeral of, 57.
  St. John's (N.F.), Singers at, 536.
  St. Paul's M. E. Church, 193.
  St. Valentine's Day at Bearding School, 101.
  A Reminiscence of, 104.
  State Prison, Auburn, 13.
  Station, the Wrong, 622.
  Stock Exchange (3 Views), 696-7.
  Stocks Down, 269.
  Stone, 565.
  Stonehill Shaftsburg, 12.
  Submarine Railway, Plan of, 13.
  Sunday Scenes, 565.
  Surprise, the Little (7 Pt's), 841.
  Swordswallower, a Modern, Pygmie, 317.
  Swimming with Gourds, 132.

Table Bay, Cape of Good Hope, 29.
  Tapestry Weaving, 4.
  Tartar Horsemen, a, 113.
  Tartars, Burning of, 117.
  Telegraph, the Atlantic Instrument, 553.
  Temperance, the, 565.
  Temple Bar, Opening of, 393.
  Thames, Steamer, 641.
  Thanksgiving Dinner of the Five Points, 765.
  Thrashing, Eastern, 241.
  Thug Execution, 53.
  Thugs, Modern, 564.
  Tiger, Attack on a, 565, 724.
  Tilting Office, Salt Lake City, 813.
  Training Ground, New, 565.
  Train, Waiting for the, 402.
  Trees, Day, 193.
  Tropic Bird, Outrage on, 397.
  Trotting, Scientific Manner in, 721.
  Turkish Counterfeits, for similie of, 661.
  Pilgrims, 565.
  Ivory Tailor, 669.

Valuable Bay, Ireland, 557.
  Valentines, How—are Made and Sold, (2 Illustrations), 104.
  The First, 105.
  Vancouver's Island, 661.
  Venerine, Eruption of, 653.
  Victoria, Vancouver's Island, 517.
  Volcano, Crater of a, 653.
  Voting Place, N. Y. City, 784.

Voyageur de la Mer, Egyptian Yacht, 681.

War Trail, 281.
  Washington, Character and Sketches of (13 Illustrations), 393-2.
  Monument at Richmond, Va., 113.
  Monument to Cost, 393, 397.
  Washington's Mansion, 421.
  Washaw, the Battle of the, 344.
  Well, going down into a, 580.
  White House, Presidential Reception at, 168.
  White House, the, 804.
  Winans' Steamer (2 Pt'o), 676-7.
  Wine Cellars, Cutting Wine, 473.
  Wines, Western, 473.

Young Prisoner in India, 565.
  Yoke, the, 809.

Zazida, Mr. Barney's tamed, 509.
  Zulu Fisherman, 29.
  Girl, 29.
  Hut, Noisy, 29.

PORTRAITS.

Bannerman, Sir Alex., 316.
  Baxter, Rev. H. W., 460.
  Bennett, James G., Esq., 653.
  Benton, Hon. Thomas H., 141.
  Bigler, Hon. Wm., 385.
  Bowles, Samuel, Esq., 376.
  Mrs. Wm., 377.
  Brown, Hon. Albert G., 88.
  Brown, Hon. Interpreter, 317.
  Bunting, Rev. Abner, 377.
  Carlyle, Thomas, 127.
  Child, Dr. N. B., 157.
  Collamer, Hon. Jacob, 393.
  Cooke, Lieut.-Col. St. George, 572.
  Davis, Hon. Jefferson, 17.
  Delhi, Favorite Wives of King of, 53.
  Derby, the Earl of, 213.
  English, Hon. Wm. H., 321.
  Everett, Hon. Edward, 97.
  Field, Cyrus W., 228.
  Fracke, Dr. J. W., 465.
  Frederick William IV., Prussia, 741.
  Galen, Joseph, 48.
  Green, Hon. James S., 289.
  Grow, Hon. Galusha A., 373.
  Gwin, Hon. Wm. M., 321.
  Hale, Hon. John P., 237.
  Hall, Charles Francis, 688.
  Hobart, Capt., 252.
  Hughes, Archbishop John, 401.
  Johnson, Col. Albert S., 72.
  Lane, Hon. Harriet, 296.
  Lane, Hon. Joseph, 296.
  Long Jack, 377.
  Longworth, Nicholas, Esq., 472.
  Mason, Hon. James M., 176.
  Matthews, Hon. Stanley, 24, 209.
  Mohammed Pasha, 193.
  Morgan, Hon. John H., 108.
  Morphy, Paul, 645.
  Moses, Prof. B. F., 321.
  Mozart, 157.
  Nona Sahib, 93.
  No-kum-adja, 377.
  O'Conor, Hon. Charles, 52.
  Orr, Hon. James L., 129.
  Parton, 157.
  Paul, General Don A., 493.
  Pelham, Major John, 493.
  Perkins, Hon. Simon Jacques, 177.
  Perry, Commodore M. C., 157.
  Pfeiffer, Mad. Ida, 237.
  Pickersgill, Miss Mary, 689.
  Pierce, 101.
  Prime, Rev. S. I., D. D., 488.
  Pillman, General, 237.
  Quitman, General John A., 454.
  Raney, John S., 509.
  Sawyer, Hon. John, 692.
  Scott, Lieut.-General Winfield, 185.
  Seaton, William W., 45.
  Sibbili, Hon. John, 193.
  Soulsbury, Bernadine, 127.
  Stephens, Hon. Alex. H., 225.
  Tyng, Rev. Stephen H., D. D., 65.
  Warren, Gen., 393.
  Waugh, Rev. Bishop Beverley, 149.
  Webb, Gen. J. W., 362.
  Wilson, Hon. Henry, 146.
  Yeh, Governor, 105.

Ansese, a Male, 375.
Absinthe in France, 471.
Accident on Central R. R., 256.
On Erie R. R., 479, 484.
To Bridge over St. John's River, 276.
To a Boy Hunter, 303.
To a Child Nearly Dead, 745.
Actress, a Lucky, 455.
Administration—How it was Defeated, 160.
Adriatic, Case of Dark, 178, 274.
Escape of, 191, 254.
Second Escape of, 295.
Advertisers, Hints to, 584.
Affray in Congress, 202.
Afternoon at Charleston, 502.
On board the Niagara, 630.
Agamemnon laying the Cable, 540.
Air Hole, the, 59.
Albert Nyanza, 741.
Albert, Prince, the King, 87.
Albums, Imperial, 495.
Algiers, Sisters, 75.
Alsop, Case of, 250.
Letter from, 250.
Voyage to America, 348.
Anglo-American Monument at Hong Kong, 758.
Anniversaries, the, 323.
Anvil, Explosion from, 646.
Apparition of Monsieur Dudoy, 202.
Apple-time at Uncle Jerry's, 651.
Appointments, 76.
Aquatic Resemblances, 297, 366.
Arab in a Wrong Box, 253.
Arctic, Cruise of the, 422.
Arctic Expedition, from the last, 1849, 252.
Arizonia, 166.
Arms Bill, Defeat of the, 146.
Vote on, 299.
Art, are Works of, Sinful? 67.
Association as a Political Method, 353.
Associate, the French, 256.
Astrachan, Great Fire at, 681.
Astronomical Quarrel, End of the, 616.
Atlantic Cable and a Sea-Gull, 503.
Condition of the, 728.
Fortnight, 56.
Fortnight, the, 584.
First Message, 471.
Atlantic Telegraph, 55, 343, 395, 415, 486, 513, 552, 554, 555, 566, 583, 630.
Another Trial of, 503.
Condition of, 679, 727.
Experiment, 491.
Failure of, 514.
Failure, 467.
Fate of, 391, 616.
In England, 551, 616.
Is it a Fact? 646.
Messages, the Queen's and President's, 590.
Sunday, 455.
Trials of, 545.
Attempts at, 646.
Report of the Agreements, 566.
Wonders, 455.
Stats of, 630, 774.
Shipping of, 695.
Successful laying of, 618.
Tie that Binds, the, 598.
To be worked, 742.
To be Worked Again, 626.
What is a Failure, 695.
Attorney, the new District, 94.
Automaton Digging, Mother of, 7.
Australia, Exploration of, 727.
Australia, a Survivor of the, 460.
Loss of the, 641, 643.
Report of Officers of, 711.
The Burning of the, 699.
Author in a Scrape, the, 606.
Awakening, the Great, 178.

Bacon's Medal, Prof., 201.
Baden, a Week at, 606.
Bally, by Lent, 152.
Baltimore, Riots at, 202.
Adventure, Fearful, 723.
Crossing the Ocean, 436, 710.
Race, 415.
Voyage, across the Atlantic, 630.
Ball-room, Overpowered in a, 84.
Banking, Gov. King on, 84.
Bank Management, 151.
Notes, Arm-chair stuffed with, 471.
Notes, ten cent, 151, 200.
Reform, 710.
Bankrupt Law, s, 167, 166, 294, 306.
Banks, 167, 268.
Baths, Public, 268.
Baker of Monmouth and Sullivan's Island, 410.
Beach Cottage, the, 587.
Bear beaten by a Horse, 613.
Fight with a, 613.
Beasts, Mr. Journal's College for young, 440.
Bed-chamber, Royal—Troubles, 215.
Beecher, Rev. Mr. 142.
Belgium, King of—loves American, 151.
Bible, with the, 67.
Bennett, James Gordon, Esq., 453.
Benedict, Erastus C., 202.
Hon. Thomas H., 241.
Berlin, Arrival of Kossuth at, 167.
Berlin Heights, a Visit to, 607.
Bermuda, Voyage of to, 793.
Bernard, Assistild of, 150.
Effects of Acquittal of, 276.
Trial of, 260.
Bet, a Deaf, 745.
Bingham's Palace, Burning of the, 627.
Bigler, Governor, Letter of, 90.
Bigler, Hon. Wm., 90.
Billy Bowlegs in New Orleans, 870.
Bird Catching Extraordinary, 667.
Birth Extraordinary, 375.
Blackmore, posthumous Work of, 259.
Blackwell, Dr. Elizabeth, 523.
Blister, Scarification after, 650.
Blossoms, How—Grow, 470.
Blue Eyes, a Pair of, 615.
Boa Constrictors Swallowing Blankets, 615.
Boarding, an Indian, 295.
Boarding-house Keepers, 87.
Boarding-house, the Runaway, s, 638.*
Boat and Train, 403.

Boat Racing of Canadian Ladies, 599.
Bohemian, 7, 10, 19, 51, 67, 83, 99, 115, 131, 147, 211.
Bonaparte, Princess, 503.
Bouget, Marshal, 199.
Boston, Life in, 183.
Bourges, 637.
Boy Love of Oliver Wharton, 762.
Boy Suffocated, 560.
Brandy, what a Bottle of—did, 196.
Breadstuffs, Prospects of Dear, 94.
Breckenridge for Douglas, 710.
Brick, a Story of a, 9.
British Channel, Submarine Railway across the, 599.
Constitution, Proposed, 167.
Dairy, Visit to a, 599.
Outrages, 128, 162, 183, 264, 303, 327, 344, 392, 407, 422, 457.
British Guiana in Parliament, 438, 504.
British Policy, 199.
Press on British Outrages, 462.
Brooks, Noble Captain of Cops, 799.
Broughton, Lord, with a Wheelbarrow, 503.
Brown University, Sophomores of, exercised, 79.
Brown, Hon. A. G., 91.
Buchanan, Mr., Speech for, 439.
Waiting his Turn at a Well-bow, 151.
Buchanan's Administration, 167.
Building Improvements, 743.
Bulwer, Lady, in Trouble, 615.
Bulwer Lytton's Works, 503.
Approach to, 503.
Bulwer, Sir H., arrested, 759.
Bulwer, Sir H., Trial of, 615.
Bunting, Rev. Jabez, D. D., 497.
Burglar, the young, 303.
Buried Alive, 215, 423, 778.
Burke and his Victim, 615.
Burning a Boy's Eye out, 638.
Burns, Robert, 615.
Burr, Interview with Aaron, 194.
Business, Business, 615.
Prospects of, 615.
Busy Bodies, 638.
Butler, Death of Hon. B. F., 774.
Butterfly Parks, 665.
Button, cost of by a, 291.
Button, the, 691.

Café, a Monster, 153.
Cairo, Burning of, 503.
Calhoun, General, on Kansas Returns, 134.
Canada is to be annexed, 754.
Canal Operations of, 93.
Canadian Politics, 50.
Canal Operations, 93.
Canoeist's Case, 90.
Canterbury Festival in, 519.
Cantor, Mr. 615.
Canton and its Best-girls, 151.
Approach to, 151.
Assault of, 119.
Barbarous Execution in, 542.
Bombardment of, 151, 167, 183.
Bubble in, 199.
Condition of, 247.
Flame of Destruction in, 46, 303.
Friends' Benevolent Measures, 247.
Missionaries, 663.
Murder of, 199.
Rapacity, 199.
Cape Colony, the Natives of, 76.
Cape Horn, 615.
Capillary Attraction, 211.
Capitalists, Success of, 71.
Capitol Extension, 50.
Carnival Amusements, 647.
Carlyle, Thomas, 727.
Carnival at Rome, 167.
In Piedmont, 210.
Cass, Marriage of Miss, 566.
Castle, a Natural, 138.
Catholic Church, 1792 Journal of, 679.
Catholic Schism, 679.
Cat, the Ancient Cost of the Bag, 678.
Cat's Paw, a, 615.
Cats not Property, 534.
Cavaignac, Madame, 40.
Censorship in France, 695.
Chair, Story of a, 615.
Championship, the, 186.
Changarnier, Influences of Genl., 199.
Chapel Choristers, the, 206.
Charleston, 615.
Fire at, 503, 567.
Reform in, 567.
Victoria at, 695.
Chartist Meeting, 536, 654, 679, 699, 713.
Chase, Hon. Salmon P., 241, 679.
Chassein, Living, 715.
Chicken, Stealing a—and Killing a Woman, 537.
Children, Sayings of, 615.
Chinese, the, 679.
Most Curious in, 407.
Opening of, 503.
Treaty with, 647.
War in, 503.
What to steal to, 711.
Christian Missionary, communicates with Emperor of, 327.
Chimes" Brown's, Last Manifesto of, 662.
Church at Paris, 775.
Imperial Proclamation, 663.
Church and State in England, 663.
Recent Facts, 663.
Church, Terms of the, 553, 599.
Chickering, Death of, 567.
Christians, Crucified against, 423.
Christmas Eve, Adventure of a, 551.
Christmas, 599.
Christmas Gamblings, 103.
Christopher Columbus, the Cutter, 765.
Church, Reverend Mr. in Bahamas, 39.
The new Brick, 721.
Church Vanilla, Horrors of, 315.
Cigars, Value of new made of Gold, 695.
Cincinnati Fire Department, 615.
Circumnavigation of Europe, 615.
City of the Dead, the, 598.
Clergymen, How—get Livings, 791.
Clerical Housekeeping, 455.
Cloots, Man Loot in the, 699.
Coal Pit, Killed in a, 484.
Cobb's Reception, Mrs., 193.
Cod-fishing, 503.
Collamer, Hon. Jacob, 206.
Colleges, Operation of, 615.
Colliers' Line, Failure of the, 154.
Commissioners of the, 663.
Comet, the, 615, 650.
Another, 679.

Comet's Tail, a New Theory of the, 726.
Comfort, Bathing at Old Pt., 470.
Commercial Affairs, 23.
Prospects of, 23, 39, 55, 87.
Progress in Europe, 86.
Comedies, Foul, of 125.
Comedian's Copy of Lear, 23.
Confessional, 792.
Congress, 6, 34, 54, 70, 86, 102, 118, 134, 150, 166, 182, 198, 214, 230, 246, 262, 278, 294, 310, 326, 342, 358, 374, 390, 406, 806, 822.
Fracas in, 202.
In—Corrupt? 98.
Congressional Investigations, 166.
Conspiracy, a Mysterious, 171.
Controversy, Singular, 76, 615.
Continent, Bridging the, 615.
Conversation, Art of, 630.
Conversion, Conspicuous, 503.
Covert Showers of Death, 709.
Cooke, Col. P. St. G., 615.
Cool, How to Keep, 662.
Coon Hunting in New England, 720.
Corpse, a Living, 230.
Corpses Disembalmed years old, 651.
Correspondence, our Special European, 119, 758, 801.
Corwin's Last, 142.
Cotton and Free Negrotability, 454.
Cotton, What—is doing, 711.
Council, the Supreme, 615.
Court Etiquette, 183.
Life at, 71.
Life, Civil at, 791.
Cousin John, 376.
Coventry, Sale in, 91.
Crawford, Mrs., in Italy, 710.
Crewson, the Man, 503.
Cricket, Accident at, 663.
Match, 679.
International, 723.
Crime and Punishment, 663.
in New York, 585.
Intercourse with, 615.
Crimmins, Launch of, 567.
Dolphin, 615.
Crystal Palace, Destruction of the, 661.
Fire at the, 695.
Cuban Events, 679.
Culpeb Judge, the, 222.
Curtain Question, 615.
Cushman, Miss, in Real Tragedy, 279.
Czar, the, and his Troubles, 615.

Dallas, Instructions to, 342.
Damocles, the Sword of, 535.
Dameron, an Operation, 743.
Darned Stockings, 695.
Davis, Hon. Garrett, 17.
Dead Alive, the, 327, 791.
Debts in a Year, 615.
City, a, 487.
Decline, 615.
Debt, our National, 695.
Revenue for non-payment of, 23.
Statistics of Foreign, 439.
For Simie of the, 624-5.
Deep Hit, the Deepest, 615.
Delhi, Tribe of Kings of, 535.
Dentist, the Wife of a, 615.
Delusion, Horrible, 775.
Democratic Convention, 695.
De Kalb Dead, the, 679.
De Soto Found, the, 679.
Murder of, 679.
Recovery of, 535.
Tomb of, 535.
Derby, Earl of, 503.
Lord—and Lady, 616.
Derby's Ministry, 102.
De Rivière Case, 695.
De Saxty, or De Sauty, 607.
Desert, Expedition to the Great, 343.
Island, Leaving Men on a, 662.
Detectives, How—were Caught, 71.
Devil, a Young, 423.
Dewey, Rev. Dr. 615.
Whipping of, 615.
Diamond, the Second Dukedom of 182.
Diamond Jewels, Millions, 535.
Dickens at Home, 291.
On Uncertainty, 343.
On Poor Children, 366.
Dickens's Household, 407, 423, 471.
Disinheriting, New Mode of, 461.
Di Vernon in Europe, 615.
Diving Bell, 87.
Divorce Act, Working of the New, 215.
Case, Curious, 391.
In Prussia, 775.
Doctors, a Question for, 95.
Dodge, Mr. 615.
Dog, 615.
Dorch, 504—Once Again, 566.
Double Widowhood, the, 775, 796.
Douglas, Senator, 3.
Mr. Senator, 662.
Report on Kansas, of, 166.
Down at the Swamp, 615.
Drain, three Hours in a London, 266.
Drama, the Legal, 615.
Dreams, Fulfillment of, 663.
Dreher, Heir of the Late, 615.
Dudley Observatory, 438.
Duel, a Fatal, 615.
Duel, C. A. Bristed fights a, 583.
Commencement of a, 567.
Fitzgerald's, 375.
Fought, 615.
Tis Do Not, 391.
Duelling, New Style of, 631.
Duel, the Last Noveau, 791.
Last Dish of, 439.
Thrilling Incident, 615.
Dwarf, Death of a, 775.

Earthquake Experience, 204.
In Connecticut, 615.
Ebony Box, 42, 55.
Eclipse, a Curious, 567.
Editor and Lawyers, 615.
Editorial Popular, Illustrated, 631.
Eckalot Lecture, 775.
El Dorado, another, 615.
Elections, the, 615, 726.
Election, the Fraud, 726.
The, 615.
State, 726.
Electric Shocks, 146.
Electricity used in Dentistry, 647.
Elgin Stephen Chas, 695.
Obituary of an, 472.
Hospital Question on an, 55.
Washington, 695.
Elgin, Lord, 695.
Of a Ward in Chancery, 622.
Embarrassed, to be, 252.
Emigrant Life, 494.
Emperor of Russia and the Peasant Woman, 99.
Empress of Russia and Mr. Bright, 743.
England, Annexation of—to French Crown, 359.
Change of Ministry in, 178.
Peace with, 695.
English, Hon. William H., 221.

English Money Market, Improvement in, 55.
Event First Colors, 439.
Engraving, Wood, 439.
Extinguishers, 439.
Epitaph, Plain—spoken, 487.
Escape, Narrow, 39.
Etiquette, Curiosities of Royal, 679.
Europe, Isolation, 215.
More Cogitat for, 535.
On Shipboard, 503.
Art a Hell, 583.
Queer Sights of, 551.
To be Regent, 135.
To visit the Pope, 711.
Excommunicated by Telegraph, 725.
Execution, Shocking for the Royal-high Life Below, 518.
Executions at Bourdeaux, 551.
Exhibition, 1851, 247.
Explosion on North River, 746.
Explosion of Steam, the Cause, 646.
Ex-policeman taken in, 646.
Evening, Spending a, 647.

Fact, Fancy, and Fun, 359, 597, 725.
Family, a Comfortable, 215.
Fanaticism, 615.
Fanny, 187.
Fashionable Fat, 631.
Father, an Unnatural, 695.
Fatherless Children, 695.
Feasibility of Ship Canal, 695.
Fenwick, Bishop Benedict, 615.
Federal Despotism, March of, 439.
Female Impudence, 535.
Field, Cyrus W., Esq., 536.
Fiendish Act, 503.
Filibusterism, the Rights and Wrongs
Filibusters, Arrival of — at Mobile, 567.
Filibustering in Nicaragua, 662, 679.
Filibuster, Proclamation against, 710.
Fillmore's, Mrs., Carriage, Sale of, 291.
Financial Crisis, 695.
Financial Statement, the, 695.
Financial Schemes, Now, 23.
Situation, the, 296.
Fire at Sea, 759.
Scene in a, 455.
Fishing Banks, Trip to the, 503.
Fish, Nice and Cheap, 615.
Five Points Children, Dinner of the, 615.
Flood at Cairo, 407.
Family Destroyed by the, 406.
The Great, 412.
Floods in the West, 418.
Fly-bite, Death from a, 663.
Flying Machine, 615.
Fog, Effects of, 615.
Foreign Wars, Prospects of, 134.
Forgery, Daring, 615.
Settling Committee, Report of, 784.
Forgeries, Extent of, 695, 742.
France, Condition of, 455.
France, How People Live in the Country in, 817.
Movements in, 391.
Revenues and Expenditures of, 327.
Francis, Dr. Convers, Decease of, 615.
Francis, Dr. Life of, 615.
Franchi, Visit of Ebenezer, 646.
Franklin Statue to be Made, 473.
Franklin, the Tomb of, 630.
Fraud, Bold—and Trick, 375.
Frauds detected by Astronomy, 730.
French Affairs, Present State of, 615.
Furts on, 644.
Gold Region, Use of, 462.
Gold-fields, 666.
Gold-fields, Experience on, 471.
Gold-mines, 461, 506, 782.
Gold-washing, 615.
Journalism at, 534.
Politics, 615.
Revolution, the Princess, 503.
An Invalid, 497.
Fruit Trade, 695.
Fortune of, 453.
Freemasonry, Reading for, 470.
Free Lovers at Berlin, 438.
French Citizens, Arrest of, 439, 471.
Doctor's Story, the, 545.
Fanaticism, Rebuked, 615.
Legitimist Corps, 7.
Life and Character, 615.
Refugee, Arrest of a, 503.
Revolution, 615.
Vengeance, 615.
Fyfe Dress Coat in a Minute in a, 695.

Galleya, the, 439.
Gambling and Gamblers at Washington, 714.
And Lotteries, 710.
Bank Broken, 615.
Hell in Washington, 726.
House in Broadway, Affair in a, 615.
Gayzani and Cromwell, 474.
General Assembly, Speech of the, 695.
Ghorkis Chicks and British, 237.
Ghosts, a Story of, 615.
Ghosts, Modern, 663.
Gibbs, Hon. Alfred, 615.
Giger Berry, 615.
Girard, Stephen, 626.
Girl, Abducted by a, 454.
A—Exchanged for a Donkey, 39.
Glass Blowing, Curious Fact in, 695. glandi, 791.
Glass Eyes—are rewarded in Fairs, 695.
Manufacture of, 695.
Glenelg, Lord, 615.
Gold Dollars, Latest from the, 615.
Mines, Latest from the, 615.
Gold-digging, Life in, 615.
Gold Berry, 615.
Goldy Tragedy, the, 712.
Governess's Story, of the, 406.
Hint for the, 520.
Governor, the Mysterious, 615.
Grandeo, How they Treat each other, 791.
Great Eastern, Failure of the, 615.
Launch of the, 615.
Great Master, the, 46.
Greece's Noble Chara, 615.
Green, Hon. Jos. S., 295.
Green, Hon. Thomas, 615.
Grist Mill, Burning of a, 615.
Groom, Career of a Lucky, 695.
Grow, Hon. G. A., 615.
Gubernatorial Messages, 53, 725.
Message, Last Fragment of a, 54.
Guy's Fairy Ball, Mrs. 262.
Gwin, Hon. Wm. M., 247.

Hair, a Robber of 71.
Hakodadi, U. S. Consul at, 711.
Hale, Hon. John P., 247.
Halleck, Genral, 615, 695.
Hamilton, Burr and, 66.

Hanover, Rival King of, 678.
Harem, a Revolt in the, 663.
Harem, a Story of the, 567.
Harper's Ferry Affair, 615.
Harriet Lane, Reverse Letter, 174.
Havana, Explosion at, 679, 694.
Hawkins, Sir John, Adventures of, 615.
Habits of, 87.
Honor to General, 93.
Is—a Barrel? 87.
Letter from Lady, 231.
Headless Men walking, 759.
Heidelberg, Studies Life at, 615.
Heir of Hardtimes, the, 839.
Heir, the Rich, 615.
Herbert (H. W.), Suicide of, 615.
Hero, a, 615.
Hero, the Modern, 615.
Highwayman, 58.
Hint, a Kind of, 615.
Holy Water, Is—Dutiable? 631.
Hong Kong, Life in, 695.
Hoop, Accident from Wearing, 175.
Hoop-skirt, the, 247, 743.
A Tax on, 599.
Hopkins, Dr. 279.
Denounced, 679.
Female Assault on, 791.
Fearful Consequences of Wearing, 599.
And Gow, 695.
Horse, Fast, 695.
Priest Imprecated for shoeing, 791.
Priests down on, 775.
Horticultural Show, 695.
vs. Salvation, 615.
Hops and Management, 545.
Horrors, Tale of, 263.
Hotels killed by Wages, 631.
A furlong, 695.
Hotel, the Tremont and Country, 465.
Taming, Profits of, 695.
Household Words, a Mean-host, 710.
Hydrophobia, Death from, 599.

Ices, Baked, 695.
Immigrant Aid Society, Office of, 722.
Imperial Family, 695.
Prince, the, 55, 199.
Impostor, Detection of an, 535.
Incidents, a Yellow Fever, 742.
Indigestion, Cure for, 695.
Indiana Senators, Case of the, 174.
Indian Letter Carriers, 695.
War, Close of the, 695.
War, Another, 695, 711.
Indignation Meeting in London, 503.
Inquisition, the, 695.
Insurrection, Prospects of, 727.
Institution, a N. Y., 695.
In the Interior, 695.
Investigating Committee, the New, 50.
Iowa, Life in, 695.
Ireland, Condition of, 503.
Indiana Families, Sentence of the, 503.

Indian Rebellion.
(See also separate Headings.)
Agra, Attack on, 695.
American Missionaries, 503.
Ava, Fall of, 503.
Campbell's, Sir C., Debut, 487.
Escape, 695.
Fun at Attock, 503.
Gwalior Contract, 727.
And the Ladies, 695.
Cawnpore, Scene at, 71.
Delhi, Capture of, 503.
The Last Invasion of, 567.
Cost of Rebellion, 695.
Danger of the British, 535.
Delhi, Arrival of, 695.
Fall of, 695.
How the King of—is treated, 71.
King of—Promoted by a Soldier, 71.
How the Princes of—are treated, 71.
Royal Family of, 71.
Delhi, Capture of, 503, 231.
Dost Mahomed, 695.
Dust Storm, a, 439.
Elephant Hunt, 695.
End of Rebellion, 39.
Expedition to Cashmere, 39.
False News, Bearers of, 487.
Future of India, 695.
Gentleman, how they Fight, 23.
Government of India, 264.
Invader Murdered, 695.
Havelock, Death of, 71.
Death of Another, 375.
Heat, the, 487.
Hindoo Women, 695.
Hindoostanee, 695.
Highland Minister, 7.
Highlanders, 695.
Indio, 695.
Life, the New, 454.
Indian Generals, 183.
Rebellion, Wreck of Mr. Layard on, 599.
Life Picture of, 791.
Jhansi and Kote, Capture of, 527.
Kaiserhagh, Pillage of the, 503.
King's Residence Burned, 695.
Wife Murdered, 727.
Lawrence, Death of, 87.
Leaders, 695.
Attack on, 231.
Battle of, 231.
Capture of, 202.
City, 54.
Defence of, 727.
Fall of, 375.
Flight of, 50, 119.
First Prince of Palace of, 439.
How—are Taken, 695.
Lucknow, Capture of, 311.
Ladies in, 503.
Nightingales at, 167.
Relief of, 503.
Manmar's Pen, 39.
Mogul, Modern—of Great, 599.
Mussulman Fanatics, 487.

Mediation, 39.
Mediterranean, Excursion of, 7.
Native Life in India, 117.
Naval Brigade, 71.
Navy Brigade in Action, 87.
Nell, how Created—was Raised, 231.
News, 503, 631.
Nicholson, Brigadier, 503.
Nicholson's Death, 711.
Peasantry, Dress of the, 615.
Plunder, Magnificent, 631.
Sepoy Victim, another, 391.
Sepoys, what—Think of Justice, 23.
Sharpshooters, 87.
Sikhs, Character of the, 439.
Sikh, What is a? 615.
Origin of the Religionists, 23.
Traitor at Delhi, 7.
Vengeance, 615, 727.
Victories, More, 599.
Wyndham's Defeat, 87.
Zouaves, the, 343.
Jack-Knife, Story of a, 166.
Jack the Giant-killer, the New—and the European Giants, 524.
Jaffe Outrage, the, 695.
Jail, Attempt to Break, 549.
Jail Delivery, Escape of—Lives, 729.
New Treaty with 33.
Japanese, 695.
Japanese Ballets, 727.
Jealousy, Effects of, 695.
Jesuits, Intolerance, Approach of the, 710.
Jesuits, Massacre at, 487, 503.
The Heroism of the, 615.
Jerks, the in France, 119.
Jerrolidean, 615.
Jerusalem, Murder of an English Lady in, 503.
Jew Bill in Parliament, 519.
How—are Kept on the Go, 23.
Question in Parliament, 615.
Jew's Harp, the Famous, 535.
Jewels, Cheap, 183.
Jim Crow, Jump—as the American is, 599.
John Sleeper's Story, 717.
Johnson, Governor, 119.
Johnston's Views, Col., 714.
John, a Precocious, 630.
A Western, 454.
Judas Iscariot, 695.
Juries, Tampering with, 536.

Kansas Affairs, 9, 10, 22, 35, 54, 69, 70, 85, 86.
Conference at, 119.
Convention, 246.
Question, 134, 198.
Gold in, 630.
Free—in, 119.
Life in, 710.
Move in, 423.
President's Message on, 407.
President's Policy Reviewed, 439.
Question, Settlement of the, 8.
Killing no Murder, 615, 647.
King, a, in the House of Commons, 727.
Kossuth, Letter of—for Sympathy, 615.
Kiss and a Kick, 615.
Look of a, 615.
Six Months' Imprisonment for a, 615.
Knox, Edward, a Man's Wife was—his, 647.
Knox, Hon. Thomas W., 615.
Labuan, 54.
Ladies' Baby Combat, 503.
Ladies, How Grand—live at Paris, 695.
New Hat for, 599.
Boxing by, 632.
Ladies' Fancy Punch, 663.
Why—pulled, 615.
Lady, a Literary, in Trouble, 647.
Lady, a Young—in a Trance, 487.
Death of a—from Effects of, 487.
Lafayette, Parents of, 615.
Lamartine, 615.
Robbed by a Swell, 695.
Saved her Life but lost her Jewels, 695.
Young—Shot, 454.
La Grange, Madame, at Court, 726.
Lamartine's Common Beggar, 791.
Philosophy, 615.
Going into Exile, 719.
Flight, 615.
Lamartine's Subscription a Failure, 615.
Land Office, Report of the, 697.
Sales, Receipts of, 695.
Warrants, Sale of, 695.
Lander's Troubles, 599.
Land Speculations, by Western, 279.
Law, What it Costs to go to, 679.
Lecompton, 615.
Committee, 114.
Constitution in Congress, 85.
Legend of my Native Town, 19.
Lafayette, Reception of, 615.
Letter, a Model, 695.
Letters, Dead, 454, 184, 183, 647.
Accident to, 375.
Irregularities in, 23.
Fourth Failure in, 615.
Launch of 7, 71, 183.
Liberty, Remarks Pale of a, 375.
Life, a Finger for a, 742.
Lion Farm, 615.
Lind, Jenny, in England, 695.
Lion Hunt, a Terrible, 615.
Lichen, the Yellow Fever at, 199.
Liquor, Drinking—for the Cholera, 96, 103, 118, 134, 150, 166, 182, 198, 214, 230, 246, 262, 278, 294, 310, 326, 342, 358, 374, 390, 406, 422, 438, 454, 470, 486, 502, 518, 534, 550, 566, 582, 598, 614, 630, 646, 662, 678, 694, 710, 726, 742, 758, 774, 790, 806, 822.
Literature, Contemporaneous French, 647.
Little God-for-Nothing, 506, 524.
Little Girl, a, 615.
Little, Sarah, at Sing Sing, 470.
Livingston, Mr. and Mrs. 647.
Departure of, 615.
Locusts, the, 615.
Londonderry's New Expedition, 711, 695.
Lord, 615.
Lord Cochrane—at Washington, 710.
Lockport, 615.
Longchamps in August, 583.
Longwood granted to the French, 407.
Longworth, Nicholas, Esq., 474.
Last Affair, 615.
Lounger, 8, 15, 34, 50, 66, 82, 98, 114, 130, 146, 162, 178, 194, 210, 226, 242, 258, 274, 290, 306, 322, 338, 354, 370, 386, 402, 418, 434, 450, 466, 482, 498, 514, 530, 546, 562, 578, 594, 610, 626, 642, 658, 674, 690, 706, 722, 738, 754, 770, 786, 802, 818.

GENERAL INDEX.

Love and Law, 487.
And Murder, 727.
Desertion, etc., 534.
In the Cars, 618.
In the Clouds, 683.
Story, My, 554.
Tragedy, a, 519.
Lovers, a Pair of Old, 359.
Lover, Story of a Mad, 630.
Lozenges, Wholesale Poisoning with, 774.
Lull House, the Old, 116.
Lumbering in Maine, 618.
Lynch Law in Lexington, 481.
Lyonnais, Escape of the—from Marseilles, 87.

Macaulay, Inauguration of Lord, 359.
(Lord) as a Beau, 327.
Macedonian, U.S.S., 477.
Madeira, will there be any more? 647.
Madison Mystery, the, 362.
Madness, singular Case of, 791.
Madonna, Another—Stolen, 311.
Mail Bags, Precious, 438.
Coach Adventure, 638.
Malakoff, Arrival of Duke of, 294.
Bride of the Duke of, 631.
Marriage of the Duke of, 711.
Probable Marriage of the Duke of, 599.
The Duke of—and Lady Jersey, 790.
Mammoth Cave, Exploration in, 614.
Man (a) makes his Soul his Heir, 423.
Of Business, Story of, 90.
Of War, a New, 599.
Smothered in a Chimney, 727.
Manilla, Visit to, 60.
Markets and Financial Reports, 15, 31, 47, 63, 79, 95, 111, 127, 143, 159, 175, 191, 209, 223, 239, 255, 271, 287, 303, 319, 335, 351, 366, 383, 399, 415, 481, 447, 463, 479, 490, 514, 527, 543, 559, 575, 591, 607, 623, 639, 655, 671, 686, 703, 718, 734, 751, 767, 782, 798, 818.
Markets in Large Cities, 40.
Marriage, a Queen's, 503.
Between two Women, 599.
Contract, Stipulation in, 487.
Law in France, 375.
Service, Mute, 662.
Marriages, how can be dissolved, 359.
Married without Knowing it, 710.
Marry, how People in Belgium, 583.
Whom should we? 482.
Martial Law in Richmond Co., 610.
Masked Balls, 183.
Are we to have? 258.
Mason, Hon. Jas. M., 177.
Mason's Ball, Minister, 199.
Matrimonial epidemic, 647.
Epidemic in Paris, 663.
M'Clintock, Rev. Jno., D.D., 309.
Meade, Mr. in Brazil, 118.
Means, our—and Liabilities, 34.
Merchant Prince, another Liverpool, 407.
Mesalliance, a, 359.
Message, and accompanying Documents, Presidential, 790, 806.
Messages, Gubernatorial, 774.
Message, the—on Mexico, 770.
Mexican Robbers Punished, 679.
Robbery of British Minister, 23.
Mexico, 754.
Affairs in, 167.
Condition of, 210, 727.
More Trouble in, 418.
Ought U. S. to Intervene? 162.
Our Relations with, 454, 470.
Progress of Priestly Despotism in, 775.
Revolution in, 98, 215.
Rupture of Diplomatic Intercourse, 423.
Mexico, the Case of, 806.
Mexico and Cuba, 803.
War in, 124.
Miel Bonbon, 490.
Millionaire, an Illiterate, 631.
And Danseuse, 759.
Will of a, 166.
Millionaires of England, 631.
Ministerial Scandals, 182.
Ministers, our Foreign, 242.
Minnesota, Admission of, 86.
Miracle, the Last, 711, 759.
The last French, 615, 737.
Miscellany, 28, 44, 62, 78, 92, 108, 126, 142, 156, 174, 189, 203, 220, 238, 254, 267, 283, 302, 318, 334, 350, 366, 382, 398, 414, 429, 446, 462, 478, 494, 526, 590.
Miser, Extraordinary, 519.
Missionaries, Outrage on American, 183.
Missionary Martyr, a Recent, 245.
Mississippi, Pleasant for—Passengers, 327.
Mock Auctions, 209.
Mocking-bird in Court, 550.
Mohammed Pacha, 196.
Monaco, the Principality of, 812.
Monarchy, Anomalies of, 674.
Monroe Obsequies, 456.
Montalembert, Prosecution of Count, 743.
Montalembert, Sentence of, 807.
Montalembert, the Count, 818.
Moon, the, 488.
Mormon affairs, Settlement of, 226.
Designs, 326.
Duplicity, 342.
Hegira, 338.
Military Tactics, 22.
Submission, 358.
Submission Reported, 342.
War, 22.
War, End of, 386, 470.
Mormons, Interesting Facts about the, 781.
Morphy and Staunton, 759, 790.
And Harwitz, 663.
Beaten, 631.
Challenge to Staunton, 711.
In Europe, 645.
In Paris, 487, 725.
Paul, 613.
Playing blindfold at Paris, 679.
Morphy's Chess Games, 615.
Engagements, 743.
Games at Chess, 598.
Reception in Paris, 647.
Success at Paris, 759.
Morse, Dinner to Prof., 583.
Remuneration of Prof., 327.
Mortara Case, the, 711, 743, 786.
At Madras, a, 775.
The Pope's Defense in the, 775.
Moslem Outrages, 519.
Persecutions, 535.
Mother of sixty-nine children, a, 423.
Mount Vernon, a Visit to, 420.
Purchase of, 498.
Mountebank, the, 634.
Mud Sills, Gov. Wise on, 470.
Mungo Park, Relic of, 487.
Municipal Jokes, 674.
Murder, 55.

Murder, Arrest for—Committed thirty-three years ago, 791.
In California, 214.
In the Cote D'Or, 199.
In Michigan, 406.
Trial, Extraordinary, 39.
Will out, 598.
Murderer, Punishment of a, 423.
Swift Punishment of a, 534.
Murderers, American Sympathy with, 290.
Shall the—be hanged? 18.
Murillo, Mr. Aspinwall's, 77.
Murnaga Affair, the, 454.
Musard, 229.
My first and last Novel, 474.
Mystery of a Lace Handkerchief, 471.
My Unfortunate Uncle, 539.

Nahant, Ball at, 566.
Belle Life at, 552.
Napier, Recall of Lord, 807.
Napier's Successor (Lord), 807.
Naples, a Street in, 776.
Earthquake at, 39, 71, 103, 119, 189, 215.
Humiliation of, 418.
Prisons at, 311.
Who may go to? 503.
Napoleon Plant, 348.
Napoleon I., Tomb of, 477.
Napoleon, Promotion of Prince, 391.
Napoleon III. among the People, 263.
At Biarritz, 647.
Attempt on Life of, 119.
Attempt to Assassinate, 87.
And Eugenie, 71.
And Lamartine, 263.
Freak of, 423.
Bill for Protection of, 151.
Dictates to England, 454.
How—is guarded, 247.
How many Sons has? 423.
How spends his Time, 487.
How travels by Rail, 715.
Laws to protect, 183.
On the English Difficulty, 215.
Other Attempts on his life, 167.
Nervousness about England, 311.
Prosecution for Libel on, 182.
Recklessness of, 231.
vs. Bible Societies, 439.
Napoleon vs. Justice, 695.
National Intelligencer and Editors, 45.
Naval Instructions, 342.
Navy, Report of the—Department, 807.
Neapolitans, what—do when scared, 71.
Neck, Setting a Broken, 215.
Negro Princes at Paris, 679.
Sold in Boston, 215.
Nena Sahib's Executioner, 96.
Neutrality Laws, 70.
New Caledonia, Organization of, 487.
New Granada, the Old Quarrel with, 70.
New Orleans Riots, 370, 374.
Newport, Festivities at, 566.
Grand Fête at, 582.
Newspaper Correspondent, Misfortunes of a, 583.
Prosecuted, 167.
New York State Loans, 422.
Niagara Falls, a Trip to, 632.
Scene at, 662.
Nicaragua, British Treaty with, 626.
Inter-oceanic Route, Opening of the, 706.
Nobleman, how to become a, 615.
Nose, Porcelain, 182.
Nunnery Life, Revelations of, 151.

Ocean Mail Service, 358.
Postage Bill, 406.
Steamers, 274.
Steamers, can we sustain? 194.
O'Conor, Hon. Charles, 52.
Officials badly scared, 663.
Officiousness, the Danger of, 726.
Old Customs, 795.
Husbands and Young Wives, 30.
Maid's Life, a Story of an, 171.
Régime, a Touch of the, 439.
Olympic Games, Revival of the, 663.
One Day in my Life, 11.
On the Road, 442.
Operation, a Fearful, 742.
Ordinance of 1787, who was Author of? 398.
Organist, our New, 570.
Orleans, Death of the Duchess of, 375.
Will of Duchess of, 455.
Orr, Hon. James L., 139.
Orsini and Pierri, Execution of, 231.
English Accomplice of, 167.
Is he a Jesuit? 167.
Masses for, 263.
Trial of, 167.
Orsini's Family, a Million Subscribed for, 295.
Last Letter, 279.
Letter to his Children, 231.
Trial, 199.
Will, 263.
Ottawa City, 116.
Oude, Burial of Queen of, 205.
Funeral of Queen of, 135.
Our Charley, 282.
Wall, 618.
Overland Mail to California, the, 662, 785.
Owen, Death of Robert, 790.

Pacific Rail-road, 258, 706.
Pacific, the Lost Steamer, 55.
Packet Ship's Company, 285.
Paddy and I, 158.
Paez, Gen., 693.
At Washington, 710.
Return of, 658.
Paraguay Expedition, 614, 642, 669.
At Bermuda, 792.
Paraguay, War with, 306.
Palmerston and the Newsman, 39.
Last Bon Mot of, 647.
Resignation of, 182.
Panic, the, in Europe, 2.
What the—cost Paris, 583.
Pardoning Business, the, 770.
Paris, American Chapel in, 109.
Conference, the new, 391.
4th July at, 503.
High Rents in, 679.
How Public Demonstrations are Prevented in, 23.
Life in, 375.
Meeting of Americans in, 135.
Sewer, the Great, 252.
Strangers in, 487.
The American Chapel at, 407.
Theatrical Applause in, 103.
Parisian Mania, New, 743.
Parisians in Hot Weather, 455.
Parliament, 7, 135, 247.
Property Qualification for, 422.
Parsee Club, a, 775.
Paulding's, Com., Letter to Walker, 22.
Paul Drayton's Charm, 443.
Peeping Tom in Luck, 550.
Pei-ho Forts, Attack on the, 516.
Capture of the, 535.
Pekin, China, 604.

Pelissier and Aumale, 375.
Marshal Jean Jacques, 277.
Pelissier's Reception in England, 247.
Penal Law, New, 183.
Penitentiary Tragedy, 198.
People's Party, 374.
Perim and its Consequences, 290.
Island of, 326.
Question in France, 279.
Perjurers, Treatment of, in New Orleans, 486.
Perry, Com. M. C., 172.
Persian Dancing Girl, 492.
Persigny, M. de, 263.
Personal Explanations, 131.
Personal Gossip, 6, 22, 38, 54, 70, 86, 102, 118, 134, 150, 166, 182, 198, 214, 230, 246, 262, 278, 294, 310, 326, 342, 358, 374, 390, 406, 422, 438, 454, 470, 486, 502, 519, 534, 550, 566, 582, 598, 630, 646, 662, 678, 695, 710, 726, 742, 759, 807.
Pet of the Law, 74, 140.
Petrified Wife, a, 727.
Petticoat, the Red, 100.
Pfeiffer, Madame Ida, 757.
Philanthropist Punished, 807.
Photographic Marvels, 486.
Photographing an Execution, 727.
Physical Decay in the United States, 130.
Piccolomini, Mdmslle., 689.
Pickpocket, an Hour with a, 622.
Pierri's Daughter, 247.
Pig, Fight with a, 678.
Pined Away, 550.
Pin-money, a French Lady's, 23.
And Needle-money, 4.
Pirate, Confession of a, 534.
Pittsburgh, Centennial Celebration at, 773.
Plains, Mammoth Train on the, 566.
Poisoned Meal, the, 650, 666, 682.
Police Amenities, 375.
Blunders of the, 503.
Reminiscences of the Prussian, 14.
Secret—in Paris, 247.
What the—does in Paris, 391.
Political Conventions, 550, 598.
Office-holders, 674.
Pope, Accident to the, 743.
Nun released by the, 790.
The—and Miss Dix, 743.
Pope's Dungeon, Escape from the, 519.
Portugal, Queen of—in England, 359.
Postage, Shall—be increased, 802.
Post Office Report, 807.
Powers, what—is Doing, 791.
Prætorian Guards, the French, 391.
Prairie Fancies, 437.
Preachers, London, 567.
Predicament, Fearful, 535.
Presentiment, Strange, 790.
Presidential Drawing Room, the Last, 296.
Press, Bribery of the, 34.
In France, 71.
Liberties of, 7.
Pretender's Hound, the, 535.
Priest catches six Brigands, a, 679.
How I became a, 606.
Murder by a, 743.
Prime Minister, an Expensive, 743.
Caught Stealing, a, 775.
Prime, Rev. S. I., D.D., 609.
Prince Alfred nearly Drowned, 487.
Imperial, the Little, 39.
Of Spain, the, 7.
Of Wales, Freaks of, 455.
Princess of Prussia, at Home, 199.
Royal and King of Prussia, 247.
Royal, Marriage of, 54, 67.
Wedding Presents, 39.
Royal, what the—thinks of Herself, 151.
Printing, U. S., 274.
Prioress Beaten, 711.
Prison, Torture and Homicide in an American State, 808.
Prize Fight, the, 690, 694.
Promenades of London and Paris, 390.
Prophet, French—Condemned, 183.
Provo, Utah Territory, 653.
Prussia, King of, 711.
Imbecility of the King of, 391.
The Prince Regent of, 741.
The Regency in, 711.
Prussian Marriage, Is it Happy? 615.
Publishers' Card, 2.
Convention at Brussels, 690.
Pulwan Singh, 311.
Pun, a Presidential, 470.
Punning in the Pulpit, 423.
Purchases, Two Great, 807.
Puseyism, Progress of, 647.

Quarantine, Burning of the, 578, 581.
Is—necessary? 658.
Perils of Service at, 598.
Quarrels in Congress, 390.
Quasimodo, a Real, 439.
Queen, Adventures of a, 567.
Robbing a, 743.
Queer Fish, a, 726.
Story, 647.
Quitman, Gen. Jno. A., 484.

Rachel, Anecdotes of, 155.
And Dr. Veron, 103.
Death of, 71.
Funeral of, 87.
Gossip about, 542.
Her Religion, 87.
How—looked in her Death Agony, 423.
Last Moments of, 103.
Tomb of, 775.
Who was Father to her Children? 103.
Radetzky, Death of, 71.
Sells his Body to a Creditor, 103.
Railroads and their Policy, 642.
War of the, 434.
War on, 498.
What Cattle Suffer on, 438.
Railway Accidents in France, 407.
Decapitation by, 647.
Management, 60.
Policy, 674.
Property, the Future of, 786.
Question, 226.
Robbery, a, 167.
System in the United States, 146.
Rain, How to make, 439.
Raise the Wind, a New Way to, 583.
Rarey, How Mr.—Tames Horses, 508.
In England, 133.
In Northern Europe, 791.
In Paris, 199.
Mr.—Letter from, 455.
On Ladies' Horsemanship, 630.
Rarey's Secret Out, 487.
Rat, Death from Bite of a, 487.
Tale, a, 574.
Rats in a Dead-house, 631.
Rattlesnake, Encounter with a, 550.
Rector's Cross, the, 26.
Red Petticoat in Paris, 231.
Republican, Another—in Favor, 679.

Regatta, New York Yacht Club, 381.
Relic of the Last Century, 679.
Religious Intolerance in Sweden, 407.
Liberty in Austria, 679.
Rites, Droll—at Genoa, 775.
Resurrectionist Story, 190.
Revenge in Texas, 486.
Revivalist, a—in Scotland, 247.
Revolutionary Outburst in France, 215.
Ridgway, Miss, Marriage of, 279.
Right of Search Question, the, 806.
Right of Visit, the, 818.
Rights of Our Flag, 338.
Ristori a Revolutionist, 663.
Robber, Robbing a, 535.
Robber's Cave, a, 727.
Robbery in the Papal States, 39.
Justifiable, 519.
Rodgers, Execution of, 742.
Rogers' Marine Signals, 290.
Romance, a Strange, 502.
In the Prussian Peerage, 551.
In Real Life, 182.
Romantic Story, 640, 758.
Rome Refuses Bibles, 727.
The French in, 791.
Rossini and the Organ-grinder, 183.
Rossini's New Home, 743.
Rosy Cheeks, Cost of, 183.
Rothschilds, Congress of the, 679.
Royal Endearments, 583.
Governments, Cost of, 290.
Progress in England, 439.
Visit, the Next, 311.
Wedding, the, 103, 118, 135, 138.
Royalty's Shoes, 487.
Rum Fishers, two, 470.
Russian Corruption, 55.
Emancipation Scheme, 39, 519, 551.
Gallantry, 343.
Morals, 583.
Prodigality, 471.

Sad Story, a, 361, 534.
Affair, a, 582.
Safety at Sea, 114.
Salerno Conspirators, 167.
Salkeld, Family of Lieut., 71.
Salt Lake City, 312, 504.
Calaboose in, 709.
Gov. Cumming Expelled from, 374.
Gov. Cumming at, 390.
Doings at, 598.
Views in and about, 605, 620.
Sand, George, intercedes with the Empress, 39.
Sarah Sands, Loss of the, 55.
Saratoga, Peep at, 546.
Sardinian Prisoners, how treated at Naples, 375.
Sawyer, Old Father, 692.
Sawyer's Translation, 722.
Scandal, the Trade in, 514.
Scene in a Church, 454.
Scheffer, Death of Ary, 439.
Schuyler, a Roman, 23, 55.
Scott, Lieut. Gen. Winfield, 385.
Scurrilous Newspapers, 7.
Sea-fish, How to Tame a, 535.
Sea-sickness, new cure for, 791.
Sebastopol, Explosion of Shells at, 270.
Foundling, a, 727.
Narrow escape at, 135.
Submarine operations at, 20.
Raising Vessels at, 455, 743.
Seducer Shot, 582.
Three years' chase after a, 534.
Self-government in Large Cities, 738.
Senate, Special Session of, 406.
Senator Elected by a Love-letter, 279.
Sensible People, Hints to, 242.
Sepoys, what is to be done with them? 274.
Seraglio, Reform in the, 647.
Serfdom, Abolition of, 157.
Sermons in Verse, 636.
Shaker Couple, Runaway, 486.
Shakspeare's House, Restoration of, 327.
Shark, Chase of a, 215.
Fishing, 518.
Shawl, Story of a, 423.
Shipwreck, a romance of, 764.
Thrilling Story of, 759.
Shocking Story, 614.
Shot with Water, 742.
Signers of the Declaration, 417.
Sisters, the, 823.
Skating, 149.
Slave-trade, African, 22.
Debate on the, 438.
In Parliament, 454.
Loss on the, 278.
Napoleon III. on the, 775.
New, 71.
Reopening of the, 162, 1[illegible].
Walewski on, 278.
Sleigh Drive, our, 132.
Sleighing in Broadway, 149.
Slidell, Hon. John, 193.
Slip between Cup and Lip, 733.
Small Pox, Damages for, 39.
Smell, How Nations, 663.
Smith, General P. F., 372.
Smugglers, Aristocratic, 663.
Snobbery, Royal, 679.
Social Prospects at Paris, 727.
Soldiers, Amphibious, 519.
Son of France, the, 614.
Soulouque and his Troops, 359.
Southern Commercial Convention, 326.
Soyer, Death of M., 551.
Sowing his Wild Oats, 410.
Spanish Baby, Baptism of the, 39.
Bombast against the U. S., 327.
Spies in Paris, 231, 279.
Spring Talk, 282.
Spurgeon, Illness of Mr., 743.
Squaws, Trade in, 662.
St. Bartholomew, Massacre of, 535.
St. Valentine and Valentines, 104.
Staunton, Gov., why removed, 6.
Starvation, when fatal, 103.
State Legislatures, 38, 54, 86.
Staten Island, Army of Occupation on, 612.
States, How new—should be admitted, 294.
Staunton backs out, 727.
"Steaks," Death of the last of the, 583.
Steamers, Break up of French Line of, 279.
Steam Fire-engine, a Self-propelling, 748.
Stephens, Hon. Alexander, 225.
Steptoe's Command, Defeat of Col., 438.
Stock Gamblers, Three Weeks with, 268.
Jobbing Excitement, 12.
Story without a Name, 747.
Stout (Ira) to be Hanged, 678.
Execution of, 695.
Straws, 130.
Strike but Hear! 502.
Suicide, Extraordinary, 566.
For Love, 534.
For Sport, 471.
In Delirium Tremens, 502.
Nearly a, 534.
New Modes of, 471.

Suicide of a Woman, 727.
Queer, 678.
Suing for an Idea, 343.
Sultan, Extravagance of the, 509.
Sultan's Daughter, Marriage of a, 455.
Retrenchment, Cost of the, 791.
Sultana, Cost of a, 615.
Marriage of a, 439.
Sumner's Treatment, Mr., 455.
Susquehannah, Last Cruise of, 316.
Swim, a Long, 391.
Swindlers, Honorable, Live in Europe, 39.
Swindling Dodge, 502.
Syria, Outrage in, 455.

T4FG2G, 776.
Target Excursion, a, 773.
Tariff Investigation, 102.
Committee, Report of, 358.
Tariff, a Revenue, 807.
Tea, Coffee, and Sugar, 690.
Teeth, wholesale Extraction of, 350.
Telegraph, Atlantic, 327.
Perils of, 663.
Secrets, how kept in France, 679.
Wire, 311.
Telegraphic Centres, 690.
Tell, a Western, 182.
Tenacity of Hope, 662.
Ten Thousand Dollar Dress, 711.
Termination Point Closed, 726.
Terror, a Tale of, 311.
New Reign of in France, 295.
Thackeray and Yates, 791.
On Schools, 55.
On the United States, 791.
Thackeray's Speech, 343.
Troubles, 519, 599.
Theatre-going, Effect of, 407.
Thief, Autobiography of a, 234.
Caught by Photography, 439.
Things Wise and Otherwise, 14, 30, 46, 62, 78, 94, 110, 126, 142, 158, 174, 190, 206, 222, 238, 254, 270, 286, 302, 318, 334, 350, 366, 382, 398, 414, 430, 446, 462, 478, 494, 511, 526, 542, 558, 574, 590, 606, 622, 638, 655, 670, 686, 702, 718, 750, 766, 798.
Three Thousand Years, a Work of, 599.
Thugs, Festival of, 364.
Tigress, Encounter with a, 167.
Times, is the—Corrupt? 391.
The—on American Expansion, 343.
Tipsy, Price of Getting, 167.
Torture at Naples, 775.
Touting for Business, 663.
Town and Country, 85.
Traction Engine, new, 276.
Trade, Thirty Years of, 375.
Last Year's, 754.
Transgressor, the Way of the, 807.
Trap, the, 750.
Travel Notes in Bible Lands, 5, 37, 69, 100, 141, 164, 237, 260, 308, 340, 436, 469, 694, 791.
Treasury Loan, new, 194, 198.
Notes, 6.
Trees, big—of California, 357.
Tribune, a Blister for the, 514.
Tribulations of the, 66.
Tried Friendship, 698.
Truth Telling, is—Good? 738.
Turkish Affairs, 647.
Bank, Counterfeits on the, 661.
Intolerance, 791.
Outrages, 599.
Tyng, Rev. Dudley, Last Moments of, 279.
Tyng, Rev. S. H., D.D., 65.

Unshipping a Cat's Rudder, 614.
U. S. again a Borrower, 530.
Troops, Collision between and Civil Authorities, 598.
What they think of—in Europe, 50.
Usury Law, 146.
Laws Nullified, 258.
Utah, 38, 182, 214, 230, 422, 694.
Affairs in, 614.
An Army in, 66.
Bragg's Battery for, 279.
Expedition, 6, 54, 72, 86, 246.
Instructions to, 150.
News from, 70.
Perils of the, 82.
What—will Cost, 70.
News from Expedition, 326.
Later from, 406, 486, 534, 758.
Legislature, 262.
New—Expedition, 310.
News from, 646.
War, Close of, 466.
War, Mr. Bernhisel on the, 454.
War in, 265.
Will there be a war in? 242.

Vancouver's Island, 516.
Venezuela, Revolution in, 215, 247.
Venice, Outburst at, 199.
Verazani Family, the, 471.
Vesuvius, Eruption of, 407, 453.
Veterans of 1812, 454.
Victoria, Extraordinary Letter to, 359.
How—lives at Balmoral, 679.
Photographs by, 87.
Present to, 678.
Victoria's Opinion of Napoleon III., 695.
Sons Setting Up in Life, 743.
State Ball, 359.
Visit to France, 487.
Virgin (the) in a Railway Car, 423.
Virginia Dare, 646.

Wabash, U. S. Steamer, astonishing the Turks, 743.
At Constantinople, 759.
Walker, General, the End of, 34, 279.
Arrest of, 22.
Capture of, 6.
And Paulding Imbroglio, the, 54.
Paulding's Letter to, 22.
Stirring again, 406.
Is a Frenchman, 775.
The Administration against, 38.
Walker's Men kept at Home, 758.
Waltzing, Death while, 423.
Warning to Young Frenchmen, 583.
War with England, Cost of a, 370.
War, Report of the Secretary of, 807. 812, 825.
Washington, Bon Mot on, 231.
Family Influence at, 198.
Festivities at, 118.
From a Mohammedan Point of View, 232.
Gayeties, 134, 182.
Glimpses at Life in, 804.
High Life at, 278.
Monument at Richmond, 114.
Monument to Col. Wm., 397.
Washington's Family Bible, 630.
Watching the Clock, 189.
Waugh, Rev. B., 140.
Waxhaws, Battle of, 346.
Weather in France, 55.
Webb, Gen. James W., 561.
Wedding at a Pic-nic, 582.

What will He Do with it? by Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, 26, 41, 58, 74, 106, 122, 138, 154, 170, 187, 204, 235, 251, 268, 284, 297, 315, 331, 368, 380, 395, 459, 476, 491, 507, 538, 557, 570, 619, 635, 651, 677, 688, 701, 714, 730, 746, 765, 812, 825.
White House, Scenes at, 170.
Widow, a Queer, 486.
Widows, Pretty—vs. Constables, 678.
Wife, Disowning an Indian, 327.
How Mr. Dix won a, 215.
How to Punish a Bad, 551.
Of Three Men, the, 775.
Old—in Search of a Young Husband, 827.
Taming in Boston, 534.
Wife's Throat Cut, a, 422.
Williams, Death of Rev. Eleazer, 582.
Wilson, Hon. Henry, 145.
Windfall, Lucky, a, 790.
Wiseman, Cardinal, on the Cable, 615.
Wives and Daughters, Prospective Cost of, 663.
Woman, can a—be a Seaman? 775.
Chopped up before her Husband, 727.
Fury of a Jealous, 502.
Letter to the Fairest, 231.
Whipping Priest, 422.
Woman's Rights, J. P. Hale on, 470.
Women, How, Work in London, 470.
N. Y. School of Design for, 723.
Wonderful Woman, 679.
Work-houses, Choice of, 566.
World's Fair, another in England, 790.
Wright's, Gov., Cold Water Festival, 375.

Years and Years ago, 299.
Year, the Old, 2.
Yeh, Personnel of, 359.
Yeh's Voyage to Prison, 295.
Yellow Fever at New Orleans, 582.
Yogees, the, of India, 366.
Young's, Brigham, Souls in Trouble, 774.
Compliments to U. S. Officers, 22.
Proclamation, 150.
View of his Position, 22.
Thinks Buchanan should hang, 22.
Young men, Opening for, 194.
Yrisarri Treaty, 290.

Zebra, how to Tame a, 391.

POETRY.

Alone, 203.
Anchored, 363.
Atlantic Cable, Conversation across the, 618.
Ode on the, 562.
Baby Valentine, a, 110.
Bash Bish, a Trip to, 628.
Beautiful Snow, 753.
Beauty, 347.
Belle, Song of the, 674.
Birds, 122.
Broadway, 428.
Broadway Lyric, 458.
Burial at Sea, 338.
Cable Charms, 668.
Christmas Eve, 825.
Christmas Song, a, 817.
Common Sense, 443.
Courtin', the, 680.
Crown of Sorrow, a, 491.
Cuirass, the, 94.
Darling Dora M'Ilvaine, 776.
Day and Night, 146.
Dream-Spinning, 522.
Egg, to an, 11.
Grace before Meals, 313.
Gray Hairs, the First, 362.
Havelock, 106.
Heed not the Erring Child, 126.
Home and Rest, 306.
Hoop de Dooden Doo, 414.
How Cyrus Laid the Cable, 578.
How's my Boy? 178.
Humbug, Ode to an Old, 722.
Hymn to Sleep, 363.
Hymn to Old Ocean, 597.
I have many Ships at Sea, 398.
Incident, an, 789.
Insane, 395.
In the Streets, 802.
Jennie's Cradle, 466.
Lament of a Prize Ox, 46.
Landmarks, 683.
Last Devil's Walk, the, 507.
Lay of the Cable, the, 744.
Leaves, 250.
Little Gray Cloak, the, 196.
Looking into the Well, 108.
Lotty Lowe, 106.
Lover's Dream, a, 298.
Love's Cure, 234.
Maggie Gray, 478.
March on, 26.
Marriage Remembrance, 268.
Mazed Kate at Clovelly, 738.
Moslem War Song, 90.
Musical Review, 251.
My Fair Love, 354.
My First Born, 516.
My Flora, 76.
My Sister, 44.
Nothing New, 489.
Old Letters, 299.
Old Maid's Retrospect, an, 267.
Old Story, an, 219.
Orphan's Dream, the, 763.
Phœbe's Wooing, 212.
Pilot's Wife, the, 107.
Poets, the three, 669.
Pompey's Philosophy, 212.
Poor Purse, 414.
Primrose, the, 725.
Resumption, 75.
Roundelay of the Hoop, 154.
Sketch, a, 346.
Sleigh Riding long ago, 28.
Snake, the, 564.
Somewhere to go, 770.
Spectre Text, the, 52.
Sure Casket, the, 145.
Surprise, the Little, 541.
Tea-party Politics, 170.
Thanksgiving, our, 762.
The Test, 270.
Town and Country, 426.
Treasures of Thought, 218.
Trust in God, 338.
Wait and Work, 289.
War Message, the, 417.
Wedding Eve, the, 682.
What a Ridiculous Fashion, 586.
Widow's Mite, the, 657.
Wife and Queen, 542.
Woman's Question, a, 153.
Yankee Maid, my, 91.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 53.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

NEW-YEAR'S VISITING IN NEW YORK.

PUBLISHERS' CARD.

MR. THACKERAY'S new STORY, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous illustrations by the author, is commenced in the DECEMBER number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets, received from the author in advance of publication in England; for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of $2000.

☞ With the full knowledge of this arrangement, the proprietors of the New York Tribune, who have been leading advocates of an international Copyright Law, and profess the warmest regard for the interests of British authors in this country, have begun to rap this Story from our Magazine into their paper, though without the author's advisable alterations. The same piracy, under the same circumstances, reprinted upon us Mr. Dickens's "Little Dorrit," for which we paid the author Three Thousand Dollars.

No American publisher can afford to give two thousand dollars for early sheets of a foreign work which is instantly reprinted upon him by a rival in business.

The course of the Tribune is, therefore, decidedly unfavorable to the prosperity of the British, of the only compensation he can get, in the present state of the copyright law.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1858.

TO THE PUBLIC.

THIS number of the Weekly commences a new volume.

The Contents of the first number, published in the last number, justify the assertion that no publication, either in America or in Europe, contains an equal amount of instruction and entertainment. The proprietors will spare no pains and no expense to make the coming volume still more valuable and welcome.

The Weekly will contain portraits of prominent men of the time; pictures of the most striking events of the day, abroad or at home; illustrations of whatever is new and important in civilization, science, and art; sketches of travel, with copious illustrations; light and entertaining gossip on society and the times we live in. In the continuation of the story, "What will he do with it?" other stories, the best that can be had, abroad or at home; humorous and social pictures, original and selected; genial and instructive essays; the continuation of that admirable exposition of wit and humor, "Things Was and Otherwise;" a copious summary of news, foreign and domestic; a complete review of the money, merchandise, and produce markets, etc., etc.

The price being only five cents a number, or $2 50 a year, the proprietors do not hesitate to say that the Weekly is the cheapest and best newspaper in the world.

THE OLD YEAR.

THE year which has just ended has been chiefly memorable, in this country, for the commercial revulsion which broke out late in the summer. Politically, there have been but few events of note during the year. The only prospect which we had at one time of commemorating the fall by the final settlement of the Kansas question, has been followed by two events; that, with that other vexed question, the Cuban question, in dispute with England, must be carried forward to the next Year. When the year 1857 was ushered in, the country was in a fever pitch under the excitement of an unusually violent contest for the Presidency: long before summer came, every trace of disturbance had disappeared, and people had ceased to speak or even to think of politics. A speck of war in Utah has hardly roused men from their attitude of indifference; and the expedition of General William Walker in Nicaragua, which a twelvemonth ago awakened a good deal of attention and sympathy, attract very little notice yet. Altogether, the year closes as it has run, as the brokers would say, on a very dull political market.

Abroad, the feature of the year has been the Mutiny in India. Spain, France, Russia, Germany, and the rest of the world, have been quiet enough; their history for 1857 can be very briefly written. But the eyes of the world have been fixed with unusual concern on the struggle which began in the Presidency of Bengal in the month of May last, and which, even at the present time, can not be considered as closed. This general concern has mainly arisen from the horror excited by the atrocities of the savages. When the revolt first broke out, the notorious misgovernment and abominable tyranny of the East Indian Government rather led the European spectators to wish well to the insurgent cause. The Sepoys seemed to be men fighting for freedom. But not many weeks had elapsed before news came of outrages beyond the power of language to describe—of the butchery of little children and fair young girls by the Sepoys; and in an instant the sentiment of the civilized world experienced a change. From the day that the first accounts of the slaughter of women and children were published, no respectable voice has been raised in defense of the Indian mutineers. On the contrary, throughout the world the cry has been universal for their punishment, and the blood-thirsty indignation of the British in India has been shared alike by every civilized people on the globe.

By this time, as every one knows, the suppression of the revolt is a mere question of a few weeks. Thanks to the exploits of Havelock, Wilson, Greathead, and the other great soldiers whom this affair has brought into notice, the year 1857 will not end till every man in India is satisfied of the hopelessness of the attempt to throw off the foreign yoke. The mutiny will be an episode as brief as thrilling in the future history of India.

This and the revulsion are the only events that will be remembered of the year. There was, at one time, a prospect that the year might have been commemorated by the opening of China; but that, too, has been postponed. The year will rank rather as decidedly dull.

THE FINANCIAL PANIC IN EUROPE.

ENOUGH never saw so wide-spread a commercial revulsion as the one which took its rise in New York last September, and is now raging from Portugal to St. Petersburg, and from Scotland to Turkey. But within our day, at least half of Europe enjoyed immunity from financial revulsions from the reason which now keeps Spain calm and undisturbed in the midst of the general tumult: there was no commerce to be overthrown. The magnitude of the present disaster is in exact proportion to the extent of the previous commercial activity. Spain laughs at revulsions, because commercial paralysis is the normal state of the country. The Bank of France gains specie and safely outrides the storm, because the French are gamblers and not traders, not merchants. The London and Hamburg, the great seats of trade and enterprise, have control overshadowed by the centers of the pressure. And as there has been throughout Europe a general and large increase of trade and industry during the past quarter of a century, the revulsion is far more sweeping and terrible than any that have ever been witnessed before.

Legislatures, there as here, are beating their brains in search of causes and remedies. All the common-place have been specified, which, if taken according to prescription, will forever preclude a recurrence of such accidents as commercial revulsions and specie suspensions. But the public wisely looks with no great confidence on these advisers and their nostrums.

The fact has become obvious to all conscientious observers that the revulsion flowed naturally from the undue expansion that was based on the unexpected gold discoveries in Europe and Australia. The increase of wealth which the world derived from these sources was immensely magnified by the facilities of banking and credit, commerce, industry, and enterprise of all kinds, received a directly fair result from the impetus given to the magnificent means for the supplying of our resources. It has taken six years for the gold which was suddenly thrown into use to produce its effects. They have come at last, however, and the gorgeous edifice of credit which was reared upon the gold discoveries has completely broken down.

What then is to follow? The mere mention of the question is sufficient to show how much undo the work which was faulty, and start afresh on a solid basis. Prices must fall to the level of the specie; and there is no more abuse it than our actual gain of wealth will justify. Liquidation—general liquidation—here and abroad, must proceed with no mild severity. When prices have fallen; when the necessaries of life, labor, land, merchandise, and every purchasable commodity, have declined to the neighborhood of the point at which they stood in 1850, then, but not till then, will it be safe to conclude that the bottom of the present revulsion is beginning.

There will come of all the projects that are being ventilated in the newspapers for new bank restrictions, and patent anti-revulsion systems. Nothing will come of them. They are a mere atom in the general basket; though they will undoubtedly befoul the error which led to our present disaster, and will be a nuisance to the general public sentiment, and as an integral part of the commercial system; they are not, in reality, worth a moment's notice. Any one particular drop in a glassful of poison is more rightly chargeable than the other drops with the death which is the result of it. There are always more bank restrictions; there are enough and to spare, if only they are fairly carried out by the men who have the control of the banks, for shut we have any legislation of consequence for the prevention of future commercial crises. The reason that we have such legislation can be framed which shall devolve upon man-kind the duties of prudence and wisdom. So long as mankind continue to be hopeful and credulous, revulsions will occur at periodical intervals, and no human effort can avail to prevent them. We may learn, as individuals, to guard against them, and always to be prepared for sudden disaster; but the commercial world as a whole must make up its mind to revulsions at set periods, just as men and women make up their minds to regular attacks of disease.

SETTLEMENT OF THE KANSAS QUESTION.

IF our news from Kansas be true, the Territorial Legislature have cut the Gordian knot in a rather unexpected manner, by directing that the people of the Territory shall be at liberty to reject altogether the Constitution framed at Lecompton, when the slavery clause is submitted to their vote. This would seem to cure all defects, and to leave no one the least room for further agitation. It is still possible that the Federal party may be in such force in Kansas as may endeavor to defeat the settlement of the dispute by fresh illegal demonstrations; but, on the whole, considering the state of public feeling, and the presence of the United States troops, the chances are the other way.

The President is entitled to general and sincere sympathy at this benevolent. Kansas has been for three years a cacke à faire to all of them. North and south; they have lived on her, traded on her, built on her the cities of their hopes. And now she is taken from them. Let us, with every expression of deep commiseration, hope and trust that many weeks may not elapse before some similar excitement breaks out to take the place of Kansas, and supply the politicians with the capital without which their vocation would cease to pay.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.

THE English have one advantage over us: they report their Parliamentary debates in full: we give but a meagre summary of ours. Hence the eloquence of this country have got scarcely a fair notion of the speeches which Senator Douglas, for instance, has delivered on the pending issue between himself and the Administration. It is a serious loss. Those speeches deserve to be reported in full.

The letter from Kansas renders it probable that the present antagonism between Senator Douglas and the Administration will shortly cease, like preceding rows. We are thus open to no suspicion of partisanship if we say that the speeches of the Illinois Senator on that Kansas question deserve to be collected as models of strong, practical, logical eloquence; that they can bear a comparison with the best productions of the best orators; and that they are far better adapted for the study of young lawyers and politicians than nine-tenths of the books of century which are now in vogue.

THE LOUNGER.

ACT SECOND.

WITH this number of the Weekly begins the second volume. As the curtain rises, the Lounger stands, with the rest of the dramatis personæ, pat for the first act, ready to sing a song.

He claims that he has worked in good company; that, in the first act, a fair result has been produced, that, viewed with shrewd and calculating eyes, your have rarely bought a better five cents' worth than when you have bought this paper.

You have had plenty of illustrations of places famous for the manufacture by the force of events; as always famous, by the force of historic, romantic, or religious association. You have had portraits of great men. You have had all over the world—pictures of manners and customs in all countries—plans, and descriptions, and accurate illustrations! If you can take in a subject through the senses, so much the better.

Then, for the future, have you not had the most eminent and the most unknown (perhaps none the less interesting) men? From Dickens, Bulwer, Wilkie Collins, the Man About Town, the Bohemian, "Prattle and Tattle," "Chat," the Editor himself; light, short, amusing, pathetic, romantic; calm surveys of books and literature, of art and science, of the world, of social news, with Nelly Lancer and the other favoring correspondents of our Letter-box?

A fair prospectus for five cents.

Now begins the second lustrum, with all the old friendships, and new knowledge and wider experience. As we all stand bowing to you, our most gracious public and patron! we know what you want. Your wishes are your pulse—and the hands upon our hearts are the assurance to you that, if we have not been true to you, we will be true.

Precious public! it is your five cents that shall keep our fire burning hay for your entertainment. Behold us in a line!—fraternally linked by the strongest ties of mutual confidence and kindness, with a happy New-Year! We look over our places. We make moonlight and thunder behind the scenes. We are cheerfully afraid of you people who sit in front, eating pea-nuts, and knowing perfectly well that we are only Nick Bottom and Snug the joiner, and no lion at all; and when we make our most successful roar, we listen behind in terror lest you should find us out. But you know all about it!) Tenez! bonsoir!

So much for the Second Act. The celebrated Sir Bulwer Lytton will now show what he is going to do with it; and whatever is done by him, or any body else any where, shall not fail to come to your ears and eyes as rapidly as possible.

Ding, ling! ding, ling! There's the bell!

Enter NOBODY. "Here's your Harper's Weekly, beginning a new volume; only five cents!"

MERRY CHRISTMAS.

"THE merry, merry bells of Yule" will have died into silence before the Lounger can wish his Merry Christmas. But the good wishes do not end with the music of the bells. They run through all the year like the beauty of the green leaves in veins of the children who hail the day.

Christmas is, of course, a universal festival in all Christendom; but it seems to belong especially to England. In Italy it is magnificent, if you see the Pope in procession and the holy cradle in the church of Santa Maria Maggiore. In Germany it is as gay as any festival can be in those gray lands. Everywhere, even in the Greek Church cross twinkle with their fiery blossoms in many happy homes. But there are those for whom it is even the general level of festivity, so as to be especially remarked. In America to have a holiday is to draw an elephant. But in England the day is most closely intertwined with a hundred associations. The manners, the habits, and the historians all delight in it, so that English literature is fragrant with the mistletoe. The mere word Christmas is a spell to conjure visions of cheerful country-life—of charity aroused in the city—of glad hearts, good cheer, and blithe song, and, with a general feeling of the great common humanity typified in Him whose birth the day commemorates.

Of these English authors Addison and Dickens are the two whose names are most closely blended with the season.

Milton's hymn of the Nativity is one of the greatest of odes. It is the stateliest strain of the most stately of poets. It has a severe and solemn almost beyond that of any other work in literature. But we cannot like that of a verse more in a ample river, full at once of repose, of power, and of grace. The religious severity of Milton's mind—his eagerness in scholarship, which sometimes rutates of beauty for the adorning of his verse from every region—sometimes his imagination, which used for illustration among them only what was in its very name musical or inevitably suggestive by its associations—that regal self-possession which yet bright, like the sea in summer—all that is most distinctive in Milton's character and genius leaves its impress upon this wonderful ode.

Charles Lamb says Milton should be read to the sound of an organ; but this hymn needs no such music. It flows on with billowy harmonies. Humboldt tells us of the musical rocks upon the banks of the Orinoco, filling all the air with melody—so rolls the hymn of the Nativity, like a magnificent river through a silent land, pealing forth a celestial song.

Yet if the general character of this noble hymn suggests the vast solitude in which everything the listening Syrian shepherds, so do the "Christmas Carols" which are the songs of pure and gentle life which those shepherds heard beneath those stars.

There were many such sermons before, never such stories with a moral, as those which came from the pen of Dickens. The play of humor, of pathos, of exceedingly natural and beautiful fancy in the "Carols" would make the fame of any author—are all devotedly consecrated to the simple moral, a course which would ruin the fame of almost any writer but him.

Probably few writings of any kind have ever had a more direct good influence upon men and society, or more beautiful shown how the magic of genius elevates and illumines. The Carols are always dreadful town, with poverty, and toil, and crime, and misery. But the light of a few generous Christian emotions, to glow and shine like the celestial city. Simple virtues invest common men and women like the mantle of love. The most familiar, most surprising, most touching, and memorable manner, the Independent world of which all the names the day, are borne in upon the mind and left flowering in the heart—" the kingdom of heaven is within you."

In all Christian churches, as in most fit, a solemn service is held on Christmas day. There is good preaching, with the exchange of friendly greetings, and the quiet inward vow, celebrate the festival. But there is another service which may not be performed in every family by the hearth, the altar of the home, and that is the solemn and fit study of Christ's birth, followed by Milton's hymn of the Nativity; and for sermon and application and illustration, the three tales of Dickens's Carols.

That is a service which will set seem, even to the youngest child, like a long chapter of course; but in the years to come, long and long hereafter, when the genial pen that wrote the Carols writes no longer, and the voice that speaks them here are silent forever, that youngest child may perhaps note the fact in addition to his first reading and in the story and the hymn that tender pathos of association which shall make his Christmas to him age, and which shall make it to his children the loveliest day of the year—a feast—a sacrament.

THE PRESENT SEASON.

"NO, Sir, don't talk to me. This is something I happen to know about. You, my dear good sport it there will not be half as many visits made by Santa Claus this year as there were last Friday, as in the last five years. No, Sir; I tell you we, Sir Now mark my words; just mark my words."

That is the sort of shrieking style of conversation, even when the other man has all his natural advantages. That fancy the Lounger with his face soaped, his head lying helpless upon a barber's chair, and the razor at his very throat, and, all this fearful disadvantage, subject to hearing that exasperating sort of conversation!

First of all, I say to Santa Claus never comes to any body but children, and he will come to them during this last week of the year as much as ever; not so richly laden, not with such stuffed jackets, but nobody who has ever given his child a gift will do any less this year because he may be poorer. Any thing will answer—a wooden bucket—a puzzle—a jack-knife—a box for shells. Jimmies, you will be sure to get some remembrance. Santa Claus will not forget you.

But the rest of us he does not know. There is no lovely fiction of Santa Claus when Smith gives Brown a gold pencil (Brown is Smith's book-stirrer at three hundred and twenty-five dollars per annum), nor when one dearest girl gives a kiss which is intended for another. And here is where the loss will fall. This is the pretty exchange that will be annihilated by the hard times.

But then this is a heavy piece of work at the best. The worst of getting a present from your lady you are not intimate with is, that you can not help regarding it in the light of an involuntary tax. You have to spend your money or look mean. Therefore every man should consider naturally whether he has a right to give the little gift he is designing to make to his unsuspecting neighbor.

Not that we are inclined to be too charitable. That is not a universal failing. Sometimes, when we get the steam up, we rush at it the wrong way, like a harbor-tug in the fog that meant to go to Tilbottomia, and found, when it came to shell, that it has also come to Sandy Hook.

So it may be quite well that the promiscuous present-giving has come to an end for the present; and that Mrs. De Gall will not send a highly-embellished box of bonbons to Mrs. Lovegold, when she loves as old orthodox Hebrews love pork. But she may take heart. We have yet to get to the bottom, nor has the bottom itself fallen out. The years will bring again the chance that this year have, and the same things will be given as heretofore.

But it will be well worth while to make a good start—at least for those who really wish to run well and arrive sooner here—by resolving from this time to make gifts with something like sense. We have give them to big people. You love Beggles enough to give him a light from your cigar. Now Mrs. Beggles up there are plenty of levels upon which people stand with you. Don't give your butter-woman a diamond pin. She would be ashamed how she will decline it, or, if she must take it, the joy of her life is over for wondering how she can ever repay the favor. If she have a less sensitive feeling, she will sell it for what she can get.

Your butler—what?

Yes; but have you fully made up your mind which she is?

You know she is not the woman who sells butter, but she who has not a cool alcove butter.

Do you think we ever the more respected because she may be hooped like an enormous firkin? Have you never seen a grocer's shop lined with satin and furnished with rosewood? Have you never swigged and smoked in bar-rooms with soft carpets and Brussels glass?

Diamonds and pearls and roses are for maidens, and queens, and princesses; and they are as likely to live in plebeian breasts and your side-scrapers.

"Fact, Sir, fact. Don't talk to me. I tell you yes, Sir. Mark my words; yes, Sir, mark my words."

How does my man dare to talk in that way? Scat! get out!

OUR LETTER-BOX.

FIRST of all, the Lounger wishes his many correspondents the happiest of New Years, and all the favorites of the season.

His Letter-box has proved a kind of little trap to catch nightingales whose songs might otherwise have been wasted—as a sort of Philomel-box, whose resolving a good deal of anonymous brilliancy into fixed star—yet once more shall sing the days with which he has pecred into many a hidden and remote nest, full of birds of pretty plumage and sweet voice—full of the desire of the world to look over his shoulder and see and hear what he has in hand.

That to-day he finds a strain from the banks of the Mississippi—not from a blue-bird or blackbird, for they are out of season—but from a whistler are always in time, and, this time, in tune. Why should the side-scrapers be musical? is the last query? All the birds are valuable, and he ought to be proud of it in these dismal days.

THE POETRY OF LOVE.

"There's a good deal of green in a tree—it's very true."—Old Play.

1. The poetry of human love
In ever-an constant sing;
It thrills through every rolled nerve,
And sets the heart to ring.

2. Through branches to the eye,
Through grass unto the ear,
Glides poetry, more to be felt
And sometimes the tear.

3. It beams in every morning ray,
It trembles on the leaf;
It's ruling o'er the spring
Yis all one joy or grief.

4. It binds our hearts in dearest ties,
Gives brightest charms to life;
And breathes the language of the skies
To other human strife.

5. Think Heaven that yet this no-thee is fled
A love that was for thee;
Or, if tossed without it would congeal, (I
The heart would pulsing.

6. It almost brings me back to youth,
When faith and hope were young,
And Nature's voice, in earnest truth,
Was music on the tongue.

7. Hyethed's years so child'd the heart
That it could love in love;
Then faith and hope might all do—(No. 7 middling?)
pulse
And not, as now, grow strongest

GREAT UNKNOWN.—If you print the above, leave off the side-notes. Mrs. Green says the lines will do; but I confess I have not much faith in them, though I think she is a good judge of poetry (or judges), for she always says mine is better than any other in the world, she believes. One reason for this opinion, however, may possibly be that she never reads any other. Besides, she is a very economical woman, and perhaps has a prejudice in favor of home-made poetry. It is a great thing in a family to make your own poetry and your own mince-meat—thus, while Mrs. G. insists that my poetry is the best in the world, I hope that her mince-pies were never equaled.

Truly yours, AMAZING GREEN.
St. Louis, December, 1857.

—Jim makes one mistake. The Lounger did not hope "to draw people out," but to draw them to—his box. And he makes no mistake in what he speaks well of the ever-puisted pencil of Hopkins. As for the Lounger's philosophy, it is the philosophy of Hudibras, Falstaff, and other unconscious humorists. There are some illusions, Jim, that should be cherished. One moment of pleasure is worth a year of them. A sensitive Oriental, who has married his wife when she is still veiled, might, and would, long hesitate before he lifted that veil from features. Let him believe her what he thinks all golden should be—young, beautiful, and modest. Let him believe her to be Venus. But to lift the veil is to destroy the possibility of illusion. Under veil Hafiz and Lalla Rookh are lovers.

Jim will surely appreciate what the Lounger hopes Jim will consider the Lounger's motive.

DEC., 1857.

DEAR LOUNGER,—I appreciate letters, and to many people I should be grateful for them. I have many correspondents, but very few of them write me long letters—and I like it, when you invited every body to write to you, I thought it was a very strange idea, to say the best of it; but now I see into your object. You mean to draw us out, and I must give you credit for being so well versed in the operation.

I don't know as I have any thing particular to say to you, only that I like you, and hope to get a printed letter from you some day. I am glad to see Hoppin's pencil so often in the Weekly, and the others in employ such a genius as his the better for it. I consider Hoppin the best artist we have. Eastman—comic or otherwise. Don't you, Lounger? Oh-holy, Lounger, you must not say that. Let Brady take your ambrotype or photograph, and put it at the head of your lounging place? I wish your admirers are your good old face. Yours truly,

JIM.

Mother-can are nothing of bishops of any kind which the Lounger is glad to hear. In fact, only Modeste ought to write of such subjects; and if the English did not positively prohibit the marriage of a widower-in-law and Johnnie, that her fault? Are not her ideas clear enough? When the Jura sun shines in it is very well reasoned through broken June clouds, do they obscure the light?

Not at all, Sir; not at all.

DEAR, DEAR LOUNGER!!!—I wonder if the melodists conform to the rules of harmony in their intervening for you to hear of? I (a brune, plastonic philosopher girl of seventeen) have attended their meetings, as I say, and have spent a whole four hundred of my fellows silk-warters, and found them to be very much out of tune. Why don't you put patient to the list; or, as they call it "Alabamian ladies have no melody." I was placed in a situation to confirm or refute the above remark, and the result was: appurtenant insensibly: it was not me to me, and the puzzling nature of my position to you.

But the honorable brother-bip attack our soul-teeth rubbing, our faces black, white and red painted, and the hideous wearing of our natural-colored hair adjectives!

A propos, dear Lounger about baloons, Prosper —, a young enthusiastic frenchman a friend of mine, he, just now let me that the Sun is stronger than the moon and consequently always rains. I persisted send you a new form of acrostat with wich he promise to convey the incomparable Harper across the oceanic plateau to "Dutchland-Hungary" in less than . . . . he counts it by hours and minutes, with an hotel ready; he, of course, could not, but he did not receive any news of his drawn baloon.

Hooping, hoping you will enlightnen each idea, Roger's Lady Clarissa Harlowe Jones. I place under your royal dependency MODESTE.

New Haven.—At noon 400 miles, there was good looking. 0

Pretty 3

Beautiful . . . . 1 the last was me, of course.

—JOHN SCRIMTUE, of Albany, ought to know that a Lounger is not to be taken in by a "postscard or tricked by any quantity of "silly stuff." In not his very business the study of mankind? Is he not officially the recipient of the confidential correspondence? Ought a coal-bearer to be disconposed by dust?

In reply to his question, the Lounger says with alacrity that John Schmyth, of Albany, is double-him the name to "Dutchland-Hungary" in the late Scientific Congress in that city—an accomplished, original, caustic, and discriminating individual, with all his powers of mind and body in that digest and adore our common humanity.

The Lounger is confident that his Letter-box will always be lighter (of course, in the sense of illuminated) by the favors of his good friend Schmyth.

ARARAT, December, 1857.

MOST LEARNED LOUNGER,—Can you tell me the advice you gave me very kindly, and hope I shall profit by it. I have purchased a pair of specticles, and long to see how I look in them.

And now, Mr. Lounger, as I believe you are pretty good at conundrums, I should like to know what kind of a man, woman, or child you suppose I am. I am sure, with all your learning, you can and answer that question correctly.

I am writing this on purpose to torment and trouble you with nothing, if, as I do not suppose you will publish or answer such silly stuff as this.

I wish that I could find words to express how much I think of your paper. I would say that in my opinion it is the best that is published; and for fear you may doubt it, I will say this with:

May your shadow never grow less,
Nor your wit nor your wisdom grow small;
And may you be always the best
You're an excellent Lounger withal.

YOURS, JOHN SCRIMTUE.

—IBRAHIM BELLFLOWER may be very sure that if roses can understand singing, and nightingales mean any thing when they prick their tremolo and bleed sweet songs, the rose loves to hear the nightingale, though that poetic bird may warble nothing else forever than "Dear beautiful rose."

What is true of roses is true of women; what is true of one sex is true of the other, for both are human; what is true of women is, in respect of variety at least, true of men. Miss Bellflower, or the belle who is only a bud now not yet flowered into the Mrs., whether men or women are wanted, I shall, on receipt of her letter, be glad to be of service to her.

Therefore, what is true of roses is true of lovers, and you have to hear how witty, and gay, and agreeable they are.

SPENCERVILLE, O., Dec. '57.

TO THE LOUNGER.—I hardly know whether it is right for me to write to you or not, having nothing to say, either about myself or anything, without it is to tell you how much I think of the Weekly; how I wait for its visit as anxiously as if it owed me a thousand dollars, and how we hear enough of that every day, anyhow. Still, I hope it won't flatter you much if I write to you now and then about it? Being nothing but a kind of premature Bohemian, with a great longing, or rather a determination, to be something in the wide, wide world—"a man or a woman"—and a firm conviction that the pen is mightier than the sword, and other trite quotations, whether in making matches (Lucifer) or building houses.

I want to commence early, and get used to it, and if I may write to you sometimes, I'll do the best I can. If you will shave before answering this, I'll be "Every Inch" does, I am, of course, out of order, and will, I suppose, be unceremoniously called into the back office. If not, I feel pretty sure I get into your Letter-box, and from that into the Weekly. If I see this there, I will try and do better next time. I have no way to say more, but I will keep it till next time; it's good for any thing it is worth, and I hope you will, as you most reverently. JIM CROW. YOURS always,

IBRAHIM BELLFLOWER.

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

EXPLOITING CHRISTMAS.

I DON'T pretend to be any more particular about small matters than the rest of the world. In point of fact it is the particular province of the Bohemian to be liberal, and sometimes to say things which the more fastidious people would blush to utter. Ages and respectability to tuck them up. But I really can not stand the exploitation, for business purposes, of the various services intended to commemorate the advent of the Redeemer. This, however, has been the fervent of our fashionable churches, and I have before me a ticket of admission to a musical entertainment given on Christmas Day, in a church in the heart of the city. Some musician has composed a new Mass, and he takes this occasion to introduce it, and, of course, the public. There are vocalists also regularly announced, after the fashion of the theatres. There will be the swell of voluptuous music by the orchestra, with the meretricious trills, and shakes, and roulades of the Opera-house; the lawful and proper Christmas music, which is somewhat more simple. Read:

SC. IERE II., TO 14.

7. And she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn.

8. And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night.

9. And, lo! the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they feared with great fear.

10. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

11. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

12. And this shall be a sign unto you; Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

13. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying,

14. Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.

There, Sir, when do you think we shall ever realize the sublime in the simplicity, the grandeur of that first Christmas? Do you think that Mr. Fugue, the celebrated composer, would have ventured to add to the original music for that child "wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger," a fine, full, rich, and elaborate chorus, the great prima donna, would have vouchsafed a single cadenza for the son of Joseph, the carpenter, and Mary so good that it was a pity the Angel of Gabriel to avoid the capitation tax imposed by Augustus? The tenor would have as well as not thought he would have sung in praise of the Emperor, of Herod the tetrarch, of Pontius Pilate, and of the good old Queen of Britain, as to the good and the saviour of things proved lucrative.

I believe there are good men and women enough in our churches to prevent musicians from making a trading day of a great Christian festival; but I wish you to say. I have any very strong hope; that they will do so.

THE HOLIDAYS—ADVICE TO YOUNG NEW YORK.

FROM positive observation of the fact, I am induced to believe that there are some children in New York—and, unfortunately, children who are most rows about the house—children who tumble down stairs—children who "bump" their heads against marble projections—children who spend their money like sailors or Irishmen, and generally make themselves nuisances of a pleasant character. It is true that these young people will make even more noise than usual during the holidays, but these antics will release his character, lately somewhat injured in the infantile community by false and malicious reports circulated by interested parties.

It is not to these representatives of little New York that I would speak just now, but to that more staid and respectable portion of the dignity of the American character—the hope and pride of the country—Young New York, Young New York, who arrays himself in the richest attire, and goes forth slaying hecatombs of female hearts at every step—Young New York, the Juggernaut which crushes even criticism beneath its resistless wheels.

I am conscious that the pillars of this estimable class of society—the young men who are already a credit to their country—are above from my especial fellows, who know a great deal, Sir; fellows who are always willing to billiards, champagne, and fast horses, and other fast things; fellows who are generally up to all kinds and varieties of snuff. But there are young men who are not "fast," who gaze upon the splendor of their seniors with anxious expectation—the time when they shall be able to say, I too am ruined, body and soul. It is to these lambs that I wish to address a few words of advice, and counsel them, if possible, from falling into the snares to which youth and innocence are always liable. You are more especially so during the holidays. Listen!

On New-Year's Day you will rise early, and proceed to the grand circle which is at present reigning. You have already written out a list of the ladies whose morning-gowns you intend to illuminate with the splendor of your presence. You will be aided and abetted by another youth, and you will take care that he is not more successful than yourself. As to dress, the English fashion is in vogue just now. You will wear a very tight coat, a hat, or Scotch cap, a gorgeous shirt-collar, a loud scarf, a rough coat, staring plaid waistcoat, loose, baggy pantaloons, and shoes of prodigious size. Bury as some low fellows who think that they ought to have some reverence for the Lord's day, and then call by appearing in full dress. But they are far behind the times. No fellow of any spirit has any respect for any day nowadays.

As to your behavior, there are two distinct characters which you may assume. The most fashionable is that of the blase man of the world, but that is difficult; very few fellows are up to it, and the girls can detect the want of your proper style if they see you are in the least bit liable to be upset. The best thing to do is to assume the "fast" style, which is clever, and agreeable. You may do this without being either light, dashing, witty, or in any way clever, and I append a few infallible rules by which you may be governed:

Avoid remarks about the weather.

When asked if you have made many calls, reply about five thousand; but none so pleasant, etc., etc.

If the lady is acquainted with your immediate relatives, and makes inquiries as to their state of health, you will reply, in a tone of deep feeling, that the old governor (meaning your proprietor) is pretty well, but the old lady (your mother) and the girls are feeling "like bricks;" all of which expressions, as they convey no meaning of themselves, are generally witty, and quite genteel.

You may fill up the dreadful intermission between the departure of the last visitor and the invitation to refreshments by a joke or two. This is dangerous ground; but have arranged one or two with the waiters previously, which will answer. A pun may be made upon lemonade, as lemon-ade, parlor, like parlez-vous, is sure to bring down the out. A simple conundrum thus: Why is a lady, on New-Year's Day, like a popular clergyman? Because she is always receiving calls. Or, another form of conundrum, which often misses fire: Why is Lord Ellenborough like a certain other thing? and after every body has given it up, you say that you really don't know. That will be a joke even with a very dense company, and I would not advise you to try it unless you meet a very clever set of people. I have known it to have a wonderful effect upon the intelligent, who never could see the fun about it at all.

Don't be too full. It is too much for you, and never would be appreciated if it were not.

If other people call while you are present, and you don't know them, be as rude as possible; and if they seem at all abashed, increase their confusion by quizzing them. The Lord likes those who generally quite safe.

Always carry your hat in your hands, otherwise you are not prepared to know what to do with them.

Take all your friends when you call at a house where you are not little acquainted. It is a most great sport to see a lady trying to do the civil thing when she really wishes that you were in Jericho, and you are not aware of the fact.

Always sit down to refreshment table with your back to the window, as it is more easy to get at them; call for things which are not on the table; talk loudly and coarsely; thus will you "get all the fun of the fair," and every one will think that you are a fellow that has seen life and knows what he is about.

Should you say or do any thing wrong, and do any thing without running any more risk than that of being kicked out, which is something that every body has to run, you may console yourself that education can not be considered to have been complete if it has not been a follow more or less frustration by dragging a young lady to the piano, and insisting upon a song. She run away; be haunted as a man a fellow more or less—and a mental scather severe comic balled with great applause.

Should you be asked to sing, you should refuse at first, and then consent with a good grace.

If you follow these rules, taking care to get very drunk, you may count upon having on the second day of the New Year the proud consciousness that you have made a fool of yourself, although you may have a bad headache, no digestion for a week, and a general sadness and shakiness, all of which are quite fashionable nowadays, I can assure you.

A PUFF FOR THE QUEEN.

THE descendants of the Bohemians of Plymouth Rock had their annual feast at the Astor House the other day. There was quite the usual amount of blarney about the Pilgrims, who never intended to land at Plymouth, and particularly not at that time of the year. Getting into rather an ugly scrape, however, they displayed the usual Anglo-Saxon pluck, and made the best of the matter. And that is the whole story. Not the whole story for after - dinner orators, however. They elaborate it, find twist it, and turn it into all sorts of shapes, and give the poor Fathers credit for plenty of things they never thought of. If one is patient, and, like Master John Hodner, a close investigator, he may pick a plum yoke or two out of this oratorical pudding. I see but one this year, and that has been made by a gallant mariner who replied to a toast about the Army and Navy (two unnecessary evils at which the Puritan Fathers did most incontinently turn up their noses). Now, as a general thing, when your naval or military man has to say "Charge!" or "Fire," he can do it quite well; but that is a different affair from standing up before a lot of orators, lawyers, clergymen, and reporters, and making a set speech. The gallant officer said nothing about the Navy of course (people never do say any thing about the especial matters in the millennium to which they intend to speak), but a great deal about what a jolly time he had of it in England, and how the English were getting to think pretty well of us, for which we ought to be very thankful. I am sure that I am. The mariner now speaks in the following handsome manner about the Queen:

"I have heard the Queen talked of as a good woman. She is one of the best sovereigns that Great Britain ever had. She is not only a good woman, but a good mother, faithful to her children and faithful to her country; leaving no stone unturned for the good of the nation. She always pays attention to her children, such as not besides do in her position, or even in position not so high."

That I call a very good notice; and I hope that Lord Palmerston will take some notice of it in the House of Commons. The old Puritans liked kings and queens very much, especially Charles the First, who was not only a good man, but a good father; faithful, etc., as he understood, and paid a great deal of attention to James and Charles, two amiable boys also much loved by the rulers of Plymouth, Wannalancet, and Boston. I should like to know how nassy "ladies" the mariner has from in the "position" of the Queen of England, and what she does for the good of the nation. I always believed under the impression that the British Constitution was an unique instrument, the fellow of which could not be found elsewhere, and that the personality of the sovereign was not of the slightest political consequence.

Now, here's the speech the mariner should have made:

"I'm not much of a hand at long yarns, shipmates, especially when I'm surrounded by people who make their pay and rations by spinning of 'em. [Hear, hear, and laughter.] About the Army I can't say any thing, because I don't know any thing; but I can tell you this about the Navy: that it is a —— ungrateful service, where a fellow may wear himself out, and get kicked on the retired list for his pains. And if Congress and the papers would just let the Navy alone, except about the pay—and we must have more of that—we would do very well. Thanking you, shipmates, for the compliment you have paid the service, I'll bring myself to anchor."

There, Sir, is not that about the thing? I shall not copyright it, but give full permission to all distressed mariners who fear that they will run ashore on the Shoals of Hesitation or go to pieces on Break-down Rock, to use it as they like.

BOHEMIEN.

PIN-MONEY.

PIN-MONEY AND NEEDLE-MONEY.

MY lovely friend, Clara Rondorton, has received, in lieu of the balance of pin-money to which she was entitled from her generous father, "a few trifles" from Tiffany's. Two hundred and fifty dollars a month is the bagatelle on which this economical young lady contrives to dress herself, and supply herself with gloves, pomades, and extraits Indien; and to her credit be it observed that she is rarely seen in rags. Such is the fruit of good training and early habits of moderation and self-denial.

Strange vicissitudes of fortune! Thirty years ago, Josiah Ronderton was a porter in the house of Stiggs & Co., Grocers. Every body remembers the great house of Stiggs, whose operations could change the face of the market in a day. Josiah was a steady, hard-working young man, who was thoroughly trusted by his employers, and who employed his evenings in acquiring a knowledge of book-keeping and commerce. After working as a porter for several years, Josiah one day accosted the head of the house, old Dave Stiggs—

"Sir, I'm not satisfied with my position; I wish you would take me into the office, and let me do some of the writing and accounts. I don't care about salary, but I want to rise."

Old Dave fell back with amazement, and made his porter repeat his request.

"Joe, my boy," said he at length, "you're a fool! It's all nonsense talking about rising. Stay where you are; you've got a good berth, and I'll give you an extra fifty for turkey at Christmas. Roll casks, Joe, roll casks; that's your vocation."

"Very good, Mr. Stiggs," said Joe, who was too wise to make a scene.

Young Stiggs, who had had a hearty laugh over the story of poor Joe's request, and whose beautiful wife, and splendid house, and fast horses, and magnificent career generally were the delight of the town—young Stiggs, I say, trampled on Joe's toes pretty roughly. He was a gentleman of a pretty humor and would chaff poor Joe; so

"I say, Joe, it strikes me you're not so active as you used to be; you don't roll the casks fast enough. Has my body been setting you above your trade, Joe?" or "Joe, my boy, we're losing money fast; ah! how devilish lucky you are to be a porter, and sure of your pay every Saturday!"

To all of which Joe only answered, "True, Mr. Stiggs, very true. But we'll do better."

One day, it was twenty years ago, a foolish and insane idea possessed the people of this country. They would not believe that the United States Bank was the most useful, and the safest, and the best institution in the country. David Stiggs was one of the few who opposed this delusion. He maintained that the banks and especially the Great Bank were impregnable, and when any sold their stock, Dave Stiggs bought. He and Nick Biddle, he said, could fight the rest of the merchants. The fight was long and tough; but it ended—alas for the vanity of human triumphs!—in the victory of an insane public, and in the overthrow of the Great Bank, the small banks, Nick Biddle, and old Dave Stiggs.

A few weeks therefore, soon after Dave had blown out his brains in his despair at being ruined, the store which he had occupied was refitted, and a new shingle hung out. It bore the name of ISRAEL ROSWORTH, CHEMISTRY MERCHANT.

Young Livingston Stiggs swore it was the best joke he had ever heard. "Egad, Tin Tin was our porter!" For his own part, the failure of the house concerned him little. He had been very timid to business, and was remarkably industrious and shrewd. He would work his way out of his embarrassments, and then build up a new fortune. And he bestirred himself manfully. It was, however, no easy task; the Bankrupt Act did not come a day too soon for Livingston Stiggs!—who took the benefit of it, got whitewashed, and started afresh.

But the taint of the old house hung round him. The enemies whom the prosperity of the father had created avenged themselves on the son. He met obstacles—unexpected, unaccountable obstacles—at every side. The best of the business of the old house of Stiggs & Co. had descended finally to Josiah Ronderton. New business proved unprofitable. And so, after a long struggle, Livingston Stiggs failed again.

This time the break-down was final. The man's energy had been wasted. He sank, and disease supervening, he became dependent upon his wife—the beautiful, dashing creature, who had been the belle of the city—for support. She died, heart-broken; and, at last, the only livelihood of the son and heir of Livingston Stiggs was obtained from the needle-money of his daughter. She had been born in finest linen, cradled in richest lace, decked out in child's-clothes of silk and satin; she burnt her candle to the socket every night now, working—to support her father—for the family of her grandfather's porter, Josiah Ronderton.

Strange contrast!—pin-money and needle-money. But, take the world as a whole, and there's but a generation between them. The father, rich; the son, poor; the children of the nabob lying in garrets or hospitals provided by the munificence of the children of the nabob's servants; the daughter of Croesus intriguing to secure for her daughter the gracious smile of the son of Croesus's stable-boy: such is every history—in this democratic and scheming country. Schemo we never so wisely, we never can contrive to do more than the law allows to testators; namely, to provide for two generations of our posterity: the third generation, the great-grandchildren, are beyond our reach and our power, and, in nine instances out of ten, the great-grandchildren of every rich man will be poor, and of every poor man rich. There is hope as well as sorrow in the thought.

NEEDLE-MONEY.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXIV.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The last View of Mount Lebanon.—A Mediterranean Calm.—A sea-sick Turk.—Mustapha in Despair.—The Harem and the Eunuchs.—A heavy Sea.—A Plunge down the Companion-way.—John Steenburger nearly throttles a Eunuch.—Latakia, ancient Laodicea of Syria, and its Ruins.—Alexandretta.—The Battle-field of Issus.

I BELIEVE that my last letter ended abruptly with the approach of the steamer to Tripoli, which place I had mentioned, and perhaps described, in a former communication. What with the rolling and pitching of the next night, and the events of two or three days following, my brain is not now in any of the best condition to recall what I did write about.

We remained only an hour or two at Tripoli. The city lies some three miles from the village at the port where we swung to anchor, and we did not go ashore. The wind rose after dark. We got away at nine or ten o'clock, and plunged at once into a head-sea. By this time it was blowing a tempest. Sudden storms are characteristic of the Mediterranean. I have had frequent occasion to remark this as illustrative of numerous passages of the Sacred History, especially in the voyages of Paul. A soft south wind, which would be apt to tempt a sailor out of a harbor on the Bay of Naples, will suddenly change into a furious norther and blow for days with unabating power. Then it will flatten down instantly to a dead calm, and the sea, in four hours, will look as if a wind never blew over it.

Plunge, plunge, creak, creak, the ship went rolling all night long on her northward voyage. We had a sorry time of it on board. Mustapha Pasha lay sick on deck, and three several times he rolled out from under the canvas, and presented each time the picture of despair incarnated. You have seen sea-sick people, but did you ever look at a sea-sick Turk? No? Then you have one more sight before you in the catalogue of terrible pictures. Why, Sir, it is indescribable in its horror. Dante should—Dante must have seen them before he described some of the tormented. There was a swinging light on the quarter-deck, and another under the canvas, and when the body of the half-dead Turk rolled out I saw it, and when it rolled in the ladies saw it, and from the occasional bursts of fun that would come at the precise moments when he disappeared under the canvas, I had reason to think the old fellow did not greatly excite the commiseration of his harem.

I remained on deck till long after midnight. It was clear, and the moon was very bright, and I can assure you the scene was one of the finest I have ever enjoyed. But it was not so much the white caps of the sea, the flashing waves, the grand night that was worth seeing. It was the majesty of Lebanon, going down behind us, the snow-capped summits that look down on the Holy Land, touched and sanctified by the white light of the moon, and now fast disappearing from my longing vision.

It were blessed, I thought, to linger out my lifetime there, and die on the borders of the Promised Land! You who have not been there can not imagine with what yearning the heart turns to the sacred soil; with what earnest love the affections draw us back thither. From the moment that I set my foot on the eastern slope of Lebanon I began to feel an oppression stealing over me, an overwhelming sense of loss that I can not make apparent to you, because you have never felt it. It is not like home-sickness. That does not define it. It is like the desire for repose that the disquieted dead might have. The feeling that we are leaving a country where is calm rest of mind, faith that could make death itself welcome, where the world does not enter, where one cares nothing for the pomps and vanities, the trials and sicknesses of life.

On my faith, Sir, as I, stout man that I am, walked that quarter-deck and looked back to the Holy Land, I envied sweet Alice Warren her boy Prit by the Sea of Galilee, and wished I, too, were there.

EASTERN FLOWING.

You will laugh at this, or call it sentimental. What care I if you do? I felt so then. I don't feel precisely so now; but I would be content to go with clothes and food and sit down in Jerusalem for the rest of my life, and die and be buried in the Valley of Jehoshaphat.

I thought the old craft would shake her old ribs out of her at last. By one o'clock she was behaving like a mad thing. She yawed and swung in a lubberly way down the sides of the seas, and at length, while I stood holding on by the weather-rail and looking into the wind's eye, suddenly she lay down toward the wind, shoved her wheel-house under a heavy blue sea, lifted up again, and swashed it over her quarter, in a flood that drowned out Mustapha and his harem.

Out came a shriek, and out rushed half a dozen ladies, shrieking as they rushed, and after them, pell-mell, two tall black fellows, bounding over the form of Mustapha as it went down to leeward, and attempting to surround the ladies, who flew like frightened birds toward me. The binnacle-light shone on their bare faces, and I saw that two of them were rather pretty. The third was veiled.

The eunuchs, whose duty is strictly to preserve the sanctity of the harem, usually cut down my rum when he has violated it, whether accidentally or intentionally. This custom is always justified in the East.

I knew enough, therefore, to foresee my danger, as one of the scoundrels led back the ladies while the other rushed at me.

Thanks be to the old sea, that has served me faithfully often, but never so well as just then! So long as the ship lay down to leeward he rushed on, but in a twinkling up went the lee-rail, and the tall reamded staggered as the angle changed, swerved a little as it increased, and when the ship lay down again almost on her beam ends, he threw his arms into the air with that awkward motion that you will not need I should describe. I had him then. Three steps and a kick on the shins settled his business. The shins of the Nubian eunuch are as tender as those of his Virginia cousins. He went down like a falling poplar, and curiously enough, he went down the after hatchway, which John Steenburger was opening at the instant. Nor was that all. The three ladies and the other blackey were stationary in the middle of the deck during the instant occupied by my attack on their unlucky guardian; but now, as the ship again lurched, they came in a heap into the same open pit, and to my horror, John, and the two blacks, and the three ladies vanished, howling and shrieking in English, Turkish, Arabic, and Armenian, down the steep gangway.

Mustapha himself roused his decaying energies at this mishap and the direful tumult it caused. I dashed down the companion-way in time to save the life of one of the Nubians whom John throttled in the dark; Sir John came from one direction and Miss Kate from another, a French passenger from his cabin, three Englishmen and an Austrian from their rooms, and, in point of fact, we had all the ship's officers and passengers there in ten seconds, while Mustapha looked down the gangway in astonishment beyond measure.

I have taken too much space in describing this ridiculous adventure, but such as it is it will serve to illustrate the people one meets with on a Syrian coasting voyage.

In the morning we anchored at Latakia, famed for its tobacco, with which it supplies Egypt and the East generally. The Turks of Constantinople do not like it so well, and use but little of it. But its fame is great in all the countries south of Smyrna.

Latakia was once Laodicea, but not the Laodicea of Scripture. Its history is chiefly of interest in connection with the Crusades; but I shall not pause here to enlarge upon it of that. I went ashore, hired a donkey, mounted without saddle or bridle, and trotted deliberately about the old town. There were two fine specimens of Roman ruins here among the houses of the village, looking sadly out of place and infinitely more melancholy for the approximation of filth and poverty than any ruins of Roman grandeur I have hitherto seen.

The incidents of the day were three falls from the donkey, one full donkey and myself both together, three fine old coins of Diocletian bought for a piastre, a large stock of tobacco laid in for the future, and a return to the ship at sunset.

I could prolong my account of this voyage to a dozen letters. There are points of classic and sacred interest on all the borders of this sea, and there were incidents of interest every hour. But enough for these sketching letters now if I but give you the idea of travel here, leaving you some day to appreciate its delicious interest yourself.

The sea went down with the wind at sunset. Next morning, after a quiet and very decent night, we woke to find the ship at anchor in the harbor or roadstead of Iskanderoon, which is Arabic for Alexandretta.

Look at your map, and you will see that it is in the extreme northeast corner of the Mediterranean. Look at your histories, and you will find that around this same corner of the sea the nations of ancient days marched in all their great expeditions, and you will find that on the plain of this same Alexandretta was fought the battle of the Issus, than which no greater was ever fought from the days of Antioch, discomfited in this, unto the fields of the Crimea.

The gate of Syria is near here, a terrible mountain pass through which nations have marched northward and southward.

We got the horses ashore with some difficulty, and leaving the servants to attend to the baggage we rode out three hours to the northward to visit the battle-field. Iskanderoon is a small village under the side of a lofty mountain. A little distance to the northward the hills retire from the sea a mile or more, and on this narrow strip of land Alexander defeated Darius. A plowman was visible when we first reached the plain, breaking up with the rude Eastern plow the soil which once was Macedonian soldiers. Little cared the peasant for the rich earth he overturned, so it yielded him his scanty living. Yet was that earth once living men that started at the voice of the son of Philip.

ISKANDEROON, AND THE FIELD OF THE BATTLE OF ISSUS.

It is not my province to relate stories of ancient history. I am but recording the visits of modern travelers to scenes of old fame, and I confess to you that when I stood on the battle-ground of Issus, as the old sun went down in the sea with his red eye gleaming as it gleamed on the scattered hosts of the Persian, when I stood there and looked at my companion and myself, sole living beings on all the plain, once thronged with the hundred thousands of Greece and Persia, Asia and Syria, and the night came on again as with ceaseless return the night has come over that battle-field, I felt a profound sense of the smallness of these later years, of the puny men and puny intellects that we so pride ourselves on, as compared with Alexander and Darius, and Parmenio and Hephæstion.

LITERARY.

In reviewing the literature of the past year one is struck with the very small number of successful books which have appeared on either side of the water. Dr. Livingstone's Travels, of course, are hardly to be considered as books of the year 1857, published as they are at the close of it. Few works of the past year have sold over two thousand copies, and probably not more than half a dozen have gone over five thousand, unless we except that class of works which, by dint of advertisements and show-bills, are made to sell rapidly, and to be as rapidly forgotten.

In Theology, the volumes of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons, published by Sheldon, Blakeman, & Co., have been by far the most salable books of the year; while Dr. Breckinridge's "Knowledge of God, Objectively Considered," published by the Carters, has been the most valuable and solid contribution to this class of literature. "The Man of Business," a collection of practical sermons by distinguished clergymen, intended for the benefit of commercial men, published by Randolph, has also been a successful book, though of that class which wins its way very silently. It forms a specimen of a new kind of book which has become somewhat popular of late, the peculiarity of which consists in the number of contributors to its pages. It is hardly proper to class "The Greyson Letters" published by Gould & Lincoln, with theological works, yet they belong to no other distinct class, and may be mentioned here as among the remarkable publications of the year.

In Fiction we have had certainly enough from which to choose. During the year we have had occasion to notice specially some twenty or thirty novels, and our list embraces as many more not worth naming.

Republication of old standard favorites has been extensively carried on. Every one will be glad to learn that Ticknor & Fields's admirable edition of the Waverley Novels (of which we have just received "The Monastery"), than which there is none more chaste and beautiful, is said to be a successful adventure. The demand for them speaks well for the taste of the reading public, and their issue claims the patronage of all lovers of fine books. Derby & Jackson have issued new editions of such authors as Mrs. Radcliffe, Miss Austen, and Miss Porter; so that "The Mysteries of Udolpho" and "The Scottish Chiefs" stare us in the face in modern dress and style, much to our annoyance at first glance, but much to our comfort by gas-light of a winter evening.

The noticeable novels of the year are Kingsley's "Two Years Ago," published by Ticknor & Fields; Miss Brontë's "Professor," published by Harper & Brothers; Charles Reade's "White Lies" (Ticknor & Fields); and "Guy Livingstone," also by Harper & Brothers. "Two Years Ago" sold well, but damaged Mr. Kingsley's reputation vastly in America, as indeed also in England. The suspicion that the young clergyman was growing egotistical on the strength of his former success was confirmed by the dictatoria[l] style of his address on American subjects, about which it was but too evident he was lamentably igno[r]ant in the main, and sadly misinformed in particul[ar]s. Miss Brontë's "Professor" was a literary curiosity rather than a new novel. It was the base on which she had built "Villette," and it was, in one sense, like seeing the skeleton of a well-known body, and learning the action of all the parts from the exposure. "Guy Livingstone" is the novel of the present season—a strange book in some respects, a strong book in all. It is a bold, dashing story, whose characters, male and female, live for life, and play its game, every one, as if he or she held all the cards, or as if it mattered nothing in the end whether the game were lost or won. Few books have been so signally popular. "White Lies" threatens to rival it in the public estimation, lacking, however, the spice of mystery which has surrounded the authorship of the former. The author of "Guy Livingstone" is now understood to be a Mr. Laurence, hitherto unknown in the literary world. We should name in passing Mr. James's annual contribution, "Leonora D'Orco," one of his best, and Miss Cumings's "Mabel Vaughan," not equal to "The Lamplighter," but a worthy book nevertheless.

Books of travel have been, perhaps, more plenty than usual. Mr. Train's "American Merchant in Europe, Asia, and Australia" (Putnam), was a decided hit; but we are not informed as to its success. Mr. Prime's "Boat Life in Egypt" and "Tent Life in the Holy Land" are said to have been the most successful books published in the summer, and have still a constant and steady sale. They were received by the press with a unanimity of praise that is remarkable. The plan of their issue was novel, and is worthy of notice. Instead of making two volumes of travels Mr. Prime published two distinct works, each complete in itself. The result has been that the one published a few weeks in advance of the other has sold only about a hundred copies more—showing a very nearly equal demand for the two.

In no year have travelers contributed more to general information. The Carters published Loftus's "Chaldea and Susiana," a work which, in our estimation, surpasses even Layard in interest; and the same house issued Dr. Bonar's Sinai, etc., which, with Stanley's "Sinai and Palestine" (Redfield) and Mr. Prime's "Tent Life," have served to reawaken the controversies about the Holy Places and the Sinaitic inscriptions; so that the Orientalists have their hands full to settle the new points and arguments submitted, pro and con, by these gentlemen.

Central and Southern America has been pretty thoroughly explored by books in 1857. Mr. Holton's "New Granada" (Harpers), Messrs. Kidder and Fletcher's "Brazil" (Sheldon & Blakeman), Wells's "Honduras" (Harpers), and sundry minor works contributing thereto.

But the great works of the year, Dr. Barth's "Northern Africa" and Dr. Livingstone's "Southern Africa," will make the year memorable among scientific and geographical scholars. Both are of intense interest to the ordinary reader, and both are of incalculable value to the student of geography or ethnography.

In biographies the year has not been prolific. Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Miss Brontë" (Appletons) was the leading biographical work of the year, but was a sad mistake in the author, though it sold remarkably well. Mrs. Gaskell quarreled with pretty much every one concerned, and after trying to revise and reform the book by erasures and new editions, gave it up in despair, and submitted to be universally condemned. Mrs. Gaskell writes admirable novels, and is therefore a poor historian of facts. The only other biography which we have to notice is that of "Mr. Gallaudet" (Carters), which is recently issued, and which commands high respect on account of the distinguished name of the subject, as well as the execution of the work by its venerable author.

Poets have sung their songs in the past year, though the world was convulsed with wars and commercial tempests. Barry Cornwall (Ticknor & Fields being publishers in America) has given us his sad farewell to the Muse. Leigh Hunt, old and kindly (the same publishers), has gathered his poems—has drawn the covers over himself, let us say, before he sleeps. Stoddard gave us his "Summer Songs;" Miss Barrett published "Aurora Leigh," and Whittier recaptured some of his fugitives and bound them in Boston; "Nothing to Wear" was born in Harper's Weekly on the 7th of February last. On the whole, poetry has flourished, and the poets have had honor, and, let us hope, profit.

Thus much of a rapid review of the year's work on paper and presses. The "grand crash" suspended the presses until the approach of the holidays, and the New Year opens with a good prospect for publishers and authors. A confident feeling prevails in the trade, and the great demand for such works as Livingstone is opening the pockets, eyes, and hearts of purchasers. It is an excellent start for the book trade throughout the country, the sixteenth thousand being put on the press within a week of the first issue. Dr. Livingstone has left England for Lisbon, to consult with the Portuguese government in relation to his proposed return to Africa through their possessions on the coast. We shall hear of him again in the future.

The approach of the holidays is signalized as usual by the announcements of many elegant works; but there was perhaps never a holiday season when American presses did so little as this year. With one exception, the American enlarged edition of "The Poets of the Nineteenth Century," edited by Mr. Duyckinck, and published by Harper & Brothers, we have not seen a single holiday book of the ornamental and expensive class which is printed on American presses. All the others that have come to our notice are imported sheets, executed in England with the American publishers' imprint on the title pages.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, the 21st ult., Senator Wright introduced a bill to continue the improvement of Newark harbor, and Senator Wilson his bill appropriating 1,000,000 acres of land for educational purposes in the District of Columbia. Debate ensued between Senators Bigler and Douglas on the Kansas question. The House resolution proposing to pay the arrearages of pay of members at the commencement instead of the end of the session was passed.——In the House, the day was occupied by a debate on the Treasury Note Bill, in which Messrs. Abbott, Letcher, Banks, Lovejoy, Campbell, Quitman, and Boyce took part. An unsuccessful effort was made by Mr. Warren to have an inquiry into the propriety of excluding the delegate from Utah from the floor of the House.

On Tuesday, the 22d ult., in the Senate, Senator Wilson introduced a bill securing to actual settlers the alternate sections of public lands reserved in the grants to the States for railroad purposes. Senator Johnson introduced a Homestead Bill. Resolutions were adopted, on motion of Senator Slidell, requesting the President to communicate the proceedings of the several Naval Courts of Inquiry; and, on motion of Senator Seward, to inquire whether new provisions are requisite to secure the faithful performance of the contracts for printing the debates. The Kansas debate was then resumed by Senators Fitch, Douglas, Stuart, and Clay.——In the House, the discussion on the Treasury Note Bill was resumed; Messrs. Grow, Smith of Virginia, Ritchie, Banks, Morris, Glancy Jones, and others, took part. A proposal by Mr. Banks to raise $20,000,000 by an issue of stock was rejected; and the Senate bill was passed without amendment, by a vote of 118 to 86. The Senate resolution to adjourn over the holidays was passed.

On Wednesday, 23d, Senator Simmons gave notice that he would introduce into the Senate a Home Valuation Bill. The debate on the Kansas question was then continued by Senators Stuart, Broderick, Doolittle, and Brown, of Mississippi.——In the House, after a protracted debate, in which Messrs. Warren, Bocock, Humphrey, Marshall, Davis, Banks, Boyce, Keitt and others took part, the following preamble and resolution, offered by Mr. Warren, were agreed to.

"Whereas, it appears from the proclamation of Brigham Young, late Governor of Utah, and from the President's Message, that said Territory is now in open rebellion against the Government of the United States; therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to consider and report on the facts, and inquire into the propriety of excluding from a seat on the floor of the House the delegate from that Territory."

Mr. Faulkner, from the Special Committee, reported the distribution of the new Hall. The deaths of Messrs. Brenton and Lockhart, of Indiana, were reported, and eulogies pronounced on their characters.

Both Houses then adjourned to 4th January.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

According to the latest news from Kansas, it appears that the Legislature adjourned on 16th ult., after having passed laws to submit the Lecompton Constitution to a popular vote on 4th January, in three forms, the ballots being marked, 1*st*, Constitution with slavery; 2*d*, Constitution without slavery; 3*d*, no Lecompton Constitution. Laws were also passed organizing a militia (General Lane was elected Major-General), and providing against frauds at the elections. Acting Governor Stanton had vetoed the Militia Bill; but it was passed over his head by a two-thirds vote. He was still acting as Governor; General Denver was at Lawrence. On the evening of the 16th a fight is said to have occurred at Fort Scott, between pro-slavery and anti-slavery men; and several men are said to have been killed, wounded, and made prisoners on both sides. Further information on these points is anxiously expected.

WHY GOVERNOR STANTON WAS REMOVED.

The official instructions to General Denver have been published. They contain the following passage on the removal of Governor Stanton:

"The Convention which met at Lecompton on the first of September had framed a Constitution, and had authorized its President to submit the question to the people of Kansas on the 21st of December, whether this Constitution should be adopted with or without slavery. The importance of the issue could not well be overestimated. It involved the complete and authoritative settlement of the only subject of difference which had seriously agitated Kansas or interfered with its prosperity. The qualified electors, therefore, to whom this settlement was referred, not only had an unquestionable right to attend at the polls and give their votes on the day appointed, but they were required to do so by the highest considerations of public duty. In the exercise of this right, moreover, they were entitled to adequate protection by the Territorial Government, and the Acting Governor was bound to employ all legal means at his command to give security and fairness to the election. With the conflicting opinions which prevailed in the Territory on the question submitted he had no right to interfere. They had their appropriate issue at the ballot-box, and to that peaceful arbitrement they might safely be referred. The great objects to be accomplished, in the opinion of the President, were to preserve the peace of the Territory, and secure freedom in the election. Entertaining these views, he was surprised to learn that the Secretary and Acting Governor had, on the first of December, issued his proclamation for a special session of the Territorial Legislature on the 7th instant, only a few weeks in advance of its regular time of meeting, and only fourteen days before a decision was to be made on the question submitted by the Convention. The course of Mr. Stanton, the President seriously believes, has thrown a new element of discord among the excited people of Kansas, and it is directly at war, therefore, with the peaceful policy of the Administration. For this reason he has felt it his duty to remove him."

THE GREYTOWN INDEMNITY.

The President, in reply to a resolution of the Senate, transmitted to that body last week the correspondence which took place nearly a year ago in reference to the bombardment of Greytown. Count Sartiges asked indemnity for actual losses sustained by the French subjects, who, he says, found it physically impossible to remove their goods from the conflagration caused by the movements of the commander of the sloop-of-war Cyane. Governor Marcy, in reply, informs him that the President has not been able to find upon what principles of right or even of equity the reclamation can be sustained, and in a long dispatch expounds to him the international law. Count Sartiges acknowledges its receipt, and says he will not fail to send Governor Marcy's communication to the French Government. No response to the latter is embraced in the documents. Although the resolution calling for the information included any correspondence with Great Britain, none was transmitted to the Senate. It is believed that Governor Marcy's reply to Count Sartiges was considered conclusive by the British Government.

THE TREASURY NOTES.

The Treasury Notes recently authorized by Congress will be issued in about two weeks. The Secretary of the Treasury has determined that the denomination of these promises to pay shall be one hundred, five hundred, and one thousand dollars. The contract for engraving plates has been given to Rawdon, Hatch, and Co., of New York, and to Topping, Carpenter, and Co., of Philadelphia, the former firm having the execution of the notes of one hundred and five hundred dollars, and the latter the notes of one thousand dollars. The Secretary is very anxious that these notes shall be executed in the best style of American art.

THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

The General-in-Chief of the Army has received intelligence from the Utah expedition confirmatory of the accounts previously published. The detachments under Colonel Johnston and Colonel Smith, together with the supply trains, had united with the main body under Colonel Alexander, and the entire force on the 7th ultimo had advanced to within sixteen miles of Fort Bridger, en route for Salt Lake City. The troops were in high spirits, being plentifully supplied with provisions, while the snow had fallen sufficiently to protect the grass from fire.

The War Department has ascertained the actual cash [va]lue of the property destroyed by the Mormons to be [n]early fifty thousand dollars, covering other items than [a]rmy supplies.

Letters found on the person of a Mormon prisoner, and purporting to be orders for Lieutenant-General Wells, the Mormon commander, direct all Mormons to harass the advance of the United States army. No doubt of the open rebellion of the Mormons is thus left.

CAPTURE OF GENERAL WILLIAM WALKER.

On the 8th ultimo, while General William Walker was still on Punta Arenas, Nicaragua, Commodore Paulding, of the Wabash, sent a force ashore and took him and all his men prisoners. Walker surrendered without striking a blow; the force sent to apprehend him being so large as to leave no room for successful resistance. The officers and men of his force are coming home in the United States ship Saratoga. Walker returned in the Northern Light, a United States prisoner on a charge of breach of the Neutrality Laws.

PERSONAL.

The Washington correspondent of the Independent gives the following vivid description of Senator Douglas:

"Senator Douglas is very short in stature, but of such physical proportions, aside from this lack, as instantly to attract the attention of a stranger. A very large head, connected with broad and powerfully-built shoulders by a short, full neck; a chest sufficiently roomy to contain the lungs of a giant, and a pair of short, dumpy legs, complete the physical picture of the 'Little Giant,' if we except the broad, lofty Websterian brow, and the deep-set, cavernous eyes, that sparkle and glow, when excited, like miners' lamps beneath it. It is the tremendous brain-power lodged in that perpendicular precipice of a forehead, and shooting out its fires from its shadowed eyes, that has given him the sobriquet which he will carry to his grave. When excited and in full flow of debate that massive head rolls and shakes with the emphasis of his thought, and the huge hand doubles until the nails indent the palm, or else the broad, open hand receives the blow of its mate and italicizes the sentence with a stunning report. The sweat pours from him profusely, and falls from his head or is thrown clear of his shoulders by these inimical shakes of the head, as the rain-drops are shaken from the trees by a storm. Add to this a thick, bushy head of black hair and a restless, uneasy feeling, which prevents his being at rest for five consecutive minutes, and keeps him moving from one point to another in the Senate chamber, and my picture of the 'Little Giant' is complete."

In executive session, last week, the Senate confirmed the nomination of Mr. Lamar and the other foreign ministers appointed by Mr. Buchanan. The nomination of Mr. Sedgwick, as District Attorney of New York in place of John McKeon, was not definitely acted on.

Henry M. Rice, formerly delegate to Congress, and General Shields have been nominated for the United States Senate by the Democratic members of the Minnesota Legislature. Their competitors were ex-Governor Gorman, Governor Medary, ex-Judge Chatfield, Hon. Frank Steele, and Hon. J. R. Brown.

A gossiping Washington correspondent gives us the following information about the social life of the President: "The President's invitations are sent out on an engraved card, five inches by seven in size; which card states that the President will be happy to have the honor of Mr. So-and-So's company at dinner, upon such a day, at four o'clock P.M. An early answer is requested.

"President Pierce always wrote his own invitations, in order, I apprehend, that the invited might retain an autographic evidence of his regard. President Buchanan's dinners are pronounced superb in matter and style. It is Mr. B.'s habit to write those with whom he wishes a quiet, confidential conversation upon matters of private business or friendly interest to breakfast with him. Such an invitation is considered an especial mark of favor. The President is often met early in the morning, or about dusk, taking his solitary walk along the broad pavement in front of the White House. He looks hale, vigorous, and solid. It is his constant habit to rise at six o'clock in the winter, and do two hours' labor before breakfast. After New Year's the levees will commence.

"An elegant conservatory has been added to the Executive mansion since Miss Lane—the President's niece—became its mistress. It is said she does the honors of the house to lady visitors with great dignity and grace. During the past summer the White House was renovated and repaired, and it is now a very comfortable place of residence."

The Sultan of Turkey has conferred on Francis Dainese, Esq., who now resides in Washington, the order of Nishan Medjidie, an order of knighthood similar to that of the "Bath" in England. It was bestowed as a recognition of Mr. Dainese's services to the Turkish Government, and a testimonial of its high appreciation of his character. The decoration and its accompanying diploma, bearing the imperial cipher, inclosed in a case of white satin richly embroidered, were last week presented, with appropriate compliments, to Mr. Dainese by the Russian minister, Baron Stoeckel, through whom the Sultan was pleased to transmit them.

The President has received a letter from Mr. Mason, resigning his position as American minister at Paris. The resignation is said to be, in a measure, compulsory, having been tendered in response to a very distinct intimation that it would be acceptable.

Speaker Orr has announced his determination to inforce strictly the rule prohibiting the custom of bringing liquors into that part of the Capitol under his especial charge.

Senator Sumner finds, it is said, that attendance at debates affects him injuriously, and will go North for a few weeks, at least.

The Columbus, Ohio, correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette says: "Governor Chase has been laid up for the past week with rheumatism, but is expected to have a firm footing in a few days. He is eminently a man of routine; perhaps no Governor ever devoted himself so constantly and systematically to the business of his office. Rumors connect the recent purchase of a tasty and commodious residence by him with intentions to place in it as his wife an accomplished young widow of Cincinnati, daughter of a wealthy and influential citizen of Columbus. The Governor's sister, from Toledo, will preside over his new home for the present."

Hon. N. P. Banks, Governor elect, has resigned his office of Representative in Congress, and his resignation has been transmitted to the Governor. Probably Governor Gardner will immediately issue his proclamation ordering an election, and it will occur about the 8th of January.

Hon. Edward Everett has repeated his lecture on Washington sixty-five times for the benefit of the Mount Vernon Fund, and the sum realized is over $36,000.

Washington Irving, now seventy-five years old, walks to Dr. Creighton's Church, in Tarrytown (of which, we believe, he is a vestryman), and back, five miles, nearly every Sunday.

Ex-President Pierce having been named for United States Senator for New Hampshire, the Concord Patriot announces that he would not accept the office, even if he could receive the vote of every member of the Legislature.

Captain Henry Meyer, of the Hamburg ship Gutenberg, has received from the President a splendid gold chronometer and chain, valued at over $300, for his successful exertions in saving the officers and crew of the ship Howadji, of Newburyport.

George D. Prentice, editor of the Louisville Journal, has suffered for two years past from paralysis of the hands. His editorials are written by the aid of amanuenses.

The Lynchburg (Virginia) Courier, in noticing the arrival of General Sam Houston, says he is six feet four inches high, large in proportion, and as straight as an Indian. He has but little hair "on the top of his head," and what he has has been silvered by the touch of time—as has also the large mustache which dignifies his upper lip. He wears a vest made of some kind of animal's skin (wild cat apparently)—has his pantaloons stuffed in the legs of his boots, and altogether presents quite a backwoods and dilapidated appearance—at least so far as his dress [is] concerned.

Mr. B[illegible], the well-known New York photographer, has bee[n to] Washington in search of a suitable place in which t[o ope]n a gallery there of photographic art. It is underst[ood h]e has made satisfactory arrangements, and will ret[urn i]mmediately to carry out his proposed enterprise.

The A[dm]inistration legislative caucus in Kentucky nomina[ted e]x-Governor L. W. Powell for United States Senator [... h]e is the only Democrat who has been Governor of [the] State for the last twenty years. The fifth of January [ha]s been fixed for the election.

Mr. T[hom]as Allibone, late President of the Bank of Pennsylv[ani]a, has written a letter from Nice, in defense of himse[lf] against the charges of being a defaulter and absconding debtor to the bank. The letter is addressed to his brother, residing in Philadelphia, and is by him communicated to the press for publication. Mr. Allibone expresses extreme mortification and surprise at the charges made against him in the affidavit of the directors of the bank; declares that he had no idea that he was at all indebted to the bank; that he was never engaged in speculation; that, on leaving the country, he gave a power of attorney to two friends, one of whom, Mr. Fell, was President pro tem. of the bank, authorizing them to sell real estate to meet demands against him; and adds, that absconding debtors do not usually take their families with them as he did. Mr. Allibone's announcement that the suspicions excited against him have preyed upon his health, is confirmed by the statement of his attending physician in Nice, and the tone of the letter tends to induce the belief that Mr. Allibone is in reality suffering in mind and body.

Charles T. Anderson, Esq., who designed the enlargement of the Capitol extension, has been employed by Postmaster-General Brown to prepare a design for the New York Post-office.

A Washington correspondent says: "The Hon. Mr. Banks, who is soon to be inaugurated Governor of Massachusetts, and whose service in the United States House of Representatives closed with the adjournment, called last week upon President Buchanan to pay his respects upon leaving Washington. The President received him very cordially; and a gentleman, who happened to be present at the interview, was quite amused at the tone of conversation which occurred. Mr. Banks congratulated the President upon his evident good health, 'notwithstanding the cares and turmoils of his official station,' to which Mr. Buchanan replied, 'Yes, Mr. Banks, I am burdened; but there are men in the nation who would willingly assume the responsibilities with the honors of the office.' 'So I am told,' replied Banks,

'I may add,' continued the President, naïvely, 'that there are young men who would not object to the position.' 'So I am told, Sir,' said Banks. 'Young men are ambitious sometimes,' continued Buchanan. 'No doubt, Mr. President,' rejoined Banks, quietly; 'you know, Sir, that is the natural fault of youth; but there are some young men who can afford to wait.' 'Yes, yes,' remarked the President, pleasantly, as he turned to other topics. At parting, Mr. Buchanan took the hand of Mr. Banks, and said, 'I am happy to have seen you, Sir; I wish you well, and I most earnestly wish you success and prosperity in every thing but your politics.'"

SCURRILOUS NEWSPAPERS.

The following Message from the Mayor of New York was laid last week before the Common Council of the city:

MAYOR'S OFFICE, NEW YORK, December 21, 1857.

TO THE HONORABLE THE BOARD OF ALDERMEN—

GENTLEMEN,—I return without approval the resolution to pay the New York Tribune one hundred and seven dollars and seventy-six cents for advertising committee meetings.

As it does not appear upon the papers presented to me by whose direction the advertising was ordered, or whether it was ordered at all, it is to be presumed that the Tribune, in its characteristic anxiety to pick up patronage, published the committee meetings without any authority whatever, trusting to the influence of one of its editors in the Board of Councilmen to get paid. There are certain newspapers designated by law as the papers in which the official proceedings of the Corporation shall be published.

To the credit of the Corporation be it said, the New York Tribune is not one of these. It is assumed that the notoriously libelous and scurrilous character of that obscene sheet properly excludes it from any official recognition by the city authorities.

In my opinion it should be put under the same ban as a newspaper that similar conduct would place an individual—viz., entire exclusion from the families and firesides of all who value the reputation and morals of the community.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENT has passed the Bank of England Indemnity Bill, and it was to be signed by the Queen by the 12th ultimo. The joint-stock bank system of Great Britain, the Suez Canal project, the American slave-trade in Africa, and the French negro emigration system have been also considered. With respect to the latter, Lord Clarendon gives it as his belief that the French plan has unquestionably a tendency to revive the slave traffic, and cause great injury to the growing trade of England on the African coast.

THE LAUNCH OF THE LEVIATHAN.

The launch of the Leviathan is still in progress. On Saturday the men began work by eight A.M., but it was past four P.M. before another slip took place, and at dusk the signal boards only showed a progress of eighty-eight inches forward and seventy-two aft, her mean being six feet eight inches. During Sunday no attempts were made, but the "rams" were advanced nearer to the ship. On Monday the usual appliances were set to work at an early hour, but the vessel was more than usually obstinate, and at four o'clock the progress marked upon the gauges was about ten feet by the bows, and something less than one foot at the stern. It had been hoped that she would have cleared the boundary of the yard, and thus saved the Company £1000, which they were liable for on account of another month's rental for the premises. On Tuesday the men were set to work early in the morning, but for some time labored in vain. A general pause was made, and then, when she was relieved from all pressure fore and aft, the capricious monster suddenly slipped of herself for a distance of nearly two feet. She was immediately followed up, and two or three more short slips got out of her, and all seemed to promise well for a good day's progress, when the fog intervened. The total distance accomplished on Tuesday was only four feet nine inches forward, and four feet four inches aft. The men have since been engaged in making preparations for the renewal of operations, with greater power at their command. On Saturday morning the Princess Royal, attended by the Duchess of Athol, and one or two gentlemen of the Court, visited the ship. Her Royal Highness was conducted over the yard by Mr. Yates and Mr. Brunel, and examined with great interest all the mighty machinery. Her Royal Highness was most anxious to go on board, and made quite light of the perilous ladder ascent; but Mr. Yates respectfully declined to take the responsibility of such a proceeding—much, it is said, to the relief of the Court ladies and gentlemen in attendance on the royal visitor.

SHOCKING INHUMANITY.

A very interesting young lady, about twenty, arrived at Folkstone by the 4 P.M. express train from London, in a state of helplessness and speechless, having been placed in the carriage in that state at London Bridge, as was ascertained from the guard, by some person who gave him a sovereign to procure any refreshment she might require on the journey. She remained in the waiting-room at the station, and partook of some tea. A few minutes before the departure of the boat she was taken on board by one of the harbor policemen, under the direction, as we understand, of the harbor-master, and placed in the ladies' cabin, receiving every attention from the captain and these on board, but neither spoke nor moved during the passage. On the arrival of the boat at Boulogne, she was taken on shore and carried to the Hôtel de Paris. Dr. Scott, with another gentleman, were immediately summoned, who considered her dying, and truly, for she gradually sank and expired, every thing having been done that could be. Disgusting to relate, on undressing her a large label was found fastened to her dress, as if she were a bale of goods, and in her purse, which contained £7 (and which was also fastened inside her dress), was a piece of paper, affording the only clew as to who or what she was, and her destination. From this it seemed that she had been a governess at a Mrs. C——'s, somewhere in London, that her salary was paid up to the 6th of December, and that she was going to her brother-in-law in Amiens. On the discovery, a telegraphic dispatch was immediately sent to her friends, who arrived too late for her to recognize them.

SORROWS OF A CAUTIOUS CAPITALIST.

A circumstance has just transpired, through intimation received by the police, of a loss of 500 sovereigns sustained by a farmer, who resides near Limerick, during the panic which prevailed last week when the run on the banks was made. The man drew the 500 sovereigns, and when on his way home on his own car, being the worse of liquor, he considered it the safest plan to hide his treasure, for fear of getting entirely drunk, and being robbed. He went into a neighbor's house, borrowed a small iron skillet, and proceeded onward; when in a lonesome place he put the 500 sovereigns into the skillet, took it to a field and buried it. Next day he went in search of it to the spot where he thought he had deposited it, but from that period up to the present he had not been able to discover the money.

FRANCE.

OPENING OF THE LEGISLATIVE BODY.

At the opening of the Legislative Corps, M. Fould, Minister of State, read the following communication from the Emperor: "Gentlemen Deputies,—The Emperor has ordered me to inform you that the verification of Powers and the constitution of the Legislative Body will be the object of this first meeting. The Legislative Corps will then be prorogued to the 18th of January next for the dispatch of public business. In the name of the Emperor I declare the session of the Legislative Corps for 1858 opened." Count de Morny, President of the Legislative Body, then addressed the Assembly as follows: "Gentlemen,—I am happy at finding myself once more among you, and proud at being again called to this chair, especially if the choice his Majesty has made of me meets with your approbation. What greater happiness can there be than that of presiding over an assembly which discusses freely and conscientiously the laws of the country, and especially when that country is France? [Applause.] In like manner as the finest buildings are best viewed at a certain distance, so it is in like manner, at a distance from France, one is best enabled to judge how great is her position abroad, and what admiration and respect the Sovereign who governs inspires to all men. [Loud applause.] The loyal, and at the same time firm and moderate policy which has been followed has replaced abroad the old prejudices which were entertained toward us by confidence and by sympathy, so that if absence has its sorrows, consolation may yet be found while afar off in that sentiment of national pride which every true Frenchman carries in his heart. [Applause.] At home, having so happily traversed severe trials, when peace was established, the series of bad harvests over were about to give us repose and prosperity, the reaction of an unexampled financial crisis has fallen upon our labor and industry. The establishments of credit and French commerce now prove their solidity, and gather the fruit of their prudence. France, after three successive loans, after three years of scanty harvests, having followed up the execution of public works, having endowed Paris with wonderful monuments, is not touched by the disasters which afflict so many other states. All this indicates prodigious resources, and must give to the whole world a high idea of her power. Let us hope that this crisis will be of short duration."

LIBERTIES OF THE PRESS.

The journal La Presse has been suspended for two months, for an article which was considered to be of a decidedly revolutionary character.

The Courrier de Paris, under the somewhat startling heading in these times of "La Presse Constitutionelle," has announced, in courageous and dignified language, its intention to adopt henceforth a new line of politics, based upon the change made in the situation by the fact of the three opposition members, MM. Darimon, Ollivier, and Hénon, having taken the oath. This article, coming immediately after the suspension of the Presse, is curious as a sign of the times.

There is not a politician in Paris, says a correspondent, who now doubts the fact, which I at first announced as a suspicion, that M. Emile de Girardin is the author of this article. I happen to know by accident that a snug little dinner, given at a restaurant a few days since, brought together these three personages, Prince Napoleon, M. Prost, the proprietor of the Courrier de Paris, and M. E. de Girardin. At this dinner the plan of the campaign, of which M. E. de Girardin is the commander-in-chief, was talked over and settled. He is carrying out the idea with extraordinary ability, steering occasionally very close to the wind, but still, upon the whole, writing in such a way as really to support the government, unless the government entertain any such wild and hopeless design as to keep France in a state of perpetual subjection to its own arbitrary will.

By an arrangement with the Siècle those subscribers to the Presse who desire it may receive a copy of the Siècle during the suspension of the Presse; but, notwithstanding this offer, so great is the demand for an evening paper that the circulation of the Patrie has increased by 10,000 copies within the last three days. If M. Emile de Girardin were to-morrow to put his signature to the articles in the Courrier de Paris, there is no doubt that the Presse, for which M. Millaud paid him 800,000 francs not long ago, would be worth comparatively very little when it comes out again at the end of January.

SPAIN.

THE NEW PRINCE.

The new-born prince, who (says a correspondent from Madrid) is destined to play so prominent a part in the world, prospers exceedingly. His appetite and digestion are all that can be desired by the fondest of mothers and the enraptured father, for it was he who presented the child to the assembled courtiers, holding it out on a golden dish, as if it were a truffled woodcock. Nor was this the most grotesque part of the odd ceremonials which followed and preceded this great court performance; there were many others, which a respect for decency and a dread of disturbing your equanimity, forbid repetition, but they are all hung out to air in the columns of the Gazette, which devoted eight columns to the record of this wondrous event. At half-past eight the Urban soldiers, who were appointed to warn the Court of the coming event, left the palace and summoned the guests. The Duke and Duchess of Montpensier were the first arrivals; then limped in Armero and his colleagues; and as soon as the Prince came into the world the King Consort handed him round the room on a golden platter—in truth, a dainty dish to set before a king. Mr. Otway, on behalf of Great Britain; the Marquis Turgot, on behalf of France; and the other embassadors, signed the certificate that the Prince had been born, and then they retired, leaving the Queen alone with her sister, the Duchess of Montpensier, to the chagrin of the Bourbon Duke, her husband, who does not like that his wife should be exposed to the contact of evil influences. Although the child sucks and squeals, and performs all other infantile functions like a "robust Prince," as he has been officially designated, the interesting stranger has failed to interest his future subjects. The attempt at public rejoicings has been a lamentable failure, having been confined to a few paper lanterns hung out at the residences of the Ministers and public offices. The news very quickly spread through all the theatres. At the Circus, one of the Queen's equerries, who happened to be among the spectators, jumped up in a state of frantic excitement, rushed to the front of his box, and told the people that their future King had been born unto them. Thereupon, overcome by his emotions, he burst into tears.

HAMBURG.

TERRIBLE EFFECTS OF THE CRISIS.

A letter from Hamburg, dated "December 8th," says that notwithstanding the arrival of about 100,000,000 francs in silver, at Hamburg, during the past week—notwithstanding the decisions of the Senate on Monday—failures have succeeded one another without intermission. "The amount of bills of exchange protested since the commencement of the crisis is estimated at 140 to 150 millions. The Discount Bank of the State has commenced operations, its rate being 10 per cent. The Bank discounts only the bills of such persons as declare on their honor that they have payments to make that day or the next. The affairs at the Bourse were unimportant, the news of fresh failures having put a stop to all business there. The financial state of this city has again become very alarming; the assistance afforded is insufficient. Several important houses have been declared insolvent, with considerable liabilities. Fears were entertained respecting several Danish houses, but hitherto without sufficient cause."

RUSSIA.

MURDER OF A RUSSIAN PRINCE.

A letter from Constantinople gives interesting details of the murder of Prince Gagarine, the Governor of Kutais, by a Circassian chief, which has already been announced: "About three weeks ago Prince Gagarine received orders from General Bariatinsky, the Governor of the Caucasus, to send the Georgian Prince de Souanète to Tiflis. Prince Gagarine immediately sent for that person, and ordered him to set off, but he positively refused to obey the order. Prince Gagarine told him he would seriously compromise himself by the refusal, and recommended him to comply. On receiving a fresh refusal, the General said that he could not tolerate such obstinacy, and that he should be under the painful necessity of ordering him to be disarmed and placed under arrest. At these words the Georgian Prince exclaimed, 'I be disarmed and arrested! I!' and at the same time drawing out a long knife which the Circassians wear in their waist-belt, he stabbed Prince Gagarine in the abdomen. At the same moment two orderly officers rushed on the Georgian Prince to disarm him, but they were both laid dead by stabs from the same weapon. Two servants then rushed forward, but they were also severely wounded. The Georgian then left the house, threatening death to any one who should attempt to stop him, and went toward the river, but not being able to cross it, he turned back, and, having entered a house, from which he drove out a woman and her children, he barricaded the entrance. A number of soldiers soon, however, arrived, and the door was forced. The Prince defended himself with the long knife; but having received two wounds, was at length disarmed, handcuffed, and taken to prison. Prince Bariatinsky was immediately informed of the catastrophe, and is expected at Kutais. Prince Gagarine died after some hours of very severe suffering.

AUSTRALIA.

HORRID MURDER AT THE DIGGINGS.

The Melbourne Herald gives the following account of a diabolical murder at the Ballarat diggings: "On Thursday, the 1st of October, a man named Garkin, a splitter, in Jim Crow forest, called at the Ballan police-station to say that a man had been murdered on the Jim Crow road. Boyle and another trooper immediately started off in the direction pointed out, and eight miles from Ballan they came upon a splitter's hut, in the heart of Jim Crow forest. There they found the prisoner Mason, sitting down with his hands tied behind him, in charge of two men, who were watching him. This was outside the hut. Boyle then went into the hut, where he saw the body of a man, headless, with one leg cut off, apparently with an axe, both arms cut off, and the whole charred, while the remains of a fire showed that an attempt had been made to destroy the body. The fire had since been extinguished. The mutilated trunk lay on its left side, and the severed leg and arms lay across it. The hut was minutely examined by the constables, but the only discovery made was a part of the arms and the half-burned boots of the deceased; the remaining part had been consumed by fire. The head, though carefully searched for, could nowhere be found. The night was then far advanced, and they desisted from further search, remaining in company with the presumed murderer and hideous remains of the dismembered body. The scent of the roast remains, however, attracted the wild cats of the bush around, and the united exertions of all parties present hardly sufficed to keep the hungry animals from feasting upon the human carcass, the scent of which excited their carnivorous instincts. The fearful night at length passed away, and at the earliest dawn the police-officers renewed their investigations. To their inquiries Mason seemed by no means disinclined to respond. The head he said first he had burned, though afterward he insisted that he had hid it in the bush. To deny the horrible crime seemed never to enter his head. The murdered man, whose name was George Beynor (or some such name), was his mate, and he had quarreled with him first and murdered him afterward—how, Heaven and he only know. He did not think much of the murder, for he had known one much worse (could he have alluded to the Meredith tragedy?), where a female had been the victim, and her body similarly treated. The deceased had been his mate for eight months or more, and they had been splitting together in partnership. No signs of blood were seen. He said the blankets of the bed had been saturated, but he had burned them since; and when the police first commenced their examination he said, 'If the man had been a light one he would not have cut him up, but he was so heavy he had to treat him that way.' He was entirely unconcerned; he had taken satisfaction, he said, and that was all he wanted."

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

We have news from Calcutta to the 10th, and Bombay to the 17th of November. Generals Havelock and Outram were so closely besieged by seventy thousand Sepoys at Lucknow that no direct communication had been had with them during three weeks, except a few lines. They hoped to be able to hold out until relieved. There was much severe fighting around Lucknow, and Outram's division was terribly cut up. Generals Sir Colin Campbell, Greathead, and Grant were marching to their aid. Sir Colin crossed from Cawnpore into Oude on the 10th of November. There were no fresh outbreaks, but the mutineers of Dinapore and Gwalior were marching for Oude. The life of the old King of Delhi was to be spared. The Scinde, the Punjab, and the Nizam's country were quiet.

PERIL OF LUCKNOW.

A correspondent writes: "So completely is the force at Lucknow beleaguered that the old device of inclosing letters in a quill has been of necessity abandoned. The only message received for weeks was written on a piece of paper three inches square, and concealed by a device it may be prudent as yet to keep private. Sir James Outram's force has been terribly reduced. About the 25th September he and General Havelock forced their way into the Residency and relieved the garrison. This feat was accomplished by pressing on through gardens, small bazars, knots of houses, and other inclosed places. The enemy fought as Asiatics always do fight behind stone walls. The bullets literally rained upon the advancing force, and that single movement cost 400 men. Sixteen officers of the 90th were killed or placed hors de combat; and almost all the superior officers of the 5th Fusiliers. I have heard many of the names, but refrain from exciting the regret of their friends at home till further information can be obtained. There had been some hard fighting before the relieving force reached the inclosures, and the total number of soldiers killed or disabled can not be fixed at less than 700. The force, therefore, even after its junction with the garrison already in the Residency, can not be more than 1400 strong; and this small party must be embarrassed by the care of sick and wounded, women and children, to a number in excess of its own. There are besides some 800 men at the Alumbagh, with a great array of camp followers, but they are believed to be without the means of communicating with the Residency. Since this time we know little positively, and that little is obtained solely from native gossip. The rumors, however, all point to one fact—that General Outram, during the second week in October, attacked some large building, probably one of the palaces, and was driven back with further loss of life. I have seen one letter in which the writer, himself in Oude, states this as a fact, but I warn you that this and all other accounts must be received with caution till confirmed. It is nearly certain that there are 70,000 men, Sepoys and armed retainers, around and in Lucknow. Every landholder in Southern Oude, except one, is in arms, to see what he can obtain in the great scramble."

PROSPECTS OF AID.

He adds: "Five hundred men, with a large convoy of provisions and ammunition, left Cawnpore for Lucknow on the 21st October. They, with the assistance of the men in the Alumbagh, may force their way to the Residency, but, immense as is the military value of every European, a garrison so small can not hope to clear a way out through a densely populated town. Nevertheless, there is no cause for despondency. Sir James Outram can hold out till the 10th November. On the 6th or 7th Sir Colin Campbell, with an army, will be before Lucknow. The Commander-in-chief quitted Calcutta on the 27th. He only remained there to organize the means of transport, which, previous to his arrival, were strangely defective. He will reach Cawnpore by the 2d November, and there take the command of some 4000 men, including his own Highland brigade, and 800 cavalry. With this little army and a very heavy train of artillery he will press on to Lucknow, pick up the force at the Alumbagh, and commence the destruction of the city. It is a lath-and-plaster place, and the heavy guns will smash a path for him without so terrible a loss of European life. I hope, therefore, by the mail of the 20th November, to report the destruction of Lucknow, the relief of the garrison, and the dispersion of the besiegers. Great confidence is felt in Sir Colin Campbell. He has will as well as judgment, can be as hard as iron when necessary, and cares nothing about 'old officers,' 'experience,' 'claims,' or, indeed, any thing except efficiency."

A HEROINE IN INDIA.

The Rev. Mr. Scudder, an American missionary in India, gives the following instances of heroism: "In one place, a lady and her husband fled in their carriage. He stood upright. She took the reins. She lashed the horses through a band of mutineers, while he with cool aim shot dead one who seized the horses' heads, and another who climbed upon the carriage behind to cut him down. On they fled, till they again found themselves among foes, and a rope stretched across the road made further progress appear impossible. True to herself, she dashed the horses at full speed against the rope, and as they, bearing it down, stumbled, she by rein and whip raised them, while her husband's weapons again freed them from those who succeeded in leaping upon them. He was wounded, but both escaped with their lives. In another place, a young lady, the daughter of an officer, shot seven mutineers before they killed her. A captain, pressed by his Sepoys, with his good sword slew twenty-six of them before he fell!"

THE CRY FOR VENGEANCE.

A letter from an officer of Colonel Greathead's column, who had been present at the storming of Delhi, and had thence followed in pursuit of the enemy, gives a vivid description of the manner in which the movements of the column had been hampered by the civilians. He mentions one village especially, inhabited by Goojurs, the class who of all others have been most notorious for their cruelty. In it they found the skeleton of a woman; the head severed from the body, and the bones bearing the marks of the most cruel treatment. The skeleton was examined by a doctor, and pronounced to have belonged to a European or half-caste woman. Yet because the village was a large one, and paid a large revenue to government, the magistrate made it a personal favor that it should not be touched. Neither officers nor men could understand this leniency, for they had seen the bodies of their countrywomen at Delhi, their breasts cut off, and every enormity inflicted; they had heard also the speech of one of the sons of the King of Delhi as he was being led to execution. "I die happy," said he, "since I have defiled English women, and seen them walking naked about the streets." The murmurs were therefore loud and deep. But when they came to Cawnpore, and entered the Charnel-house, there perused the writing on the wall, and saw the still clotted blood, their grief, their rage, their desire for vengeance, knew no bounds. One officer was met coming out with a small article of female dress dabbled with blood in his hand. "I have spared many men in fight," he said, "but I will never spare another. I shall carry this with me in my holsters, and whenever I am inclined for mercy the sight of it and the recollection of this house will be sufficient to incite me to revenge." Stalwart, bearded men, the stern soldiers of the ranks, have been seen coming out of that house of murder perfectly unmanned, utterly unable to repress their emotions. From them there will be no mercy for these villainous assassins.

HIGHLAND MONSTERS.

The Calcutta correspondent of the Times remarks, en passant, the extraordinary effect produced on the native mind by the appearance of the Highlanders. "The Sepoys on this side of India have never seen them. At first they took them for women sent out to avenge the massacre of the ladies at Cawnpore. The battle of Oonao disabused them of that idea, and the Highlanders were pronounced 'petticoated devils.' Still they were a puzzle. The Sepoys could understand the existence of devils, but could not comprehend why they should be barelegged. At last the truth came out. The devils were barelegged in order more conveniently to break Sepoys across their knees. A Sepoy of the 73d, who happened to be in Calcutta on their arrival, reported on his return to his regiment that the English were sending out monsters, with legs like elephants, faces covered with hair like wild beasts, and blood-red eyes. The Highlanders are, in truth, a singular contrast to the people of the low country. On the arrival of the 42d, a Sircar or Bengalee clerk had occasion to go on board the vessel. A Highlander stepped up to him, and looked at him long and curiously. Then, catching him by the waist, he held him above his head, exclaiming with a chuckle of amazement, 'Sandy, be thae the things we're to fecht wi?' I need scarcely say that a Sepoy is very different from a Bengalee, being usually taller than an Englishman, though he weighs less."

A TRAITOR AT DELHI.

It appears to be proved that there was at least one European at Delhi who lent aid to the mutineers. Many letters report the capture of an Englishman in the dress of a native officer. He was a sergeant-major of the 28th Native Infantry, and formerly an artilleryman. He rendered, it is said, important services to the besieged, and was created a general of artillery. He has not been executed, and, despite appearances, it seems incredible that a European should have deliberately aided the devils who were burning his wounded countrymen. It is to be hoped it will be found that he was simply a man of weak nerves, unable to face the dread of death by torture. In that case his own conscience will be his own sufficient punishment. It is in his favor, also, that the Portuguese drummer, Antonio Seraphim, who was kept to play to the general, and who escaped at a very late period of the siege, does not accuse him, but considers him rather a prisoner. Four Europeans at Moradabad turned Mussulmans to preserve their lives. These five appear to be the only Christians about whose conduct during the rebellion there is even a suspicion. Nearly 6000 of our countrymen were exposed to a danger to which that of death is trivial. One may have yielded, four more purchased life by a temporary apostasy, and that is all, while hundreds have met death or torture as calmly as reward, fighting like Tucker after hope had gone, or like Mrs. Boyse, clinging to her husband's breast to shield him from their balls.

SEPOY ATROCITIES AT DELHI.

A letter says: "Some further incidents of the siege have come to light, and among them one which has driven every European, except the higher officials, almost frantic. The Sepoys took all the wounded Europeans they could catch during the siege and burned them alive. The charred bodies, tied to stakes, were found by the stormers, with the Queen's buttons still recognizable. It must be remembered that the men who did this were Sepoys, the comrades for one hundred years of the victims—men who had been led by them from victory to victory."

MORE EXECUTIONS OF MUTINEERS.

A letter from Ahmedebad gives the following account of an execution at that place: "Meanwhile the doomed five had been marched to the five fatal guns. They were bound by the arms to the wheels, but their legs were free, and the end man—the only one whom I could entirely see from my place on the flank—leaned his back against the muzzle, as loungers lean against a mantle-piece. I fixed my eyes intently on that man, not fifty yards away, and in a moment the signal was given. There was a roar, and the whizzing of a bullet, far away from the firing party; a bank of white smoke, and a jet and shower of black fragments, sharp and clear, which leaped and bounded in the air; this and a fearful sound from the spectators, as if the reality so far exceeded all previous fancy that it was intolerable; then a dead stillness. I walked straight to the scattered and smoking floor before the guns. I came first to an arm, torn off above the elbow, the fist clenched, the bone projecting several inches, bare. Then the ground sown with red gristly fragments, then a black-haired head and the other arm still held together. This was the man I had watched; close by lay the lower half of the body of the next, torn quite in two, and long coils of entrails twined on the ground. Then a long cloth in which one had been dressed rolled open like a floor-cloth and on fire. One man lay in a complete and shattered heap, all but the arms; the legs were straddled wide apart, and the smashed body in the middle of them; the spine exposed; the head lay close by, too. The last body was that of a native officer, who was the arch fiend of the mutiny; he was a short man, with a cruel face. His head had been cut clean off, but the muscles of the neck had contracted round the throat like a frill. His face was half upturned and calm, the eyes shut. I saw no expression of pain on any of them. What had been his body lay on its face, the legs, as usual, not shattered, but all the flesh torn like cloth from a sharp angle in the hollow of the back, off and off, till it merged in one mangled heap. I turned next to the three who had been shot. One had been struck in the heart, and only bowed slowly over on his face. The others had been pistoled afterward through the head. All I think, however, had been badly hit, as all were prostrate when I ran forward to the guns. And only now—there was so much more terrible—did I look up to the ten white figures slowly swinging and revolving over this scene of blood. I hope they died quickly, but the ropes were very short. The troops immediately marched off, and I rode home at speed, and when I dismounted the dogs came and licked my feet."

THE BIRTH OF THE NEW YEAR.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR!

THE AIR-HOLE.—A SKATING STORY.

The winter of 185– will be long remembered in southern New England for its extreme and enduring cold. It was in the middle of one of the most slippery portions of that rigorous season that I transacted with one of the most slippery customers I ever met the regular and irregular professional business hereinafter described.

I was at the time a young and not over-busy attorney-at-law, in the slow, solid, and wealthy city of Hartford, Connecticut. A senior professional brother, commonly called Lawyer Brian, just then intensely occupied in preparing a great insurance case, called on me one day at noon, accompanied with a dapper little gentleman of twenty-five.

"Good-morning, Brother Truax," said Lawyer Brian, in his dry, slow way. "Let me make you acquainted with Mr. Spiggleton, of New York City. Mr. Spiggleton—Mr. Truax."

We testified great mutual delight at the acquaintance, and Lawyer Brian continued:

"Mr. Spiggleton is traveling for Longtime, Sellemup, & Co., dry-goods jobbers in Murray Street. He's here on a rather unpromising business; and as I don't go out of the county, and am very busy besides, I've told him that you are exactly the man to make every human exertion in the matter, provided only you have the time."

And as he gravely and deliberately uttered these last words, he winked to me a professional and confidential wink with the eye farthest from Mr. Spiggleton, but without any motion of the other eye, or any other change of feature. With corresponding gravity, I replied,

"I'm much obliged to you, Brother Brian. But when must we go, and whither, and how long must we stay?"

"Only to Middletown; but if there's any thing to be done, it must be done by to-night. You can come back in the morning."

"I don't know—let me look at my docket."

So I opened a leather-covered memorandum, of fat and pompous appearance, and reflectingly read, "Ross versus Jenkins—that might be put off. Brown's deeds; arbitration with Robinson; injunction, East Hartford versus Bridge Company. Why, I'll undertake it if I can positively come back to-morrow."

N.B. The book contained, I grieve to say, only a caricature of Lawyer Brian, ditto of three Supreme Court Judges, ditto of sundry others of the bar of Hartford County, and sundry items of amounts due from me, in the nature of bills payable. "Only this, and nothing more."

"Well," continued my senior, "I'll leave Mr. Spiggleton with you for the present. If you'll just run into my office before you go, I'll give you a hint or two; and you can make the experiment, at any rate."

So he stalked off, and I inquired of Spiggleton what the business was. Being a smart, clear headed, business man, in spite of his trigness and putty-colored complexion, he proceeded to give me a very succinct statement to the effect that a certain Peleg Bitterill, keeping a "country store" in Portland, Connecticut, opposite Middletown, and on the Connecticut River, nearly half-way from Hartford to the Sound, but also doing business in Middletown, and residing there, had bought a large bill of goods of Longtime, Sellemup, & Co.; that they had received private early advices of his intention to "fail up," and probably to vamos with the proceeds; and that he, Mr. Spiggleton, had half an hour ago arrived in hot haste from New York to get the professional help of Mr. Brian, the usual counsel for the firm in those parts, for the obtaining of any possible security; but that Mr. Brian had intimated that Bitterill's case was somewhat understood, as it happened, in Hartford, and that the result of the attempt was rather doubtful.

"What were you proposing to do, Mr. Spiggleton?"

"Why, wouldn't you levy on the goods?"

"I would if I could. But is the payment due?"

"One note for twelve hundred, thirty-five, fifty, due three days since—protested. Two others, amounting together to fourteen hundred, seventy-eight, ten, due thirty days hence."

"You can levy for the protested note only, then."

"But," said Spiggleton, "we thought that he might give security for the whole if we threatened to break him up."

"He's too broken already, it's very likely, to be afraid of being broken any more. It's possible, however, that some of the goods may be within reach. The only thing to be done is to try that, at any rate."

"Can't you arrest the body, Mr. Truax?"

"Not in Connecticut, Mr. Spiggleton, unless upon affidavit of the debtor's fraudulent intention to leave the State. I rather think it's a gone case, unless we can find some of the goods; and even then, if you wanted to do more than to secure that first note, you can only do it on affidavit charging fraud in the purchase, not on action of debt."

"I am prepared to make that affidavit."

"Very well. I'll leave for Middletown at three, then. I'll get the papers ready, and if I want you I'll call. You are stopping where?"

"At the City Hotel."

So Mr. Spiggleton left me, and I prepared for my trip; that is, I ate my dinner, made out a writ for a Middletown officer whom I happened to know, and then stepped over to the legal sanctum of Lawyer Brian.

The old gentleman was deep in the consideration of a tough point in the law of insurance, but with professional versatility he piled up his books and proceeded to give me the information at which he had hinted. It appeared that by some of those numerous secret channels by which all sorts of queer information come quietly into a lawyer's hands, he had learned that Bitterill had been selling a large lot of dry-goods in Hartford at very low prices for cash within a week; that those goods were gone West, and out of reach; that sundry New York and Hartford creditors had also possession of the information which Messrs. Longtime, Sellemup, & Co. thought exclusively theirs; and that officers were waiting for Bitterill at Hartford, and were also looking after him in Middletown; and that he was undoubtedly hidden somewhere about this latter city, with a considerable amount of money on his person; that the idea of attaching any goods was absurd; that the only plan was to catch him, and frighten him into partial or full payment; that he was a stout, active, quarrelsome fellow, and an ugly customer; and that, on the whole, it was as barren a prospect for securing a debt as could well be imagined. He added that he had a sort of business-partner, or fellow-rascal, in Hartford—one Johnson—but that he was too wary a rogue to make any thing of.

"Has Bitterill a wife?" I asked.

"Yes. It's astonishing," indignantly moralized the old lawyer, "how the biggest villain under heaven can always find some woman that's fool enough to have him!"

"Then he might be concealed at home. Or, stay—I see! I can find out from her where he is."

"Hardly, I think; but you can try. One thing more: make those New York men pay you from half to three-quarters of any thing you secure. They would jump at ten per cent. for their claim this minute."

"Thank you, Counselor," I answered, laughing; "I'll think of it, unless I should get a —— thrashing! Good-day."

Leaving word with Spiggleton that I should be back next morning with news, I rode down to the station on Asylum Street. Espying a constable lounging about the building, I accosted him.

"Ah, Mr. Lockitt, how's the bracelet and nabbing business to-day? Any thing new?"

"Why, no," replied the officer. "I'm here on the chance of ketchin' Peleg Bitterill. But I reckon he's too sharp to stick his nose in here. He's a darned sight more likely to be at the Berlin Station, below. But he's wanted there, too."

"Is he?" I answered. "Pleasant thing to be of so much importance, eh? But isn't there some partner of his here in Hartford?"

"Yes, I b'lieve so," said Lockitt, "Jotham Johnson, they say. But there won't nobody prove nothin' against him. He's an old bird!"

The train now came thundering in, and, bidding the communicative constable good-morning, I entered the car and went on my way. My intention was to pretend a message from Johnson to Bitterill, if I could find Mrs. Bitterill, and thus discover his hiding-place; but I deferred any detailed scheme until I should have reconnoitred. Changing cars at Berlin, where also I noticed a Hartford officer quietly ensconced in a corner of the station-house, I arrived at Middletown in good season, and proceeded at once to the residence of the officer to whom my writ was directed. He was absent. His wife thought he was "up to Peleg Bitterill's," and getting the direction, thither I went.

It was an insignificant but snug-looking little white tenement, in the northeastern part of Middletown, near the river. As I entered the street where it stood, I met Mr. Japes the constable, walking slowly, his hands in his pockets, and his head down, but his eyes and ears wide open for all that.

"Ah, Mr. Japes, how are you? Will you serve a writ against Bitterill for me?"

"Why, yes, Mr. Truax, after I've found him first, and then served half a dozen others 't I've got in my pocket here," he answered, with a grim official smile.

"How deep is he in?" I asked, confidentially.

"I don't know, I'm sure. There's three fellers up from York, and several from Har'ford, and more'n one from Middletown. There's an officer in the house, and one or two in the streets, for there's a chance of his comin' home to-night, they say. I do'no—I guess there won't be enough ketcht on him to put in your eye! Why, they say that if you count all he's done, he's let folks in up to twelve or fifteen thousand dollars! He's a deep one, I tell ye!"

"I'm late in the day, I'm afraid," I observed; "however, there's the writ; I'll go back to the tavern and get some supper, I believe. Hold on, I think I'll see Mrs. Bitterill a moment."

I approached the house and knocked at the door for the purpose of trying the experiment aforementioned. "Come in!" answered a querulous and nasal feminine voice, and I entered; the door opening directly into the plain and very neat little sitting-room. A thin and pale woman, with a worn and frightened look, stood looking out of the window, while a rough-looking fellow, the officer, sat silently by the fire.

"Mrs. Bitterill?" I inquired, bowing.

"That's my name," she answered, in an impatient, angry tone.

I stepped near her, and said, in a tone too low for the officer's ear, "Mrs. Bitterill, won't you let me see you alone a moment?"

She looked suspiciously at me. I added, "I have a message from Jotham Johnson"—she started—"and if I can't find your husband, I must leave it with you."

She answered, with a meaning look, "The books are in the other room, if you'll just step in there a moment."

She led me into the kitchen, and, leaving the door ajar, took down two or three account books, and laid them open upon the table. "There," she said, "it must be in there." I approached, and, bending over them, pretended to search for some item, while I told her, in a low tone, that I was to warn Mr. Bitterill not to endeavor to leave by way of Hartford, for that they were waiting for him there, and at Springfield too.

"He isn't here," she answered, in the same manner. "He's across the river. He was a goin' up on skates, on the ice, to take a team at East Hartford. You'll have to go and see him there, for he ain't a comin' home agin."

"Across the river?" I said, with a show of reluctance. "It's terrible going, and very cold. But I suppose he must know it. Where is he?"

"At Pat M'Cabe's old shanty, near the Upper Quarry," she answered, with some hesitation. "If you knock, and call out for Jotham Johnson, he'll let you in. You must be pretty quick, for he was a goin' to start not fur from this time."

"I'll go right over," I said; "but it's a tough job." Then I continued, more loudly, for the officer's benefit—I had seen him peering through the door—"I don't find it. I must look again in the morning. Good-night, ma'am."

"Good-night." And I quietly left the house, and having saunteringly passed by Constable Japes, yet on his chilly post, with the remark that I hoped he'd have better luck than I looked for, I turned the corner, and made very quick time to the hotel, scheming as I went.

This was evidently a pretty well-considered scheme of Bitterill's, and indicated that he must have something somewhere, worth taking a good deal of pains for. This could not well be any thing except money, which, accordingly, I presumed he had about his person, to the full amount of the receipts from his swindling sales; very likely five thousand dollars. On skates? I meditated; that is not a bad idea, it's glorious skating all the way up, and for such a slippery trick so slippery a means is very suitable.

I determined that I would take a hasty supper, procure a pair of skates and a stout stick, and start off alone after our sly friend Peleg; for skating being a "specialty" of mine, I made no doubt that if he should have set out I could overhaul him on the river. What exactly to do if I should come up with him, I didn't know. But it was an adventure, at any rate, and I felt quite assured that either by persuasion or force I could effect some arrangement or other which should benefit my clients, and, willy nilly, ease his conscience. At the worst, I proposed to arrest him on my own responsibility, and secure him in some way until I could transfer him to the clutches of the law. Nearly three thousand dollars! It was worth one hot chase, or a cold one either. But—suppose he should overpower me? A great, rough, black-whiskered bully, Spiggleton called him. It would be, in Western phrase, "pretty ridiculous," if he should knock me in the head and leave me on the ice. Yet some risks must be taken, and with my training in the fistic art, I did not, on the whole, fear for the result of a single combat.

So meditating and deciding, I reached the hotel, and finding the proprietor, I addressed him in haste:

"Landlord, I want you to do four things for me a little faster than they were ever done before. First, get me supper. Second, send out and buy me a good pair of skates, and also, third, a stout straight cane. Fourth, furnish me a pocket-flask of good brandy."

"It shall be done in fifteen minutes, Sir." He disappeared with speed, and it was done—I mean the supper—and before my short and rapid meal was complete, the required remaining articles were at hand; and paying my bill, putting the skates and the flask in my pocket, fortifying myself with comforter, overcoat, gloves, and mittens, and grasping my stick, I was ready.

"Where is the road to the Upper Quarries?"

"Cross the river at the steamboat-landing," answered the somewhat puzzled host; "and it leads you a direct route, behind the Middle Quarries, straight along, up past Pat M'Cabe's old shanty."

"That's enough; thank you. Good-night."

And I was off. It was now between five and six o'clock, and bitter cold, with a sharp wind from the northeast. Settling my head well down in my coat-collars, as if I were trying to cover my ears with my shoulders, with hands in pockets, and cap drawn over eyes, I struck a round pace for the landing, and in five minutes reached the dock. The river lay utterly silent and motionless before me, one great sheet of cold, grayish snow ice; a dismantled schooner, careened over, was frozen-in a few rods out; no voice nor sound was heard; the lights from the houses opposite, in Portland, twinkled dimly through the keen air. And the unsteady, tremulous light of the wintry moon made the deadness of the scene almost ghastly. I paused a moment to look, and then climbing down upon the frozen surface, sliding, scrambling, half-walking, half-running, as those must do who walk on smooth ice, I proceeded. All at once, a series of noises like—

Whip—prrrt—slap bang—crack—crack—crack! beginning somewhere out of sight, came ripping and rattling past me, in the ice, and so faded away down the river toward the Narrows. It was a "frost-crack;" and a token of the extremest cold—a sort of groan from the ice under the relentless rigor of the Ice King.

Reaching the other side, I found the road without difficulty. It led me some little distance back from the river, up the steep slant of the hills which border it, and then turning northward, ran along the verge of the immense excavations known as the Middle Quarries. These enormous pits, which look as if a whole farm had been pulled up by the roots and the hole left, extend far below the water-level of the river, the sandstone growing finer in quality as the pit grows deeper; and furnish employment to a vast force of laboring men, as well as "brown stone fronts," caps, sills, and stone blocking, for all parts of the United States. Past the precipitous verge of these great horrible abysses, that looked all but bottomless in the deceitful moonlight, I cautiously and rapidly pursued my way; and having kept on in that direction perhaps a quarter of a mile, gradually returning toward the river, reached the miserable old hovel known as Pat M'Cabe's shanty; a rackety, solitary, dismantled den, where M'Cabe had kept a whisky-shop in the summer, and which had become notorious by reason of the many desperate rows that had occurred there and thereabouts. It was, however, now altogether deserted, and indeed had lost so many boards and joists that it was little more than the tottering skeleton of a tenement.

I knocked loudly at the broken door, and called out "Johnson! Jotham Johnson!" There was no reply, and I entered. The hut was empty; but in one corner there was a heap of shavings and a blanket or two, and there were also the embers of a decaying fire. Bitterill had been there, and had recently gone.

Quarter past six. He must have it in mind to reach Hartford, and then the first railway station between Springfield and Boston, in time to board the evening express train, which leaves Hartford at eight P.M. "That needs fast skating and fast driving—and faster on my part, if I am to catch him."

I hurried down the high precipitous bank to the river, slid out upon the gray, glassy ice, and, kneeling down, proceeded to put on the skates. Deliberately—for in such a business the more haste the less speed—and carefully I fitted them, jammed the heel-pins home, passed and buckled the straps, straining them until my feet felt as if compressed in iron shoes, replaced my mittens, grasped my stick, one hand at each end, holding it athwart me—a most excellent plan, by-the-way, in skating long distances—and wheeling about in a few small circuits to feel the ice, and the skates, and the elasticity of my muscles, I turned northward, bent low, headed diagonally across the river to round the next point above, and struck out across the glimmering silent ice, with long, steady, rapid, sweeping strokes.

From Middletown to Hartford is about twenty-five miles, by the course of the river. I might decrease this distance a mile or two, by taking advantage of my knowledge of the river, and "cutting off corners." But Bitterill doubtless knew the same, and my object, if attained at all, must be so by desperate straightforward racing. My skates, fortunately, though quite new, were not too sharp; and as the ice was extremely hard, they ran over it with very little of the scoring cut which is so apt to diminish speed; and for twenty minutes I sped steadily on at a moderate pace, until I should get a little easy in my work. There had been so much skating that the many tracks along my route afforded me no indications as to my predecessor.

Click—whip—crack—bang! went another frost-crack. Colder yet; and although very little of me except the tip of my nose was visible, the air rushing past my face fairly burned it with cold. But now my blood began to grow warm with the manly exercise; and gradually I increased my speed up to a good racing pace, not, however, going at a faster rate than I felt that I could hold up to the old wooden bridge at Hartford. The icy northeaster whistled in my ears as I flew along, or moaned and sang dirges to me from among the leafless trees and evergreens on the bleak hill-sides. It would blow the sound of Bitterill's feet back to me, and keep mine from him.

Away I went, sweeping by the wide bare meadows, past the gorges in the hills, whirling round point after point, stretching in straight lines from one to the next, while the reduplicated ringing strokes of my skates made a monotonous music for me, and I could hear the little fragments cut out by an occasional heavy foot-thrust, blown crackling backward by the wind.

Past Middletown Upper Houses; past the level meadows of South Glastenbury, famed for walnuts; past the steep, barren hill-sides of Rocky Hill, I swept along for fifteen miles and more; and now I came shooting up toward Glastenbury Landing, and still I neither saw nor heard any skater. I rounded the point opposite the landing. From this place a long, straight reach opens, the vista being closed by the roofs and cupolas of the Connecticut State Prison, situate in the onion-metropolis, Wethersfield. Now I could see upon the river, half-way up the reach, the figure of a man skating along at a good pace. It must be Bitterill; and my coming upon him while he was speeding so rapidly toward the prison might be taken as an omen of his fate and my success.

Now, at last, I put forth the very utmost of my strength; and, going at a tremendous pace, was rapidly overhauling the dishonest bankrupt. I was almost within speaking distance, when he must have heard the ringing of my skate-irons; for suddenly looking over his shoulder he saw me, and instantly redoubled his speed, which convinced me that he was my man. Away we flew for nearly a mile in perfect silence, except for the scoring and ringing skate-strokes; but I steadily closed up, until, as we turned and swept northward again, round the bend in the bow of which the State Prison stands, I spoke:

"Bitterill, hold up! I want to speak to you!"

"Go to ——!" he vociferated, with abundance of other curses, but slackened not his speed.

I continued to gain, and was just considering whether I would knock him down with my stick or lay hands on him, when, turning his head, he suddenly discharged first one pistol-shot and then another, but, firing over his shoulder, missed me. I was even already lifting my stick, and should have returned his compliment—unless he had "winged" me with a further use of his revolver—when at once the gray ice over which we had been gliding disappeared, and I seemed to be skating on water. It was dead black ice. Good God! an air-hole! An instantaneous, horrible thrill of fright shot through me; my speed was too great to turn aside, but, with an instinctive impulse, I shut my eyes, and sprang desperately up from the ice with both feet.

The tremendous speed of my former motion and the effort of that terrific leap swung me over ten feet of black, open water, and threw me, with a severe fall, flat upon the thin but tough black ice beyond. As I leaped I heard a cry, the crackling of breaking ice, a plunge—Bitterill had driven blindly into the ghastly open abyss!

I had slid some distance beyond the spot where I fell. Stunned and hurt, I arose with difficulty just as the prison-bell rang out an alarm upon the keen, still air. The two pistol-shots had been heard, and it was probably thought that some convict was escaping. That was not exactly it; the old bell might, however, be taken to sound forth the signal that a culprit was caged. A glance showed me that we were opposite the entrance of that singular body of water called Wallenstadt Cove; the warmer outflow from whose springs, passing through a narrow channel into the river, had kept open this death-trap, within whose fearful circle Bitterill had risen to the surface, and, the knife current carrying him to the lower side of the orifice, was sustaining himself by his arms, but made ineffectual struggles to creep out upon the thin ice, which cracked and broke as he bore upon it.

"Hold still!" I cried. "I'll get a rail." So I hurried to the next house, and returned shortly with the rail dragging behind me, when it occurred to me this circumstances facilitated the making of good quotations. "Stand by, Friend Pelegy, as was now, in a manner, at my mercy. So I halted and addressed him:

"You are Puleg Bitterill, are you?"

"Yes."

"You'll settle Longtime, Sellenup, & Co.'s bill if I get you out, will you?"

He answered very eagerly, and with some curse—but rather cool ones, for he was hardly able to speak by this time—"Oh, h—— Are you going to let a man drown before your eyes? Shove me that rail, will ye?"

And, in a rage, he made a great splutttering in the water. But he was getting a little stiff, and the ice kept breaking and letting his head under. I was not to be satisfied with evasion, and repeated my demand.

"Agree to settle that bill in full, with interest, and here's the rail. If not, why, you must get out yourself. Come, I can't wait all night here, I have business at Hartford." And, dropping the rail, I turned as if to depart.

Not that I would have left the rogue to drown, but it was well to let him think so. He was by this sufficiently agreed to my conditions; upon which I got my rail under the ice, crawled out upon it and could reach him with the rail, and held it as firmly as I could, while he raised himself upon it and carefully crawled out, resting upon it awhile to cool and partly upon the ice.

As he somewhat along to firmer footing, such was the intensity of the cold that every time his mitten or his knee touched the ice, all dripping as he was with water, they froze fast to it; and he was at last he stood erect, which he was only able to do by re-lying the rail still upon the ice. Forward the shore, we had not reached the bank before he was clothed from head to foot in crackling icy armor, and his skin was hard and smooth as ice, but he would never have risen; and it was only by threats and a show of violence, and with no small amount of actual dragging and pushing, that I succeeded in leading him to the door of the nearest house, where, upon knocking, we were hospitably received, and forthwith put before a cheerful fire. The kindly Yankee dame and her husband both agreed with me that Bitterill was at most only a fool, for he was almost speechless. When, however, Mr. Allen (such was the name I attempted to give) and I would have resisted. Without attending to his offers, however, we quickly divested him of his frozen raiment, and his reluctance was explained. He wore a belt, with a considerable sum in gold sewed up in it, under his clothes. But we kept him, refusing to take it, even with warm towels, gave him a dose out of my brandy-flask, and in an hour long before he was asleep. On emptying his pocket-book that night he might be dried, I took the liberty of investigating his wallet, and found no signs of money, but the possession of about five thousand dollars, all told. From this I abstracted the amount for which I had stipulated with him, and having deposited the same with my own slender peculium, I went to sleep—pretty well fatigued, but with a joyful feet.

Rising early, I suggested to Mr. Bitterill (who was still asleep when I entered his room) the possibility of his wishing to bring him up before the dividuals anxious to put papers into his hands concerning "Our Mr. Sheriff," as the phrase was "Justice of Peace") and hands on his shoulder; at which idea he exhibited and expressed a disgust profound in character and altogether original in expression. But the suggestion prevailed with him to yield a perfect consent to the proposition, after which I informed him, and whose completeness I demonstrated by exhibiting to him the bunch of wet bills in my pocket-book. And then I left him with as evil grace, a receipt in full from me to Longtime, Sellenup, & Co.'s attorney.

Leaving him to his own devices, and thanking and paying Mr. Allen, I hastened to Hartford, where, not to fail on the strict line of duty, which the community, I noticed officer Locklin of the place where I had left Bitterill, and informed him, although the constable used instant diligence, he failed to apprehend. I have received no news of him since; I suppose he may be in California at present for what I know.

I found Spiggleton at the hotel in Hartford, informed him, with a grave face, that I had found that there were absolutely no goods to attach, and that I had reliable information that Bitterill had left Middletown; but, I added, I thought that there was a certain chance that I might, if I did release, twenty-five per cent. or thereabouts of the amount due could be obtained.

Spiggleton's further inquiries about Bitterill seemed to have even lowered his estimate of the man and his solvency. For he caught at the offer, and said it was lucky that they could get so much.

I laughed. "I beg pardon, Mr. Spiggleton, I believe I realize the inquiries by your face. Perhaps I've secured the whole amount. Have the kindness to count these bills, will you?"

And I deposited the documents, yet wet, but good money and true, upon the table. In silent wonder the New Yorker counted and summed up.

"Twenty-seven hundred and thirteen dollars, sixty-one cents," he said. "Do you mean to hand out of the river? The notes are wet enough."

Yes, literally and truly, I did," I answered; and told him the story, to his great satisfaction and delight.

Longtime, Sellenup, & Co. paid me two hundred and fifty dollars for that night's work; but no money would buy me to experience again the awful agony, deadly panic of fright that shot through me at the sight of the black ice of the inlet; neither, to this day, can I refit over the frozen surface of any water without a slight instinctive trembling.

STANZAS TO AN EGG.

[BY A SCOUT.]

PLEDGE of a fowl's affection,
Kidnapped in thy downy nest,
Soon for my breakfast—sad reflection!
Must thou be put to rest.

What are the feelings of thy mother?
Poor bereaved, unhappy hen!
Though she may lay, perchance, another,
Thee she ne'er will see again.

Yet do not mourn. Although above her
Never more shall parent brood,
Know, dainty darling! that I love thee
Dearly as thy mother could.

ONE DAY IN MY LIFE.

I.—THE JOURNEY.

THANKSGIVING began earlier than usual for me this year. I usually enjoy the festival of the day night before, when with a subdued yet conscious triumph I announce my invisibility at the office for the remainder of the day, the joy of a two vacation was enhanced by the bright visions before me. The sanctified turkey—sacred to the day —must before me with freedom in his wings; while on the eastern horizon, rich, round, and golden as the harvest moon, rose a famous pumpkin pie. Exultant yet pitying, I bade adieu to my fellow-laborers. For them no Connecticut even opened with seven-fold fervor, whose-fold turkey yielded up his life. Still "cabined, cribbed, confined" within the dingy walls of the office, under the imitation of a frost, one remove, and only one, above the pasteboard banquets of the stage. But I was going to keep Thanksgiving in the country, and already the foreshadowing of the great day made me jubilant even in Nassau.

As a rule, I am not fond of early rising. I never could appreciate the point of that joke which turns on making a worm "early to bed and early to rise," as the untimely hour, the ruthless invasion of that delicious unconsciousness, the sensation of being in the additional circumstance? It is a clear instance of bathos. Be content, O venerable Miller, with the noon day, and dismiss from your list, if not it have, by minor details!"

But on that eventful Wednesday morning I did not hesitate. The sun had not yet risen when fifteen cot-loads of stiffened humanity emerged from the depot and began to disperse. Then, with the facilities of old, was traveled by faith, and not by sight. The cars were packed, and the train of rushed headlong through the darkness; but we knew that Connecticut was ahead, and that neither the cold nor the snow was more than a temporary annual feast. Through the dark tunnel, over Harlem River, by Spuyten Duyvil, through Westchester, scattered through rocky Westchester—Melrose and Waverley, Scrabblington and Laura Matildaville. Then in rapid succession the Highlands of the Hudson, of New England. The plashing rain became feathery flakes, and every hill-side grew whiter as we sped along. Children began to cry for candy, and the wind came, and fell over their joyous anticipations; and children of a larger growth, grave men and women, gazing drearily out on the familiar landscape, felt their impassive hearts throb with more rich warmth as they saw the fences disappearing. At every stopping-place they debarked in crowds to get their dinners, and crowded the waiting railroads; some in quaint, roomy stages; some, already near their bourne, by still quainter vehicles, which had been sent to meet them, and which were driven over to meet them.

Our pilgrimage was not a burger. Through the damp and fetid cavern which serves the New Haven people for a depôt, and to the rest of mankind jungles and bowers, we were hurried by the "cabby" of the book, where we wondered whether it was the real thing, or the "Arabian Nights," and where the omnibus-looking people were standing; through New London, and over, under, by, between, and all around Connecticut. At Saybrook the lies at a town had fallen from the sky and been broken to its present size and shape. At Old Lyme, grave Italian's great palm, and took into his big blue eye, and hear his cheery words of welcome. You intimate that I am a Connecticut man in some way, whereas, as in a great lungering hall, whole troops of Boys in blue are all Connecticut soldiers. So goodly man is Cousin James to look upon, towering up as he does head and shoulders high over us, his honest face beamed by the fire-light, that I could clear calm sunshine of his native New England atmosphere. Cousin Jacob, and Cousin Jane, I have seen in them, too, that tells of thoughts dwelling with his lost ones; with the babes that lie in the graveyard at home, and the loving wife over, whom ocean waves forever sing requiem. By her side-lied, and in her place, sat a fair young woman; up he read the last solemn prayer, he has learned to "suffer and be strong." And strong he is: strong in his manhood, strong in his childhood, strong in the deep shadows of his soul, and only pathos and chasten the light of gladness in which he walks. Playfully he lifts us, like babes, into the carriage, and like babes tucked up in bed together with the very robes in his hands brought from a far-off country. His work for the day is not yet done; many guests will still arrive by the evening train; so off we go through mist and mud, and leave him in the gathering darkness, gazing up and down the platform as if it were a quarter-deck.

II.—THE OLD HOMESTEAD.

High on a bleak and barren hill, like the weatherbeaten air-streaked on Arnaut, stands the old useless-house of Cousin Jacob. Once upon a time it was the necleus of a flourishing country village, and tradition fondly points back to the time when no less than "forty-one" made it a place of commercial importance. But this Augustan age has passed forever. As the valleys round them thriving factory villages have sprung up, and business has slid down into them. Still the North Parish persists in considering them her suburbs. Like a lonely old maid, she keeps solitary state in the old homestead while her younger sisters dance gayly about in the world, and are thrifty matrons with troops of children growing up around them. Over her long green sea-shore she wander. From the upper end the weather-beaten spire, a bird-mark for storms seems, looks down upon half-closed and mouldy houses where a few old men and women, whom no change can transform their life-long homes, sit waiting to be carried into the grave-yard where their fathers lie. Their sons and daughters are in the far city, or on the western coast, and there is an youth left in the lonely old place.

But from the lower corner of the green on that blushingly rural spot a pretty light streamed out into the sleety darkness, betokening us a welcome. Nor did the table belie it. The door opens as we drive up, and warm and cheerful are the hearth and hearths that receive us. Age and loneliness have not frozen the kindhood of the old North Parish people.

How shall a modern—a travel-bed pen describe portray thee, then perfect specimen of ancient maidenhood, Aunt Mary? It different fate had placed thee on a throne, or even in the more unpretentious sovereign, fame would have handed thy name down to posterity as a woman worthy of the great place. And yet, in the rare elements of discretion, thou wouldst have been no more excellent than now. The kings of old were known as wise or unwise, bold, it is not, of all spheres, that where innate royalty of soul shows itself most truly out? And the while, O, my England mother, to be a queen worthy a reign? Judge between them: on the one hand, the loving-hearted wife, the tender mother, the kind neighbor, "mother thy father and thy mother." Would those stalwart Yankees, her sons, bow as implicitly to the old lady as to their mother? They themselves have long been men in authority, accustomed to make their own laws by multitudes of inferiors. He would be a rash man who should taunt either of them with not daring to do "all that may license a man." And who ask one of them to whether he would dare disobey his mother. Or, if you prefer a different test, ask Cousin Jacob or Cousin James to light his best-beloved Manilla cheroot in the south parlor, suggest to Cousin William that he do not shave or wear a cravat, or Cousin Henry a candle and coalscuttles raking up the ashes. You will get by the answer, dear reader, if you wish it for myself, I respectfully decline.

Aunt Mary, however, can not sit in state to-night to have your portrait taken—no, not even if we cabinet meetings to be held in the kitchen, and privy-councils in the pantry, to say nothing of a constant journeys into the chambers and other remote provinces of her kingdom. Even at this minute, though with brows as smooth as a whale-bone and were not weighing on of six sits in her great chair in the best room, and pretends to talk to me, I know she will rush up the moment I retire to direct her attention to me is but a piece of state policy and to her self-respect, rather, of that conscience which sits so gracefully on royalty.

She does not listen long in vain. Whether her now, as, with light in hand, she goes out into the storm from the opened door. Can you not see that face expectant of the young? A whole household child to her, long as he has been to others a portly, prosperous man? Yet, it is to at last. He steps carefully out of the way of the opening door, in the suspicion of the gust has followed him even here. And he does not think of it when he stands on the threshold of the old home, with his mother's arms around his neck, and his lips on her silver hair. Into her face he does not need to look; but you, dear reader, if perchance you have thought there was a little bit of the boy left in the man, if you have seen one of these who believe that the great central fires of this world do not glow as truly beneath the ice-crust as in the tropics, and under cover of a warm fire-place, why then it were well for you to watch that mother's greeting of her son.

III.—AT DINNER.

"How about Thanksgiving dinner?" growls the judicious friend, to whom I suppose myself to be addressing this letter.

Possess thyself, oh worthy but impatient critic, and I will come to it.

"Is the dinner sublime," you know, my dear friend, "transum orditur ab ovo."

And my old friend, Horace, satisfied that he has not only rebuked me, but made a very neat display of his classics, becomes gracious, replaces his feet on the fender, and settles his elegant coat—listening.

He has lost by it, however, more than he can know. The sound of that day, the indescribable, when my nose first emerged into the Arctic atmosphere of the northwest, or keeping-room chamber (temperature, 50° by observation—of my own feeling), up to the time when I ushered beneath their roof my friend, Spiggleton, deserved a "vale sacro" which henceforth they will "exeunt."

Nor will the reader now make with becoming fruit without, and strong appreciation of my friend Jacob, of Boston. Cousin Jacob does business in a genuine down, redolent of fat and calculation, upon some wharf. When I say that he is one of the solid men of that sea-port, my reader will understand me. Wherein Jacob is a solid man. His wharf is a solid wharf. His store and his credit are solid. So are his bank account and his watch chain. His ships are good solid ships, built at Piscataqua, and Passamaquoddy, and other celebrated places down East, where they build such ships by the mile, and stow them off on to the stock required. I have no doubt he married into a solid family, and made his choice from solid citizens. One could not be four-and-twenty hours under the same roof with Mrs. Cousin Jacob without feeling assured of it.

Dinner was a little late, but the time did not seem long. When it was over, I was pleased to meet it, as the poet beautifully remarks, without fear, and was a success. Cousin James's cousin, Lydia, was on my arm.

There, the secret is out, and I may as well spare myself all unnecessary effort of further concealment. Did you ever know me particularly pleased with any thing that was not a hazel-eyed young woman at the bottom of it? On this occasion I was in great coolbrunon. I had demonstrated my friend Jacob the cause of my visit, and Jane must be my cousin also; and the hazel-eyed young woman had attained the force of my reasoning.

"Liddy, child," said Uncle Jacob from the other end of the table, "have you heard of Mary Parkman's engagement to Tom Hopkins?"

"Mary and Tom Hopkins engaged!" cried Hazel-eyes. "Why, Uncle Dlah, they are cousins!"

Something suddenly destroyed my relish even for second-joint and side-bone. The rest of that dinner is vague in my memory to me as a dream. I recall only a long procession of spectral waiters, of shadowy spider patties, of illusion commending wines, and spirits, and pretty pies in large quantity. To the other guests there were substantial realities, but to me there was nothing "help" in the kitchen, where a fresh voice now attracted our attention, and announced the arrival of Uncle Jacob's.

Every country neighborhood has its walking romance. Dartmoor is that of the Dartmoor. A poor, half-witted old man, silent and inoffensive, wandering restlessly from house to house, over a little circuit, which I know by heart, and given tenderly the simple fare and shelter he craves. Aunt Mary generally finds him her self-invited guest on Thanksgiving-day.

"Egad," says Dr. Cook, striking down his newspaper, "something unpleasant about to be visited board, I don't think the fellow so much of a simpleton after all."

While Darcanet was feasting in the kitchen Aunt Mary told us his story. It was a simple old-fashioned romance of a parson and his love, and revealed only in time to learn that the avowal was that a day too late. The parson's love would have conquered or been crushed. His simple, loud nature was only crazed and crippled for life.

"Poor fellow!" said I, when the story was told, and the words seemed to come from the very tint tone of my heart. I started at the sound, and my quick, half-guilty glance detected that of Hazel-eye turned full and searchingly on me. It was very provoking that she should have chosen that very working away on the bosom that reached to Hebrew. Somewhat flurried, I rose, and, hurried, a mighty player on the bass-viol, and chief among the tenors, had brought out Corinna Sacra, or something like it, and with the blessing of Providence Melinda was distinctly audible in the dining-room. Fancy could very well have dispensed with Hazel-eye's company, and would have sung the back through from cover to cover most contentedly without her. Nay face must have been a mask when she joined them, for I caught Mr. Cousin Jacob eyeing me with a look of suspicion, the same I had seen on her face when Hazel-eye left the dinner-table. How I wished that estimable lady a safe voyage to the bottom of Boston Street!

In fact I was thoroughly miserable. For ten years I had stood at the very threshold of that pure, rich heart, gazing on its treasures; and yet it never had occurred to me that the very secret instinct just as the door, so to speak, was slammed in my face.

Tea came at last, and then the long evening. The young folks, whose anticipations of a frolic had been soured by the sad tale of poor Darcanet, and Cousin Jacob from Boston, seized with glad surprise upon the opportunity of making the new-found discussion we hit upon one of these elaborately heavy performances in which one couple is exiled from the room while the rest choose a subject. Mrs. Cousin Jacob, spiritelle as I used to think her, was a most stupid woman. She had no imagination.

When it fell to the lot of Hazel-eye to choose a partner and go out, my heart beat like a winning pigeon; but when Uncle Jacob from Boston had called down I came to the turn of Mrs. Jacob, and she called me out, it was going very heavily indeed.

"Bless my heart, "cried my lady, as we reached the door, "if I have not forgotten my handkerchief! Cousin Lydia, do, please, take my place while I run up stairs."

Oh, Mrs. Jacob, Mrs. Jacob! How much I should have lost if you had gone back to Beacon Street that night!

Hazel-eye came demurely enough out of the room, but her cheek glowed, and her glance did not meet mine.

Now do you suppose I am going to tell you what was said in the five minutes before they called us back? Or in the ten which elapsed after that because were locked in the room? Or anything that was said because in the parlor after every body else had left? Or what was said, and kept that old lady and gentleman under their chill for the space of audience?

By no means. If you insist on knowing, ask my wife!

THE REGULAR STUDENT.

"Oh! you see, we—we—went up to their room there, and sat down, and drank some beer now and then, and—and—oh! I tell you we had a capital time, I assure you." Now, the real state of the case is, that Jones was brought home by four students and put to bed, and beyond a cloudy recollection of pipes, beer, and tobacco, dancing, singing, and hugging, smoke, swords, and swearing eternal friendship to every body—beyond this, his account of things is very indistinct. Saufenheimer likes to put travelers through in this style. There was my friend H——, of Boston, who will probably remember the very mellow state in which he reached his couch not long ago. You won't forget, shall you, H——, that ornamental painting on the house, not in water-colors, which you worked out so handsomely that evening after you got home? You remember the three dollars you had to pay to get it removed? Bhaesi! how the good Frau Steckenhamen raved when she first saw that illustration adorning her clean white front.

We have five corps or fighting clubs here, numbering about one hundred and fifty members altogether; and if you wish for a "mensur" or a "row" you can have it at the shortest notice. Generally speaking, we are in a perpetual stew of some kind all the time. From eight to ten duels a day, for at least four days in the week, is about the general average. They begin at eight in the morning, and get through at about one or two o'clock. Of course, the "powers that be" wink at this state of things. It's a vent-hole for hot blood, and, if stopped, might burst out somewhere in the form of a revolution, or something perhaps equally dangerous: so they say, we will let them alone so long as they don't kill one another. These duels are of three kinds: first, for a trial of skill simply; second, the half-serious, without cap and breeches; third, the serious, with pistols, rapiers, or the sabre. The first one originates as follows: One corps sends another a challenge, saying, "We have six men ready to fight six of yours of equal standing." The challenge is of course accepted, and Tom, Dick, Bob, and Harry, without knowing with whom, agree to fight, with the chances of getting a chop in the face which will disfigure them for life. This kind of duel can not exceed fifteen minutes. The combatants having been duly beheathered and bandaged by the doctor, are led forth into the hall, looking very much like two evergreen hay-stacks. An umpire having been selected, and the combatants taken their places, the duel proceeds in this manner:

MY FRIEND SLAPPENHEIMER.

UMPIRE. "Silentium—silentium!" A dead silence ensues.
FIRST SECOND. "Auf die mensur fertig, los!"

A DUELIST IN FULL DRESS.

From our position, Ready—fight. (Slap, slap—slash, slash—slap, flash, whack.)

SECOND SEC. "Halt!"
FIRST SEC. "Weshalb"—why?
SECOND SEC. "Klinge ist gesprungen"—your blade is sprung.
FIRST SEC. (to the Umpire). "Is the blade sprung?"
UMP. "The blade is sprung."
This constitutes a round. They then fall back, right the blade, and commence anew.
The second kind, the half-serious, originates in this manner: Two students pass one another on the sidewalk; one accidentally crowds the other off; whereupon the latter turns around, and wants to know if he meant any thing by that. No. 1 replies that he did or did not, just as No. 2 likes. No. 2 accordingly calls him a dumme junge, and says he will fight him, ohne mütze und pantoffeln (without cap and breeches).
The third kind I can illustrate by a duel which took place a few days before my arrival.
A Herr von S, for some supposed insult, had knocked down another student, and jumped on his face with the heels of his boots. The next morning there was a rather dull at the Hirschgasse. On the third round Von S. received a cut in the forehead which knocked him senseless. He was carried into an adjoining room, where, for two weeks, he lay vibrating between life and death. Soon after he began to recover, and at the expiration of the eighth week was just able to leave the house. I have since learned that he has been shot dead in a pistol duel.
The wounds received in the two first kinds of duels are always on the face, but never dangerous. It seems to me that they rather covet their possession. My friend Steppenheimer, of the Rinaus,

THE LIFE OF AMERICAN STUDENTS AT HEIDELBERG.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

HEIDELBERG, December, 1857.

HERE I am at last, a jolly student of medicine, at the old Karl-Rupert University of Heidelberg. I believe in the old proverb, "When you are among the Turks, do as the Turkeys do;" so just three months ago, just before matriculation, I bought the largest pair of boots, almost concealing the ou l'on va, the shortest bob-coat, not quite covering my ne petois, that I could find. I also purchased two or three pipes, one about a yard long, which Kätchen has to light for me; and a map for the lectures. Add a small dumpy cap, and my beer mug, and then allow me to introduce your humble servant—a through and through German student. The American caterpillar turned German butterfly. I like the rig. It's bold and effective; there is no about it, and you feel more like a real Teuton in it.

My first four weeks I fear did not smell much of medicine. I went round under the auspices of lusty Burschen beer-drinkers, inducing myself generally into the mysteries of beer and duels. This forms the quintessence of student-life here. Not a traveler passes this place without going to see the duels, or coming home very late from some beer-kneipe, very drunk. Jones comes over from New York. He wants to see a duel. Could I introduce him to some one? Oh! certainly. So I introduce Jones to Mr. Saufenheimer, with whom he sees a duel, and gets also an invitation to the kneipe or club that evening. The next day I meet Jones, looking rather seedy. "How are you, Jones? Did you have a good time last night?" "Oh, capital! splendid!" "What did you do?"

THE DUEL.

has four conspicuous ones, which I verily believe he is proud of. He is student-life, illustrated with cuts.

An interesting feature of our life here is the torch-light procession. This is generally got up to do honor to the advent of some new and distinguished Professor. We had one a few evenings ago here. There were above two hundred, each with a torch, in the procession. It was a sight for you. Those gay, spanking leaders, and the others who formed the procession, in their grim, old-looking kappiruzas. We marched up to the Professor's house, got a speech out of him, then turned about, and went down to the University Place, where we formed a ring, and sang the "Dum, Vivamus Vivamus" and "Gandeamus igitur."

The roar of those two hundred voices, together with the wild dancing, waving torches, and gesticulation generally, beat all the Kickapoo Calisthenics, I am certain, quite into the shade.

A SUBMARINE RAILWAY

BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

OUR European files bring us intelligence that the prospect of constructing a submarine railway and highway, to connect England with France, is once more under consideration—and this time with more than usual prospect of success, so far as an actual attempt is concerned, the Emperor Napoleon III. having appointed a commission of able scientific men to report to him upon the practicability of a plan recently proposed to His Majesty by M. Thomé, civil engineer, of Paris.

The idea of connecting England with France and the European continent generally, by means of a submarine passage-way, by which passengers and goods might be transported to and from the "sea-girt isle," is by no means new. So long ago as 1798, M. Matthieu, French mining engineer, conceived the possibility of such a work, and in 1802 he laid his plan and accompanying drawings and estimates before the First Consul. The drawings were for many years on exhibition in the Luxembourg Palace, and are now deposited in the archives of the Institute.

The wars of those days put off the consideration of Matthieu's plan, and, when he died the matter was forgotten. Since then, however, a number of scientific men, both English and French, have considered the possibility of such a submarine communication. The greater speed attainable for conveyances, since the introduction of railways and steam, had given added plausibility to the project, while the successful submerging of various lengths of submarine telegraph cables has placed a tunnel rather in the opinion of many engineers upon the catalogue of things possible of achievement, and only awaiting time and money to become actual.

In 1842 Mr. E. Pearse proposed an iron tunnel from Dover to Calais, which he supposed could be constructed at a much less (comparative) cost than the Thames Tunnel.

In 1845 M. de la Haye proposed a wrought-iron tunnel, in separate divisions, to be sunk and afterward connected. Supposing these divisions to be 1030 feet in length, he says "only 104 divisions would be required to join the rails of the South-eastern Railway with those of the Calais and Paris." Allowing, as he did, $200,000 as the cost of each division of his tunnel, the tunnel itself would cost $20,000,000. The entire expense of laying down, constructing turnstile stations, watch and light towers, etc., was estimated at another $20,000,000; and M. de la Haye expressed himself satisfied that the undertaking could be successfully carried through with $80,000,000.

In 1848 M. Ferdinand, engineer, submitted to the French Academy of Sciences a proposal to construct a floating tunnel from Calais to Dover, of iron sufficient to be traversed by small locomotives and cars for the conveyance of passengers. This would, however, have put a stop to the navigation of the British Channel, and was therefore out of question.

In 1851 M. Hector Horeau, of Paris, made public a plan for crossing the British Channel by means of a single tube of strong plate or cast iron. The details of this plan our engraving will enable the reader to comprehend. The tube was to contain, besides paths for foot-passengers, two lines of rails for cars. The slope acquired by the tube, as it extended toward mid-channel, M. Horeau thought would give the cars a sufficient impetus to send them across from terminus to terminus, without the aid of locomotive or other power. Light-houses were to be moored above the tunnel, to warn vessels from casting anchor over it. Where the water should, near shore, be shoal, light-houses would have a solid foundation, and might serve as residences for light-keepers and fishermen. The tube or tunnel was to be lighted by means of reflecting metal plates. In the upper portion should be placed, at regular distances, strong glass plates, which also would give light. M. Horeau's plan excited some attention at the time. But the matter was not seriously considered by either moneyed men or the Governments of the countries most interested. He estimated the costs at the very reasonable sum of $20,000,000.

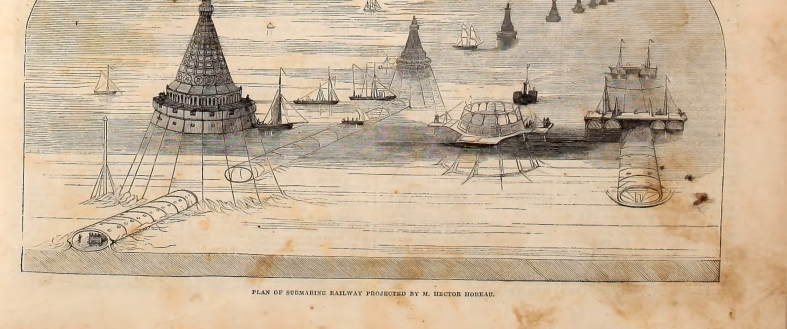
SUBMARINE RAILWAY, AS PROJECTED BY M. THOMÉ.

1. The Channel. 2. Folkestone. 3. Dover. 4. Oceanic Railway Station of Ecelle de Varne. 5. Small artificial Islands. 6. Light-house.

In May, 1855, Dr. Payerne proposed, in the Bon Sens Gazette, to construct, with the assistance of 40 subaqueous boats (or his own invention), 1500 sinkers and workmen, 4,500,000 cubic yards of material, and at a cost of $50,000,000, a tunnel by which the Channel should be crossed in thirty-three minutes. His plan was to lay a solid arched passage of masonry upon the bed of the channel, smoothing as far as might be all inequalities of surface, having very little incline, and communicating with the surface at the termini, by means of shafts sunk down to its level.

During the same year, M. Favre published in a Parisian journal a plan for constructing a submarine railway. He proposed to make the arch of brick lined with iron, to make the tunnel level, and to sink it at least eighty-five feet below the bottom of the sea—thus boring his way across.

Finally, in November, 1855, Mr. James Wylson, of London, proposed a tunnel, to be composed of hollow iron staves, firmly hooped together, the segments to be joined by flexible connections, and the whole to be moored by heavy mooring tackle, at a depth of one hundred feet below the surface of the channel; where Mr. Wylson supposed it would float by its own buoyancy, and be sufficiently strong to bear the weight and strain of railway trains rushing through from side to side.



None of these plans seem to have attracted favorable notice from either capitalists or governments. We come now to that submitted by M. Thomé, the most colossal of all in its proportions, and the one which seems at present to have the best prospect of success. Our engraving will assist the reader in gaining a correct idea of this stupendous design, now worthy the whys of the pyramid builders, and which, if carried out, would form another and pre-eminent wonder of the world. To state the outlines simply, it is proposed to construct between Cape Gris-nez near Calais, on the French coast, and a point called Eestware, between Dover and Folkestone, on the British side, a tunnel, cylindrical in form and arched in solid stone, twenty-nine feet wide by twenty-two feet high, eighteen and a half miles long, and having a double set of rails running through it, and, besides, a wide foot-path on each side.

So much for the submarine portion. This is to be connected with the outer world, on the French side, by a tunnel over nine thousand yards in length, and joining the submarine part at a depth of one hundred and seventy-five feet below the level of Cape Gris-nez; on the English, by a like tunnel, over six thousand yards in length, and joining the English terminus of the submarine tunnel at a depth of one hundred feet below the surface of Eestware point. Thus would be obtained a very easy grade quite in the power of a locomotive to surmount.

There is yet to be stated, however, the most colossal portion of M. Thomé's plan. To ventilate the submarine portion of the tunnel, it is proposed to establish upon firm foundations twelve small islands and one large one, at various distances from either shore, which islands are to connect with the tunnel beneath, and besides affording air, will serve, by means of stairways constructed within, to give access from the shores to the tunnel. Passengers may thus, in a smooth time, permit themselves to be landed—so to speak—upon one of these islets, and descending the stair amid the train for Paris or London, whichever may be their port of destination, leaving the good ship to make her way through gale and head-winds to her proper port: a charming prospect for such of us as may be journeying Paris-ward six years from now—for that is the period which M. Thomé gives himself to complete the whole work.

The larger island, which is numbered 4 in our engraving, is to contain a small but safe harbor for vessels, where, we have no doubt, many a windbound homeward bounder will be glad to find refuge in times of trouble. Here, too, it is proposed to have conveniences for discharging cargoes of vessels, so that an East India or China trader may dispatch half her cargo of silks and spices to Paris per submarine railway, and then proceed with the balance to her proper port of London; a material saving in time, if in nothing else.

The Harbor Island, which is to be known as the station of Basile de Varne, is to be founded upon the shoal or bank of Varne, which is five fayvers M. Thomé's plan. The descent from the water to the tunnelled way will be 300 feet; the island itself is te cover a space nearly a mile square; and the barbor will be so constructed as to be attainable in all weathers, thus proving indeed a harbor of refuge to hard-beaconed vessels. Light-house will be established upon all the islands, as well as upon the points Eastward and Grl-sett. From these points, also, shafts will be sunk to the level of the tunnel, and stairways will enable foot-passengers to attain the light of day here.

PLAN OF SUBMARINE RAILWAY PROJECTED BY M. HECTOR HOREAU.

As before said, M. Thomé proposes to complete the entire work, road for the passage of trains, in five years from the day of commencement. He divides out his work as follows: the first year he will devote to the construction of the artificial islands, and the sinking of shafts to the level of the sea, pushing out, during the second year he will break ground in all the main sections; and the four remaining years are to be devoted to the completion of the work in all its departments.

The cost he estimates at $22,500,000 for the submarine portion; $6,000,000 for the connecting tunnels on each side; and $7,000,000 for the construction of the islands, the safe harbor, and accidental expenses, making in all a cost of $34,500,000, on which capital he calculates that the net receipts, for freight and passengers, will produce a dividend of at least 12 per cent.

The shafts of the towers and artificial islands will serve from the first as outlets for the superfluous earth which must accumulate below, as well as for purposes of conveying building materials and air to the laborers at the bottom, and freeing the works from gases. When those interesting objects are afterward to form so important a part of the finished undertaking, are of the greatest use from the first.

M. Thomé laid his plan before Napoleon III. last year, and the Minister of Public Works has since appointed a commission composed of able scientific men to take the matter in consideration; while by the Emperor's orders the sum of 500,000 francs has been set aside from the national treasury to be devoted to experimental trials, of pneumatic sounding, etc. etc.

Thus there is reason to hope that this vast project will shortly assume some tangible shape.

REMINISCENCES OF THE PRUSSIAN POLICE.

THE following anecdotes of the tyranny practiced by the Prussian police are from an authentic source, and may be relied upon as true:

H. Henry, a young gentleman who had for more than twenty-five years in Prussia, fell ill, and his wife wrote to their son—who was established in the United States of America—to come over and see his old father once more before his end. The dutiful son then left his prosperous home and embarked the first steamer bound to Hamburg; where he arrived in due time. By the first train he set off for Berlin. Here, he was accosted by the police, who asked for his passport. Young Mr. Henry, little versed in police matters, gave it him even thought of a passport. When he left home he had none. A republican without a passport, what a horror! Of course he was arrested on the spot as a vagabond, put into prison, and examined by the police. In this preliminary examination he remained for ten days: after which time he became free, to the inexpressible delight of his dear cousin in Hamburg, to whom he wrote immediately after his arrest. The Prussian police did not even apologize for the loss of time given him, "All right; you have told us the truth, and we let you go." The innocent gentleman was overjoyed by this vexation, and took the product of his labors in the spinning-house (a large cleve of worsted) home with him, to show it to his relations, and to keep it in his family as a token of Prussian liberty.

Another gentleman I know well remained in prison a whole year for having irreverently observed upon one occasion that the King was a fool.

I was intimately acquainted with a literary man who conducted a weekly newspaper. For some years of which (three shillings a year) was thought more dangerous even than its contents. It was written under censure; that is to say, the proof-sheet was sent to the censor, who struck out every thing which he considered shocking. When the work received the sanction of the government, the paper was published, and common sense would have indicated every editor to think himself safe. It was not so. My friend had an immense success with his paper, and, in a few months, had more than fifteen thousand subscribers. This would have yielded him a considerable income, even after English notions. All the German papers are poor, and most of all that of Prussia, because almost frantic; for my friend was as conscious as I am, and they could not get at him under any legal pretext. It was before the year eighteen hundred and forty-eight, and such pretexts were still required. One day, however, when I was at dinner wondering at my friend's success, I received a hasty message of a pencil-note from him, dated from prison; by which he informed me of his having been arrested, and of the judge's having very reluctantly consented to let him go, on depositing five hundred thalers in cash. Fortunately the money was in the house. I took it myself to the judge, and delivered my friend.

Of course I was anxious to know the cause. It was not a little amused when he showed me the lines of his paper for which the Austrian government had imprisoned him. He had spoken of an Austrian chief of artillery having opposed the reducing of military from Italian to German, and, in eight, objecting that it would be impossible for recruits to become good artillerymen in eight years; and the writer exclaimed, "that a fellow who could not learn his service in eight years must be indeed a potentate's son-in-law." A censor, of course, he must be many times sillier than the Austrians generally are thought to be in the army, or in harmony. My friend was condemned to three months' imprisonment without being allowed to compound for his punishment by a payment of money; which was customary in free transgressions. Very soon afterward, the paper was prohibited without any legal proceeding—nay, against law and the constitution. With the same right they might have shut up the shop of any grocer for selling cigars manufactured by the special consent of the government.

When my friend published another journal, that was prohibited also, and we got a hint that he would be arrested. By stratagem I got his paper out from the house where it was deposited, and he left Leipzig, going to the next Prussian town. For he was a subject of Prussia. Again by necessity, my friend was well warned in the law, and adhered so strictly to it, that they were unable to "legal pretexts" for a long time; but he was annoyed in every manner. At last he found an opportunity, and published his aside at any cost —sent one of his books to Magdeburg, that the law might be observed—there might yet be some little matter to impeach him for through treason, or other nonsense that promised a rich harvest of crowns. The book arrived, and some men busied the censorship of the government; for they could find no crime in the book, and were forced at last to Berlin. But very soon it came back, with a reproof, and many passages in the book marked with a red pencil. Cornelius Nicolaus said, "Give me five written words of a man, and I shall find matter in them to have him hanged." And all this was summoned before the court, and impeached on the following points: "Page 1, line 1, contempt of Majesty-Rebellion—lese majestatis 1, line 2, the feloniously and treasonably." The judges showed him the offending passage, he took the Landrecht and pointed triumphantly up from the bench, and set up the paragraph relating to the offense attributed to him, and read aloud, "Such a crime the King, and not subject." "Well, I wonder whether I should have been pardoned also, for having committed such a crime?" Everybody said, "Most likely: for if, even in the scale of justice, a pair of thousand-eyed tricots weighs heavier than a pair of two-eyed ones, how much more will they not put out of its equilibrium the balances of grace?"

Yes: the judges pondered long and roughingly, as two years' imprisonment, and the loss of the national cockade. About this hated sign of slavery in the shape of a cockade I must say a few words, as it is an absolute Hohenzollern invention and not a pin; but as his mischief the less of most of his evil rights. Every one of the judges pronounced this verdict, and it was altered to only one year of imprisonment, which he endured, in the citadel of Magdeburg.

So much for the press. Now I shall show how the police worked in Prussia in 1847 and 48.

There was, in Konigsberg, a dissenting congregation of quite a thousand members, which, although a Protestant sect spread all over the empire. Of course any legal pretexts to be met with were available for persecution. Many of the members were; but the police used the most drastically and most unjustifiable when there was a chance. Thus, for instance, all persons employed in the police, and even private persons, to give no work to any dissenters, in order to force a general abjuration, leading to this persecuted sect—nay, keepers of public-houses and the waiters employed were forbidden to sell any thing to members of it, under pain of the withdrawal of their licenses. This was a serious thing for those congregations, and their minister, the Reverend Mr. Rupp, then minister of the congregation, to maintain them. Many members were also his parishioners, lest they might bring innocent men to trouble and ruin.

One of the members, having no fewer than ten children, happened to be employed in the police, and lost his place because, although a nominal existence this man competed to rent the house of the shooters' company belonging to the city, and therefore dependent upon the city authorities. When the police became aware of his intention, they managed things so that the negotiation fell to him. He was offered the house only if he would receive the Lord's Supper out of the hands of the most fanatical person of the Lutheran church. He refused, and no other hope of supporting his large family, was to seek country. He got a place as a gate-keeper, very much trodden-it in his mind; wretched for life, in fact.

A young respectable girl, having a very large connection as a seamstress, against whom no one in Konigsberg could say a word, was also a dissenter; and, not being a native of Konigsberg, although of Prussia, was ordered to leave the city within a fortnight. The girl, who was entirely supported on all mother, was not base enough to change her religion, and was consequently left by her friends and her sung, although bustle position. However, she was not only never sent good, but pretty and a young master-joiner offered her his hand. She accepted him at once. There was only one difficulty—the banns. The Reverend Mr. Somlyo being just sufficient to fulfill the requisites of the law, refused laughing at the idea of being bride of a cities of Konigsberg, she was forced to remain out of that city. A loud knock was heard at the door. Police entered, and one of them said, "This assembly is dissolved!" This interruption was disagreeable, but no ludicrous that every body was amused. The bridegroom said, "Well, good friends—the assembly is not dissolved, but they might dissolve as much as they like; this society" (he took the hand of his bride) "shall not be dissolved." The bridegroom was a policeman nor by any other functionary, whether in blue or in black."

With this dissolving of assemblies the police answered the dissenters, and a couple of them had little meetings to take tea and read the German classics. Almost always they were disturbed by policemen dissolving the assembly; sometimes followed by soldiers with their muskets and bayonets. The very first such member of this circle was summoned before the police and reproved. Remonstrance was useless; and, when they at last asked the president of the police to give them a definition of a prohibited assembly (for they had a right to ask for information in such matters as this party), he told them their meeting was not to be taken for a tea party, but for an assembly; because they had read books which they were neither friends nor neighbors, nor relations, nor of the same station in life. When the Reverend Mr. Rupp once invited some poor people of his congregation to a public garden, to keep holiday there, he was prevented by the police. They remained, and said these persons had been his guests. He was answered that they had been invited by him, and so society for him. Mr. Rupp took out his Bible and read a passage in St. Luke, in which Christ commands to avoid ostentation in the rich, who could give dinners in return, but the poor and lame. The assembly broke indeed confused, and Mr. Rupp escaped, unlined.

Even children-gardens were forbid by the police, and an association, which, from three to six years old, was once dissolved. The little ones did not know the cry of the police, but were quietly detached by the servants of their parents, and, when the police asked them the names of their fathers, they answered, "Papa." Many of the little lambs were seen walking with the wolves, quite confident about the streets, inquiring where they did belong to.

Such dissenters as belonged to officers formed an exception to the rule. Mr. Lieut.-Colonel L., who died in the year eighteen hundred and forty-eight, did not conceal his dissent a penny. However, the younger sister had the expectancy of a place at canoness in a foundation for spinsters of noble birth, which had been granted to her and bestowed by the life grandfather of the young lady, who was a very rich man. The elder of the two sisters got, after much sho, a small pension from the government, by the interest of the minister of education, who was connected with the family. Angelius, the younger sister, while expecting her canoness-place, got just finished by private teaching lessons in French, and writing books for young people. Heaven blessed her brave endeavors: she got a husband, a school, and many pupils and lessons. She had, indeed, no much to do, that although her application was to visit the religious congregations of the dissenters, to hear Mr. Rupp.

Thus she went on very well till the year eighteen hundred and forty; when it was found out by Police-President Peters that Miss von L. should not be allowed to visit meetings. It was discovered that Miss Leo, the mistress of the school, should dismiss Miss A. von L. directly; and without any fear (peculiarity) timidly. Miss von L. was to leave Konigsberg, and informed that the intended to go to Prussia Angelius to the whole Prussian monarchy.

In vain the unhappy lady tried the law—nay, went over Peters to the King, complaining of the wrongs practiced on her. She was answered by the Minister of Justice that all the proceedings against her had been strictly lawful. Notwithstanding, Miss von L. tried to give lessons in French, which was the only agitation was a dismissal of her family; but this gentleman, although willing to grant her any favor not prejudicial to the proceedings of Konigsberg. She left the Prussian empire for Dresden, where she found pupils; but there came a telegraphic dispatch from Berlin, and she was ordered by the police of Saxony to leave Dresden in twenty-four hours. To fill the choice of sorrow to the inn, she received a letter from the abbess of the Barth-foundation telling her to give up the application of a canoness-place if she adhered to the dissenters. Thus she lost her canoness-income the only hope left her for old age—for her faith.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

THE VALUE OF HEALTH.—A good constitution is like sauerkraut—it is the last value of it is never properly known until it is broken.

GOOD-NATURED THOUGHTS.
BY A STOUT, HARMLESS FELLOW.

It is not pleasant to know Work for the follies of young men.

Old wives, like fibrels, will remain good for a long time. Dull people are like cats you take of them, and love you husband them.

Angels and ministers of grace are no doubt like butchers as at all events to hide the holes in them we know.

Solid worth is often found in a rough outside. Sovereign rob oysters are not found in silver fish.

When a friend is asking, Hope is like the Archer that shoots his shaft not only to distress, and to show that a volunteer in carrying it to him.

To him a joyful thing indeed is always a painful thing. It is like a child looking at Clives after he has mumbled the candy.

A merry reception from a debtor raises a pleasing hope of a future payment.

If we only pay attention to the trifling things that, en-fection, we feel we might and ought to have more influence follow the pin to the bell.

We have often seen a cur pet with her milk in the most pathetic manner, and we could not help feeling pain. It reminds us always of a generous soldier grazed by a ball.

WORDS TO THE UNWISE: OR, THE DONKEY'S DICTIONARY.

ADVICE. Generally useless, even when the giver Is sincere, in recommending somebody else to imitate himself. One man tells another what he would do if he were in that other's place, instead of telling him what would be the best thing possibly constituted, so as to be of use. Advice is very commonly mere dictation: the expression of a desire that somebody else should immediately regulate their conduct. In receiving our past errors, we are almost always ready to acknowledge the folly of the course we took, and rejoice for not having taken that which we rejected. Instead advice is generally valuable only as a wise gratia is not worth what it is offered for. Little dependence can be placed on any advice but that of a resolute friend.

BANTER. It is the polite and refined expression of contempt. In the conversation of gentlemen who despise one another. Nobody dares to banter a judge on the bench, or any body that he fears. The objects of banter are usually those on whom it can, or gentlemen think that it can, be practiced with impunity. Banter tires a philosopher as reasoning and information bores a fool. To rid yourself of the plague at banter you must retort it, but in the nature of banter care should be taken to return insult for insult in as elegant and pleasing manner. Thus, if a friend, between two cards, is what banter is between gentlemen. It is the reciprocal raillery of rude boys, who, when one says, "I'll punch your head," or "I'll stick dickie" may be taken as a proposal to fight, and if not accepted is considered by the rogues that are concerned about banter as a confession of cowardice. Hence the triumph of chaff lies in the excitement of wrath, but the cutting of chaff and banter, for the most part, consists either in insolence than in satire.

Rupp and Savory were side-by-side to Dennie, adopted as a boy, and brought up in the field of Rupp. The latter soon made progress by his suppleness; the former was a dull, heavy fellow, and remained in the same position. He once ushered a dark-looking Cordean to the presence of Rupp, and when that took care to take a seat near to the interview lasted. When questioned by Rupp's son as to the reason of his conduct, he replied, "I don't like such trash in your company."

A crown, and duke revolution or dethronement. It walks up and down the earth an independent, self-supporting fellow, with a much weight frame and let loose a star to roll in its orbit, and yet not the slightest preponderable a little bit from his life or a golden-orbed speech to roll through the generations to come.

A preacher, not one hundred miles from this, while reading the Scriptures, the thought, for the benefit of things," by pulsating the doctrine of a call to the ministry of which he was not one. He was called upon, but never believed he was called to preach. "And no person else ever believed it," said an acquaintance looking by.

When Sir Richard Steele was made a member of the commission, he was expected from the various writings that he would have been an admirable orator; but it not be the case. He was, in fact, a very poor speaker, and the Speaker one day interrupted him with

"I am not afraid of a barrel of cider," said a taper to a temperance man. "I presume not," was the reply; "you may presume it, and I will not deny it, but I would aim at your approach."

It was Chauncey, the Philadelphia surgeon, who rang the bell, and made that good thing at the expense of Nurse Cox, who, when he was dressing the wound in the chimney, was spending himself, covering the hearth to the utmost of capacity.—"Water, take that 'bleeve' from the fire."

Sir Peter Laurie, when Lord Mayor of London, gave a dinner to the Duke of Wellington, at which, while he proposing their health, observed—after expatiating on the "immortality of the Duke's character"—"in his presence my humble self; but why should I do so, when there be one so much greater than myself present?" and then he sat down, to the astonishment of the company, but I may say, from the very dregs of the people."

Not long since, a certain noble peer in Yorkshire, who is fond of boasting of his Norman descent, was showing one of his tenants, who, he thought, was not speaking to him with the proper respect, the family pedigree. "My ancestors came over with William the Conqueror!" "And," replied the tenant, "I'll be bound the first man that stops out."

Speaking of the miscellaneous articles left in the carriages of the Aberdeen Railway, a wag said to the late Sheridan, "I wonder they don't advertise for a wife and children. The remarks of the by-standers were many and varied. "Why," said one, "I'd give a shilling for a wife myself that my lumbar vend na lose mineel his slavas!" "I'll tell you," said another, "what I'd advertise!" "Well," said a third, "let's hear some chiel that hasna paid his fare, and has had a lang ride."

A Southern paper, among its watch-house items, tells of a "nice looking young gentleman" who was taken up for being drunk and disorderly, and who, on coming to and understanding his situation, fell upon the constable, considering it very hard that he should be locked up for a little thing like that. Such conduct is unbecoming a gentleman; but, Mr. Officer, you will see where to get a case of mercenary wine, with landscape, nature, and a fresh egg in it?

"Dad, if I were to see a duck on the wing, and was to shoot at it, would I be right if I hit it?" "No, my son; it would show you are a good marksman, and I would be proud of you." "Then, father, if I were to shoot at an old gentleman, as he was flyin' over the fence to-day, and missed him, would I be right?" "No, my son."

An Irishman, who saw the sharp-pieces on fire that endangered his property, called out to the company with the alarming intelligence. Down rushed the master, and saw a body of boiling fire at the end of the fire. "Well, why don't you put the fire out?" "And sure I was going to, sir, but when I saw the devil in it, I came after it, but water, sure."

Speaking of a fanner's wildness that we do not think of putting on until after we have caught cold.

The first oddity that comes in my way is a remark by some one, that "a man may be always known by the men he make of nothing and are very good"—a very sensible remark, by-the-by—and the next is the definition of a "bad." Thus—Bum, n. bum: rebus, to kiss again: plural, bumbus. Bumbus! regard to see; ablybus, to like the best natural of the life; blunderbuss, to kiss the wrong person; cuculus, to kiss the cook; and so on, through Bybus, to kiss by the bye, and ne'er in the end. Evidently the country-girl who came to "town" last fall had these definitions in her mind, when her fashionable cousin was to escort her a mile or two down-town, and ask nothing to walk, she answered, "No, I'll thank you; take a bus." But Mary, blushing to the eyebrows, with her lids and eyes cast-down modestly replied, "Oh, George! not right here in the street!"

Andrew Fuller, one Sunday afternoon, saw the people, during the singing of the hymn, sauntering out—some to the tavern, others to the play, and, taking the Bible, he read it aloud to the few remaining congregation, and then quietly retired, he said, "I am often afraid that I preach you to sleep; but it can't be my fault to-day, for you are asleep before I have begun."

The New York Associated Press have decided to employ a news yacht to meet all the European steamers at Cape Race. The object of this plan, we presume, is to get the news while it is new.

The following letter was sent by a man to his son at college: "My dear boy: I will write to you, as one of my old teachers, that you may have a new cent made out of him. As the new cents are sickly things, mine has just knit, by cutting down some of mine. Your mother sends you an elixir which is very knowing, and for fear you would not use it wisely I have kept back half, and only send you a part. Your mother will, I am well, except that your ciller has got the measles, which we think would spread among the whole school, if we had not had them before, and he is the only one left. I hope you will be home to my birthday party, for we are six, and your mother and myself your affectionate parents."

When Godwin was employed in writing the life of Chatham, he applied to many of his contemporaries for suitable anecdotes and suggestions. Mr. Fawcett applied him with a striking anecdote on a speech which he had heard Chatham deliver on general warrants. "Every man's house is called his castle," said Mr. Fawcett. It is surrounded by a moat, or defended by a wall? No. It may be a straw-built hut, it may be a cottage, it may rain may enter it; but the King can not. The point, as Fawcett thought, was plain enough; but when he came to read the printed volume he found in that autograph: "Every man's house is called his castle. Pish! Pish! Pish! Pish!" It was preceded by a note, of different date, thus: "It may be a straw-built hut; the rain may enter it—all the kicks of heaven may whistle round it—but the King can not." This italicized what Fawcett called a debut of natural impudence.

Shortly after the battle of Waterloo, it was proposed to make some change in the uniform of the Life Guards; and George IV. ordered some of his subalterns to ask him who was said to have slain six or seven French officers in single combat. He was asked, however, in presence of each of which he assented; until the King, perceiving that he was not to be caught in a trap, turned round hastily and his eye alighted on a tall Scotch officer, who was going to have such another day's work as at Waterloo, how would you like to be dressed in the uniform of Majesty," he replied, "in that case I'd rather be in my skirt sleeves."

A poor player having lent one of his comrades a small matter, spoke to him one night behind the scenes in the Convent Garden Theatre. "Sir," said the comrade, "I cannot pay you ought to be paid me; you know I am in great distress." "I'm not talk to me about your distress," answer'd he within this week I will take care to pay in some shape or another." "Sir," said the other, "I am much obliged to you; and pray let it be as much in the shape of two guineas as possible."

The other day a Jerseyman was observed standing in Wall Street, gazing at a number of Celestial and Flowery Chinese canines which are so much admired by dog connoisseurs. Near Jersey was a rural gentleman from Jersey looked at them and then at the "dog:"

"I say, Mister," said he, addressing the pigeon-toed rebel Bill, whose hands were filled with "stock lists," "I say, does that dog belong to you?"

Bill nodded distantly.

"Will you sell him?"

"What made you think that 'dog' belonged to me?"

"Well, I want to; already sure he belonged to you, for I was outin the dog has taken with you or some of your friends."

"Why so?" said Bill, getting excited.

"Cause he's as close aboard—there ain't a bar on."

Broker walked away, wishing Jersey a good morning.

Jem had offered Tom a gimcrack for his bag of white shillings, and Tom, who had a fancy for gimcracks, had closed at once with the proposition, but in a task more easy than was expected. This was a bargain soon conceded as the basis of the bargain, and Jem held out his hand for the money. "Money!" said Tom, "what for?" "Marbles first," said Jem. "D'ye think I mean to cheat ye for nix?" exclaimed Jem, indignantly. "You know, I reckon, Jem: "dickins times there; don't know who to trust, nor for how much sometimes." "Well, then," said Tom, "there's Sam, there. You give him your money and I'll give him my bag of shillings, and when he's got 'em both, I'll tell him to give you the marbles, and he'll put it down in his book and then we'll be all right." "I agreed," said Jem. And "agreed," said Tom, and he deposited the bag of shillings with Sam, and off went all the traders to the "Jolly Sandboy" public house, where, after counting both money and marbles, back to his bag, he took up the shillings and all his thumb on his nose as he ran—exclaiming to the astonished bystanders, "Sprats, gentlemen, sprats!" Perhaps there wasn't "a row" on that bank.

A gentleman offered a horse six months ago, to a friend for $150. "I'll buy him," said this friend, "on these conditions. I shall pay you two hundred cash, and you pay the rest. The deal was accepted, but the friend coming on, the seller called upon the purchaser for the two hundred cash. "Why," said he, "I said I'd buy him on a variation of contract. I agreed to pay two hundred cash and you pay me one hundred, and at the end of six months would be broken."

Put and Murphy, who were eating corn-cob on the banks of the Mississippi, observed a barrel floating down the Father of Waters, and hoated it. Just as they got it to the loops proved the contents unlucky. Happy Full given Rose Murphy! Over the gave joy they threw barrel, and, crawling on to Mary, and gave every other evening, Murphy, who was a sailor, and had a wife in Rockford Water Street, was shifted to 110 ——— Street. Next morning the question arising how to divide the barrel, a very lively conclusion was arrived at by using the cross-cut saw and sawing it in two: of course the contents were to be sold on the corn cob auctioneer, and the two Irishmen were bereaved.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Dec. 29, 1857.

THE foreign trade of the port last week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week in 1856.	1857.

Exports,	$1,067,389	$1,575,750
Corresponding week,	1856	1,067,389	1,878,900
Increase		$15,849
Decrease		$303,449

The export of specie was large, amounting to $3,626,316, but nearly as much has been received from the interior. Money continues to be abundant at the rate of 6 to 7 per cent and 6 @ 7, and money on call a 5 @ 6. Exchange is heavy. On 3 days, rates were 108 @ 108¼ and 108¾ @ 9.18. The news from Europe by the Persia, which has been almost one week in transit, and a great falling off in the amount of bullion to be imported, has had the effect of depressing exchange here, and the market closed weak and heavy on Saturday.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, December 28, 1857.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have exhibited but little animation during the past week, and the transactions for the business days Friday having been Christmas and Thursday New-Year's day, the sales of the week fall very much short, as for request, chiefly for home uses. Prices fluctuate, and closed with an up ward tendency.——Wheat was tightly dealt in at droopy rates.... Corn was abundant and cheaper, yet not much doing on Saturday, when large sales were reported effected, prices leaning in favor of buyers.... Rye and Barley dull and nominal, and somewhat lower.... Heavy plenty and lower, with a limited inquiry for them..... Cotton was depressed, and it declined materially, closing heavily and irregularly.....Provisions were in stock request at unsettled prices.....The returns of other commodities were moderate and unproductive of any remarkable alterations.....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ashes, pots, first sort, per 100 lbs. $ 5 00 @ $4 05
Superfine to fancy Western do. 4 35 @ 4 45
Common to fancy State, per barrel.... 4 40 @ 4 70
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel.... 4 40 @ 4 70
Superfine Western, per barrel..... 4 10 @ 4 30
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel.. 4 75 @ 7 75
Fancy and extra Ohio, Genesee, per bbl.. 4 75 @ 5 75
Corn Meal, per barrel..... 3 20 @ 3 40
Wheat, Chicago, per bushel..... 1 00 @ 1 00
Red Wheat, per bushel..... 1 00 @ 1 00
White Western, per bushel..... 1 00 @ 1 00
Rye, per bushel..... 0 80 @ 0 80
Barley, per bushel..... 0 45 @ 0 60
Barley Malt, per bushel..... 0 80 @ 0 90
State Oats, per bushel..... 0 40 @ 0 43
Western Oats, mixed, per bushel..... 0 38 @ 0 40
Southern Oats, per bushel..... 0 38 @ 0 42
Timothy Seed, per bushel..... 2 00 @ 2 00
Mess Pork, per barrel..... 15 50 @ 15 75
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel..... 13 75 @ 14 00
Country Mess Beef, per barrel..... 9 00 @ 9 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel..... 11 00 @ 11 50
Prime Mess Beef, per pieces..... 13 00 @ 13 00
Lard, in barrels, per pound..... 0 10 @ 0 10
Cut Meats, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Hams, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
State butter, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Ohio butter, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Cheese, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Rice, per 100 pounds..... 2 50 @ 3 00
Tallow, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Cuba Sugar, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Cuba Molasses, per gallon..... 0 @ 0 0
Hyson Teas, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Coffee, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Domestic Whisky, per gallon..... 0 @ 0 0
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Seed Leaf Tobacco, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Havana Tobacco, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
American Fleece Wool, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
Pulled Wool, per pound..... 0 @ 0 0
North River Hay, per 100 pounds..... 0 @ 0 0
Shipping Clipped and Ragged, per 100 pounds..... 0 @ 0 0

Freights were dull and depressed. For Liverpool—Cotton, 5-32d. per pound; Flour, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Corn, 6½ @ 6¾d. per bushel; Beef, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Bust, 4s. @ 4s. 6d. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 40s. @ 42s. 6d. per ton. For other ports there are no quotations. The number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 350, against 340 last week.

The Live Stock market, last Wednesday, was dull. The supply of Beeves was inferior in numbers, but superior in quality to that of the previous week. The market was moderately brisk market during a part of the day, and at the close was comparatively inactive, prices ranging from 9½ head left over.....Good fresh Milch Cows were more in demand after a subsiding excitement. Other sorts met a moderate supply and demand at somewhat easier rates.

Sheep and Lambs were abundant, but prices were unchanged figures. Some extra animals have been sent in from the West, which have sold at from $4 00 @ $11 50 each.....Swine were less freely offered and were in fair demand at unchanged prices. The receipts and sales of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Dec. 21.	Week ending Dec. 28.
Beeves	2,017	2,017
Milch Cows	260	258
Veal Calves	140	140
Sheep and Lambs	8,316	8,305
Swine	4,000	4,000

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

New York	900	Illinois	96
Ohio	463	Connecticut	48
Kentucky	385	Michigan	49

The range of prices, according to the actual sales of Live Stock, was as follows, viz.: Beeves, first quality, per 100 lbs. gross, $9 50 @ $10 00

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound.. $0 7 @ $0 11
Veal Calves, per pound..... 0 6 @ 0 8
Veal Calves, per pound..... 0 6 @ 0 8
Sheep and Lambs, per pound..... 0 6 @ 0 8
Swine, per pound..... 0 6 @ 0 6
Dressed " ..... 0 8 @ 0 9

The Country Produce Markets have been more active during the week, owing to the occurrence of Christmas Day. Apples have been freely purchased at full prices.....Onions attracted more attention, and advanced a little.....Potatoes have been in good request, and prices for middling and fine-to varieties.....Turnips and Cabbages are abundant and plenty.....Dried Fruits, are actively inquired for, and are generally higher.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$7 00	@ $8 00
Apples, dried, per pound	0 4	@ 0 5
Chickens, per pair	0 50	@ 0 75
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	2 00	@ 3 00
Onions, per barrel	2 00	@ 2 50
Peanuts, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Blackberries, per barrel	5 00	@ 6 00
Potatoes, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 50
" sweet, per barrel	2 00	@ 2 50
" sweet, per barrel	1 50	@ 4 00
Onions, per barrel	2 50	@ 3 00
Turnips, per barrel	0 75	@ 1 00
Pumpkins, per 100	12 00	@ 15 00
Cabbages, per 100	4 00	@ 6 00
Cabbages, per head	0 12	@ 0 25
Turkeys, per pound	0 8	@ 0 10
Geese, per pair	1 00	@ 1 50
Ducks, per pair	0 75	@ 1 00
Carrots, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 50
Parsnips, per barrel	0 50	@ 0 75
Celery, per dozen	0 50	@ 1 00
Lettuce, per 100	6 00	@ 8 00
Eggs, Limed, per dozen	17	@ 18
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	0 25	@ 0 30
Chickens, per pound	0 8	@ 0 12
Ducks, per pair	0 75	@ 1 00
Guinea Fowl, per pair	0 50	@ 0 62
Pheasants, per pair	0 50	@ 0 62
" per pair	0 25	@ 0 50
Quails, per dozen	0 75	@ 1 00
Turkeys, Wild, per pound	0 8	@ 0 10
Geese, per pound	0 6	@ 0 8
Pigeons, per dozen	1 75	@ 2 00
Prairie Hens, per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Partridge, per pair	0 75	@ 1 00
Roasting Pigs	1 25	@ 2 75
Venison, per pound	0 8	@ 0 10
Hares, each	0 10	@ 0 15
Rabbits, per pair	0 25	@ 0 37
Venison, per pound	0 8	@ 0 12
Bear Meat, per pound	0 6	@ 0 8

ADVERTISEMENTS

A USEFUL PRESENT.—Get one of Pratt's Patent Sewing Machines, the best in every respect for family use. Price $12 to $30. 377 Broadway, N. Y.; 18 Washington street, Boston.

QUAKERS AND JEWS, the thrifliest and boniliest of all people, and 23 other articles. Address "Publisher of Herald of Health, New York" for January. Specimen Numbers 10 cents.

PROPOSALS will be RECEIVED until
THURSDAY, 7th, 1858,
From persons wishing to purchase a SPLENDID BOOK
Issued by the Harpers, Appletons, Lowell & Allen, Derby & Jackson, Mellvaine, Billet, Orton & Co., Sheldon, Blakeman & Co., and
D. D. T. MOORE.
RANNEY'S
213 Broadway.
Where all Works are sold at Publishers' prices, and GIFTS OF JEWELRY, &c.,
Varying in value from 50 cents to $100,
PRESENTED WITH EACH BOOK.
A. RANNEY, AGT.

"THE TEXT UNALTERED."
THE HOLY BIBLE,
Containing One Hundred Steyles,
Suitable For Holiday Gifts.
Elegantly Bound in styles ranging in price from One to Fifty Dollars, and Illustrated with HARDINGE'S EDITIONS.
Which may be had of the leading Booksellers and Dealers in America.
When they can not be obtained direct, a person forwarding any sum of money will receive, by return of Express, a fine Edition, full as cheap as can be had of Dealers.
Address JESPER HARDING & SON,
211 Sixth Third Street,
Philadelphia.

FUR WAREHOUSE,
No. 45 MAIDEN LANE.
C. G. GUNTHER & SONS INVITE SPECIAL ATTENTION TO THEIR STOCK
OF
LADIES' and OTHER MANUFACTURED FURS, which they offer, in the face of existing circumstances, to the trade,
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

HARDING'S PEARL EDITION OF THE BIBLE.
For Christmas and New Years.
For the Pocket.—the Chamber.—the Pew.
Sent by mail to any address, on receipt of postage stamps to fall value.
With a Clasp, gilt edges..... 75 cents
Bound in Turkey antique clasped $1 25
" 1 50
This edition contains the Psalms in metre, and finely illustrated with colored Maps.
Address JESPER HARDING & SON,
211 Sixth Third Street,
Philadelphia.

FUN!!!
HARPER'S COMICALITIES
SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY
LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.
FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.
For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

BUY YOUR NOTE PAPER at GUMBREDES, 668 Broadway, and you will be sure to have it beautifully ruled.

CARDS FOR NEW YEAR'S DAY.
Leave your Card-Plate at GUMBREDES for Packs of Visiting Cards, Printed in Script or Pocket Card-Case.

J. N. GIMBREDE, Leader of fashion in Cards, Engraving, and Dealer in Fine Stationery, neither Publishes nor Sells Annuals from his STORE for the TRADE. Parties requiring Wedding Cards in the most elegant Enamelled Stamped Paper, are requested to leave their orders at 668 Broadway.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.
The Trade and Booksellers will be supplied at
THE USUAL TERMS ON CENT. DISCOUNT.

CLOAKS!!! CLOAKS!!!
BRODIE'S
CELEBRATED CLOAKS
ARE NOW
STILL FURTHER REDUCED IN PRICE,
IN ORDER TO CLEAR OUT
THE ENTIRE STOCK,
PREVIOUS
DURING THE HOLIDAYS.
WONDERFUL BARGAINS!
No. 185 CANAL STREET, N. Y.

"GROVER & BAKER'S"
CELEBRATED FAMILY SEWING MACHINE.
For $9 different styles with the latest improvements. These are unquestionably the best machines for Family use in the market.
Among the many prizes home comforts will do without is a GROVER & BAKER MACHINE, made expressly for Ladies' wear.
405 Broadway, New York. 18 Summer Street, Boston; and 150 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

MRS. SIGOURNEY'S NEW BOOK.
LUCY HOWARD'S JOURNAL. By Mrs. L. H. SIGOURNEY, Author of "Letters to Mothers." "Letters to Young Ladies," &c. 1 vol. 12mo. Price $1. Sent by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of Price.
Mrs. Sigourney's writings are so pure, so refined, and appeal so directly to the best feelings of the heart, that they will ever hold a prominent place in our literature while these qualities are cherished. But few readers of this class have equaled with the pen, and we think she may long be preserved for future unfoldment.—North American.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of One Dollar.

NEW BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS,
BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED.
AT THE CHURCH BOOK DEPOSITORY,
762 Broadway, New York.
CHARLIE HOPE, A CHRISTMAS STORY.
By CORINE ALICE.
SUNDAY AT OAKLANDS.
By CORINE ALICE.
LIVES OF THE BISHOPS.
WHITE, GRISWOLD, CRANE, BRADLEY, HOBART, MOORE, DUNCAN, and GARDNER.)
By Rev. H. CROSWELL.
THE LITTLE HOUSEKEEPER.
By the Author of "Cousin Lucy."
THE SCHOOLMATES.
By the Author of "Allen Gardner."
EDWARD HOWARD.
By M. L. W.
A CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEARS GIFT.
(Adapted to the Times.)
BOCKETT'S STORIES ON THE LAST SIX COMMANDMENTS, FOR BOYS.
In Four Volumes Neat.
A great variety of BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, JUVENILE BOOKS, PICTURE CARDS, and all the NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON.
E. D. HARRIMAN,
Agent General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union and Church Book Society,
762 Broadway, New York.

WILL CLOSE JANUARY 9.
EXHIBITION OF FRENCH PAINTINGS,
ART UNION ROOMS, 497 BROADWAY.
Open from 9 a. m. to 5 p. m., and 7 to 10 in the evening.
ADMISSION 25 CENTS.
CATALOGUES GRATIS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, New York, Publish this Day:
THE LIGHT LATER. Being Passages from the Life of a PHYSICIAN. In One Volume, 12mo. Cloth.
CONTENTS.
The Night Entrance.—Under the Shadow of Eucalyptus —The Kingdom of the Dreams—Cashmere and Coffee —The Mystery of the Lake.—Under the Tropic Moon —The Mysteries of the Life-Spec Gemini—The night of Sorrow.—Under the Palm Trees.—Voices of Angels in a Bivouac—The Shadow of Buchlau, the Shadow of Death.—Under the Southern Cross.—The Light Later.
HARPER'S NEW CLASSICAL LIBRARY.
Zeno: a Romance, Prometheus—Hindu Theatre and the Drama of Europe—Hall: Pythagoras—Plato: Dante opened on the Ascendent One his Eye of Anger"—An Oath in the Mountains—Alexander's Feast—With the Old Navy Guard—Brannigan!—Leaving his School-master, for Pythagoras sets up for Himself—Discovering the Doctor; not Southey's, but mine—Grand Diversion—Grand Finale and Last Scene of All—Dr. Parr's Story—The Visionary; to which Chapter there is no Address—Conclusion of the Whole Matter.
NOTICE TO THE WAY INWARD.
Labyrinths and Mazes—Illustrations of Men and their Situations.
"PLEASANT & PEARSON will send the above Work, by Mail, postage paid (or any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Price.
SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—
The following extract will speedily purify the blood, and thoroughly eradicate from the system, and finally, but gradually, expel every vestige of disease.
Prepared and sold by A. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!
BULWER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, WILKIE COLLINS, IN
HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," which has been commenced in the May Number, was announced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, as "in advance of the press"—received from the Author in advance of publication in England. The first chapter was written by Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.
MR. CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF ALL TRADES—A MATTER OF FACT BIOGRAPHY," will be commenced in the JANUARY MAGAZINE, was also announced in the December Number.
MRS. GASKELL, Author of "MARY BARTON," has become a contributor to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and a thrilling story from her graphic pen will be found in the January Number.
WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE DEAD SECRET," will shortly appear complete in the February Number.
The same brave stories are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $3 50 A YEAR.
BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this author's fertile and brilliant novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.
TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year..... $3 00
Two Copies for One Year..... 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for One Year..... $1 00
One Copy for One Year..... 2 00
One Copy for Two Years..... 3 00
Two Copies for One Year..... 3 00
Four Copies for One Year..... 5 00
Twenty Copies for One Year..... 20 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE Subscribers.
The first Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $2 00, is now ready.
Cloth Covers for Volumes are furnished at which their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE per cent DISCOUNT allowed to Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.
"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" will be sent for One Year for Five Dollars.
Subscriptions to the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be received.
Periodical publishers, Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.
The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage to any part of the United States is HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.
Persons remitting Five Dollars for HARPER'S WEEKLY, in addition to their subscription, Thirty-six Cents in the shape of Postage Stamps, will receive the WEEKLY, for the American postage.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

NEW YEAR'S VISITS

TO THE DRAWING-ROOM.

TO THE AREA.

NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS SUITED TO THE TIMES.

SANTA CLAUS IS COMING!
CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEARS!!
GIFTS!! GIFTS!! GIFTS!!!

EVANS & CO.'S ORIGINAL GIFT BOOK SALE.

The following is a Schedule of Property which will be given to Purchasers of Books at the time of sale:

Patent English Lever Gold Watches (Hunting cases)	$100	each.
Patent Anchor Gold Watches (Keyless cases)	75	"
Ladies' Gold Lepine Watches	50	"
Silver Lepine Watches	25	"
Large Double Case Miniature Lockets	10	"
Sets of Cameo Pins and Drops	10	"
&	10	"
Ladies' Neck Chains (solid gold)	10	"
Gold Studs, or Cameo Sleeve Buttons	5	"
Cameo, Stone, or Cameo Bosom Studs	5	"
Gents' Gold Pencils and Pens (large)	5	"
Silver Fingered Gold Pens, double or, case (large)	5	"
Gold Lockets (fine glazed)	3 50	"
Gents' Heavy Gold Rings	3	"
Ladies' Gold Breast Pins	2 50	"
Ladies' Ear Drops	2 50	"
Gents' Gold Bosom Studs	2	"
Gents' Gold Sleeve Buttons	2	"
Gold Thimbles	2 50	"
Silver Fingered Gold Pens (small)	2 50	"
Mixed Gold Breast Pins	1 50	"
Ladies' Gold Rings	1 50	"
Gents' Bosom Pins	1 50	"
Ladies' Gold Bosom Pins	1	"
Silver Thimbles	50	"

Besides a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $40.

One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold.

Any person, by forwarding us an order for Books (with money enclosed), will receive an EXTRA BOOK AND GIFT with every TEN BOOKS sent to one address by Express.

All orders for books will be promptly and impartially filled. The Gifts, in all cases, will accompany the book, with a written certificate to the person sending us the order.

For particulars see CATALOGUE, which we mail to any address upon application.

D. W. EVANS, Address
J. H. PRESTON, EVANS & CO.,
671 Broadway, Ledger Hotel Building, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York, have just Published:

MISSIONARY TRAVELS AND RESEARCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA; including a Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi, to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTON, LL.D., D.C.L. With Portrait, two Maps by ARROWSMITH, and Numerous Illustrations. 1 vol. 8vo. Muslin, $5 00.

THE POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Selected and Edited by the Rev. ROBERT ARIS WILLMOTT. With English and American Additions, arranged by EVERT A. DUYCKINCK, Editor of "Cyclopedia of American Literature." Comprising Selections from English and American Authors. Superbly Illustrated with 120 Engravings, from Designs by the most eminent Artists. In elegant Small 4to form, printed on Superfine Toned Paper, richly bound in extra Cloth beveled, gilt edges, Price Five Dollars.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

SANTA CLAUS HAS COME.

GIFTS! GIFTS!! GIFTS!!!

A Gift worth from 50 Cents to $250.

Will be given to all who make purchases at "THE GIFT STORE," No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

J. PHILBRICK, Agent, or at
375 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.

SPLENDID BOOKS from one of the following Houses: Harper & Brothers, Sheldon, Blakeman & Co., Dodd & Co., Derby & Jackson, Miller, Orton & Co., C. Scribner, Leavitt, Allen & Co., Appleton's, Francis & Co., &c., &c. All the Books sold at Publishers' prices.

Gifts of Gold and Silver Watches, Lockets, Pins, Cameos, &c. For particulars, send, per mail, for a Catalogue, or call and see us.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE, one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

SPITE.

MISS SLIMLY. "Do you know, dear, I was asked the other day if you were my Mamma?"

A PICTURE ON BROADWAY.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FURS.—WHITCOMB, PRENTICE & CO., 171 Water Street, Wholesale Dealers in Furs, offer their entire Stock of Ladies and Gentlemens' Furs at RETAIL FOR CASH, AT LESS THAN WHOLESALE PRICES. Every article is of our own manufacture, and warranted.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 54.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

THE last number of the Weekly commenced a new volume. The Contents of the first volume, published in its concluding number, justify the assertion that no publication, either in America or in Europe, contains an equal amount of instruction and entertainment. The proprietors intend to spare no pains or expense to make the coming volume still more valuable and welcome.

HON. JEFFERSON DAVIS,

UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM MISSISSIPPI.

THE portrait of the Hon. Jefferson Davis, which we give below, is from a photograph recently taken at Washington, and is considered very felicitous. As it is generally understood that Senator Davis will be the Administration leader in the Senate, the public will naturally feel a desire to see what sort of a man he is.

His modesty is such that the materials for his biography are scanty. It is known that his father was a Kentuckian, a farmer, it is believed, who transferred his residence from Kentucky to Mississippi Territory early in the present century, taking with him his infant son Jefferson, who was born about 1806. The father's means enabled the son to receive the best education the country afforded. After the usual course at school he entered Transylvania College, Kentucky, where he remained until his father obtained for him admission to West Point. It was in 1822 that he entered West Point Academy; he left it, with honor, in 1828, as brevet Second Lieutenant, and at his own request was placed in active service. The only wars of the time were the Seminole affairs against the Indians; in these young Davis distinguished himself in so marked a manner, that, when a new regiment of Dragoons was formed, he at once obtained a commission as First Lieutenant. His exploits during seven years of Indian warfare resemble those of all the brave officers who have been engaged in the same service. The only fact that is remembered of him is the romantic attachment which sprang up between him and his prisoner, the famous Indian chief "Black Hawk." The latter forgot his animosity to the people of the United States in the friendship and admiration he felt for Lieutenant Davis: not until his death was the bond of amity between the two brave men severed.

In 1835, the United States being at peace with the world, and likely to remain so, Lieutenant Davis grew tired of military life, and settled down quietly on a cotton plantation in Mississippi. For eight years his life was tranquil and obscure; the duties of his plantation, diversified with study, engrossed his time. He devoted many hours per day to the perusal and study of political works, acquiring that remarkable fund of varied information to which he is indebted for much of his subsequent distinction.

In 1843 he took the stump for Polk, from an intimate conviction that the Democratic party was the only one which was likely to deal fairly with the South; and having attracted no little attention in his State by his vigor and ability, he was sent to Congress at the election which took place in 1845. He had only been a few months at Washington when the Mexican war broke out. He wrote home earnestly urging upon his friends not to allow Mississippi to be behind her sister States in contributing men for the war. The answer was an announcement that a regiment of volunteers had been formed, and that he had been chosen as its colonel. He resigned his post in Congress instantly, and joined the corps d'armée under General Taylor.

Very few officers in the army which marched against Mexico achieved so much distinction as Colonel Davis. Space forbids our attempting to follow him throughout the campaign; suffice it to say, that, wherever danger was to be encountered or glory won, there Colonel Davis, with his Mississippi rifles, was to be found. Buena Vista, especially, bears witness to his eminence as a soldier: his men—though volunteers—showed a steadiness which equaled any thing that might have been expected of veteran troops; and they were handled in so masterly a way, that, if the glory of that day were to be assigned to any one corps rather than any other, they would probably bear away the palm. Every one remembers the proud appeal of Colonel Davis to another regiment of volunteers, who were finding the fire rather warm, to "Stay and re-form behind that wall!"—pointing to his Mississippians. Throughout the war, he and his brave riflemen loom up as intervals whenever the fire grows hot or the emergency grave, and never without good effect. They were armed with a peculiar rifle, now best known as the Mississippi rifle, chosen by their Colonel himself; it was scarcely less deadly than the Minié. Their Colonel set the example of intrepidity and recklessness of personal injury: at Buena Vista he was badly wounded at an early part of the action; but he sat his horse steadily till the day was won, and refused even to delegate a portion of his duties to his subordinate officers.

The term of service for which the Mississippians had volunteered having expired they were disbanded; and the surgeons insisted on the Colonel withdrawing from active service, in order to give that attention to his wound which it deserved. He was not long permitted, however, to nurse himself on his plantation. In the fall the Executive of his State appointed him United States Senator, to fill a vacancy; and as soon as the Legislature met he was elected unanimously to the office for the ensuing six years. This was, in fact, Colonel Davis's first appearance as a prominent actor in Federal politics. Though, on his first long speech in the House of Representatives, so good a judge as John Quincy Adams had pronounced him a man of infinite promise, his term in the House had been too brief to justify the prediction; it was left for the Senator to fulfill the hope of the Representative. He was chosen Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in compliment to his military fame; but his most conspicuous function was the defense of the doctrine of States' Rights, and Southern institutions. Those were memorable stormy sessions of 1848–50 and 1850–51 can not have forgotten the fierce and the heat with which Senator Davis defended the doctrines peculiar to his section of the country. In feeling, at least, he was a young man still.

In September, 1851, he was nominated for Governor by the Democrats of his State, and in obedience to an honorable practice which ought to be more common in the North, he instantly vacated his seat in the Senate. The canvass was animated, and the contest warm, but he was defeated by about a thousand votes, and Mississippi remained in the hands of the enemy. Ex-Senator Davis retired to his plantation, and once more found solace and occupation in the study of politics and history.

When Mr. Pierce was nominated for the Presidency, the result in the States of Mississippi, Tennessee, and Louisiana being very doubtful, Mr. Davis took the stump on his behalf. Of all the Southern Democratic speakers, he was perhaps the most zealous and effective. In the judgment of the political managers eclipse stood higher than he; and his engagements till the close of the campaign were more than he could fulfill.

Partly in reward of these services, and partly in consequence of his obvious capacity for the post, he was chosen by President Pierce to fill the responsible position of Secretary of War. He discharged the duties of that office to the general satisfaction of the army during the whole of President Pierce's term of office. His Reports are eminently creditable, and evince a high order of administrative ability. If he deeply to be regretted that his disagreements with the Commander-in-chief—whose popularity with the people at large is almost unparalleled—were ever suffered to rise to the light.

At the close of President Pierce's administration Mr. Davis was again chosen United States Senator by the Legislature of Mississippi. His political force, the devotion he has so often evinced to the interests of the South, and his unswerving fidelity to the cardinal principles of the Democratic faith, pointed him out as an available leader of the Administration party in Congress. It is expected that, ere the session progresses much further, he will vindicate the wisdom of the selection.

Colonel Davis married, some years since, a daughter of General Zachary Taylor. At her death he married a lady whose amiability and tact have made him many friends.

In the North, Colonel Davis is regarded—somewhat unjustly, perhaps—as a type of the Southern fire-eater. Many persons who have never seen him fancy him a quarrelsome, petulant, hot-headed, turbulent. His appearance in the Senate does not justify these views. A prim, smooth-looking man, with a precise manner, stiff soldierly carriage, and cold expression; his head fuller, seemingly, of statistics and hard, dry principles than any thing else; his voice cool and firm, without tremor or excitement; he is the last person a spectator would pick out as "the fire-eater." In his own country he is intensely beloved—chiefly from his kind and gentle disposition. He is a man of whom Mississippi may well be proud.

HON. JEFFERSON DAVIS, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM MISSISSIPPI.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WHITEHURST, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

PUBLISHERS' CARD.

MR. THACKERAY'S new Story, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous illustrations by the author, is commenced in the DECEMBER number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets, received from the author in advance of publication in England; for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of $2000.

☞ With the full knowledge of this arrangement, the proprietors of the New York Tribune, who have been leading advocates of an International Copyright Law, and profess the warmest regard for the interests of British authors in this country, have begun to copy this Story from our Magazine into their paper, though without the author's admirable illustrations. The same parties, under the same circumstances, reprinted upon us Mr. Dickens's "Little Dorrit," for which we paid the author Two Thousand Dollars.

No American publisher can afford to give two thousand dollars for early sheets of a foreign work which is instantly reprinted upon him by a rival in business.

The course of the Tribune is, therefore, decidedly calculated to deprive the British author of the only compensation he can get, in the present state of the law.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1858.

THE RIGHTS AND WRONGS OF FILIBUSTERISM.

THE event of holiday week has been the arrest of William Walker by Commodore Paulding, and his forced return to the United States. On one side, a portion of the Northern press have rejoiced over what they consider a just punishment of piracy; on the other, the Southern journals, almost without exception, take ground against Commodore Paulding, and in favor of Walker. The Administration has a sop for both extremes. President Buchanan is understood to be willing to sustain the action of the Commodore, notwithstanding all legal objections; but Secretary Cass, on behalf of the Government, does not recognize that Walker is a prisoner. At New Orleans and Mobile meetings have been held, at which not only the course of the United States Navy has been denounced, but material aid—men, money, and munitions of war—have been promised to the remnant of Walker's force now in Nicaragua; and at the same time Humphrey Marshall and others have given out that they will move Congress to have Walker returned to Nicaragua in a national vessel. Opponents of Filibusterism, in the North, consider the arrest of Walker as implying such ill-luck and mismanagement on his part, that he is forever disqualified from the command of future filibustering expeditions; others, on the contrary, argue that the interposition of the United States Navy was of all accidents the only one against which he had no reason to be on his guard. There are those who pretend that Commodore Paulding really rendered Walker substantial service by getting him out of a hopeless scrape, and making a martyr of him; but there are others who reason that, after the capture of the steamers—which was effected before Walker left—the Great Filibuster, small as his force was, was in fact the master of the situation and of Nicaragua.

Amidst this chaos of conflicting sentiments, a few principles loom out in clear certainty. Had Walker been overhauled by Commodore Paulding on the high seas, he might unquestionably have been arrested and brought home; but after he reached the soil of Nicaragua, the legal question was entirely changed. Walker claims to be a citizen of Nicaragua; and as the laws of the United States recognize the right of a citizen to expatriate himself, and to obtain a naturalization abroad, this country has no right to question his Nicaraguan citizenship. Of the fact, his election bears substantial evidence. Now, nothing can be more clear than that a United States commodore has no right to land men in a foreign country and kidnap a citizen of that country. Let us illustrate the case. During the Russian war, certain agents of the British Government came here, enlisted men to serve in the British army, and conveyed those men to Halifax, in defiance of our laws. What would have been thought of a United States commodore who had chased such an agent to Halifax, landed a boat's crew there, seized the Englishman, and brought him here for trial? Would any body have sustained so high-handed a proceeding?

With the character and aims of Walker we have nothing to do. He may be the pirate certain persons assert him to be; he may be cruel, relentless, heartless, and all the rest; but if he was a citizen of Nicaragua, Commodore Paulding had no more right to kidnap him and bring him here than he would have to land a boat's crew in the Thames, and bring us Lord Palmerston or Prince Albert in irons.

At the same time, it is rather probable that the right to complain of Walker's arrest and extradition lies exclusively with the Government and people of Nicaragua. Citizens of the United States seem to have no more right to complain of what has been done—save in a purely officious way—than subjects of Great Britain or Frenchmen. If this be so, then, so far as national interests are concerned, we must wait for a remonstrance from Nicaragua before we can act. Privately, William Walker may possibly have individual recourse against Commodore Paulding; but publicly, the only nation that would appear to be entitled to demand redress is Nicaragua.

It will be well, therefore, to wait to see what the Nicaraguans may do before forming any decided judgment.

SHALL THE MURDERERS BE HANGED?

THE Court of Pardons of New Jersey has decided not to commute the sentence of death passed some time since on the murderer Donnelly. The Court has acted rightly; after the case of Cueva, especially, it behooved our neighbors not to justify the growing suspicion that the trade in blood was as free in the Jerseys as in Ashantee or New York. It now remains to be seen whether the effort which has been made by many respectable persons in this State to revive the old practice of executing the laws will be successful or not.

On the fate of two individuals—Rodgers and Cancemi—does the question hang. The facts in both cases are familiar to the public. Rodgers—a youth under twenty—met, in a public street, a gentleman walking home quietly with his wife, insulted him, and, when his victim turned to expostulate, stabbed him to death. There had been no quarrel between the parties. They had never met before. The deed was a spontaneous outburst of that savage ferocity which is peculiar to the rowdies of New York. If this had been a solitary, unusual accident, it might be argued that a long confinement would answer the ends of justice. But the animus which prompted Rodgers to take the life of Swanson pervades a very considerable class of individuals. There have been half a hundred cases during the year in which men of Rodgers's stamp and age have imperiled or actually taken life. There are youths of that class to be met with every evening in the thoroughfares of the city, who, on the least provocation, or on no provocation at all, are ready to use the knife they carry up their sleeve, or the slung-shot in their hand. For months, nay, for years, these vermin have infested the city, and, under one name or another, have been the terror of quiet people. They have pursued their lawless career with the recklessness which the uncertainty of the administration of justice, and, at the worst, the quasi-certainty of ultimate pardon, were calculated to inspire. Rodgers appears to be the type of the class: ready, at a moment's notice, and without earthly motive, to take life; very sorry for it after the deed is done, and quite anxious not to be hanged.

Cancemi is a villain of another cast. He was a housebreaker. A mechanic by day, a robber by night. He had a character to preserve; and so, when the policeman Anderson tried to arrest him, he shot him dead in order to escape. The law holds that an assault upon an officer in the execution of his duty is more heinous than an assault upon a private individual; not because, intrinsically, the person of the one is better worth preserving than that of the other; but because law-breakers are so sorely tempted to kill those who try to arrest them. It is in the power of many single wards of this city to turn out a force which could overcome the whole body of the police. To guard against this, the law of this as of every civilized land stamps with peculiar reprobation attempts to resist the constituted authorities; and it is to that feature of the law that we owe our reliance on the police, in spite of their physical weakness. This aim of the law will be defeated if Cancemi—a man who shot a policeman in the execution of his duty—be not adequately punished.

The question, then, amounts simply to this: is incarceration an adequate punishment? Will it operate to prevent rowdies of the class of Rodgers from carrying and using knives? Will it deter housebreakers from murdering policemen in order to escape? We have experience as well as reason to guide us in forming a judgment on this point. For some years public sentiment in this State has been averse to capital punishment. No matter how heinous the crime, the authorities have considered the State Prison and Penitentiary a sufficient retribution. The consequence is before us in the shape of a prodigious development of crime, especially in the more heinous grades—murders, rapes, arson, and burglary. Furthermore, the unanimous testimony of the bar and the reporters declares that criminals entertain no dread of prisons. They regard them as temporary asylums, presenting many advantages over their usual abodes. They know that in respect of health and ease of mind they will be better off in prison than at home. They are perfectly aware that the term of years for which they are sentenced is merely nominal, and that a complacent Governor will set them at liberty long before they have served out their time. Practically, to such a man as Rodgers, it matters but little whether he ply his trade in jail or out of it. Thus, the great end of punishment being to prevent, not to avenge crime, the imprisonment of a noted criminal fails entirely in its object. His comrades hardly know of it; it strikes them with no terror. He is missed for a day or two, then forgotten. Nobody is struck with dismay, and led to ponder on the brink—to hold back from meditated sin—by the news that So-and-so has been sent to the State Prison. A villain holds his breath with dread and horror at the news that his friend has been hanged—the idea shocks and terrifies; it is a staring, awful reality which may well deter the boldest. But the Penitentiary—bah! every body laughs at it. It does not avail, in any sensible degree, to attain the only end and aim of punishment.

A few days will decide whether Governor King belongs to the party which, in obedience to these reasons, seeks to have the laws fairly executed, or whether he shares the notions of the enthusiasts and politicians who would pardon every body, and trust to Providence for the protection of life and property.

KANSAS.

AT the election appointed by the Lecompton Convention the Constitution framed by that body, with the slavery clause, was adopted by a large majority of the voters. In other words, the bulk of the people of Kansas abstained from the election, and the handful of pro-slavery men who still remain in the Territory voted as their instincts suggested. Rumors reach us already to the effect that frauds, even more monstrous than those which Governor Walker defeated at the last election, have been perpetrated by the politicians who are bent on keeping the Kansas quarrel alive. On the other hand, on 4th January the people of Kansas will vote on that Constitution in obedience to the act of the Legislature. There is little doubt but they will vote it down altogether, slavery clause and all.

Congress will thus be placed in possession of two distinct votes of the Kansas people: the one ratifying the Lecompton Constitution, the other rejecting it; and both, so far as will legally appear, will seem to be clothed with every element of validity.

The New York Herald, which is said to have the ear of the Administration, argues that Congress should at once recognize Kansas as a State, under the Lecompton Constitution, as ratified on 21st December, with the slavery clause, and that the duty of abolishing slavery and altering the Constitution should be left to the people of Kansas. The view is entitled to respect. But it is more than doubtful whether it will concur with the sentiment of the House of Representatives.

The vote of 4th January will be entitled to as much regard as that of 21st December: the rejection of the Constitution will deserve as much respect as its ratification. Between the two the simplest solution of the difficulty would appear to be, a Congressional Enabling Act, providing for a new Convention and the submission of a new Constitution to the people; and this is the course which Congress will probably adopt.

THE LOUNGER.

VALE!

THE old year died so delicately—going out in June softness—so unlike the grim, bleak, icy death he usually dies—that the tone of these little verses has the deepest sympathy with the peculiar grace and beauty of the season.

They came just too late for last week:

FAREWELL TO THE OLD YEAR.

The Old Year said to me, as he lay dying,
"Why dost thou look upon my face with sighing?"
A gush of happy tears prevented my replying!

Old year! blest year! oh, ever can another
Lead me, like thee, as gently as a mother?
Kindly reprove me as an elder brother?

Untried, the future years are slowly creeping—
O year of years! my life was in thy keeping;
And thus I stand beside thy couch with weeping!

Loved year! lost year! thy latest breath is fleeting;
A stranger comes, with slow and solemn greeting—
O speak to me once more, and bless our meeting!

True friend, we part! Though many men will blame thee,
And with blind hearts will thanklessly defame thee,
As God's eternal angel still I claim thee!

Farewell!

THALBERG.

THE American tour of Thalberg fell in an unfortunate year, and yet his notes have not been at a discount. He has played in earnest all over the country, making it a great keyboard over which he has run from one end to the other, and now lifts his fingers, puts one hand upon his heart and one upon his pocket, and so bows himself gracefully away.

There has been no difference of opinion about him as there was about Jenny Lind and other famous musical artists who have come to us. The simple perfection of his performance was at once appreciated, and always enjoyed; and yet at last it cloyed. No one cared to hear for more than the twentieth time the same fantasia played in the same way. At the twenty-first hearing it began to sound a little trite.

But this was not the fault of the artist—if it were any fault at all. It was merely the limitation of interest in the instrument. Thalberg plays the piano as well as it can be played, but then the piano is a very circumscribed instrument. He seems to understand its resources perfectly, and to develop them with complete skill, but he is not a bit of a mountebank. He does not play with his shoulders, or body, or ambrosial locks. What the piano can do in the interpretation of a piece of music, he makes it do—and no more.

That is the difference between Thalberg and other equally celebrated performers. Thalberg's playing is not suggestive. It is entirely satisfactory in itself (with the limitation mentioned), but it does not leave the feeling that the player could do a great deal more; nor does it raise any haunting image of a great orchestra pouring force and fullness, blood and substance, into the music the performer sketches upon the keyboard. He trills exquisitely, but he never thrills. There is exquisite symmetry in all he does; but in the greatest works of art, of every kind, there is a fragmentary and incomplete character. It is the nimbus of what might be hanging like a halo around what is.

Arion will take care that the great pianist sails smoothly wherever he goes. Triton will blow his wreathed horn before his bark; and, perhaps, some happy day hereafter, ladies of quality will part his glove among them, for souvenirs of that dexterous hand—as late befell his great rival Liszt after a concert in Germany.

And who knows, but that with much patience and many Thalbergs, even we Bœotians may one day attain to a similar homage to art and artists?

"THE VIRGINIANS."

THIS is the Lounger whispering to you upon his own responsibility.

As an author—for every body who drives a pen for the public (except clerks of criminal courts) may be considered authors—the Lounger has his opinions about all subjects interesting to the guild.

The Most Worshipful Company of Scribblers get very little recognition from the Law, and no international protection at all. After twenty-eight years their rights to their own property cease—with a possible renewal for half that time—and then their pretty garden is turned into an open common.

Of course this is matter of high debate. The very fact that the Law seriously limits all copyright, and that general public sentiment has not yet occasioned an international understanding upon the subject of literary property, show that the question has another side—although as an author, and a man with his ordinary allowance of common sense, the Lounger insists upon saying for himself that he can not see the beauty nor the justice of that other side.

But what the letter of the Law does not protect is often guarded by a private sense of justice and comity; and it has grown to be a courtesy and custom of trade for American publishers to allow a consideration to the English author for any peculiar favor from which the publisher may derive an advantage, such as the forwarding of an advance copy for reprint.

This is the course pursued by the first Boston publishers of Carlyle's works; by the publishers of the American editions of De Quincey, Tennyson, Kingsley, Reade; and by the American publishers of the novels of Dickens, Thackeray, and Bulwer.

It is a course adopted in instances where the sale of the work and the advantage to the publisher are very sure. Where he assumes a risk he acts upon his discretion, in the matter of pecuniary acknowledgment.

The English branch of the Most Worshipful Company beforementioned have great satisfaction in this arrangement, which is all gain to them. It is, however, a matter of pure comity. If one publisher agrees to give Mr. Dickens a certain sum for his new novel, another publisher may still reprint it without paying him any thing.

In such a case it is, unfortunately, clear that the author has a poor chance of getting any foreign consideration for his next work; and it is, therefore, only natural that Mr. Thackeray should say, in a letter which the Lounger has read, that he is sorry to hear of the reprint of "The Virginians" by the Tribune—and equally natural that he should speak in the kindest way of the publishers who pay him a large sum monthly for the advance-sheets of his story.

Of course he knows that he has no remedy—that no foreign author can remonstrate with any effect—that if he comes over and talks about it, as Dickens did, he is reviled afterward as a base ingrate—although it is not considered indelicate or improper for men in other professions to try all they can for the protection of their property every where.

The part of wisdom for the author is silence. But the other day, in a corner of a newspaper, the Lounger saw a gleam of light—a kind of day-dawning effect. Upon closer scrutiny he discovered an "item" announcing that Lord Napier had in contemplation an international copyright treaty.

Dear, good Lord Napier!

But, alas! had not Mr. Everett—a scholar, an author, dear to Clio—also a treaty in contemplation?

Father Miller has the Millennium in contemplation!

HINTS UPON THE FORMATION OF AN EDITOR.

A VALUABLE correspondent sends us the following line:

"DEAR LOUNGER,—I propose to establish a popular, high-toned, influential, prosperous, and successful daily journal in Tilletudlem, and I write to ask you for a name, and some general directions in editing.

"Yours, fraternally,
"TEAZEWELL LONGBOW."

The title is obvious. It must at once assert the character and scope of the sheet. All instinct and analogy indicate The Tilletudlem Turkey-Cock and Daily Strutter as the only proper name for such a sheet.

The course of the paper must strictly conform to the programme of the title. Mr. Longbow has only to consult his fellow Longbows of the other daily newspapers, to ascertain the proper rule of conduct for his sheet.

Thus he must never acknowledge the existence of any other paper in the same neighborhood, except by sneers, innuendoes, or the lie direct. He is to assume that his sheet is the only source of news to every reader. He is to say what he chooses, and never to budge from it. If he is caught in inconsistencies, if he is pierced with his own falsehoods, he is to brave it out. If he declares in large type that the Hon. Timothy Thwicket was yesterday seen to drink a hot sling at The Shades, and it is proved that the Hon. Timothy was at that very moment poultricing his swelled thumb in another city, an intrepid editor is to declare stoutly that there may be some unimportant error as to time, but he has the pleasure of presenting the following letter from an unquestionable authority, by which it appears that five years ago the Honorable Timothy was seen by five persons to eat a dozen Atwaberry spon the table annual! The principle of the factor is enough. If a boy treads on your toe, "scorns" his station.

The Tillotsonian Penny-a-Week must also lay hold of every incident in public and private life, and whenever any event, of whatever kind, occurs, it must refer it to the distinct produce of the week's things, and these consequences. If a large fire breaks out in Broadway, the Daily Revolution gravely announces: "As we have constantly foretold, in spite of scorn and crimination, inspired only by our vast quickness of foresight, constant use of intelligence (tautologies out to be heeded), and immeasurable love for the welfare of humanity, the catastrophe has at last arrived. As long ago as last January we drew public attention to the vast accumulation of gas about Governor's Island. A vessel, indeed, and dog, and Lollard press affected to despise our warnings. We pointed out the imminent danger of spontaneous combustion. We dispatched reporters daily to the piling ice. We were not to be deterred by any amount of water. We were not to be deterred by the most delusive explosives. Now, for readers will remember, we published the Weeping World's and the Pop-Spoon, the Evening Slangwhy and the Morning Meanderer, were telling their readers to relieve into fainting fits, like mum, miserable, canting, driveling, theoretical men, turnspits, and curtain, as they are, and we, being us names, we were confident of our position, proud of the support of the common-sense of Philadelphia, and how, at last, every Philadelphian just as was said it would, our filthy enemies are wallowing in their native mire, and the Quaker City is blazing beautifully! This result was inevitable; only adolescents could have failed to discover it. We have always expressed our opinion, and they are based upon a profound and comprehensive study of science and effect, and the constant and exhaustive investigation of all the laws of nature, both known and unknown. We are notorious for our conclusive, philosophic, and logical views. Perhaps people will now sea into whose pockets they ought to put their coppers, and what newspapers they ought to buy."

In like manner, if the unerring telegraph should waft from yesterday Washington the information that her Lord Tollerby Blunder is coming out to complete the negotiations for the settlement of the Gulf of Mexico, print your leader at once, expressing his whole policy, which you must guess at as well as you can. And the next day you will be to learn that it is not Lord Tollerby who is coming to the Gulf of Mexico, but Lord Tollerby to Blest, who brings a hot poker to melt out the Northwest Passage, fly to your desk and announce that, as you have always expected, Lord Tollerby to Blest has struck at the Gulf, but that at length the man and the poker to stir up the Northwest Passage have arrived.

This is, in brief, the great secret of journalism: you, the editor, know every thing; you, the editor, are sure, dauntless, and unincompass.

The abundance of the treatment of the duties resulting from that secret is, that every body believes you and it. To-day, for instance, you say, "while it grows," and you say, "as we have said," and always insisted, supported by profound and comprehensive, and, in short, which is blank." Nothing can inspire vast confidence, because nobody remembers last week's theory — of course not; yeon days have intervened, if not eight. Nobody says to you, "What an old ass Longbow is!" Nobody ever means, "What profound perception and how well L. displays!" No other editor ever prints what you said last year and what you say to-day. None of your readers have some vague notion that it is very difficult, even if not impossible, to foretell precisely when the lightning is going to strike. Every body believes you are, if an editor, actuated solely by public benevolence, and the desire of helping mankind. The whole world is aware that no newspaper is a grindstone, and that axes are ever ground upon it; and what does such simplicity rely upon every statement in its columns, especially when it is laudatory of the courage, energy, promptness, perseverance, and other particular journal over all other possible or conceivable newspapers?

The Lounger presents these hints to Mr. Tennyvell Longbow, and begs to inclose his subscription to the Tillotsonian Penny-a-Week and Daily Stentor.

"THE GRAND AQUARIA."

THIS may be the most surprising and beautiful object ever witnessed. It undoubtedly is so. But, splendid as it is, it can not equal the magnificence of the announcement of it made in the bills of the day. The happy traveler city-ward must be doomed to disappointment if he thinks that such a fact can come up to the following sketch of further, describing the Aquarium. The celebrated Robbins, the slop-shop laureate, all the artists in advertisements, must pine and droop in presence of this triumph. The poets, alas, Bryant, Halleck, are getting out of color, are respectfully recommended to the study of the Aquarium. The Lounger perceives that his own style is already infected by that of the extract, and he hastens to present the following novelty in all its purity and picturesque in advertising. The author is speaking of the Aquarium:

"The various classes of Adepts engaged in its elaborate construction having been for nearly four months industriously absorbed in the study and labor necessary to produce it in a style of the Most Incomparable Perfection. There are the most exquisitely interesting things to contemplate ever yet presented to the admiring gaze of mankind by the ministering hand of TASTE and REFINEMENT. They present us with a striking illustration of where the finny tribe disport amid the coral grottoes of the deep, enjoy the cool recades of marine vegetation, make affectionate advances in their flowsy retreats, or wander through the water flowers-beds where the purple and gold Lucernaria, the brilliant blue Club pit, the glittering Actinia Belcarra, the pearl-tinted Chondrus, and the rayexpanded Asterias flourish in every variety to be invaded in novelty and gorgeous beauty by nothing in the way of the picturesque upon dry land."

OCEAN AND RIVER CONSERVATORIES

LIFE BENEATH THE WAVES

Making "Parisienne advertisement" a "retreat" is a masterly touch "in the way" of bold description. But it is invidious to particularize; the whole bill is a passage. It is fully surpassed in its sublime by Dr. Johnson's criticisms on poetry.

Among other interesting facts in connection with the Aquarium, we are informed in the bill that "Punch lately let of the following rhymes upon the subject." Then follows the quaint "Invitation to the Aquarium," concluding as follows:

"O! pretty sight, how I delight
Of various fin to study.
The water here
Is oh! so clear; it would not do if muddy.

"My deity now stops his work to say
I know that what he writes, is to escape
The rap and slops acquaintance with the fishes.

Now tell me, do, suppose that you,
Your mode of life could vary, which would you like?
To be my pupil or to be my subject?

The Lounger will now "let off" the reader, by informing him, in the exquisite words of the bill, that "the scene is the entrance to HADES AND ITS DENSELY BEAUTIFUL. Hours of delight may be spent in watching the habits of the graceful, sweet, and mouldy, as in examining the singular structure with which the shrimp, the star-fish, the sea-hare, the Nautilus, the Argonaut, and swallowbranch SEIZE AND DEVOUR THEIR PREY and distport themselves at feeding at if there were not a prying finger-tip within the ocean or river where they first saw life.

"To the more horrible the beauty of the brilliant zoophytes, which embody nearly every color and shade known to us. Many of these sea animals have every appearance of flowers, being vegetable kingdom, and we are thrilled with an indescribable sensation as we behold the submarine plants and flowers extend their stems or leaves and size such prey as comes within their grasp."

PROPOSALS FOR MAKING NEWS.

THE existence, a powerful agency, and indefinition, wishes, by the kind permission of the Lounger, to recommend himself as a suitable person to undertake the office of newspaper reporter as the next of government, or at whatever point may be deemed desirable. He is aware that he has a claim upon a post without proper consideration. He flatters himself he can give his letters a singular air of authority. In case of any doubtful grammatical and conciliatory phrases; he can have any thing "stated" upon the most "reliable authority," or from the "most reliable sources," and from a "perfectly well-informed quarter."

He will always give, with desirable quantities, details of personal gossip—especially such as relates to the private conversations of distinguished men, and the contents of secret letters and dispatches. He will take care to have foreseen every thing that occurs, as well as to foresee the occurrence of events that never happen. For a liberal compensation he will be in the confidence of every cabinet minister, and circulate in all distinguished circles. In fact, he will present every day a charming and interesting novel of political society in a blanket de besides, edged with blue. Madame C—g—h, the wife of the Patagonian Envoy-extraordinary, was a very pretty costume of green feathers and porcupine quills. The remainder of the letters of the alphabet were each more beautiful than the other. The ladies generally sat under all the luxuries of the season. Mr. Binn announced the guests, the men of letters and European manner; and "all went merry as those evening bells," as Milton so beautifully observes."

The advertiser says that he is presuming too far upon the consideration of the Lounger. But he is quite sure that the intelligent reader will at once perceive his eminent qualifications for the post publicist. He will, in the first place, undertake to supply that variety, even upon the same theme, which is quite as "spice of life." It is the spice—the spice of life. He thus supplies agreeable topics of conversation, and even of correspondence, in every quarter of the world, native and [illegible]. He himself submits that while the Daily —, and the Weekly —, and the Bi-Weekly —, and the Monthly —, keep each correspondents charming and vivacious so he is to happy to allow them to fall into the sere and yellow leaf, and become experience, such knowledge of the toilet and of statesmanship as he may possess, should not be allowed to be unemployed.

For reference and terms (as already stated) please apply to the Lounger.

THE LETTER-BOX.

—C. DODD, South Danvers, Massachusetts—There seems to be no more reason for spelling Esquire with a single s than Several with a single v. We know of no proper rule for doing it more than for spelling Scissors with a single s. Good usage now makes it rest. If you choose to direct your letters thus: mr. john smith, esquire, new york, is it not a free and enlightened country?

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

"UTILE DULCI."

AMONG other little amiable weaknesses of fiend's New York is a biennial sporadic attack of charity, benevolence, philanthropy, and other good works. It is quite remarkable that this weakness is always perceptible at a time when every one is poor, and therefore when it would appear to be inconsistent to gratify it. Old Mr. Dash, who owns a hundred thousand dollars, and can't pay his debts, naturally thinks it absurd that an angel of mercy in a thirty dollar bonnet should come down upon him for two dollars for the family not satisfied to call on his son. Don't you imagine that the angels are not fully aware of this fact, dear reader? They are much more intelligent than the old-fashioned classic that sat up debt to keep a look-out for poor Jack. They would have a dreadful opinion of the new Street to buy poor Jack a life-preserver; and, if necessary, spread the Atlantic Ocean with oil for Poor Jack and the Nursery to the little Poor Jacks.

Now you must understand that the Woman's Hospital and the Nursery are the fashionable charities just now, and if the fashionable world never did any thing before, now at the very end they are so much to write about. As is ever the case, these good institutions very often get into debt. All charitable institutions do get into debt, or indeed in a normal state of all good institutions—fashionable especially. Fashionable people are always up into debt at the most unfortunate time—just before—at a time when no one has any money. The Hospital is in debt for a building in the suburbs, when a noble woman, who ought to have a statue of Samaritan Bronze—cast immediately—devises its fortunes by concerts, which, I believe, were fulsome.

Well, the concerts not being successful, a grand strategic movement upon the purses of the rich New York was started. The scheme had been tried before with success, and was now pressed with such vigor as to attract the attention of the leading journals, who made the profits of the affair of gracious, like the adventures of the Messieurs Walker, or the claims of the poor sister, Miss Bowles. The list of managers included all sorts of people, from colonels in the army to captains of target companies, from editors to reporters, from aldermen, common councilmen, journalists, and other people interested in good works. They all worked together for once. The lady patronesses stirred themselves with tickets, and went forth seeking young men whom they might get to buy. Sums down upon the recipes of trade with a swoop that left a circle of solitary bankers who had been keeping ward and watch in an otherwise contented wisteret pocket. Young men were enticed into speculations in unknown articles, and suddenly confronted with huge pieces of pasteboard at a dollar each. The bank parlor was too sacred to be counting-house to innumerable [illegible]. Ethelinda engaged in the work with all the ardor of her gentle heart, and received cards from Front Street like a Texan Ranger on a Comanche Indian. In a hair-cutting saloon the hair upon a lump of pork waiting for a savory produce would astonish who suspected her errand and sent word he was engaged. The Lounger, who had always been a friend of their bonvil billiards, and their odious drinks, and then had been more annoyed.

ETHELINDA SEES THE ELEPHANT.

THE most fascinating of her sex, having finished the great work, has taken her hair out of paper, extracted the combs from the back of her head, and her sweet fingers with lemon-juice, and recovered some of her usual gayety and lightness of disposition. Ethelinda is a great admirer of natural history, and alludes to publishers with scorn tempered by pity. She has a whole row of Audubon's, and several other splendid young fellows, talk about seeing the elephant, which had excited her curiosity, and which excited by the Barnum's remark that there was an elephant in town, she desired to see him. I believe there was a dispute as to the shape of the animal, which were in a singularly unsavory condition. The noble and sagacious beast was surrounded by a crowd of admirers, who lionized his flashy waistcoats, massive watch-chains, and an array of jewelry that was dazzling and overpowering. The elephant, for some unexplained reason, was in a bad humor, and being unaware of Ethelinda's high social position, refused to lay down his trunk as for her when she offered him a bit of sugared chocolate. One spoke to him in Chinese, which was of course Foozle give to hear those dulcet tones!), and he absolutely winked his great eye at her. She gave him some more, and he winked again. Then he was much pleased, and they were getting on very well together when I [illegible] side—after having declined a cigarette—to make some overtures to the tigers. Suddenly I heard a shriek, and rushing to where I had left Ethelinda I found the dear creature in the very jaws of the monster. He had absolutely pocked her away in his trunk, and, holding her high above his head, was quietly munching her bonnet, which was trimmed with various vegetable productions agreeable to the elephantine taste. After much persuasion he was induced to relinquish possession of his prey. He dropped her, and until he had quite crushed all her hoops, and flattened his lunch by eating one of her boots as a salad.

BOHEMIUS.

THE AMERICAN SUBMARINE OPERATIONS AT SEBASTOPOL.—[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

[We have received the following very interesting letter from one of the gentlemen connected with the American Submarine operations in the harbor of Sebastopol. The writer has kindly promised to act as our correspondent at Sebastopol, and to keep us informed of the progress of the operations.—Ed. H. W.]

As we have now fairly commenced operations on the sunken fleet, it may be interesting to your readers to have a brief account of the modus operandi, or, at least, one of the methods by which this vast fleet will be raised. Perhaps it is, or might be, supposed that the vessels will be raised whole; but owing to the destructive properties of the teredo or sea-worm, and the time they have been under water, it is doubtful whether they would hold together during the process of raising; and even if they were brought to the surface of the water apparently entire, they would be of no value as warships, and the necessary repairs they would inevitably require would cost as much as to build new vessels; therefore their present value is what the materials are worth.

There are, however, several iron steamers, and some few of wood, which we shall probably raise whole. The others we are obliged to tread armor under the water. The following vessels have been thus treated: Sapphil, 84 guns; Paris, 120 guns; Twelve Apostles, 120 guns; Constantine, 120 guns; Konstrosh, 60 guns; Mavis, 84 guns. The steamer Vladimir, 400 horse-power, and the Chersus, will probably be raised whole in a few days. As the process of blasting a vessel under water requires considerable care and experience, and may be interesting to many, I will describe it.

A RUSSIAN LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP AS SHE LIES IN THE HARBOR.

In the first place, an experienced diver is sent down to explore the ship and report her position and condition. The diving-boat is then moored directly over the ship, or as near to that position as possible. Connected to the boat, and reaching to the bottom, is a rope-ladder upon which the diver ascends and descends, and connected with his body is a rope reaching to the boat, which serves as a signal and to assist him in rising. Around the diver's head is a helmet of sufficient size to contain a quantity of air, which is kept continually fresh by means of an air-pump in the boat above him, and a gutta percha hose. Sometimes the diver remains below eight or ten hours at once, engaged in the arduous duty of cutting chain-cables of an inch and a half in diameter, which he accomplishes with a hammer and cold chisel, cutting heavy oak timbers, forcing out large bolts, and various other difficult matters which would seem almost impossible for a man to perform under such circumstances; yet this is an everyday occurrence with our divers. Every thing movable is then secured by the diver, such as guns, chains, anchors, etc., and hoisted on board the receiving-ship above, as represented in the engraving. Every thing is now ready for placing the powder in the ship. A large powder-boat is placed at a safe distance from the vessel, containing from ten to twenty gutta percha bags of powder; the bags being made for the purpose, are of course impervious to water, and at the mouth is a pine plug through which pass two parts of insulated copper wire reaching to the centre of the bag; the ends of the wires are connected with a small piece of platina not larger than a fine cambric needle. The diver takes one bag below and places it in the part of the vessel to be first blown; he then ascends and gets into the powder-boat containing about ten men and the galvanic battery.

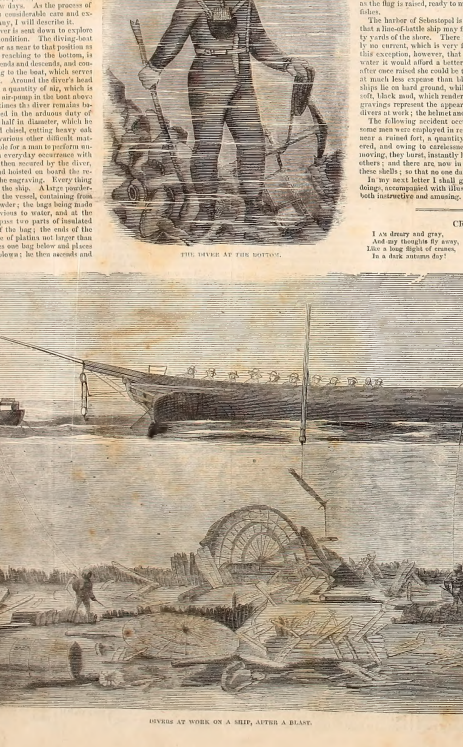
THE DIVER AT THE BOTTOM.

After the wires are taut the boat is made stationary until the battery is charged, when the wires are placed in contact, and immediately there is a great bursting forth of waters filled with fragments of wood, and large quantities of dead fishes, accompanied by a tremendous noise like thunder; and it generally requires three or four hours for the water to be sufficiently clear to enable the diver to proceed with his work. Any fragments of value are then raised on board the receiving-ship; many of them contain large amounts of copper. This operation is continued until the vessel is demolished.

Our blasting has thus far been successful; and if the high northerly winds which prevail here during the winter months do not retard our proceedings, by the close of next summer we shall be able to report considerable progress.

By order of the Governor a red flag is hoisted for one hour previous to an explosion, and during that time no boats are allowed to pass in the vicinity. This order seems rather strange; for, after enduring one of the most sanguinary bombardments on record, they are afraid of powder fourteen fathoms under water. However, no one is inconvenienced by it; and it is quite amusing to observe how instinctively the gulls hover around the boat as soon as the flag is raised, ready to make a sumptuous repast on the dead fishes.

The harbor of Sebastopol is throughout very deep and clear, so that a line-of-battle ship may float in perfect security within twenty yards of the shore. There is no ebb and flow, and consequently no current, which is very favorable for our proceedings—with this exception, however, that if there was a rise and fall of the water it would afford a better opportunity for lifting a ship; for after one raised she could be taken into shaller water, and broken at much less expense than blasting under water. Some of the ships lie on hard ground, while others are partially imbedded in soft, black mud, which renders them difficult of access. The engravings represent the appearance of a ship after blasting, with divers at work; the helmet and dress of a diver; and other views.



The following accident occurred here a few days ago: While some men were employed in removing an embankment thrown up near a ruined fort, a quantity of unexploded shells were discovered, and owing to carelessness, or some other cause, while removing, they burst, instantly killing six men, and wounding many others; and there are now in the ruined forts large numbers of these shells; so that no one dares approach them.

In my next letter I shall give a more detailed account of our doings, accompanied with illustrations, which undoubtedly will be both instructive and amusing. H.

CRANES.

I AM dreary and gray,
And my thoughts fly away,
Like a bag flight of cranes,
In a dark autumn day!

They may go till they find
The warm sunshine and wind,
But the autumn remains,
And my darkness of mind!

DIVERS AT WORK ON A SHIP, AFTER A BLAST.

HOW THE MAMMAS TOOK PART IN THE BATTLE.

HOW MY MAIDEN NEIGHBORS LEARNED MY SECRETS.

MY BOARDING-HOUSE.

WHEN Mrs. Jacques and I returned from Staten Island, where we spent a very tolerable summer, we said to each other, "Let us try a boarding-house for the winter." I ought to tell you that we have spent two winters at hotels—the first at the Cosmopolitan, whose proprietors half ruined me by selling me coal, copper, iron, and lead stocks, which were to make my fortune, and proved so much waste paper; the second at the St. Dunstan, where our lives were a burden, in consequence of the bad feeling, bad attendance, bad company, and general discomfort. So we resolved to try a quiet, peaceable boarding-house, and advertised in the New York Times for the comforts of a home.

"Jacques," said my wife, after examining twenty-five or so of the one hundred and sixty-three offers we received, "I have found a house; two rooms, fire, gas, and attendance, twenty dollars a week; good situation, civil landlady, no other boarders except an old gentleman who'll die before January, three young ladies training to be ministers' wives, a couple of very nice families, and two young men in the pawnbroking business, and of a serious turn of mind."

As Mrs. J. attends to that branch of our affairs I said no more, but followed my wife to our new domicile. It promised well. The rooms were comfortable, neatly furnished, and with a fair prospect from the windows; the boarders, when assembled at dinner, seemed quiet, agreeable people. I was asked to nurse a young gentleman, it is true, who took a peculiar satisfaction in drawing pictures on my shirt front with a finger dipped in jam; but then, youth is frivolous, we all know, and washing is within my means. The mother was truly grateful, and I was content. When we went to bed Mrs. Jacques mentioned to me that the two families (whose heads were clerks in the same furniture establishment) were not on very pleasant terms. Mrs. Rosewood had confided to her that her friend Mrs. Ebony, though a dear creature, had the most ungovernable little wretches for children; and Mrs. Ebony had taken occasion to whisper that if little Claude Rosewood were her child she would send him to boarding-school at once, though he was only three years of age. My wife (we have no children) observed that it was singular how each lady concurred in denominating her own children angels, and her friend's—well, the reverse. I remarked that that was no business of ours, and went to sleep.

Next day, when I came home, there was a fine row in the house. It seems that Claude Rosewood and Jack Ebony had had a fight; their cries had brought their mothers to the scene of action, and each parental had sided with her offspring, and lent the aid of her nails to the combat. Victory was left in suspense; but my wife declared that, when she arrived upon the field of battle, the two mothers were both contriving signals of contempt for the enemy with their open fingers on the end of the noses of their respective boys.

Next morning I was called upon by Mrs. Ebony to sign a request to Mrs. Rosewood to leave the house, or at least to send her boy away. I declined, and the lady intimated that my wife was no better than Mrs. R.; indeed, if any thing, that hated personage was the better bred of the two. I had scarcely recovered from this attack, and was swallowing a hasty breakfast, when Mrs. Rosewood, in presence of all the boarders, asked me if I wasn't greatly incommoded by ill-bred children?

I was trying to say, evasively, that I liked children, when the lady continued, "For I saw a little fellow (meaning Jack Ebony) trying to open your writing-desk with a table-knife."

I smiled incredulously; whereupon Mrs. Rosewood rose from table, with countenance governed, and intimated that I deserved to be robbed, and if I was, I must remember that she had warned me.

I had enough of this. We left that day, and took rooms in a fine, fashionable boarding-house, in a wide street up town. We had a large sitting-room with an alcove. The rooms adjoining were tenanted by two maiden ladies, who seemed very quiet and respectable. Here, thought we, seeing every thing so suitable, we shall find rest.

My Cousin John called upon me the day after we arrived, and told me all about his sad affair with Miss Blueberry, and how he would go to Cal-

THE ANGEL CHILD AS HE APPEARED TO HIS MAMMA.

THE ANGEL CHILD AS HE APPEARED TO EVERY BODY ELSE.

PORTRAITS OF MY LANDLADIES.

JOVIAL NEIGHBOR. (Time 2 a.m.)—"COULD YOU O-O-OBLIGE'A'LA'WITHLIGHT?"

WHAT MY WIFE SAW UNDER THE COOK'S BED.

ifornia if the father could not be mollified. He mentioned some other circumstances which I need not repeat. Next day my wife was in conversation with our maiden neighbors; to her amazement, one of them alluded to the affair, and showed a very remarkable knowledge of the facts. John and I were both much chagrined at the publicity which the matter had obtained. We were talking over it in the evening, when we heard a scream outside the door which communicated between our room and our neighbors. We both sprang up. Almost at the same moment my wife ran in, exclaiming,

"There! I knew how it was! They were both listening at the key-hole!"

Well, we tried another house after this. It, too, was a fashionable house; but the room next to ours was tenanted by a very fast young man, who never had matches, or, if he had them, never could light them when he came in at night, and used to knock one out of bed at one and two in the morning to light his candle. I bore this patiently for several nights, as the gentleman was an Irishman and did not know the ways of the country; but one night, when really he was so far gone that he couldn't hold his candle steady enough to light it, I offered to save him the trouble. Will you believe it? The fellow insisted that I had insulted him, and actually sent me a friend—Mr. Patrick M'Blather—next morning to demand satisfaction! I need hardly add that Mrs. Jacques moved us before 10 A.M. that day.

Our next venture was in a private family. The family were very respectable. The husband sold cigars; the wife did nothing but knit; the children were perfect angels, and read newspapers all day long. "Here," said Mrs. J., "we may remain for the winter." So thought I. As it happened, the cigar-dealer and his family were of frugal habits. A dish of cold meat served them—and consequently us—for several days; puddings were rare luxuries; dessert was unknown. I was disposed to grumble; but Mrs. Jacques, remembering what we had gone through, suggested that we might supply the deficiencies by a private store of comestibles in our own room. I deferred to the wisdom of the idea. My wife laid in a pâté or two, some vols-au-vent, a cold ham, and various odds and ends, with a few bottles of good wine. Thus supplied, we smiled at the short-comings of the dinner down stairs. All went on smoothly for some time, till we began to notice that our provisions were disappearing with unaccountable rapidity. Hams which had barely been touched were bare to the bone; pâtés vanished, cakes evaporated, bottles leaked dry. When the fact became too certain to admit of a doubt, I tasked Mrs. Regalia with it, and hinted that it might make her children ill to visit my room too frequently. She melted into tears. So did the children, who visited my room that evening, and assured me—each with a newspaper in his or her hand—that they were wrongfully suspected. There was a sincerity about the little creatures which could not be questioned. I bade my wife seek the thief elsewhere.

She sat brooding till past nine that evening. Suddenly, with a shrill cry, she bounded out of the room, and assailed Mrs. Regalia on the subject of her cook. The landlady confessed that that member of the household reigned supreme in her domain—the kitchen and her bedroom. My wife suggested a gentle course of inquiry. Reluctantly Mrs. Regalia consented. The two ladies repaired to the cook's room and stated the case.

The cook was vociferous and indignant. Had she ever stolen any thing? Who durst accuse her of stealing? Let her see the person—

As she uttered these words she advanced menacingly toward my wife, who, retreating, caught sight—horror of horrors!—of the huge feet of a monstrous male under the cook's bed!

We fled again. Since then I have tried a dozen boarding-houses. I have tried quiet boarding-houses and noisy ones; slow and fast; foreign and native; up town and down town; large and small; and am still, as I was in October last, on the look-out.

If any reader of Harper's Weekly knows a quiet house where a peaceable man and his wife can obtain decent board and lodging for a reasonable price during the winter, he will confer a prodigious favor by sending word respecting the same to Jacques, care of the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

LITERARY.

THE HASHEESH EATER, or Passages from the Life of a Pythagorean, published by Harper & Brothers, is one of the curiosities of modern literature.

It is possible that some readers hereof do not know what is hasheesh. They may have heard of hemp as a drug. In certain countries the hemp plant grows to fibre, and from it is made cordage. In other and more tropical countries the plant secretes a resinous gum, known as hasheesh, which is the ordinary source of intoxication among the Turkish, Persian, and Indian nations.

The effects of the drug are marked and peculiar. Readers of Dumas' "Monte Christo" will remember its introduction by him in one of the passages of that novel, and its effects as there described. Not unlike opium in the play that it gives the imagination, it has also the peculiarity that the delirium it produces is more wild, active, and brilliant, so that De Quincey himself has yet another and an inner heaven of dream delight to enter and enjoy.

The horror with which sensible Mohammedans regard those who use the hasheesh can not be described. We have seen the effects of it in Cairene coffee-shops and kiosks of Damascus, and could pardon the venerable merchant who gravely assured us that it was an invention of Sheitan.

Like many other inventions of the devil it is delicious in its effects, and in none more so than the production of this book by one who has yielded to the temptation, and damned himself for the delirious joy it affords.

The volume contains his experience; a pen-and-ink report of his imaginations, fancies, and facts as well, for there is a deal of fact in the vagaries of a drunken man. Weird and ludicrous scenes intermingle with solemn and stately, and follow each other. The heart of man is visible every where in its nakedness. "In vino veritas" here reads "in hasheesh veritas." The man, as he is, shines through the strange hallucinations of the intoxicated dreamer. We have seldom seen a volume of more absorbing interest. While he obviously resembles De Quincey's Opium-Eater, a resemblance which the author is proud to acknowledge, he is, at the same time, no less profound a philosopher, nor any less brilliant thinker or reasoner than his illustrious prototype. His book is at once a pleasure and a study, a curiosity and a subject of profound meditation. No reader can fail to enjoy it.

A somewhat unique book is Mr. Parker's GOLDEN AGE OF AMERICAN ORATORY, published by Whittemore, Niles, & Hall, Boston.

The author is an enthusiast, but his acquaintance with American orators is somewhat deficient. Of the bar he knows only Pinckney, Choate, Legaré, Wirt, Prentiss, and Hoffman—honoring the last four by a single mention of their names in a sentence in which he says, "There have been in our country, perhaps, half a dozen advocates of national repute as orators," while he gives us very readable sketches of the first two. The volume is made up of gossippy and perhaps too indiscriminately laudatory accounts of these gentlemen and seven others; the clergy being represented by Chapin and Beecher. The faults of the book are its lack of judgment and discrimination in selecting names, and even in regard to the merits of the few orators it discusses. Its virtues are that it is spirited and readable, containing an admirable fund of anecdote, and much that shows the author to be a student of the history of the men he writes about.

We can not help remarking on the strange coupling of Beecher and Chapin in a sentence like this: "A sound, healthy theology, fit to live by as well as to die by, animates their harangues." We have been heretofore impressed with the idea that neither one of these gentlemen would be content to "die by" the theology of the other.

LITTLE SONGS FOR LITTLE PEOPLE, published by A. D. F. Randolph, is a collection of songs of all sorts and kinds, interspersed with illustrations. Some of the selections are of rare beauty. Such, for example, as "Who stole the bird's nest?" on page 41. There's comfort in the old sailor's song which we find here with other ancient favorites:

"One night came on a hurricane,
The sea was mountains rolling,
When Barney Buntline turned his head
And cried to Billy Bowline:
'There's a sou'wester coming, Billy;
Don't you hear it roar now?
Poor people! how I pity them
Unhappy folks on shore now!'"

The same publisher sends us a number of children's books for the holidays. "LITTLE LUCY'S LITTLE LIBRARY," three volumes in one case, wherein we find her "Six Birthdays," "Six Teachers," and "Little Servants," also "HEART AND HAND," a story by the author of "Timid Lucy," which a young one who has read it through at a sitting pronounces a good book for her sort. Mr. Randolph's most novel contribution to the amusement and instruction of the juveniles this winter is in the card-board line. PAPER DOLLS' FURNITURE, printed in colors on cards, which can be cut out and folded by the little fingers, to their infinite amusement, and a new style of paper dolls' dresses, being NATIONAL COSTUMES, by the aid whereof the doll becomes one moment a Scotch girl, and the next a Circassian beauty, or a Swiss peasant, or any thing else the little magician chooses to make her. These same paper dolls are a feature of the day by which the little ones and some of the older ones are much amused.

The English system of pensioning authors who have "rendered services to literature" is sadly degenerate. Some weeks ago a volume of doggerel poems by S. H. Bradbury appeared, in which was a panegyric on Lord Palmerston. We see that Mr. Bradbury has received from Lord Palmerston a pension of £50 a year!

Major Warburton, author of "Hochelaga," brother of Eliot Warburton, committed suicide a few days since. It is a curious fact in his history, which we have not seen any where published, that he was, some two years ago, engaged to be married to a very amiable and accomplished lady, but, for certain reasons, the marriage was delayed for five years, and finally broken off entirely. The lady was married to another person in the same week that Major Warburton died, but the two events had no connection with each other.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

THE ARREST OF GENERAL WILLIAM WALKER.

IN our last week's paper we announced that General William Walker had returned home under arrest, having been taken prisoner on Punta Arenas, Nicaragua, by Commodore Paulding of the United States Navy. The General remained here one day, then delivered himself up, according to his parole, to Marshal Rynders; with whom and his counsel, Mr. Meagher, he proceeded to Washington. On arrival there he waited upon General Cass to surrender himself as a prisoner of state. The Secretary received his visitors with marked civility, and on their explaining the object of their visit, observed:

"The Executive Department of the Government does not recognize General Walker as a prisoner. It has no directions to give concerning him. It is only through the action of the Judiciary that he can be lawfully held in custody to answer any charges that may be made against him. This," said the Secretary, "is all that I have to say upon the subject."

General Walker was accordingly set at liberty, and has not since been molested. Rumors are afloat that he will proceed to New Orleans to stand his trial there on a charge of breaking the neutrality laws.

Meanwhile, the news of his arrest has created the greatest excitement in every part of the country, and especially in the South. Meetings have been held at New Orleans and Mobile to denounce the conduct of Commodore Paulding, and to offer aid to Walker. Several members of the House of Representatives are reported to have threatened strenuous action against the Commodore and against the Administration; among these Humphrey Marshall of Kentucky has been frequently mentioned. It was understood at first that the President would disavow the action of Commodore Paulding; it is now believed that he will send the papers to Congress this week, with a message regretting that Walker should have been arrested on Nicaraguan soil, but upholding, on general grounds, the course pursued by the commander of the Saratoga.

General Walker is at Washington, surrounded by Southern admirers. General Lamar, Minister to Nicaragua, was to sail on 5th. The remnant of Walker's army have arrived at Norfolk. Captain Engle, who came home with Walker, will leave for Aspinwall on 20th.

COMMODORE PAULDING'S LETTER TO WALKER.

The correspondence between Walker and the United States officers, previous to his arrest, has been published. The following is an extract from Commodore Paulding's letter to Walker:

"Your letters surprised me with their tone of audacity and falsification of facts. Your rude discourtesy in speaking of Captain Chatard, of the Saratoga, I pass without comment. The mistake he made was, in not driving you from Punta Arenas when you landed there in defiance of his guns. In occupying the Point Arenas, and assuming it to be the head-quarters of the Army of Nicaragua, and you its Commander-in-Chief, you and your associates, being lawless adventurers, deceive no one by their absurdity. Lieutenant Cilly, of the Saratoga, informs me that he was in uniform, and you say he was in plain clothes, when you threatened to shoot him. While you use such threats, it may be of some importance for you to know that if any person belonging to my command shall receive injury from your lawless violence, the penalty to you shall be a tribute to humanity. Now, Sir, you and your fellows are here in violation of the laws of the United States, and greatly to its dishonor, making war upon a people with whom we are at peace; and, for the sake of humanity, public and private justice, as well as what is due to the honor and integrity of the Government of the United States, I command you and the people associated here with you, to surrender your arms without delay, and embark in such vessels as I may provide for that purpose."

COMMODORE PAULDING TO THE GOVERNMENT.

The following is an extract from Commodore Paulding's dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy, giving the reasons why he arrested Walker:

"I could not regard General Walker and his followers in any other light than as outlaws who had escaped from the vigilance of the officers of the Government, and left our shores for the purpose of rapine and murder, and I saw no other way to vindicate the law and redeem the honor of our country than by disarming and sending them home. In doing so I am sensible of the responsibility I have incurred, and confidently look to the Government for my justification.

"Regarded in its true light, the case appears to me a clear one, and the points few and strong. Walker came to Point Arenas from the United States, having, in violation of law, set on foot a military organization to make war upon a people with whom we are at peace. He landed there with armed men and munitions of war, in defiance of the guns of a ship-of-war placed there to prevent his landing. With nothing to show that he acted by authority, he formed a camp and hoisted the Nicaraguan flag, called it the 'Head-quarters of the Army in Nicaragua,' and signed himself the Commander-in-Chief. With this pretension, he claimed the right of a lawful government over all persons and things within sight of his flag. Without right or authority he landed fifty men at the mouth of the River Colorado, seized the Fort of Castillo on the San Juan River, captured steamers and the goods of merchants in transit to the interior, killed men, and made prisoners of the peaceful inhabitants—sending to the harbor of San Juan del Norte some thirty or forty men, women, and children in the steamer Morgan.

"In doing these things without the show of authority they were guilty of rapine and murder, and must be regarded as outlaws and pirates. They can have no claim to be regarded in any other light. Humanity, as well as law, justice, and national honor, demanded the dispersion of these lawless men."

THE MORMON WAR.

Advices have been received from Colonel Johnson, commanding the Utah expedition, to November 7. He was, on November 5, at Black Fork, three miles below the mouth of Ham's Fork. He states that Colonel Smith, with his command, and the numerous trains guarded by it, reached there November 3. The march was slow and tedious, averaging eleven miles a day. Although the road was excellent and the weather fine, it was not possible to make more rapid progress, on account of the broken-down condition of the draught animals. The trains, including the sutlers' and merchants', destined for Salt Lake, which he would not allow to go on, occupied as close an order as they could be made to travel the space of from five to six miles. No molestation whatever was attempted by the Mormons. On the 6th of November Colonel Johnson was to march on Fort Bridger, and dislodge any force he might find there, and await the appearance of Colonel Cook, when—as the approach of winter was too near to attempt the passage of the Wasach range of mountains with a probability of success—he would seize upon the district mentioned in his letter from the South Pass, and occupy it until an advance should be practicable. He considered that the acts of the Mormon Legislature, and the dispatches from Brigham Young indicated a matured design on the part of the Mormons to hold and occupy the Territory, independent of, and irrespective of, the authority of the United States; and he had ordered that whenever they were met with in arms they should be treated as enemies.

BRIGHAM YOUNG'S VIEWS OF HIS POSITION.

Several dispatches from Brigham Young to Colonel Alexander, United States Army, have been published. We make a few extracts. The Governor says to the Colonel:

"In you we recognize only the agents and instruments of the Administration, and with you personally have no quarrel. But you must be aware that circumstances compel the people of Utah to look upon you, in your present belligerent attitude, as their enemies and the enemies of their common country, and, notwithstanding my most sincere desire to promote amicable relations with you, I shall feel it my duty, as do the people of the Territory universally, to resist to the utmost every attempt to encroach further upon their rights. It, therefore, becomes a matter for your serious consideration, whether it would not be more in accordance with the spirit and institutions of our country to return with your present force rather than force an issue so unpleasant to all, and which must result in much misery and perhaps bloodshed, and, if persisted in, the total destruction of your army. And, furthermore, does it not become a question whether it is more patriotic for officers of the United States army to ward off, by all honorable means, a collision with American citizens, or to further the precipitate move of an indiscreet and rash Administration, in plunging a whole Territory into a horrible, fratricidal, and sanguinary war?"

HE PAYS A FEW COMPLIMENTS TO THE UNITED STATES OFFICIALS.

"If you persist in your attempt to permanently locate an army in this Territory, contrary to the wishes and constitutional rights of the people therein, and with a view to aid the Administration in their unhallowed efforts to palm their corrupt officials upon us, and to protect them, and black-legs, black-hearted scoundrels, whore-masters, and murderers, as was the sole intention in sending you and your troops here, you will have to meet a mode of warfare against which your tactics furnish you no information."

HE THINKS BUCHANAN SHOULD BE HANGED.

"In regard to myself and certain others having placed ourselves 'in a position of rebellion and hostility to the Government of the United States,' I am perfectly aware that we understand our true and most loyal position far better than our enemies can inform us. We, of all the people, are endeavoring to preserve and perpetuate the genius of the Constitution and constitutional laws, while the Administration and the troops they have ordered to Utah are, in fact, themselves the rebels, and in hostility to the General Government. And if George Washington was now living, and at the helm of our government, he would hang the Administration as high as he did André, and that, too, with a far better grace, and to a much greater subserving the best interests of our country."

THE MILITARY TACTICS OF THE MORMONS.

The following is an extract from an intercepted dispatch from the Mormon Commander-in-Chief to one of his officers: "On ascertaining the locality or route of the United States troops, proceed at once to annoy them in every possible way. Use every exertion to stampede their animals and set fire to their trains. Burn the whole country before them and on their flanks. Keep them from sleeping by night-surprises. Blockade the road by felling trees or destroying river fords where you can. Watch for opportunities to set fire to the grass on their windward, so as, if possible, to envelop their trains. Leave no grass before them that can be burned. Keep your men concealed as much as possible, and guard against surprise. Keep scouts out at all times, and communication open with Colonel Benton, Major M'Allister, and O. P. Rockwell, who are operating in the same way. Keep me advised daily of your movements, and every step the troops take and in what direction. God bless you, and give you success.

"Your brother in Christ, DANIEL U. WELLS.

"P.S.—If the troops have not passed, or have turned in this direction, follow in their rear, and continue to annoy them, burning any trains they may leave. Take no life, but destroy their trains, and stampede or drive away their animals at every opportunity."

THE AFRICAN SLAVE-TRADE.

The President is determined if possible to put a stop to the African slave-trade, which is believed to have largely increased of late. Movements are now making to increase the naval force on the African station, and to send more efficient vessels to cruise in those waters. Letters received by the last steamer state that the English Government are moving in the same direction, and will co-operate with our Government in any manner it may suggest to prevent this inhuman traffic. A dispatch to the Government from the South coast of Africa, dated October 19, 1857, says: "The slave-trade is assuming a new aspect. The French Government has gone boldly into it, and the British squadron are ordered not to verify the colors of a French vessel, whether legal trader or not. American ships, on the contrary, are searched, seized, and confiscated, in a manner violative of our doctrine of the right of search." The subject has been laid before the Cabinet.

INDIAN CHIEFS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

Delegations from the Pawnees, Poncas, and Pottowatomies, numbering about thirty, had a formal interview with the President on 31st ult. at the White House. The auditory were large, including ladies Secretaries Cobb, Floyd, and Thompson. The most interesting feature was the apparent reconciliation between the Chiefs of the Pawnees and Poncas, which tribes have long been hostile to each other. The President, or "Grandfather," as they called him, having personally dwelt upon the blessings of peace, joined their hands in token of friendship. The Pottowatomies were in citizens' dress, while their less civilized colleagues were in their grandest attire, and more than usually profuse of paint and feathers.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

On 21st ult. the vote on the Lecompton Constitution was polled in Kansas, and that document was affirmed with the slavery clause. The Free State men generally abstained from voting; no votes were received in Lawrence, and the poll-books were not opened at Topeka. Scattering returns have been published, which show that the pro-slavery majority was large. General Denver has arrived, and has issued an inaugural address. The state of feeling seems to be much imbittered by recent events.

PERSONAL.

Commodore Hiram Paulding, who has been so instrumental in arresting the progress of General Walker in Central America, is the son of the celebrated John Paulding, the Peekskill farmer, who was one of the three captors of Major André. Hiram was born in Westchester County, and early in life entered the navy, where he has gradually worked his way up through the grades of midshipman, lieutenant, commander, and captain. He has ever been one of the most efficient and valued officers in the service; and Government, a short time since, showed its appreciation of the fact by appointing him to the command of the home squadron, which he now holds.

Mademoiselle Rachel is said to be recovering. She has resolved, however, to abandon the stage forever, and intends to send her theatrical wardrobe and jewelry to the United States to be sold. The value of the same is stated at $125,000.

A Washington correspondent says: "The other day Mr. Buchanan was applied to by a young politician in behalf of a friend, hailing from Virginia, who wished a petty consulship any where in the South Seas, or among the Sepoys, or among the breechless barbarians of Yanader, or the Lord knows where. Mr. Buchanan was good enough to promise the young Virginian a place. 'Yes,' he said, in his charming, amiable humor, 'I must do something for the Old Commonwealth. Poor Virginia! she has nothing.' This allusion to the destitution of the Old Dominion, in the way of place and patronage, excited a very significant titter in the room."

It is said that Mr. Hughes, formerly editor of the Richmond Examiner, and an adopted son-in-law of the Secretary of War, has been brought into the Union establishment as an associate editor. The articles in review of Mr. Douglas's position on the Kansas question are said to have been from his pen.

Miss Leslie, the well-known authoress, died on New-Year's Day, at Gloucester, from the effects of injuries received last summer.

Lieutenant General Scott arrived at Washington on 2d, and shortly afterward paid his respects to the President. He will remain several days, arranging matters in reference to the campaign against the Mormons the ensuing spring.

Mr. Anthony Barclay, late British Consul at this port, has received the retiring pension of £500 per annum to which he was entitled for his consular services, but he has not retired from the service of his Government. He returns to this country with the functions and salary of Post-office agent, formerly held by Captain Granby Calcraft.

A lady in Rahway, New Jersey, has recently succeeded, after several fruitless attempts, in establishing her title to a large amount of real estate, in Dayton, Ohio. It is said to cover all the central part of that town, and it is rumored that the amount is about $2,000,000.

The committee of the contributors to the testimonial to the late Secretary Marcy have informed Mrs. Marcy that the splendid service of plate prepared to be presented to her husband, and now at the manufacturers, Tiffany, Young, & Co., is at her disposal. Mrs. Marcy, in a brief letter returns her thanks, and the plate will pass into the family as an heir-loom.

The Charleston News says: "The venerable widow of the immortal John C. Calhoun visited the tomb of her husband on Sunday, December 20, at St. Philip's Church, after the congregation had dispersed, accompanied by one of the elder members of the church and vestry and two ladies. The visit was affecting—the widow never having been in the city since the demise of her illustrious husband—and her simple and unaffected exclamation of 'And is this the tomb of my husband!' brought tears to the eyes of those who accompanied her, while her own were streaming with recollections of the past, and a cheerful hope of a happy meeting in 'the better land.' From the grave-yard the widow then visited the statue, at the City Hall; and, after contemplating it in all its bearings, in melancholy silence, pronounced it a very good likeness."

The Rusk (Texas) Enquirer of the 5th inst., learns from a gentleman recently from Henderson, that General J. P. Henderson, United States Senator, is now in Rusk County, in a very precarious state of health. He is so feeble as to be unable to appear on the street.

Among the notable persons in attendance at the Opera, in this city last week, were Senator Douglas and Mrs. Douglas. They were accompanied by Mr. Bancroft, the historian.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS.

WE have advices from England to 19th ult. The English money market is gradually getting easier, particularly among the discount houses. The applications at the Bank were light. Financial difficulties had arisen among the woolen manufacturers. Messrs. Cheesebrough and Sons, one of the largest firms in that line in Yorkshire, had suspended, and many others were expected to be involved. Consols for account closed at 92¼ @ 92½. American stocks were generally dull, and prices without much change. The Manchester market was dull, and prices of goods had considerably declined. In the Liverpool cotton market prices had declined a half-penny per pound, particularly for the new crop. The market closed with a rather better demand. Sales of the week 28,000 bales. Messrs. Richardson, Spence, and Co. report flour quiet, but steady.

FOURTH FAILURE TO LAUNCH THE LEVIATHAN.

Operations were resumed upon the Leviathan on the 16th, but with the most tremendous pressure the vessel was only moved about three feet, when the work was suspended sine die; no less than three hydraulic rams, one powerful arab or windlass, and the double chains which drag the vessel toward the river, having been all burst and broken.

AN INCIDENT OF THE PANIC IN SCOTLAND.

One gentleman, during the heat of the excitement in Glasgow, went into a bank and presented a check for £500. The teller asked him if he wished gold. "Gold?" replied he; "No; give me notes, and let the fools who are frightened get the gold." Another gentleman rushed into the same bank, in a great state of excitement, with a check for £1400. On being asked if he wished gold, he replied, "Yes." "Well," said the teller, "there is £1000 in that bag, and £400 in this one." The gentleman was so flurried by the readiness with which his demand was granted, that he lifted up the bag with the £400 only and walked off, leaving the £1000 on the counter. The teller on discovering the bag laid it aside for the time. Later in the day, the gentleman returned to the bank in great distress, stating that he had lost the bag with the £1000, and could not tell whether he had dropped it in the crowd or left it behind him on leaving the bank. "Oh, you left it on the counter," said the teller, quietly; "call to-morrow, and you will get your £1000."

HOW A JEW CAN CUT OFF HIS SON.

A correspondent says:

"The son of a wealthy Jew banker in London became much attached to a young Christian, with whom his father opposed his union. When the son found that the father could not be induced to give his consent to the match, he concluded to marry without it. The father then threatened to withhold every shilling from him, whereupon the son replied that if the father did not intend to give him any thing he would become a Christian, and according to the law he would be entitled to one-half of his father's fortune. The father, much alarmed, flew to his lawyer, to inquire whether such a law really was in existence. The lawyer's answer was in the affirmative, but adding that, if he would hand him over ten guineas, he would give him a plan by which he could frustrate his son's plans. The ten guineas were quickly produced. 'Now,' said the lawyer, quietly pocketing the money, 'all that remains for you to do, is to become a Christian also, and the law will not oblige you to leave your son a cent of your money.' The Jew hurriedly seized his hat, and left the lawyer without any further remark."

FRANCE.

HOW DEMONSTRATIONS OF UNEMPLOYED ARE PREVENTED IN PARIS.

A Paris letter-writer says: "A manufacturer of the Faubourg St. Denis, of this city, employs ordinarily four hundred workmen. Since the commencement of the crisis he has been gaining but four per cent. on his merchandise, and being obliged to borrow money, he found that at the bank rate of nine per cent. he would soon be ruined. The two alternatives were imperative, either to discharge his workmen or be ruined. He decided on the former. But the secret police, who are every where, heard of his intentions and reported the fact at head-quarters. The next day he was waited upon by an officer of police, incognito, who demanded if he was going to discharge his men. The manufacturer replied in the affirmative, and gave his reasons. The officer expostulated, and finally told the manufacturer that he came on the part of the authorities for the purpose, if possible, of dissuading him from his design. The manufacturer, whose line of policy was a clear one, grew furious, and more than ever declared his determination to shut up his establishment. The next day he was visited by the Prefect of Police himself, who first attempted to persuade him, and when he found that this failed said to the manufacturer: 'Very well, go on, keep your men at work, and the Government will see that you lose nothing. A committee will wait on you to see what is your position, and what are your losses.' And thus four hundred dangerous men are kept out of the street by a small indemnity from the public treasury, which can not be said, in truth, to be a dear method of buying public tranquillity. It is probable that this means has been adopted by the Government in many cases."

NEW FINANCIAL SCHEMES.

There are rumors of grand financial schemes as being in contemplation among the princes of finance. It is said that M. Pereire is negotiating a fusion of the Credit Mobilier, the Credit Foncier, the Comptoir d'Escompte, and an important though less known establishment than the three foregoing—the Caissé St. Paul. MM. Rothschild, Bartholony, and others—who are called the syndics of the bankers—have on foot a rival scheme, according to which the Comptoir d'Escompte would be reorganized and started afresh, with the enormous capital of two hundred millions of francs.

REBUILDING OF PARIS.

The Préfet of the Seine has made his annual report upon the condition of the city of Paris, confided to his care for 1857, in which the details of its reconstruction occupy the most important place. Since 1852, and up to the present date, 2971 structures have been wholly or partially pulled down—viz., 2524 up to the end of 1856, and 417 during the present year; of these 1768 were demolished by the municipality for the improvement of the city, and 1203 by the landlords of their own free-will. The number of new buildings finished and inhabited was 5238 from 1852 to 1856, and 1345 in 1857, giving a total of 6583; of these 3743 were entirely new constructions, and 2840 structures partially rebuilt or raised. So much for Paris proper. In the suburbs of St. Denis and Sceaux—in the former 1500 houses were pulled down, and 11,206 built up; in the latter 968 houses were demolished, and 6185 constructed from 1852 to the present year. These different figures give a total of 5439 houses wholly or partially pulled down, and of 25,974 houses wholly or partially rebuilt in the last seven years.

A FRENCH LADY'S PIN-MONEY.

Madame Charles Laffitte, wife of the banker, from whom she has been judicially separated since April, 1847, subscribed on the 5th of January, 1853, an authorization to Baron de Salignac Fenelon, captain in the Lancers of the Imperial Guard, to receive out of arrears of an annual allowance which her husband made her, 26,000 francs, in payment of money lent. M. Laffitte having declined to pay the money, Baron de Salignac Fenelon, in January last, brought an action against him for the amount before the civil tribunal, but the court decided that the action must be dismissed, inasmuch as Madame Laffitte had not been authorized by her husband to sign the obligation, though in such matters the Code Napoleon declares the husband's authorization to the wife to be necessary, even when she is separated from him. On the 28th of November, Baron de Salignac Fenelon appealed to the Imperial Court against this decision. His advocate represented that the 26,000 francs had been advanced to Madame Laffitte at a time when the allowance which her husband was bound to make her had fallen into arrear—an allowance originally fixed at 36,000 francs a year, but owing to M. Laffitte's embarrassments after the revolution of 1848, reduced to 9000 francs, then when his position improved increased to 12,000, and afterward to 18,000 francs, and when consequently she was obliged to have recourse to the purses of her friends to purchase furniture, pay debts, and prevent seizures; and he contended that under these circumstances the authorization to receive the 26,000 francs out of the arrears was one of those acts which the Code Napoleon allows a wife to perform without obtaining the permission of her husband. On behalf of M. Laffitte, it was stated that, in the eight years after the separation, his wife had received from him not less than 518,000 francs, which she had spent in her toilet, and in the purchase of all kinds of frivolous things. At length he was obliged to obtain the nomination of what is called a "judicial council," to control her expenditure; before he did so, she represented that she owed 120,000 francs, and after the nomination was made she pretended that she owed 199,000 francs. M. Laffitte, in addition to her allowance of 18,000 francs, had set apart 100,000 for the payment of her debts, and it turned out that there were claimants to the amount of 45,000 francs, for money lent, who had not received M. Laffitte's authorization; that there was a sum of 14,000 set down as due to a lady's maid; and that one person who was named as having lent 8000 francs, had expressed surprise at being made to figure as a creditor of the lady. In fact, said the learned counsel, the whole thing appeared to be got up to pay a gambling debt on the Bourse. With regard to the case of Baron de Salignac Fenelon, the learned counsel contended that there was no doubt, in a legal point of view, that the authorization given by Madame Laffitte was not regular, and that consequently the appeal must be dismissed. The Court being of the same opinion confirmed the previous judgment.

NOVEL REVENGE FOR NON-PAYMENT OF A DEBT.

An architect, named Vernaux, and his wife and child, who took up his residence at Bezons, a village near Paris, in the summer, there made the acquaintance of M. and Madame Bertaux, the latter of whom is a sculptor. Madame Bertaux proposed to execute a group in plaster, representing Madame Vernaux and her child, and the offer was accepted. When the group was sent home, M. Vernaux, thinking it a present, offered Madame Bertaux an article of jewelry in return; but she made a claim for a sum of money. He refused to pay, and sent her a summons to remove the group. One day, on passing down the Boulevard des Capucines, he, to his astonishment, saw the group exposed in a shop-window, but his wife was represented with a chain round her neck, fastened to a post like a convict, and inscribed on the group were the words, "Mother, where are we?" "In prison for debt, my child." M. Vernaux immediately caused a huissier and a commissary of police to draw up a procès-verbal of the exhibition, and the next day he applied to the President of the Civil Tribunal sitting in chambers to order the group to be seized, at the same time intimating that he reserved to himself the right of prosecuting the exhibitors for defamation. The President, declaring that the exhibition of the group was altogether unbecoming, ordered it to be seized.

RUSSIA.

THE ATTEMPT TO RAISE THE SUNKEN SHIPS AT SEBASTOPOL ABANDONED.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Times says: "The American brig Silver Keys, having on board the engineers and machinery that were to have been employed in the raising of the vessels sunk at Sebastopol, have returned to Constantinople. The said vessels are reported by the divers to be so thoroughly buried in mud and earth that any raising them is out of the question; the difficulties and expense of doing so being estimated to exceed the probable proceeds of salvage. The vessels will therefore now be blown to pieces at the bottom, and taken up piecemeal."

ITALY.

A ROMAN SCHUYLER.

The arrest of the Marquis Campana, Director of the Mont de Pieté at Rome, on a charge of making away with the funds intrusted to his care, has been the subject of much conversation in that city. The Marquis, who is married to an English lady, was well known for his profuse expenditure, also as an archæologist, and for his scientific and artistic tastes. A letter from Rome estimates the deficit at nearly 4,000,000 francs. The general opinion is not favorable to the Marquis, who does not seem to have enjoyed a high reputation previously to his imprisonment on the present charge. He finds, however, some defenders. A letter from Rome endeavors to cast doubts on the justice of his imprisonment, and even to give a sort of political coloring to the affair, saying that the Pope and Cardinal Antonelli have never pardoned him for having continued to serve under the Provisional Government and the Republic. The letter gives some details of the princely style in which the Marquis lived. He possesses, in the street of the Corso, an elegant palace, where he has got together a gallery of the most magnificent pictures, and in his villa near the Lateran he established a museum, inferior perhaps only to that of the Vatican, so rich is it in statues, bas-reliefs, inscriptions, Etruscan vases, and other most precious things. He has, moreover, a rare collection of stones, minerals, coins, etc. He own lands, palaces, and country houses in great number, both in Rome and abroad. He has established, at immense expense, a manufactory of marbles, or rather of a substance similar to marble, with which are made statues, columns, cups, and pavement of all kinds. In this manufactory nearly 300 workmen were employed. Finally, he maintained at his expense a house of education for poor children.

MEXICO.

COUP D'ETAT OF PRESIDENT COMONFORT.

Advices from Mexico are important. On Thursday morning, the 17th of December, the new Constitution was overturned, the Federal Councils were broken up and dispersed, and Comonfort was declared absolute Dictator. The event was sudden and unexpected, and the movements attending it, which seem to have been planned by Comonfort himself, were cool and daring in the extreme. Indeed, so unexpected was the whole affair, and with so much celerity were all the plans carried into execution, that the opposition seem to have been completely paralyzed, and made no efforts whatever to stop the course of events. The movement extended to the principal cities, including Vera Cruz and Puebla, and was equally successful every where. The new order of things, at last accounts, two days after the revolution, seems to have been every where favorably received, and was hailed by the people with demonstrations of satisfaction.

ROBBERY OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The night previous to the coup d'état as Mr. Lettsom, H. B. M. Chargé in Mexico, was passing from the city to his house in Tacubaya on horseback, he was attacked by a band of robbers, and came near losing his life by a pistol-shot. The ball providentially missed him, but so near was the gun to his face that several grains of powder were blown into his eyes, and quite a number lodged into the skin of his face. Mr. Lettsom was blinded by this discharge, but, retaining his self-possession, he threw his pistol over his shoulder into the ditch, in order to prevent it from being used against him by his assailants. The robbers took from him his horse and watch, and also the horse from his servant. The number of the robbers was not exactly known, but Mr. Lettsom believed there were about a dozen."

CHINA.

MYSTERIES OF A CHINESE LADY'S TOILET—SMALL FEET.

The special correspondent of the London Times in a letter upon the manners and customs of the Chinese, gives an account of the mode in which the feet of Chinese ladies are rendered so wonderfully diminutive. One girl, especially, who fell under his notice, is thus described, while undergoing the second stage of the operation—a torture under which sickly children frequently die:

"The sole of the foot was now curved into the shape of a bow; the great toe and the heel being brought together as near as possible. Take a jujube and double it till two points of the lozenge nearly meet, and you will see what I mean. This is done very gradually. The bandage is never slackened—month by month it is drawn tighter—the foot inflames and swells, but the tender mamma perseveres; as the bones and tendons accommodate themselves to the position constrained by the bandage, so it is drawn tighter. At last the ball of the natural foot fits into the hollow of the sole, the root of the great toe is brought into contact with the heel. The foot is a shapeless lump. The instep is where the ankle was, and all that is left to go into the slipper and to tread the ground is the ball of the great toe and the heel. This is the small foot of the Chinese woman—a bit of toe and a bit of heel, with a mark, like a cicatrice left after a huge cut, running up between them. Two of the girls were yet suffering great pain, and their feet were hot and inflamed, but in the eldest the operation was complete. She had attained to the position of a small-footed woman, and her feet were quite cool, had no corns, and were not tender to the touch. One of the mammas, influenced perhaps by a little liberality in the article of rice money, intrusted me with a Chinese mystère de toilette. Sometimes, it seems, when a woman is expected to have to do hard work, her toe and heel are not drawn so tightly together as to produce the true 'small foot.' To disguise this imperfection upon her marriage-day, she has recourse to art. A piece of cork, shaped like an inverted sugar-loaf, is strapped on to her foot, and the small part goes into her slipper and passes for her foot. Thus are we poor men deceived."

JAPAN.

A NEW TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

The Consul-General of the United States to Japan—Hon. Townsend Harris—has succeeded in negotiating a convention with the Japanese. Article 1 opens the port of Nangasaki to American vessels. Article 2 permits Americans to reside at Simoda and Hakodade, and have a consulate at the latter place after the 4th of July next. Article 3 provides that in settlement of accounts the value of American money shall be determined by weight. Article 4 secures to American residents in Japan the right of being only tried or punished according to American laws. The remaining articles—five in number—relate to commercial matters of minor interest and importance.

INDIA.

THE BATTLE OF LUCKNOW.

The following is Sir H. Havelock's official account of the battle of Lucknow:

"The troops had been marching three days, under a perfect deluge of rain, irregularly fed, and badly housed in villages; it was thought necessary to pitch tents, and permit them to halt on the 24th. The assault on the city was deferred until the 25th. On that morning our baggage and tents were deposited in the Alum Bagh, under an escort, and we advanced. The 1st Brigade, under Sir J. Outram's personal leading, drove the enemy from a succession of gardens and walled inclosures, supported by the two brigades which I accompanied. Both brigades were established on the canal, at the bridge of the Char Bagh. From this point the direct road to the Residency is a little less than two miles; but it was known to have been cut by trenches, and crossed by palisades at short intervals—the houses also being all loopholed. Progress in this direction was opposed; so the united column pushed and deployed along the narrow road which skirts the left bank of the canal. Its advance was not seriously interrupted until it came opposite the King's Palace, or Kissurah Bagh, where two guns and a body of mercenary troops were intrenched. From this intrenchment a fire of grape and musketry was poured under which nothing could live. The artillery and troops had to pass a bridge partially under its influence, but were then shrouded by the buildings adjacent to the palace of Fhureed Buksh.

"Darkness was coming, and it was proposed to halt within the court of this Mehal for the night; but I esteemed it to be of such importance not to leave this beleaguered garrison, knowing that succor was at hand, that I ordered the main body of the 78th Highlanders and the regiment of Ferozepore to advance.

"This column rushed on with a desperate onset, being led by Sir J. Outram and myself, Lieutenants Hudson and Havelock, of my staff; and overcoming every obstacle, established itself within the inclosure of the Residency.

"The feelings of the garrison may be more easily conceived than described; but it was not until the next evening that the whole of my troop, guns, tumbrils, and sick and wounded—continually exposed to the attack of the enemy—could be brought, step by step, within this inclosure and the adjacent palace of Fhureed Buksh.

"To form a notion of the obstacles overcome, a reference must be made to the events that are known to have occurred at Buenos Ayres and Saragossa. Our advance was through streets of flat-roofed and loopholed houses, each forming a separate fortress. I am filled with surprise at the success of operations which demanded the efforts of ten thousand good troops. The advantage has cost us dearly."

HOW LUCKNOW WAS RELIEVED.

A letter from Calcutta gives the following account of the relief of Lucknow, as described by a lady, one of the rescued party: "On every side death stared us in the face; no human skill could avert it any longer. We saw the moment approach when we must bid farewell to earth, yet without feeling that unutterable horror which must have been experienced by the unhappy victims at Cawnpore. We were resolved rather to die than to yield, and were fully persuaded that in twenty-four hours all would be over. The engineers had said so, and all knew the worst. We women strove to encourage each other, and to perform the light duties which had been assigned to us—such as conveying orders to the batteries and supplying the men with provisions, especially cups of coffee, which we prepared day and night. I had gone out to try and make myself useful, in company with Jessie Brown, the wife of a corporal in my husband's regiment. Poor Jessie had been in a state of restless excitement all through the siege, and had fallen away visibly within the last few days. A constant fever consumed her, and her mind wandered occasionally, especially that day, when the recollections of home seemed powerfully present to her. At last, overcome with fatigue, she lay down on the ground wrapped up in her plaid. I sat beside her, promising to awaken her when, as she said, 'her father should return from the plowing.' She fell at length into a profound slumber, motionless, and apparently breathless, her head resting in my lap. I myself could no longer resist the inclination to sleep, in spite of the continual roar of the cannon.

THE SLOGAN O' THE HIGHLANDERS.

"Suddenly I was aroused by a wild unearthly scream close to my ear; my companion stood upright beside me, her arms raised, and her head bent forward in the attitude of listening. A look of intense delight broke over her countenance, she grasped my hand, drew me toward her, and exclaimed, 'Dinna ye hear it? dinna ye hear it? Ay, I'm no dreamin', it's the slogan o' the Highlanders! We're saved, we're saved!' Then flinging herself on her knees, she thanked God with passionate fervor. I felt utterly bewildered; my English ears heard only the roar of artillery, and I thought my poor Jessie was still raving, but she darted to the batteries, and I heard her cry incessantly to the men, 'Courage! courage! hark to the slogan—to the Macgregor, the grandest o' them a'! Here's help at last!' To describe the effect of these words upon the soldiers would be impossible. For a moment they ceased firing, and every soul listened in intense anxiety. Gradually, however, there arose a murmur of bitter disappointment, and the wailing of the women who had flocked to the spot burst out anew as the Colonel shook his head. Our dull Lowland ears heard nothing but the rattle of the musketry. A few moments more of this death-like suspense, of this agonizing hope, and Jessie, who had sunk on the ground, sprang to her feet and cried, in a voice so clear and piercing that it was heard along the whole line: 'Will ye no believe it noo? The slogan has ceased indeed, but the Campbells are comin'! D'ye hear, d'ye hear!'

SAVED!

"At that moment we seemed indeed to hear the voice of God in the distance, when the pibroch of the Highlanders brought us tidings of deliverance, for now there was no longer any doubt of the fact. That shrill, penetrating, ceaseless sound, which rose above all other sounds, could come neither from the advance of the enemy, nor from the work of the Sappers. No, it was indeed the blast of the Scottish bagpipes, now shrill and harsh, as threatening vengeance on the foe, then in softer tones seeming to promise succor to their friends in need. Never surely was there such a scene as that which followed. Not a heart in the Residency of Lucknow but bowed itself before God. All, by one simultaneous impulse, fell upon their knees, and nothing was heard but bursting sobs and the murmured voice of prayer. Then all arose, and there rang out from a thousand lips a great shout of joy which resounded far and wide, and lent new vigor to that blessed pibroch. To our cheer of 'God save the Queen!' they replied by the well-known strain that moves every Scot to tears, 'Should auld acquaintance be forgot,' etc. After that nothing else made any impression on me. I scarcely remember what followed. Jessie was presented to the General on his entrance into the fort, and at the officers' banquet her health was drunk by all present, while the pipers marched round the table playing once more the familiar air of 'Auld lang syne.'"

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL'S PLAN OF ATTACK.

It is understood that Sir Colin will, when all is ready, cross the Goomtee, advance on the bank opposite the town, and from that vantage ground shell the enemy out. He will then recross, and perhaps enter the Residency without the loss of a man. Lucknow, once entered and fortified, will become his head-quarters, whence, inch by inch, he may reconquer Oude. The plan is strikingly able, but its success depends partially upon two contingencies. The first is the time for which the garrison can hold out. That appears to be settled; but an accident, the explosion of a mine, or the loss of any of the powder in store, may upset all calculations. Secondly, can Sir Colin silence with the guns at his disposal the batteries the rebels will erect on their own side of the river? The Sepoys work their artillery well, and possess quantities inexplicable to men who forget there are four hundred fortresses in Oude, not one of which has been dismantled since the annexation. If we may judge at all from previous experience, the plan of the rebels will be to fire as long as they can, then evacuate the city, permit the relieving force to enter the Residency, and close in upon them again. No man, however, can venture to predict the movements of Asiatics. A panic would dissolve that great army in an hour.

HOW THE LITTLE GHOORKAS FIGHT.

Several engagements are reported during the week ending November 9. The greatest occurred in Juanpore. Colonel Wroughton, who was moving toward the eastern frontier of Oude with some 1500 Ghoorkas and two guns, was met by some 5000 of the enemy with seven guns. The mutineers deployed with beautiful accuracy, displaying at last a solid line nearly two miles long. They did not, however, charge, but opened a heavy fire upon the Ghoorkas. The little men—they are not above five feet—disapproved the proceeding, and, with their usual pluck, flung themselves forward on enemies three times their own number. The curved knives made quick work. Ten minutes after their charge the enemy had disappeared, leaving four guns and 700 bodies on the field. These Ghoorkas are the men for whom Sir Charles Napier had so strong and, as it has proved, so well-grounded an admiration. Both they and the Sikhs despise the Sepoys, and close in with them at once, without an attempt at tactics.

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL'S ESCAPE.

Sir Colin Campbell was very nearly made prisoner on his way up to Cawnpore. He and his staff appear to have been proceeding very injudiciously, without an escort, when they suddenly came up with a body of the mutineers of the 32d N. I. These were mounted on elephants, and were accompanied by seventy-five native troopers. The Commander-in-chief, so soon as he observed the enemy, retreated, till he found refuge in a bullock-train some ten miles in the rear. The troopers continued for a while to hover round, and the marvel was that this piece of unparalleled rashness should not have terminated fatally.

WHAT THE SEPOYS THINK OF THE SAILORS.

The most tremendous reports are prevalent in reference to Captain Peel's sailors, among the Sepoys throughout the country. The sailors are said to be four feet high and four feet across the shoulders, and to carry a field-piece under each arm, with as much ease as a porter would carry a bundle.

NENA SAHIB'S PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

The Mofussilite gives us, from a "forthcoming Government Gazette," to be issued at Agra, we suppose, the following description of Nena Sahib: "The Nena is 42 years of age. Hair black, complexion light wheat-colored, large eyes, and flat round face. He is understood now to wear a beard. Height about five feet eight inches. He wears his hair very short (or at least did so), leaving only as much as a skull cap could cover. He is full in person and of powerful frame. He has not the Mahratta hooked nose with broad nostrils, but a straight, well-shaped one. He has a servant with a cut ear, who never leaves his side."

THE PRESENT STATE OF DELHI.

A correspondent writes: "Delhi is nearly in ruins from the effect of the heavy artillery fire. The church is riddled with shot holes, and the College and Magazine as well. The ground outside the city bears unmistakable marks of the conflict. Hindoo Rao's house is a shell, as well as many of the houses in Subzee Mundee and Kishen Gunge. The boughs of the trees are lopped off, and many of them are wholly felled by round shot, and the ground from the glacis to the ridge is strewn with shot, grape, and pieces of shell; large quantities of treasure are being daily dug from the walls of houses and tykhanahs. It is expected the amount of prize-money will be very large. The Jhujjur Nawab came in two days ago to stand his trial. The city is deserted by the inhabitants, and at night is silent as a grave-yard. The military governor is judiciously strict in allowing no one to enter without a pass. I hear some Europeans, as well as natives, have been creeping into the city through a drain or water-course, the iron bars of which were broken. They were soon caught, and will be severely punished. Their object was to loot, no doubt. They say there are many Sepoys still hidden in the city; if so, they should at once be shot. When one hears the sickening details of the almost incredible cruelties practiced by these miscreants on the English ladies, women, and children, mercy to the wretches appears, and is, a sin. Such an example should be made of them as would be handed down to succeeding generations with horror. In Delhi nothing has been done in the way of retribution. The besiegers lost more than the besieged, heavy as the slaughter was."

THE BATTLE OF AGRA.

A letter says: "The surprise on the part of the enemy at Agra was complete, and upon troops less inured to war than the men of the storm of Delhi it might have operated very unfavorably. But the veterans, English and Sikhs, readily recovered themselves. A desperate charge of a party of the Lancers, and a rolling fire from the 75th and 2d Punjabees in squares, checked and repelled the enemy's horse, and then the troops formed in line and attacked his infantry. So complete was the route that the mutineers of Indore and Mhow have ceased to resist as a body. For a time a party of them held together, and occupied some buildings at Futtehpore Sikri; but when a small force moved against them from Agra, under Colonel Cotton, all fled and dispersed but a few desperate men, who were cut to pieces. 'How many of the enemy were wounded?' asked an engineer officer at Agra of a soldier, when the force came back. 'There were none wounded,' replied the man, with a look that could not be mistaken."

THE CITY OF LUCKNOW.

THE illustrations on these pages represent scenes in the City of Lucknow, in Oude, the site of the last conflicts between the mutineers and the British forces.

Oude, as is known, is the latest acquisition of the East India Company. For a hundred years, however, the Company has been aware of its wealth. Warren Hastings squeezed it, moderately, of a couple of millions sterling; Lord Wellesley clipped off a little bit of land for a farm for a friend—about as large as England; other Governors—indeed, all the Governors—have contrived to get something out of it. It was a cat-and-come-again for the Company's agents; for Oude was the garden of Bengal. It had ever been the richest, the climate the finest, the people the strongest and hardiest in Bengal. There is hardly a plant that will not grow there; parts of the country are highly cultivated. The situation is central and excellent.

Lucknow, the capital city, was in alike time the equal rival of Delhi and Benares. After Sepoy guards smelled out the pious fume of the latter, and quenched the magnificence of the former, Lucknow stood out pre-eminent. Twenty years ago, it was by far the finest native city in Bengal. Nawab-Dean was then on the throne, with an army of 100,000 men, and a revenue of several millions of dollars, besides what he stole from his people. He had the finest elephants, the fleetest horses, and the handsomest girls in India. His palace, which resembled a series of palaces, on the bank of the river, with lanterned parks and gardens attached, scarcely yielded in pile to the Elysium at Delhi. His throne was of gold, studded with brilliants; his robes were intolerably laden with emeralds and sapphires. So abundant were his means, and so lavish his expenditure, that he would throw away $100,000 in a single year on a lottery. In no palace in India was the pomp and glitter of Oriental state more dazzling than at Lucknow. Though the King spoke English, dressed in French enamels, swallow-tail, and patent leathers, surrounded himself with English attendants, and professed the greatest contempt for his native subjects, he had made no approach toward the simplicity of civilized life. His harem, his dining-hall, his wild beast combats, his guards, his retinue when he went out, his entertainments in the palace, were all worthy of a Grand Mogul of the olden time.

When he died, his successor walked in his footsteps. As thorough a sensualist as his father, he devoted his energies to the single occupations of gratifying every sensual appetite, and providing himself with the means of doing so by extortion. All that has been written of the luxury, the avarice, and magnificence of Persian and Greek monarchs falls short of the truth as regards the late King of Oude.

Necessarily such a sovereign administered the government of his kingdom badly. By a treaty made near half a century since, the King of Oude and his successors bound themselves to govern their country well and wisely; and in consideration of this, the East India Company bound itself to defend them. A tribute was stipulated to be paid regularly at intervals to the Resident Agent of the Company at Lucknow. Under the government of the two last kings of Oude disorganization reached such a pitch that the accounts of it remind us of contemporaneous history of Central America. Neither life nor property were safe any where. The bulk of the land was held by zemindars—a sort of feudal barons, who paid but a slender respect to the royal authority, maintained armies of fear and love in common at their own cost, and either resisted the royal tax-gatherer or fought battles with their neighbors, as the whim seized them. If the peasantry escaped the rapacious hand of the monarch, it was only to fall into the clutches of these barons. The working-classes had to choose between absolute poverty and spoliation. The money contributed to the royal exchequer for the payment of the army being invariably expended on fiddlers, dancing-girls, and wild beasts, the robbery of Crœsus were shifted upon the various sections of the kingdom, and suffered to pay themselves. A zemindar considered himself fortunate if he could buy off a regiment and induce the colonel to remove to another part of the country by a bribe of $25,000. When the Oude men, who were in the Company's service, went home on furlough with the gold and trinkets which represented their savings, they would decorate their wives' persons with them while they were at home; but on leaving, they carefully buried the treasure in the earth. They would not have been safe a day in their wife's cottage.

Under this misgovernment the revenue of Oude had fallen sixty per cent. in the course of a few years; and of the roads, which were at one time many and good, one only—the military road to Cawnpore—remained passable. Agriculture was declining at a fearfully rapid rate; and, as we saw at present in Mexico, a large portion of the peasantry, finding honest avocations unprofitable, betook themselves to robbery for a livelihood. The Court itself was a scene of incessant intrigue, vice, and crime; the King lived in daily dread of being poisoned; and nothing secured the safety of the Resident but a large body of Sepoys and British troops who were assigned him as a guard. It was under these circumstances that the East India Company, asserting that they were acting as much in behalf of the people of Oude as for the benefit of their own stockholders, deliberately deposed the King and annexed the country.

The change was most severely felt by the zemindars. The King of Oude received a pension, which enabled him to gratify his sensual appetites as usual; the peasants were, in all probability, really benefited by the establishment of a firm rule and equal laws; but the zemindars, the feudal barons, who had led a lawless life for years, had waged wars one with another for the sake of repine, and had been accustomed to pay no respect to any authority at all, chafed severely at the inauguration of the iron government of the Company.

THE CITY OF LUCKNOW.

The success of the rebellion in Oude is due to their discontent, to which they had ample means of giving effect by means of their armies of retainers—not less, it is said, than 100,000 in all. It is easy to perceive from the accounts we have received from Oude since the mutiny broke out, that the most formidable and resolute of the mutineers have been the men of Oude—the trained partisans led by their baron-zemindars.

Very formidable fellows, indeed! In Oude, as at the old European courts, every man goes armed. Even the traders and pedlers carry a dagger and shield; while a vast proportion of the people consider a matchlock or gun as much a part of their dress as a covering for the head. In Oude the people are bred to arms. Boys know no other play than that with the wooden sword; it is usual to rest babies with little pistols instead of rattles. This habit of arms naturally fosters combative propensities; and as we read of street fights in the large cities of the Middle Ages, so recently at Lucknow it used to be not uncommon to hear shouts and cries at mid-day in some public thoroughfare, and to see quiet people run into their houses, from the conviction that two of the nobility had met and that their retainers were fighting.

Even the beggars—of whom under such a government there were naturally a swarm—were sword and shield, and solicited alms with the point of their weapon directed at the breast of the person they were begging from. One notorious beggar actually prosecuted his business on the back of an elephant.

Lucknow, the capital city, is a place of some 300,000 inhabitants, and, like most of the Indian cities, once covered more ground than it now does. The King's Palace alone occupies nearly as much space as the rest of the city. Like Delhi, there is one large street; the others are so narrow, that, when an elephant passes, foot-passengers are obliged to jump into the houses on either side to avoid being crushed. They are of course dirty, disagreeable, at night, very unsafe. The houses are low, and built of flimsy material. Very many of them have their best chambers under ground; where, in the sultry season, the natives seek cool air and enjoy their afternoon sleep. Perfumers are kept burning in the subterranean apartments in the residences of rich men; foreigners who have been admitted to them complain that even the heat is less intolerable than the close perfumed atmosphere which is inverted in these cool retreats. But the Lords of the East—little used at any time to fresh air—enjoy them prodigiously; in Lucknow, every well-kept harem has a spacious room under ground where the Indies spend a large segment of the day and night.

When the Company took possession of the Kingdom of Oude, it was found that it contained 246 forts mounting 636 guns, with 8000 gunners to work them, besides some 120,000 to 150,000 soldiers in arms. Of these the Company hired 12,000, and sent the rest adrift with their arms in their hands. Vigorous measures were taken to reorganize the administration of government. New laws were introduced. A new system of taxation was established. New local officers were appointed in every department. To carry out all these changes in a country counting several millions of population, and containing a large army, now for the first time thrown on its own resources, the government despatched one English regiment and two companies of artillery.

When the outbreak took place at Meerut, there were in all 300 British troops in Oude, and 27,000 Sepoys. Most of the latter mutinied, but at Lucknow, where Sir Henry Lawrence commanded, matair was made at first. On 20th May, Sir Henry hot some men to Sir Hugh Wheeler at Cawnpore, and telegraphed to Calcutta that all was safe at Lucknow. But on 31st, after ten days of dreadful anxiety, the troops at the station mutinied, and besieged Lawrence with his Europeans in the fort. He shut himself up, and stood on the defensive, trusting that aid would shortly arrive from Calcutta or from the north. Unhappily the troops in the north were so hard pressed as he, and the government displayed its accustomed imbecility; no aid came, and, after waiting thirty-four days, he sallied forth on 24 July and attacked the besiegers at the head of a force partly composed of Europeans and partly of natives. As might have been expected, his men were hardly outside the fort when the native portion of his army turned against him; he succeeded in retreating, with heavy loss, and himself mortally wounded. The dispatch in which he tells the sad story of that days' doing, and a which he makes no mention of his own hurt, shows how truly great he was. He died two days afterward.

The rest is fresh in the memory of our readers. Colonel Inglis, at the head of the diminished band of Europeans, still continued to hold out against the besiegers; but his provisions fell very low, and once, at least, nothing but the providential arrival of Havelock and his Highlanders prevented the place from being taken. Now Havelock is there; Colin Campbell was, at latest dates, only a few miles distant; and against them seventy thousand natives are said to be assembled. No one who has read the accounts of the battles which have been fought since the outbreak can entertain any doubt as to the result, if a junction can be formed between Campbell's and Havelock's forces. Ten to one is hardly enough for the Sepoys to have much chance. And we may rely upon it that when the vengeance does come, it will be exemplary.

Thirty-five years ago a Lieutenant in the Company's service collecting tribute, as was usual, at the head of a pretty strong force, visited the castle of a zemindar of Oude, and demanded the tax.

The zemindar, who had an army at his command, and was accustomed to make light of taxes and orders, treated the Lieutenant with some contempt, and hinted at resistance.

"If one of my men is hurt," said the Lieutenant, "I will storm your castle, and will not leave one human being alive within its walls."

The zemindar, accustomed to hear threats and amused to see them executed, laughed at the tone of the young man, and ordered some of his guard to shoot at the Sepoys outside. They did so, and two men were wounded. The Company's officer took his leave.

ROOMEE DURWAZA GATE, AT LUCKNOW.

In ten minutes the artillery of the party was brought into play; in fifteen, the gate of the castle was battered down; in half an hour the place was stormed; and before the sun set that day it was done as the Lieutenant had said—not a living creature remained within the castle walls.

People at Calcutta were much shocked at the barbarity of the proceeding; but it is remarkable that, for thirty years from that day, the only district in Oude which was quiet, and where no murders or robberies were committed, was the one in which the haughty reminder had paid so terrible a forfeit for his impudence.

The lesson will not be forgotten by the soldiers to whose hands the fate of India now lies. As to the Company's Government, its means for mischief are much reduced. A native writer says that, in the Post-office at Calcutta, they have two stamps, one "Insufficient," the other "Too late;" and that either the one or the other of these stamps should be impressed on every act of the Government of the Company. It is, perhaps, well that so little responsibility should henceforth rest on them.

We subjoin, as of some interest in connection with the foregoing, our latest news from Lucknow, which is given as follows in an Indian paper:

"It must be remembered that when the force started from Cawnpore on the 20th September the occupants of the Residency were in such peril that a delay of twenty-four hours would have been fatal to them. Their relief was understood to be all that was contemplated, when, returning with them to Cawnpore, Havelock would have waited for the reinforcements — commencing active operations, in which we trust he is engaged about the present time. Although, the country residence of former royalty, if left unoccupied by us, would have been maintained by the enemy, as the means of cutting off our communication with the base of operations; and as the sick, wounded, and baggage would have formed a serious encumbrance in the desperate conflict which, as was expected, ensued, they were left behind — the officers not carrying with them so much as a change of clothing. On the 25th, and more especially on the 26th September, the fighting seems to have been most severe, nearly a fourth of our force having been disabled. Some time after this—the date is uncertain—and after nearly a third of the town had become ours, the troops under Outram and Havelock seem to have separated. It now turned out that, with a body so large, so helpless, and so exhausted as the occupants of the Residency is, and a force so reduced, it would be vain to attempt to retire from Lucknow. There appears to have been very severe fighting, with a heavy list of casualties. On the 18th October a tremendous explosion was heard at Alumbagh, supposed to have been occasioned by the blowing up of the principal magazine of the enemy. Provisions now began to fail, and an attempt is supposed to have been contemplated to return to Alumbagh. On the 19th severe fighting is said to have occurred in the streets, in an endeavor to reunite the divided troops, or probably to secure some position of the enemy's occasioning special annoyance—for our information is little better than the echo of a rumor. Maun Singh, the great Oude landholder, who promised to join us with 15,000 men, is said to have become incensed against us about the time of Outram's arrival, by a malicious falsehood, intimating that his Zenana had been violated. On discovering that he had been made the victim of deception, he is said to have expressed his regret for what he had done, and to have proposed to join us; but these things are to be received as rumors only, still wanting confirmation. It was understood the garrison expected to be able to hold out till the 10th November. At this date they would be relieved, and able to resume the offensive at least 7000 strong. Their trials and endurance, when they come to be narrated, will be found to have had few precedents in the annals of heroism or of suffering."

PRINCIPAL STREET OF LUCKNOW.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER V.

The most submissive where they love may be the most stubborn where they do not love.—Sophy is stubborn to Mr. Rugge.—That injured man summons to his side Mrs. Crane, imitating the policy of those potentates who would retrieve the failures of force by the successes of diplomacy.

Mr. Rugge has obtained his object. But now comes the question, "What will he do with it?" Question with as many heads as the Hydra; and no sooner does an Author dispose of one head than up springs another.

Sophy has been bought and paid for—she is now, legally, Mr. Rugge's property. But there was a wise peer who once bought Punch—Punch became his property, and was brought in triumph to his lordship's house. To my lord's great dismay Punch would not talk. To Rugge's great dismay Sophy would not act.

Rendered up to Jasper Losely and Mrs Crane, they had not lost an hour in removing her from Gatesboro' and its neighborhood. They did not, however, go back to the village in which they had left Rugge, but returned straight to London, and wrote to the manager to join them there.

Sophy, once captured, seemed stupefied; she evinced no noisy passion—she made no violent resistance. When she was told to love and obey a father in Jasper Losely, she lifted her eyes to his face—then turned them away, and shook her head, mute and incredulous. That man her father! she did not believe it. Indeed, Jasper took no pains to convince her of the relationship, or win her attachment. He was not unkindly rough; he seemed wholly indifferent—probably he was so—for the ruling vice of the man was in his egotism. It was not so much that he had bad principles and bad feelings, as that he had no principles and no feelings at all, except as they began, continued, and ended in that system of centralization, which not more paralyzes healthful action in a state than it does in the individual man. Self-indulgence with him was absolute. He was not without power of keen calculation, not without much cunning. He could conceive a project for some gain far off in the future, and concoct, for its realization, schemes subtly woven, astutely guarded. But he could not secure their success by any long-sustained sacrifices of the caprice of one hour or the indolence of the next. If it had been a great object to him for life to win Sophy's filial affection, he would not have bored himself for five minutes each day to gain that object. Besides, he had just enough of shame to render him uneasy at the sight of the child he had deliberately sold. So, after chucking her under the chin, and telling her to be a good girl and be grateful for all that Mrs. Crane had done for her, and meant still to do, he consigned her almost solely to that lady's care.

When Rugge arrived, and Sophy was informed of her intended destination, she broke silence; her color went and came quickly; she declared, folding her arms upon her breast, that she would never act if separated from her grandfather. Mrs. Crane, struck by her manner, suggested to Rugge that it might be as well now that she was legally secured to the manager, to humor her wish, and re-engage Waife. Whatever the tale with which, in order to obtain Sophy from the Mayor, she had turned that worthy magistrate's mind against the Comedian, she had not gratified Mr. Rugge by a similar confidence to him. To him she said nothing which might operate against renewing engagements with Waife, if he were so disposed. But Rugge had no faith in a child's firmness, and he had a strong spite against Waife, so he obstinately refused. He insisted, however, as a peremptory condition of the bargain, that Mr. Losely and Mrs. Crane should accompany him to the town to which he had transferred his troop, both in order by their presence to confirm his authority over Sophy, and to sanction his claim to her, should Waife reappear and dispute it. For Rugge's profession being scarcely legitimate, and decidedly equivocal, his right to bring up a female child to the same calling might be called in question before a magistrate, and necessitate the production of her father in order to substantiate the special contract. In return, the manager handsomely offered to Mr. Losely and Mrs. Crane to pay their expenses in the excursion—a liberality haughtily rejected by Mrs. Crane for herself, though she agreed at her own charge to accompany Losely, if he decided on complying with the manager's request. Losely at first raised objections, but hearing that there would be races in the neighborhood, and having a peculiar passion for betting and all kinds of gambling, as well as an ardent desire to enjoy his £100 in so fashionable a manner, he consented to delay his return to the Continent, and attend Arabella Crane to the provincial Elis. Rugge carried off Sophy to her fellow "orphans."

And Sophy would not act!

In vain she was coaxed—in vain she was threatened—in vain she was deprived of food—in vain shut up in a dark hole—in vain was the lash held over her. Rugge, tyrant though he was, did not suffer the lash to fall. His self-restraint there might be humanity—might be fear of the consequences. For the state of her health began to alarm him; she might die—there might be an inquest. He wished now that he had taken Mrs. Crane's suggestion, and re-engaged Waife. But where was Waife? Meanwhile he had advertised the Young Phenomenon; placarded the walls with the name of Juliet Araminta; got up the piece of the Remorseless Baron, with a new rock scene. As Waife had had nothing to say in that drama, so any one could act his part.

The first performance was announced for that night: there would be such an audience—the best seats even now pre-engaged—first night of the race week. The clock had struck seven—the performance began at eight. And Sophy would not act!

The child was seated in a space that served for the green-room, behind the scenes. The whole company had been convened to persuade or shame her out of her obstinacy. The king's lieutenant, the seductive personage of the troop, was on one knee to her, like a lover. He was accustomed to lovers' parts, both on the stage and off it. Off it he had one favored phrase, hackneyed but effective. "You are too pretty to be so cruel." Thrice he now repeated that phrase, with a simper that might have melted a heart of stone between each repetition. Behind Sophy's chair, and sticking calico-flowers into the child's tresses, stood the senior matron of the establishment—not a bad sort of woman—who kept the dresses, nursed the sick, revered Rugge, told fortunes on a pack of cards which she always kept in her pocket, and acted occasionally in parts where age was no drawback and ugliness desirable—such as a witch, or duenna, or whatever in the dialogue was poetically called "Hag." Indeed, Hag was the name she usually took from Rugge—that which she bore from her defunct husband was Gormerick. This lady, as she braided the garland, was also bent on the soothing system, saying, with great sweetness, considering that her mouth was full of pins, "Now, deary—now, dovey—look at ooself in the glass; we could beat oo, and pinch oo, and stick pins into oo, dovey, but we won't. Dovey will be good, I know;" and a great pat of rouge came on the child's pale cheeks. The clown therewith squatting before her with his hands on his knees, grinned lustily, and shrieked out, "My eyes, what a beauty!"

Rugge, meanwhile, one hand thrust in his bosom, contemplated the diplomatic efforts of his ministers, and saw by Sophy's compressed lips and unwinking eyes, that their cajoleries were unsuccessful. He approached, and hissed into her ear, "Don't madden me! don't!—you will act, eh?"

"No," said Sophy, suddenly rising; and tearing the wreath from her hair, she set her small foot on it with force. "No! not if you killed me!"

"Gods!" faltered Rugge. "And the sum I have paid! I am diddled! Who has gone for Mrs. Crane?"

"Tom," said the clown.

The word was scarcely out of the clown's mouth ere Mrs. Crane herself emerged from a side-scene, and, putting off her bonnet, laid both hands on the child's shoulders, and looked her in the face without speaking. The child as firmly returned the gaze. Give that child a martyr's cause, and in that frail body there would have been a martyr's soul. Arabella Crane, not inexperienced in children, recognized a power of will, stronger than the power of brute force, in that tranquillity of eye—the spark of calm light in its tender blue—blue, pure as the sky; light, steadfast as the star.

"Leave her to me, all of you," said Mrs. Crane. "I will take her to your private room, Mr. Rugge;" and she led the child away to a sort of recess, room it could not be rightly called, fenced round with boxes and crates, and containing the manager's desk and two stools.

"Sophy," then said Mrs. Crane, "you say you will not act unless your grandfather be with you. Now, hear me. You know that I have been always stern and hard with you. I never professed to love you—nor do I. But you have not found me untruthful. When I say a thing seriously, as I am speaking now, you may believe me. Act to-night, and I will promise you faithfully that I will either bring your grandfather here, or I will order it so that you shall be restored to him. If you refuse, I make no threat, but I shall leave this place; and my belief is that you will be your grandfather's death."

"His death—his death—I!"

"By first dying yourself. Oh, you smile; you think it would be happiness to die. What matter that the old man you profess to care for is broken-hearted! Brat, leave selfishness to boys—you are a girl! Suffer!"

"Selfish!" murmured Sophy, "selfish! that was said of me before. Selfish!—ah, I understand. No, I ought not to wish to die—what would become of him?" She fell on her knees, and, raising both her clasped hands, prayed inly, silently—an instant, not more. She rose. "If I do act, then—it is a promise—you will keep it. I shall see him—he shall know where I am—we shall meet!"

"A promise—sacred. I will keep it. Oh, girl, how much you will love some day—how your heart will ache! and when you are my age, look at that heart, then at your glass—perhaps you may be, within and without, like me."

Sophy—innocent Sophy—stared, awe-stricken, but uncomprehending. Mrs. Crane led her back passive.

"There, she will act. Put on the wreath. Trick her out. Hark ye, Mr. Rugge. This is for one night. I have made conditions with her: either you must take back her grandfather, or—she must return to him."

"And my £100?"

"In the latter case ought to be repaid you."

"Am I never to have the Royal York theatre? Ambition of my life, Ma'am! Dreamed of it thrice! Ha! but she will act, and succeed. But to take back the old vagabond—a bitter pill! He shall halve it with me! Ma'am, I'm your grateful—"

CHAPTER VI.

Threadbare is the simile which compares the world to a stage. Schiller, less complimentary than Shakspeare, lowers the illustration from a stage to a puppet-show. But ever between realities and shows there is a secret communication, an undetected interchange—sometimes a stern reality in the heart of the ostensible actor, a fantastic stage-play in the brain of the unnoticed spectator. The Bandit's Child on the proscenium is still poor little Sophy, in spite of garlands and rouge. But that honest rough-looking fellow to whom, in respect for services to Sovereign and Country, the apprentice yields way—may he not be—the crafty Comedian?

Taran-tarantara—rub-a-dub-dub—play up horn—roll drum—a quarter to eight; and the crowd already thick before Rugge's Grand Exhibition—"Remorseless Baron and Bandit's Child! Young Phenomenon—Juliet Araminta—Patronized by the Nobility in general, and expecting daily to be summoned to perform before the Queen—Vivat Regina!"—Rub-a-dub-dub. The company issue from the curtain—range in front of the proscenium. Splendid dresses. The Phenomenon!—'tis she!

"My eyes, there's a beauty!" cries the clown.

The days have already grown somewhat shorter; but it is not yet dusk. How charmingly pretty she still is, despite that horrid paint; but how wasted those poor bare snowy arms!

A most doleful lugubrious dirge mingles with the drum and horn. A man has forced his way close by the stage—a man with a confounded cracked hurdy-gurdy. Whine—whine—creaks the hurdy-gurdy, "Stop that—stop that muzeek," cries a delicate apprentice, clapping his hands to his ears.

"Pity a poor blind—" answers the man with a hurdy-gurdy.

"Oh you are blind, are you? but we are not deaf. There's a penny not to play. What black thing have you got there by a string?"

"My dog, Sir!"

"Devilish ugly one—not like a dog—more like a bear—with horns!"

"I say, master," cries the clown, "Here's a blind man come to see the Phenomenon!"

The crowd laugh; they make way for the blind man's black dog. They suspect, from the clown's address, that the blind man has something to do with the company.

You never saw two uglier specimens of their several species than the blind man and his black dog. He had rough red hair and a red beard, his face had a sort of twist that made every feature seem crooked. His eyes were not bandaged, but the lids were closed, and he lifted them up piteously as if seeking for light. He did not seem, however, like a common beggar; had rather the appearance of a reduced sailor. Yes, you would have bet ten to one he had been a sailor; not that his dress belonged to that noble calling, but his build, the roll of his walk, the tie of his cravat, a blue anchor tattooed on that great brown hand—certainly a sailor—a British tar! poor man.

The dog was hideous enough to have been exhibited as a lusus naturæ—evidently very aged—for its face and ears were gray, the rest of it a rusty reddish black. It had immensely long ears, pricked up like horns. It was a dog that must have been brought from foreign parts; it might have come from Acheron, sire by Cerberus, so portentous and (if not irreverent the epithet) so infernal was its aspect, with that gray face, those antlered ears, and its ineffably weird demeanor altogether. A big dog, too, and evidently a strong one. All prudent folks would have made way for a man led by that dog. Whine creaked the hurdy-gurdy, and bow-wow, all of a sudden, barked the dog. Sophy stifled a cry, pressed her hand to her breast, and such a ray of joy flashed over her face that it would have warmed your heart for a month to have seen it.

But do you mean to say, Mr. Author, that that British Tar (gallant, no doubt, but hideous) is Gentleman Waife, or that Stygian animal the snowy-curled Sir Isaac?

Upon my word, when I look at them myself, I, the Historian, am puzzled. If it had not been for that bow-wow, I am sure Sophy would not have suspected. "Tara-taran-tara. Walk in, ladies and gentlemen, walk in, the performance is about to commence!" Sophy lingers last.

"Yes, Sir," said the blind man who had been talking to the apprentice. "Yes, Sir," said he, loud and emphatically, as if his word had been questioned. "The child was snowed up, but luckily the window of the hut was left open: Exactly at two o'clock in the morning, that dog came to the window, set up a howl, and—"

Sophy could hear no more—led away behind the curtain by the King's Lieutenant. But she had heard enough to stir her heart with an emotion that set all the dimples round her lip into undulating play.

CHAPTER VII.

A Sham carries off the Reality.

And she did act, and how charmingly! with what glee and what gusto! Rugge was beside himself with pride and rapture. He could hardly perform his own Baronial part for admiration. The audience, a far choicer and more fastidious one than that in the Surrey village, was amazed, enthusiastic.

"I shall live to see my dream come true! I shall have the great York Theatre!" said Rugge, as he took off his wig and laid his head on his pillow. "Restore her for the £100! not for thousands!"

Alas, my sweet Sophy, alas! Has not the joy that made thee perform so well, undone thee? Ah! hadst thou but had the wit to act horribly, and be hissed!

"Uprose the sun, and uprose Baron Rugge."

Not that ordinarily he was a very early man; but his excitement broke his slumbers. He had taken up his quarters on the ground floor of a small lodging-house close to his Exhibition; in the same house lodged his senior Matron, and Sophy herself. Mrs. Gormerick being ordered to watch the child, and never lose sight of her, slept in the same room with Sophy, in the upper story of the house. The old woman served Rugge for housekeeper, made his tea, grilled his chop, and for company's sake shared his meals. Excitement as often sharpens the appetite as it takes it away. Rugge had supped on hope, and he felt a craving for a more substantial breakfast. Accordingly, when he had dressed, he thrust his head into the passage, and seeing there the maid-of-all-work unbarring the street door, bade her go up stairs and wake the Hag, that is, Mrs. Gormerick. Saying this, he extended a key; for he ever took the precaution, before retiring to rest, to lock the door of the room to which Sophy was consigned, on the outside, and guard the key till the next morning.

The maid nodded, and ascended the stairs. Less time than he expected passed away before Mrs. Gormerick made her appearance, her gray hair streaming under her nightcap, her form endued in a loose wrapper—her very face a tragedy.

"Powers above! What has happened?" exclaimed Rugge, prophetically.

"She is gone!" sobbed Mrs. Gormerick; and seeing the lifted arm and clenched fist of the manager, prudently fainted away.

MARCH ON!

I.

Heavy and thick the atmosphere,
The prospect narrow, dark, severe—
Yet a few steps the path is clear,
For those few steps, march on!

II.

Dark rocks that frown as if in wrath,
Like giants ranged across the path—
Be sure the gorge some outlet hath,
So trustfully march on!

III.

A deep wide stream that shines like glass,
Flanked by steep banks of slippery grass—
There is some bridge by which to pass,
So watchfully march on!

IV.

A tempest rattling in the wind,
The sun in thunder-robes enshrined—
Doubt not some shelter soon to find,
Still hopefully march on!

V.

The day goes out—the fog upcrowds,
Darkness the face of heaven enshrouds—
A voice shall guide thee through the clouds,
So patiently march on!

VI.

If Duty set you on the way,
You need not fear—you must not stay;
Still faithfully her word obey,
Still loyally march on!

VII.

Let but your aims be high and true,
Your spirit firm, but patient too,
A Titan's strength shall go with you,
Still fearlessly march on!

THE RECTOR'S CROSS.

I first saw the little village of Arlington three years ago. It has its modest beauties, like every other country place that has not yet begun to think of being like town, and without great mountains, large rivers, or broad prairies around it to give it prestige, still leaves in the heart that has once seen it a feeling of midsummer quiet and green solitude that keeps it from being forgotten, and makes one wish to return to it again. Tired with the dusty tumults of the world, as I entered it, half-reclining among the cushions of my carriage, I said, while I gazed dreamily upon the willows by its water-courses, and the cows that, undisturbed, drank or browsed beneath them,

"Truly this is better than Newport, better than Saratoga, for it is a watering-place for the heart!"

For it did not seem possible that Arlington should ever be invaded by the tumults of the inner or the outer life. It was a lotos-eater's bay, a grotto of stillness not yet wakened out of the blessed far niente of the Golden Age. Men were born here into a heritage of peace. There were no feuds between brethren; no pangs of love unreturned; no temptations to be resisted with the writhings of an athlete; no fierce ambitions; nothing but birth, a good, pure life, and a late death, which was not death, but a falling of ripened hearts ——"into the lap of earth, Gathered, not harshly plucked."

For three months I was to stay in Arlington, and grow young again. I had taken a cottage for the summer in one of the most pastoral dells that slept in the shadows of that pastoral place. I had taken it because it had a window in which I might sit, smelling woodbines in the whispers of the wind, reading Herbert, Sir Thomas Brown, and the musical trochées of old Robert Herrick, living with them in the shrines and fields of the simple-hearted long ago, undisturbed by a single hard suggestion of the iron younger time.

But I am a companionable man, and I sometimes felt, even in the delicious repose of my odorous nook, a longing for one congenial soul to whom I might say, "How happy I am!" The birds sang when I read my best beloved old poets, as joyously as if they understood them with me; and, say what you will, I believe the birds do understand Chaucer, and Spenser, and Herrick, and all who understood them so well. But alas! poor child of the present that I was, I had lost the key to their genial criticisms, and heard music only without words. So I sought and found a human friend.

It was the Rector of St. John's, the church of Arlington. Daily I grew in love with that man, for he was one of the most thoughtful, gentle, sympathizing natures that I ever knew. He loved the authors that I loved, and that was the first common ground on which we met. We had both passed through trials; and what bond of brotherhood is there like that? At length we two walked together in lonely places every day, which is the last and surest evidence that communion has been recognized between natures.

Some of these walks were a kind of spoken meditations; others, again, were brisk, sturdy tramps to shake off the over-indolence of the cloister; and in the latter of these I learned that I had been partly mistaken in supposing Arlington utterly devoid of those traits which give a grand as well as beautiful distinction to physical character. She had no mountains, rivers, or heaths, as I have said, but modestly she kept her greatness in secret; her forte was caves.

Every where under the rolling limestone ridges which surrounded her, Nature had gone mining and carving; here running a narrow, sinuous gallery, here lifting the dome of a resounding chamber—now leaving her memorial in a crystal-clad knight, now in an under-earth chapel of sparry fretwork. Many an hour, with torch in hand, have I spent, side by side with the Rector of St. John's, or following him cautiously past gulfs and rifts, among those wondrous monuments upon which their eternal Architect has left no date for us, the workmen of a day.

It was during one of these tours of exploration that we came suddenly into a chamber loftier, and in every respect more beautiful, than I had seen before; and thrusting our torches into a crevice of the floor, sat down upon a shelf to rest. As I searched all the room with the curious eye of a novice in such wonders, now attracted by some grotesque corbel, now wondering if in the ancient time the strange cresset of stalactite which hung from the arch above me had ever flashed with green witch-lights to cheer a goblin-dance, I happened to catch a glimpse, in the farther corner, of a perfect cross, fashioned from the spar, and reared in a deep natural niche whose shadow half obscured it. Rising, I took my torch and went to it. Just at the intersection of the arms, carefully graven, it bore these two letters:

R. N.

"Why, Eversley," I exclaimed, "what is this? Nature certainly does wondrous marvels for you people of Arlington; but I am hardly prepared to believe of her that she has taken to the primer, or learned to write in our alphabet."

I said no more, for I saw that the sprightly tone of my words chorded but ill with the feeling which just then was shadowing the Rector's face into something like the twilight of a past yet unforgotten sorrow.

"Not Nature," solemnly replied Charles Eversley, "but the conquest of Nature by a soul which was greater than she, has hallowed with that cross the chamber in which we are sitting. With my own hands I carved it from the rock, with its inscription, to keep in mind forever the memory of another—an unseen cross, borne by the heroic heart of my more than friend—my brother—who is gone, Ralph Norton.

"Nay, do not ask forgiveness; you have not been unkind—you have not heedlessly awakened memories which I would lose. I brought you to this place because it was the fittest for the recital of that great self-sacrifice which has sanctified this cave to me for evermore.

"I have not always been Rector of Arlington. Twenty years ago I was only master of the parish school and assistant to the then Rector, who was himself the friend of whom I have spoken—the R. N. commemorated by that cross.

"Having graduated from St. Mary's College at the age of nineteen, poor, and without patronage, I took orders, certainly without any expectation of ecclesiastical preferment, but rather in the hope that the future might have something for me to do of quiet usefulness, if not of greatness. I was a lover of books, of walks and talks among the poor, and my early orphanage had very much cut me off from those pursuits of society in which a man of family is likely to indulge. You will not wonder, then, that the offer of this situation at Arlington, subordinate as it was in rank, and modest in remuneration, was still accepted thankfully by one whose whole life had taught him to bound his desires.

"On reaching here I was immediately received into the family of the Rector with a cordial hospitality which it did not take long to ripen into a strong friendship. Ralph Norton was a man of forty-two, erect and handsome, though giving evidence in the paleness of his face, and the unnatural brilliancy of his deep brown eyes, that he had won the invariable guerdon of a life of deep thinking—that sad crown of scholarly men, unhealth. An organic disease of the heart had fastened mercilessly upon him; and on this very account had it been necessary for him to divide with another the labors of a parish so small as Arlington.

"The other members of the Rectory household were a housekeeper and a young girl of eighteen, Rosalie Manners. The latter was the orphan of his most intimate college friend, a clergyman of great promise, who, dying widowed when this, his only child, was a mere babe, had bequeathed her to Ralph Norton, with the entreaty that he would be to her all that, had he lived, he might have been himself. With what sleepless tenderness that trust was fulfilled Heaven has written down beside Ralph Norton's name!

"It was beautiful to see the pride with which he now regarded her as, in the full blush of her exquisite young womanhood, she repaid all his earlier labors for her with a nothing-reserving confidence, an obedience to his every wish, and a thorough accomplishment in those feminine arts which make a home lovely, and glorify the humblest accessory of life into 'something rich and strange.' She was very beautiful, and her mind and heart were as lovely as her face. So that I could not wonder, when, on the very night of my arrival, he made her the theme of most of our conversation as we sat till late around the fire-light together, and listened with a sparkling eye to those praises of her which I could not help speaking. He showed me fine landscape pieces, and said Rosalie had painted them; when a sweet, low voice went singing up the stairs he listened and whispered, 'That is my dear child;' and I could glance nowhere around the room without seeing some new grace which he told me she had contributed. 'Truly,' thought I, 'never did father love daughter more dearly.'

"On the morrow I was installed in my place. Gradually, day by day, I learned to love it more and more. The parish children were bright, and, on the whole, orderly, industrious little things, and there was nothing difficult in taking care of them. Then, too, the Sundays on which I preached in St. John's would have been very pleasant to me, bringing as they did honest, attentive, country faces, and the grand old melody of the service, had it not been for the thought that my place in the pulpit was due to some paroxysm of pain or weakness which kept my friend Ralph Norton at home.

"And whenever, after school or service, I returned to the rectory, what a home was that I came to! How little had I ever expected such a one in my modest peerings forward into life from the college cloisters! There was the Rector looking up always with the same smile of welcome as I opened the door, Rosalie chirping the same bird-like, half-coy greeting as she flew about in tea-making responsibility among the cups and saucers, and the motherly old housekeeper giving comfortable prestige to them all from her sinecure position of oversight in the largest arm-chair by the fire. If there ever was a feeling of short dislike to going away from that dear household in the morning, it was straightway chased by the thought how pleasant the coming back would be at night.

"For the first few months I kept saying to myself, 'How good it would be if all this would last forever; if these nine o'clock partings could be our hardest, these absences the longest, and our evenings could ever be spent in the same way!' By-and-by, however, there crept into my heart the feeling that something was wanting, and I was glad, on the whole, that the once desired unchangeableness could never be realized. I would have had never a hair grow gray upon the forehead of the noble Rector; I would, as earnestly as before, that I might never hear his voice sound differently as he talked with me or read to us all enthusiastically, with a rich, clear tone, out of some beloved book; nor should old Meta have another wrinkle nor need stronger glasses for her liturgy; nor should house or trees or garden change in aught—but for the sake of one, I looked forward with a vague longing to some future time—some time when I might be a nearer friend, a still more warmly welcomed comer—yes, when I might say, as well as the Rector, and still more dearly—my Rosalie!

"Never for woman's sake had I felt this longing before. At first it was so new a thing that I could not define it, and because it gave me a sort of half-pain, I worked harder, and read more deeply, and talked more intently with them all, thinking that I might throw it off. Ignorant one! It grew, and grew, and grew.

"As soon as I began to feel that I was really in love with the beautiful girl, I seemed to perceive a change in her. She was much more shy of me—she blushed whenever I came in suddenly, and really appeared to be avoiding me at those times when I most sought her. Yet in all that I did she took a deeper though more silent interest than before, and if I preached or talked to my children while she was by, I invariably caught her eye fixed upon me when I turned toward her, and saw her look away in confusion. Was this a response of love to love? I was too much of a novice to tell.

"At last a heavy sickness came upon me, and for a week I lay at the rectory just trembling between life and death. It was in those hours of watching and weariness that that noble heart of Ralph Norton showed itself. Truly, all great souls are blended of twain—the manly and the womanly—and when the shadow of death seemed shutting out from my eyes all dazzling cross-lights, I beheld truly the greatness of that man in the strength of his upholding, and the mother-like tenderness of his consolation. Then also did I make another, if possible, a more delicious discovery. On the last night of that delirious week of my danger I awoke about midnight into the first perfect restoration of consciousness. I made no sign which could tell that I had returned, and there, in the moonlight that came through my curtains, I saw Rosalie kneeling by the side of my bed. She thought that I still slept, and with an intensity that made her voice broken she was praying that if it were possible I might be saved. Then all doubt fled forever.

"Just then, too, Ralph Norton looked noiselessly in at the door. He cast one glance at the praying girl, and over his face there passed, like a cloud, an expression of such intense anguish as never before had I seen on the features of a fellow-man. And then he glided away as silently as he had come. What could it mean? Ah—I learned in after days! But at that moment, in the dimness of my newly recovered sense, I feared that it was some sudden paroxysm of his disease, and faintly cried, 'Rosalie!' Hearing me speak again, she started up as in a dream, and seizing my hand pressed it to her lips for a moment, then ran to bring the Rector. He came, and with a face on which the late emotion had left no trace, embraced me, saying, with a solemn cheerfulness, 'The Lord be praised for thee, my brother.'

"And now I mended rapidly. Cheered by a great hope from whose sky all questionings had gone, surrounded by endearments, and nursed by all that loving household more like a child than a man, no wonder that before the spring which saw the beginning of my sickness had melted into summer I was again attending to the duties of my place. They all seemed glad. Rosalie gladder than them all.

"It was as bright a day in June as this which you and I, my friend, have left behind us in the open air, that the Rector, Rosalie, and I set out for a visit to this very cave. We were to explore all its windings, and then, returning to a sunny knoll overlooking Arlington, to meet there a servant sent from the house at noon with the dinner-basket, and enjoy one of those quiet picnics which, in fair weather, had come to supplant all our other holiday recreations.

"I do not remember a more blithely-seeming three than we were that morning. For a long time the Rector had been quite well, I was now entirely restored, and the exuberance of Rosalie's spirits was enchantingly girlish. At the mouth of the cave we lit our torches as usual, and then, taking very much the same route as ours to day, began winding through the labyrinths until we came to this room. Then on this very shelf we all sat down to rest, planting our torches in a rift of the floor.

"Look up now to the ceiling of that strait passage by which we entered. Do you see, just over what might be called the door-sill of this chamber, how deep a chasm opens upward toward the surface?"

I looked, and perceived a high-reaching rift, just the breadth of the entrance, and perhaps ten feet wide in the direction taken by the outer gallery, into which might have been drawn up a portcullis massive enough to make our chamber as impregnable as Gibraltar. "Yes, I see it," I replied.

"Very well. When Ralph Norton, Rosalie, and I entered this room, that chasm was not there. The door was as low as the gallery—we stooped half my height at least when we came in—for the present void was occupied by an enormous rock, bounded on all sides by crevices indeed, but to every human appearance as certain to resist every shock till the last day, as any part of the surrounding ceiling.

"As we sat here together on the shelf our thoughts reverted to those caves which God and Time have hallowed. We spoke of Machpelah, where the grand old father of a race buried the beloved dead out of his sight; the solemn desert catacombs, where Edom laid her grim-harnessed warriors after the fields whose glory was unwritten; the cavern of the rich man, where, when all things were fulfilled, angels watched the wondrous sleep of One who in the time to come shall wake us all to meet Him.

"Then said Rosalie, 'I could not sleep quietly in a cave. When I am dead I would fain lie nearer other hearts and the sunshine.' And she clasped my arm convulsively, as if in fear of the thought.

"Over the face of Ralph Norton there passed such another cloud of quick unutterable pain as I had seen at my bedroom door. But it cleared away in a moment, and he answered,

"'I would willingly lie down to rest here forever.'

"But hark! What was that low rumbling—that grinding as of heavy rock-masses? We all looked at once toward the entrance, and saw the stone above it moving down. For one moment we believed it an illusion; another, and with a muffled roar, it fell and shut us in!

"Yes, we were entombed! A while we sat gazing into one another's fitfully-illumined faces with a dreamy horror—a stupefied doubtfulness. The Rector was the first to realize the truth. He sprang to his feet—he rushed to the fallen rock, and putting his mouth to the narrow gaps that still were left on either side, shouted, 'Help! help!' with all his might, while Rosalie's voice and my own joined with him. In vain! utterly in vain! We might as well have hoped to be heard from the bottom of the sea. This spot, where you and I are sitting, is a winding way of half a mile from the daylight.

"But despair came soon enough, and with it calmness. No, I will not call it despair—at least not with the Rector. His face grew slowly lighter with a serene smile as he sat down between Rosalie and me and took both our hands.

"'God takes us home by an untrodden road,' said he; 'yet it leads to Him as surely. And now, my children—suffer one who loves you to call you so—we can not tell how long we may have to wait here before the darkness breaks. Our master was in the cave three days—for us the time may be longer. But one thing we must do before all things are accomplished. We are going to a world where there is no marrying or giving in marriage; therefore it becomes souls who would meet hereafter in that indissoluble bond to be wedded here. Rosalie—Eversley—you love one another.'

"It was then, with one speechless embrace, in that sepulchral bridal chamber, that my beloved and I told one another all the unimparted yearnings of the past.

"'It is well,' spoke the Rector. 'Let us all stand up.'

"In a clear and solemn voice he began the marriage-service. Even now I hear it sometimes sounding in my dreams, and it makes sleep so holy, so awful, that I instantly awake.

"We came to that portion of the rite in which I was to repeat after him, 'With this ring I thee wed.' But ring I had not—the poor scholar, the only less poor priest, had never numbered a jewel among all his possessions.

"For a moment the Rector stopped, and, feeling in his breast, brought forth a small packet which he opened. There, half hidden in a light curl cut from Rosalie's forehead in her childhood, lay what we needed—a plain gold circlet, without a stone or any inscription but the letters of her name—and he handed it to me. I placed it on her finger, and the Rector went on. But this was done by feeling, not by sight; for just as the words 'Till death us do part' had fallen from our lips, the last torch that burned lingeringly in its crevice of the floor went out, and we were parted by that darkness which seemed a symbol of his more awful brother. In the darkness was the service finished, and kissing with an unutterable kiss each other's unseen lips, we sat down.

"For a short time no one spoke. We heard only our own breathing, sounding low and smothered as if by the palpable blackness. Suddenly, between Rosalie and me there came a bitter groan, and I knew as certainly as if we were in the sunlight that the old cloud was passing over the face of Ralph Norton. But never to shadow it again. The hand that clasped the fingers of my wife and me grew quickly cold—closed tighter still—and then relaxed to close on them no more, till we shall all greet one another in the light ineffable. He had broken the darkness first—Ralph Norton was dead! In the sudden shock of that midnight affliction Rosalie fell senseless on his breast, crying, 'My father! oh my father!'

"But for that mighty upholding which is given us in the measure of our need, I should have gone mad. Helpless—not for myself, whom I utterly forgot, but for her just made mine in the bosom of our grave—not knowing but she were already with him whom we had lost—oh, in this double grief, nothing but God close by me could have kept reason from extinction!

"But presently she spoke again, and knowing that I was not utterly forsaken something strangely akin to joy came back to me, and I clasped her to my bosom, saying, like a little child, 'Rosalie, Rosalie, never leave me!'

"How long we kept our rayless guard over the dead I could not measure. Now falling on the rock beside him in the slumber of exhaustion, now weeping bitterly as if we would move the stones of our prison, now supporting each other with the sublime consolations of a world to come, and now clasping each other in terror as we imagined the rest of the ceiling coming down and the air growing more stifling, we passed—they tell us it was thirty hours.

"At last we saw a gleam dart through the crevices at the door-way. We heard voices call sturdily, 'Mr. Norton! Mr. Eversley! are you there?' Not daring to believe it was not some mocking dream, we still answered loudly, and heard the voices utter a deep 'Thank God!' Yes, they had found us!

"Cheering heartily as they labored on with a will, our preservers hammered and delved and cut toward us with pickaxe and bar. Yet most cautiously had they to mine, or another fall of rock might have buried us all. At last they opened a breach just large enough to shove through the food and drink for which we were famishing. Then they came so near that they could thrust in their hard brown hands, bleeding with that extraordinary toil of humanity, and Rosalie and I wrung them and kissed them as if they had been those of angels. But missing one hand whose grasp they had been nerving themselves to reach, they asked, bodingly, 'Where is Mr. Norton?' I could only answer, 'He has gone to the light before us.' After that they wrought on as steadily, but I heard no more cheering.

"Under God's open sky again! Out beneath the priceless heaven, breathing that measureless free air, bathed in that quenchless sunlight which we had only learned to be so wonderful a blessing from the All-Father, by having known what it was [illegible] despair of ever coming to it more. And with [illegible]ve brought that cold dwelling of Ralph Norton, [illegible] which, as out of a narrower cave, his pure [illegible] had flown into a wider, grander sky. Then [illegible] it laid in the church-yard with weeping and [illegible]amentation of a people who mourned a noble [illegible] and a beloved.

"[illegible] was made Rector of St. John's, and Rosalie and I went to that sad house whose shadow should never be lighted by the blessed face of Ralph Norton. And there have we lived together till this day.

"It was long before I could command myself enough to make the necessary examination of the estate of my dead friend. When I did so I found that he had left every thing to Rosalie, of whom he spoke in his will as 'my best beloved one.' For form's sake it was necessary that I should inspect a small note-book which had always been kept in his private desk. On one of the pages I found this memorandum:

"'May 12th. Bought to-day a ring which shall be my Rosalie's wedding ring if we are married. That is, if I ever think it just to ask her if she could love me in that way. I am forty-two—she is eighteen—perhaps—"

"That was the ring he took from among the windings of the curl, and gave me in the cave to place upon the finger of my wife! That told the story of his clouded face."

"Oh could the dead have heard—could the motionless hearts have beat—the pale lips have spoken once more, to say 'I forgive you for your greatest sin!' I stretched myself upon the floor in Ralph Norton's silent study and wept as with a broken heart.

"Now, my friend, you know why, day after day, I lay before yonder niche, and, sometimes veiled, blinded with tears, carved out that effigy.

I grasped the hand of my companion without speaking, and then with my own eyes greeting yet and then, looked down and reverently kissed the letters R. N. For I knew that at that crave I was seeds-sowing by the memory of a saintly woman, and was filled with such a solemn blessing as streams from the tombs of the martyrs.

SLEIGH-RIDING LONG AGO.

HOMAIN the the winter moonlight!
White light on the drifted snow;
Hurrah for the clear up country,
Hurrah for the long ago!
How I shiver and shudder and chatter!
Oh! fearfully old, and cold!
But hurrah for the old man's treasures,
The old man's memories of gold!

I remember a winter moonlight
Of exceeding beauty, like this
When all of the stars together
Sang an audible song of bliss;
When the blue was so deep that my young eyes
Never dreamed of that land of rest
Which the old, over whom it hangs lower,
Forever imagine is night!

There are stories of Paradise maidens
That heedless years and Islams
Hear, drowsily murmured by breezes
That rustle the whispering palms.
There are tales of white virgins, whose fingers
Hold goblets of life-giving wine,
Whom the dead, that die bravely in battle,
Shall clasp in endless embrace.

I remember a hazel-eyed woman
Thus whom never dream was more fair,
Like a star in a storm gleamed her brow
Through the dark flowing flood of her hair.
How swift flow the horses before us,
How swift flew the passion-winged hours
Of York over dreamed of such heaven
As lie in the arms of the Graces.

Fast, fast went the horses before us!
Fast, fast in the night keen and cold!
If to-night when still bells ring so clearly
It can't be that I am so old.
Soft, soft, but how warm was the cheek of
My one of her velvety cheek;
Oh, stars! ye have not yet forgotten
That joy, too delicious to speak!

Fast, fast went the horses before us;
Close, close pressed the cheek, soft and warm,
And then—oh, ye stars! through what winters,
What winters of woe and of storm,
What summers and snows ye have kept it,
Her secret and mine, of our bliss,
Which that night turned joyously, gaily,
And blessed my thrilled lips with a kiss!

Hey, Philip, my grandson, stand up here!
Dost ever go sleigh-riding now?
Are there maidens whose lips stir like yours
Whose cheeks are like sunsets o'er snow?
Have the hearts of young beauties grown colder?
Are chaste now forbidden to be?
Are there lips whose soft voices will whisper
Love's latest and sweetest curse?

My lips have grown thin—I am old—
And the current of life runneth slow,
They glide swift as the sleigh-riders drive,
Who trust the road that is true.
But slowly, lonesome, and cold,
No bells ringing out on the night,
No cheek against mine, no delicate ear
Will my hope shall be changed into sight!

The snow-drifts lie deep in the church-yard
Heaped up over head-stone and cross,
Where sleeps under snow-drift and ground-mound,
And head-stone long covered with moss,
Lies the maiden, whose eyes of soft hazel
Were closed on the depths of the skies:
And the kiss of her lips that once blessed me,
I shall know—when the blessed arise!

My lap when you drive down the valley,
Both up at the church and the town,
Go slowly and sacredly by it,
And, Philip, don't touch her lips there!
Don't kiss the dear child, but sit quiet,
And press your cheek closely to hers;
Let the horses go gently, and hear you
The psalm of the solemn old fire.

Then up the long hill with a rattle,
Then down the sharp hill with a shout,
Then clasp the glad girl to your bosom,
And kiss her red lips till they pout.
Then tell her the old happy story,
And her sweet face will be covered low.
Then hurrah for the white winter moonlight!
Hurrah for the brave Long Ago!

Miscellany.

CIRCUMSTANCES ALTER CASES

BECHMOS, a personal and political friend of Lafayette, dedicated to Louis Philippe, then Duke of Orleans, a work written by him on our American Constitution. Reflecting after-ward that the plan of the work might seem too revolutionary in its character, he requested his favor of the Duke, and proposed to alter it if necessary. "Change nothing," said the Duke. "I acknowledge the whole. I am now of a republican than you are yourself. You forget that I have lived and labored in America. I alter its Constitution! No, no. It is for me, with me it is practice."

The revolution placed this ardent republican on the throne. He resided in two short years the Liberals were dismissed and proscribed; and even Lafayette himself, one of whom he had most trust in the King, that he felt himself constrained to withdraw from public life, and live in retirement at La Grange. What feeling Louis Philippe entertained at last for him may be deduced from the following circumstance:

There is a pulsating in the new gallery of Versailles, by Vinchon, representing the siege of New York, in which General Rochambeau, as a commander of the French, and General Lafayette of the American troops, appear in prominent figures. While Vinchon was engaged on this painting, on side-to-assay of Louis Philippe called upon him, and stated that, for particular reasons, the King strongly objected to the introduction of the figure of Lafayette in the picture. Vinchon replied that he entirely disapproved of the political course of Lafayette, but that in a historical composition no manner than imitates the subject by leaving out the principal actor, he would resign the work.

Finding Vinchon immovable, he was permitted to finish the painting according to the original design. Many years after the death of Lafayette Louis Philippe had declared that he only accepted the crown at the pressing solicitation of Lafayette in the name of the French nation.

CORNISH BRAVERY.

MANY are the records of unassuming bravery exhibited on the annals of the Cornish miners. When the Anna frigate went to pieces, years ago, on the terrible beach at Trevose Head, Padstow Bay —where, as the people of the neighborhood affirm, the bodies of the drowned, if recovered at all, reappear either on the Padstow or Newquay side by the grinding of the rollers on the shingle—the only assistance that could be given was by means of a small pinnace in the surf, and snatching at the bodies as the breakers carried them struggling toward the shore. At one period of the wreck, when a man was in succored, volunteered for the service. He rode twice on the sea and brought another man, but on the third venture both horse and rider were swept away. A more remarkable story of a few years back is, that not while in the water, but, strictly in our opinion, by falling into the hands of Mr. Carlyle's, he has dressed in the full costume of heroism; but the fact is true, and the scene was a mine in the neighborhood of Liskeard. Two men, an old and a younger, were at the bottom of a deep in a level. Not till the fuse was lit for effecting their escape, did they discover, called out to his younger companion mounting without him, because he said, he had himself contracted a fit of vation, while his comrade might risk soul as well as body. He crouched down in a corner, and the explosion passed safely over his head. Such a story is far best left to make its impression without exclamation. But we will not refrain remarking, if he will, the terrible narrative in Sir Walter Scott's Journal in the Delaware, of the three emigrants suspended by a rope, of which the strands were visibly parting overhead; the topmost man, determined that it must not be his fault if they all three, deliberately cut it asunder below himself, and landed his father and brother into the abyss.

—Quarterly Review.

DUCKS OF PEOPLE.

THE Simmons spend three-fourths of their existence in the water. Their first act on awakening is to bathe; they bathe again at eleven o'clock; they bathe again in the afternoon, and just before sunset; there is scarcely an hour in the day when bathers may not be seen in all the creeks, even the shallowest and muddiest. They go in like the surviver, just as poor English children go to play in the street. "I once saw a Simmons woman," says a traveler, "sitting on the lowest step of a landing-place, while, by a gentle, she held in the water her infant of a few months old, splashing it and kicking about with evident enjoyment. Were not these people expert swimmers, many lives would be lost; for the tide flows so swiftly that it needs the greatest skill and care to prevent boats from running foul of one another; and of course many are frequently upset. On one occasion our boat (an English built jig) was thrown a small distance from us raising a woman and two little children. In an instant they were all plunged and disappeared. We were greatly alarmed, and C—— was on the point of jumping in to their rescue, when they behaved up, and the little girl, about three years old, seized, poured forth a round volley of abuse. This relieved us her mind, the coolly paddled to shore —which had been floating bottom upward—lulled out some of the water and bundled in her two children, who had been meanwhile energetically swimming round her, regarding with mingled fear and curiosity the barbarians who had occasioned the mishap."

A COURAGEOUS OLD WOMAN.

HER cow had strayed, and was nowhere to be found in her usual pastures. This gave the good dame considerable anxiety, as the cow had been used to search for her in the higher valleys. Leaving her cottage early one morning, she rambled on for several hours, and at length found herself far up on the Tagoan without ensuing upon any traces of the fugitive. This was very disheartening—it still she would not give up her search. The valley she had entered upon was thickly wooded with pines in many parts; in others there were fine open glades, with clumps of bushes and shrubs, and among these she wended her way from one little plot of grass to another. At last she spied the well-known dark brown hide through some bushes. The old woman feared of the many snares she had been searching for the truant; and stealing softly on, determined to give her sufficient chastisement, with a thorough good hit her delicious staff, the blow fell fast. Up sprang the animal and turned slang round, when, to the dame's horror, she saw a large brown bear. The two stood staring at each other, apparently with equal astonishment and apprehension. The bear, however, soon recalled, partly turned tail and bolted.—Atkinson's Oriental and Western Siberia.

UTILITY IS A FORTUNE.

CIVILITY is a fortune itself, for a courteous man generally meets with little ill-will, and believes when objects of stability sometimes fail. The famous Duke of Marlborough is a case in point. It was a rule of his at the commencement that his private affairs matters often converted an enemy into a friend. Many years after the battle he was prevailed to be denied a favor by his Grace than to receive one from most men. The gracious manner of Charles James Fox ingratiated him from personal dislike, even at a time when he was politically the most unpopular man in the kingdom. The history of every country is full of such examples of success obtained by civility. The experience of every man confirms it, but recall the past. Perpetual instances where conciliatory manners have made friends of implacable enemies. Civility, in fact, politicians, merchants, and indeed individuals of all pursuits. In being introduced to a stranger, his office, his shop, or even seats instantaneously give a prepossession in his behalf, or awakens unconsciously in a negative feeling. To turn civility is in fact what beauty is to women; it is a general passport to favor—a letter of recommendation, without the possession of more stronger introductions. The best of men have often injured themselves by irritable and hasty expressions, as the greatest feats of scoundrels have frequently succeeded by their plausible manners. Of two men equal in all other respects, the most courteous has twice the chance for fortune by means of it.

SCOTCH AND MANCHESTER PRUDENCE.

SOMEBODY says twenty years ago, when the manufacturing trade was in its infancy, several poor Scotchmen settled in Manchester, who after a few years' experience, and with small capital, started as manufacturers on their own account. Success attended their efforts, and when one of them was asked how one of those men in his early struggles, His landlady thought he paid too little for his room, and he recommended him to raise his rent from 5s. 6d. to 8s. 3d. a week. This the Scotchman stoutly refused, and was given up. He left his late lodgings and began rather than give a fraction more than eighteenpence. A saying like this is worth a fortune. The dispute with this axiom, which ought to be remembered by our young men: "It isn't what you get, but what you save, that makes you rich." Ye ken, Betty, it's the breaking into a fresh piece o' bacon, that's your ruination, and the preservation of Manchester prudence in connection with our Great Exhibition. "Why did you not tell me before?" said the lord, "yourself and family?" we asked a gentleman of considerable property; "the gains among strangers, you know, does not admit you on the gay promenade days." "Listen to me, young man," he said; "don't talk without thinking. You will find that I care for four two-guinea tickets; but"—dropping his voice as though he feared the very walls were a secret a new thought—"don't you see, it would have involved a twenty-guinea dress apiece for my wife and two daughters!"

THE LARK AND THE ROOK.

"GOOD-SPEED, Sir Rook!" said a little Lark,
The bright light fades, it will soon be dark;
I've bathed my wings in the misty last ray,
And sung my song to the close of day;
So now I haste to my quiet nook
To smooth my feathers and roost, Sir Rook."

"Good-night, poor Lark!" said his tilled friend,
With a haughty toss and a distant bend;
"I've not begun my prelude,
But not to sleep on the cold damp ground.
I'll perch on the tall tree by the mill,
In the topmost bough of yon tall pine-tree.
To spend my song in the midnight air,
And saw you taking your upward way,
Screaming your notes so wearily dreary,
An ugly spark in the sun's bright beauty,
Nothing has light in it, nothing gay."
And said to myself, What a foolish bird!

"I trod the earth with a princely step;
I felt my way with a lordly force;
I cared all day and a lordly song,
And I made every creature do my will.
The sun shone full on my shoulders bright,
I basked and wondered—good-night, poor thing!"

"Good-night! once more," said the Lark's sweet voice,
"I see no cause to repent my choice;
I have built myself a home in the pine,
But in your shoulder nests oft thou mine!
You make your home in the world's dust,
But whose is the sweeter ministry?"

—Parents Gatherings.

OUR LANGUAGE.

DICTIONARY language is something very different not only from common colloquial English, but even from that of ordinary written composition. Instead of about 40,000 words, there is probably no single author in the language from whose works, however voluminous, so many as 40,000 words could be collected. Of the 40,000 words there are certainly many more than one half that are only employed, if ever, by the very profound, and on the rarest occasions. We should say of not a few printed to find, if we counted them, with how small a number of words we manage to express all that we have to say, either with our lips or even with the pen. Our common literary English probably hardly extends to 10,000 words; our common spoken English hardly to 5000. And the proportion of native or home-grown words is undoubtedly very much higher in both the 5000 and the 10,000 than it is in the 40,000. Perhaps of the 30,000 words or thereabouts, standing in the dictionaries, that are very rarely or never used even in writing, between 20,000 and 25,000 are of French or Latin extraction. If we assume 25,000 to be so, that will leave 15,000 native words for common use; and in our literary English, taken at 10,000 words, those that are non-Roman will thus amount to about a half. In our 5000 words of spoken English only a few more than half will therefore be genuine English words. In our entire extent. It will consist of about 40,000 Gothic, and 1000 Roman words.

A BEGGAR GIRL TRANSFORMED INTO A COURT DAMSEL.

ONE day a dirty and ragged girl applied for some bread, supposed to be Mr. Watt's door, and told a tale of suffering and woe, such as greatly interested him, placed at it was something very striking and prepossessing in the appearance and manner of the girl-herself. Mrs. West had but recently died, and domestic affairs had not yet occasionally employed about the house. Finding an inquiry that Mr. West was not at home, he interested himself on her behalf, and procured for her employment to look after the children of some family belonging to the Court. As she was passing a shop-door, two ladies eyed her, and thought that a frock with her would suit. Her story then suddenly accosted her as follows: "Would you like, my girl, to go abroad with us?" "Oh," was the immediate answer, "I should, but it's you go with us we shall make a fine lady of you." "Oh," said the lady, "we will not do that, but we will let you go at once." Without further delay, arrangements were accordingly made between them. The girl was dressed by Mr. West, and the ladies and she proceed. Much astonished, and suspecting something extraordinary, she had not requested her not to act so foolishly; but her mind was made up, and go she would, although at that time she did not even know who the ladies were, or where she was going. Nothing more was known until about the time girl had elapsed, when a handsomely apparently accomplished young lady called upon him, who, he found to his astonishment, was the same poor girl he had relieved at the door. And, and who now told him the following "romance of real life." She found that the ladies were those of Sweden, and that the two ladies who had accosted her belonged to the Swedish Court. On arriving there, she was expected to appear at the next festivities of the King, a lady who was subject to mental and nervous depression, and who on that account at strike these in attendance upon her. On one occasion her illness of this girl went beyond her usual height, and she was carried to her bedroom by seizing the lady by the hair of her head, and dragging her across the apartment by the same means was fairly spent. Dreading the consequences, she at once found means to make known to the King what had occurred, and with what she had done. Upon hearing her explanation he commanded her, and told her to attend before him. She was expected in a short time to return to the Swedish Court. Most probably she is there now, and if so, may the Christian advices she received from the man of God preserve her amidst the blandishments and pomp of royalty, and the many temptations which must be presented to one so suddenly and strangely raised from the depths of poverty to that of a palace life!—Life and Journal of the Rev. D. West.

CAPE TOWN AND THE UNITED STATES EQUADRON.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

CAPE TOWN, September 21, 1857.

WE arrived in sight of the highlands of the Cape of Good Hope Saturday morning, September 7, at day-light; but as a stiff breeze was blowing on shore, the ship was running, and at mid-day under easy sail until Monday morning, when weather and sea both having moderated, we ran in and dropped our anchor off Cape Town.

For a distance of some ten leagues, the high, uneven ridge which forms the boundary is very steep. The principal guides in this range to the entrance to Cape Town are Table Mountain and Lion's Rump. When first seen from the sea the appearance of these points to the objects from which they derive their names is very remarkable and, however, it increases. The scenery upon the whole coast, as far as the eye can reach, is of a most strangely picturesque and romantic character: precipitous sides of the rock, forming strange and fantastic figures, which are frequently enveloped them, inspiring the oddest resemblances—suggesting clumps—are in the most ridiculous figures, of huge fortifications upon Gibraltar-like rocks.

Cape Town is seated in a little indentation in this rocky coast. In the rear it is built in part on a harbor; neither it is upon a roadstead, but it slightly protected from the northwest winds which in the winter blow with great violence, rendering the anchorage extremely unsafe, as the mist wrecks upon the beach are frequent. A narrow spit of land, upon the end of which is a light. When in the anchorage the bold rocky cone is left and fertile hills can be seen, and beautifully green slopes dotted with little glistening white (one of barely two-story high) chimneyless houses; the land in all directions bearing evidences of a high state of cultivation.

The town from the water appears like a long narrow exquisite line of houses upon the beach behind which rises abruptly the perpendicular dark-brown front of Table Mountain with its flat top, flanked at the right by a much lower range covered with verdure, and bearing a strong resemblance to a couchant lion, from which it derives its name.

The first act which we committed upon setting foot upon the jetty which formed our landing-place, was the involuntary one of protecting with our hands our eyes from the clouds of dust which were flying about us thick as from the very opacity of their particles, to say nothing of the conjunctival irritation they produce, as to render the gratification of the privilege of seeing a rather dangerous one. Fortunately this is the first month of spring, when, they say, the winds and dust are light. In the winter vails are absolutely necessary to protect the eyes.

There is very little either in the style of building or appearance of the streets to characterize Cape Town. The principal thoroughfares resemble those of any other English town, with the exception of the entire absence of sidewalks, and the seldom more than two-story high houses. The streets are well lighted and kept clean, so that the want of sidewalks is not felt. This view of Saint George's Street will give a very good idea of their appearance. In the suburbs many of the houses built by the early Dutch settlers are still standing; while the present prevailing style of architecture is a one-story, stuccoed, neatly-whitewashed house, with a pointed and thatched roof, inclosed by a high brick wall, also perfectly white, and presenting a very pretty contrast to the green groves of oak or fir by which most of them are surrounded.

One very delightful spot in the heart of the town is the Governor's Walk and Botanical Gardens adjoining. The first is a smooth gravelled walk of two-thirds of a mile in length, bordered on either side by oaks which form an arch overhead. Facing, but a short distance from this walk, is the winter-residence of the Governor, in the midst of a delightful park in which running about are ostriches, springbocks, an animal resembling our fawns, with many others peculiar to this vicinity.

VIEW OF TABLE BAY, CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

A BUSHWOMAN.

On the other side of the walk are the Botanical Gardens, open only to subscribers; strangers are always admitted, registering their names upon entering. There does not appear to be in them anything very rare or strange, yet the grounds are prettily laid out, some neat fountains and shady seats sufficiently inviting to prompt us to spend a long time during a hot day in them.

The Governor's Walk is the promenade of Cape Town. In pleasant weather it is filled with nurses and children, representatives of most of the native tribes of Southern Africa, who lounge about on the benches, and at night it has been the trysting-place of many a lover.

The natives, which one continually meets with in Cape Town, are an exceedingly interesting portion of its inhabitants. The story of their origin, their former independence and power, is that of the North American Indians; their wrongs and oppression seem a part of the same tale.

Of the origin of those tribes nothing is certain. Various authors have hazarded their conjectures; but every thing seems involved in the deepest obscurity. Of the twenty-three thousand inhabitants at present residing in Cape Town but a very small proportion can represent the early tribes that once owned the whole country. Almost the first authentic information available which relates to them is that given by the early Dutch travelers, who speak in a loose manner of the Hottentot tribes only, and it is thought that from them the Bushmen originated, while the Caffres were of Arabian descent.

But few of the Hottentots are to be seen about Cape Town. They are not many, and mostly reside far in the interior, and are met with at Algoa

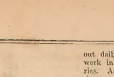
A HOTTENTOT.

Bay, at Natal, where they are split up into tribes of Zulus, Fingoes, etc., and at other places in the interior. From the accompanying plates an idea of their primitive huts, mode of life, and dress, and means of subsistence may be seen. Their huts are composed of mud, consisting of one apartment, which is used for every purpose for which a house is supposed to be built. They exert themselves as little as possible, and subsist principally upon the fish which they spear in the streams. Those retiring at Algoa Bay are represented as living in rather better style than the others; they are brought more within the range of civilization, put on rather more apparel, and live in huts in which some little taste has been employed in the construction. The Fingoes resemble the others in most respects. They are said to have a particular weakness for ornamentation, covering their fingers, neck, and all parts of their bodies where they will hang, with brass rings and pendants. Mr. Duff, an artist traveling through their country, mentions having seen a juvenile Fingo who had ornamented his head with the tail of a white buck, which as it hung over his forehead formed a striking and pleasing contrast.

The Caffres are entirely different from these. They are much more athletic, darker colored, more powerful, warlike, and in all respects a finer looking race than the Hottentot tribes. It is impossible for them to overcome their proclivity for fighting. The many repulses they have met with from the English seem not to have humbled them in the least. They are still causing the English troops a great deal of trouble. A force must be a strong one which dare intrude itself into Caffreland. Here is a sketch of Sandilla, a powerful chief who rendered himself particularly obnoxious to the colonists, but who was finally captured. Their dress consists entirely of skins of the wild animals they have slain. There are at present fifteen of these warriors, which were made prisoners in an engagement a short time since, confined in one of the fortifications in this place. They are taken out daily and made to work in the stone quarries. As we approached them, several left their work and pressed about us for tobacco, which is now about all they hanker after. Strict confinement, limited diet, and punishments have reduced to submission the most powerful of their tribe.

ZULU FISHERMEN AT WORK.

ST. GEORGE'S STREET, CAPE TOWN.



A HOTTENTOT WOMAN.

When taken in war by the English they are forwarded to some of the garrisons, where, under strict surveillance, they are made to work and obey. But once reduces their proud and commanding spirit, and then they are let out to the farmers as servants or slaves. The Caffre tribes are not so strong as formerly; still a force of twelve thousand men is kept on their frontiers, which are the scene of continual skirmishes. A prophet has just arisen among them who commanded that all their cows should be killed.—When this was done the dead weeds rise from their graves and assist them in exterminating the English. As a natural consequence, hundreds are dying daily of starvation; many are coming into the settlements to procure work; starvation is doing in a month what the Minie rifles could not do in years.

The Bushmen vary from either of the others, both in size and in appearance. Their habits are also entirely different. They are between four and five feet high, well proportioned, with a copper hue to their dark skin, and features resembling those of the Chinese or Mongolian race. Some writers think them outcasts from the Hottentot tribes, being driven by their misdeeds into the passes of the mountains, where, from being obliged to subsist upon what their arms could procure, they have degenerated to their present condition. Their habits are exceedingly nomadic, wandering from one settlement to another, plundering and driving off cattle from those tribes weaker than themselves. They are almost naked, and the small raiment they do possess is of the filthiest kind of common skin or hide—possessing none of the tasteful adornment of person with skins of wild animals which the Caffres take so much pride in. Their instruments of war and the chase are of course proportionately small.

A ZULU GIRL, NATAL.

The only tribes met with about Cape Town are the Mozambiques and the Malays, which are all that remain of the old system of Dutch slavery.

There are very few objects of public interest in Cape Town; the Garrisons, the Botanical Gardens, the Reservoir which supplies the town with water, and which is filled by the streams flowing with the purest crystal from Table Mountain; the Public Library and the Museum comprise about all the sights which a person cares to look at—unless it is the view from the top of the mountain, or one of the two delightful rides leading into the country.

ZULU HUT, NATAL.

The Public Library contains forty-two thousand volumes, and is quite a select and valuable one. A printed room is attached, which, by the kindness of the librarian, was thrown open at all hours for our curious.

The fund for the establishment of this library was raised by a tax upon the wine manufactured in the district, which is now abolished—the whole support being derived from private subscription.

Naturalists have been at a good deal of pains to collect specimens of natural history of this part of the world and arrange them in the South African Museum, under the charge of Mr. B. L. Layard, a brother of the celebrated traveler. It contains at two large rooms full of interesting objects, among which are models of the Caffre and Bushman huts, their primitive state, and which are the only true representatives of the dress, size, etc., of the originals to be found in this vicinity. There is also a portion of the rude stone cross which was erected by Bartholomew Diaz, a Portuguese, in 1486, and another who has spoken of the southern portion of the African continent under name of Cabo Tormentoso, or Cape of Storms.

Besides this Public Museum are several private sales, called "curiosity shops," kept by Germans, where whole stock in trade consists of skins of lions, tigers, birds, etc., etc., indigenous to the country, together with riding-whips and canes made of the skin or horn of the rhinoceros; the dress, warlike and cooking utensils of the Caffre and Bushman. It is from these shops that many of the fine skins of famous South African hunters are procured, as tradition of skill or success.

Two separate evenings had we prepared our hands, and our guide, and ourselves, with a preparatory to an ascent of Table Mountain the following morning, but, upon rising, the fog, mist, or cloud of which frequently covers it, and which entirely precludes the idea of any person attempting to pass it without danger, was in its usual form of a table cloth, and, as the saying is, "Good-by, last journey," we succeeded.

The distance for a mile and a half from the town is a slight inclined plane, with a good road, and, as we ever, passed it became more rough, and the ascent more abrupt. We were obliged to walk at one moment over sharp stones, and the next through mingly pastoral; the next, wide-shelving hollows but and; then pick our way across immense masses of smoothly-polished stones which composed its bed, occasionally suffering with a slippery coat of green shin. The banks of these streams were lined with washer-women, hundreds being employed; while with these were their children, of all ages and all of all ages, in the garb which Nature provided for them, splashing in the water or gamboling on the black sheep upon the oasis of turf at its side. It seemed as if the bushes of the surrounding country were hung with clothes, and all the sunny-haired women in the colony had come here to wash.

Our junk at first was not so severe as to compel us to rest often. Having accomplished half the distance, however, it was impossible to take a step in connection steep without feeling the effect; the palpitation of our hearts was felt in our throats. It was at this time that the guide proposed a short stop, owing to the entire failure of two of the party.

A little shed of rock was found, in which the sun was hidden; a trickling stream of ice-cold water was forming a little pool near us, which, when mixed with some of the brandy with our guide, kept for just such occasions, so revived our drooping constitutions as to encourage them to renew the ascent. Our poles were of the greatest service in leaning upon, and thus resting; our legs, as well as steadying our persons, and preventing falls—aided in many places, with legs, poles, holding on with our hands to the bushes or grass on the sides—the ascent of a projecting rock, we could with difficulty make the slightest progress. As we entered the Cleof, or split in the rock, through which our path led, and which was but a few feet wide, with precipitous sides, which at the entrance appeared to be a thousand feet high, our path led over loose stones, which formed the bed of some former stream, at an angle of seventy degrees; and we looked, as described by immense masses of rock, around which we were obliged to go. The sun's rays reflected was the cold water from the crevices in the rocks, near or of which moisture streams we would often stop and rest ourselves.

It was in this manner we progressed, until, after three hours and a half of the most laborious exercise, the top was reached.

The summit of Table Mountain is a plain, the edge of which is a nearly straight line, which fronts toward the town, and which is exactly three miles in extent. From this front is a gradual declination to west and south, with terraces, until the low land of Constantia is reached, and which a horse can ascend without difficulty.

The view from the highest point, thirty-seven hundred feet above the sea, fully repaid our hardships in reaching it. The harbor, with Cape Town and its environs, was at our feet. We looked as if a biscuit could have been thrown upon the roofs of the houses. The shipping, with the noble Hindostan towering above all, and looking large enough to hoist any one of the many ships about her inboard, was right before us. On our right was Paarl, Stellenbosch, and many minor towns and hamlets, clustered beneath us, together with the magnificent vine-growing districts of Nyesberg and Constantia. On our left was the Lion's Rump, and further out, the open sea; when, on turning about, the entrance of the Cleof, or Good Hope was clear to; and, still nearer, False and Simon's bays, with their shipping—these last points being considered quite near, but distant. But the panorama could be taken in at a glance; and in extent, diversity, and beauty of scenery, could not be surpassed. We carried an American boat-flag with us, which was soon planted, and then, with a hearty cheer, as the stars and stripes unrolled; then building a fire, the smoke of which should inform our friends of our success, we left a flag on the rock, which our climbing had fully prepared our appetites for, and a bottle of cold water never before tasted.

After this was finished we started to explore the plain forming the summit. Two miles from the Cleof, descending, we had arrived at the commonest twenty feet high, erected by Herschel, to assist him in his observations. Here we rested a short hour.

Our path to it was rough, being obstructed by masses of rock many feet in circumference, as we rode over the Cleof Like, which, in a beautiful and wild flowers growing about it. In fact, wherever there was a little earthy spot would deliver a most these beautiful wild flowers might be seen. Our guide, an old Malay—a remnant of one of the old Dutch slaves—had gathered a considerable quantity of these pretty flowers, but had on this occasion given out when we had arrived at the Cleof. This was now soon waving a flag for us to approach. There was little more to be seen that differed from the view on the other side of the hill, except a wider and long look, we commenced our descent.

The return, however, by this route was rather more perilous than the ascent. Our road, strip from under us upon the long, rank grass, or a mid-air the moment we attempted to move our feet below, where a huge rock would interpose, in the most horrible manner, on the other, and, as we progressed—impressing our bodies with the necessity of proceeding with a great deal of circumspection. However, this was accomplished safely; and in less than three hours we were comfortably in a warm bath at the Mount Nelson, and sitting down to the hospitable board of a noble Dutch gentleman—Mr. Hoffmeyer—whose acquaintance we had made on the journey have appreciated, and which it affords me great pleasure to be able to pay this slight tribute. We had fish, game, delicious wine, and listening to his hearty laugh, my fatigue was soon forgotten. In his grounds was erected a large vineyard, which illustrates very well the mode of growing grapes in the colony. Several hundreds of pipes were manufactured annually by Madeira, Sherry, and a variety of Port called Pontac—the exposure of which wine is from fifteen to a dollar a gallon. The Constantia, however, in a very valuable wine, quite rare, and selling for three dollars a bottle.

On Saturday, September 17, Sir George Grey, Governor of the Cape Colony, left Cape Town for English army officers, with the foreign consuls residing here, and a party of ladies, visited the Mountain. The day was delightful, and the view in appearance, size, armament, and all, elicited universal applause. Upon the leaving the summit a salute was fired and the yards manned. Each round, as he left, also received the customary salute.

Mr. Reed has been at the Masonic Hotel during the stay of the Minnesota, receiving much attention from the officials of Cape Town. The officers of the Minnesota speak in the highest terms of the hospitality of Cape Town. Invitations to balls, supper-parties, and rides, have flowed in upon them; and they will go away with the kindest feelings toward the short and happy two weeks in Cape Town. Letters have reached their ship, and have always been well received. She is to sail on the 23d for Hong Kong.

OLD HUSBANDS AND YOUNG WIVES.

"I was an old fool! Yes—I was an old fool; that's all there is about it. I was an old fool, and no better; she was not to blame, poor thing! she is not a child to act with the discretion and wisdom of a libitious mother's eye. It was not the old man, but his money—his money—I might have known it. Why could I ever have believed that Mary Terry could love me for myself alone? Ah! Mark Ware surveyed himself in the large parlor mirror.

See I—he reflects a portly old man of sixty, with a ruddy face—a face which, in spite of every effort, in the light of youth had long since departed. And yet there is the same look and expression as we have he strides across the carpet, ejaculating, with fresh emphasis, "Yes, I was an old fool!—an old fool! I will tell the old fool to her face. I will not remain another hour in the house with her. I will not remain another hour a young girl because her mother took her out of the seminary at home to bring her on. I see now it is not in reason for a young girl like her to have much else to do with a man of my years and gouty feet. Poor little Mary! No—I'll not punish her because she can not love me; she shall have a little while to enjoy herself, and then her mother is only too proud to trot her out, as the wife of the rich Mark Ware. Ah! I see it now; them both happy, let them do it; maybe"—and Mark Ware paused—"maybe, after she has seen what kind of a Sea-gipsy—what kind of a husband she will come back and love the old man a little—maybe—who knows? No woman who is believed in, and well treated, ever makes a bad wife; there never was a bad wife yet, but there was a bad husband first; that's gospel—Mark's gospel, anyhow, and Mark Ware is going to act upon it. Mary shall go to the hall tonight—Mary shall dance—I will stay at home and nurse my patience and my gouty leg. There's no evil in her; she's as pure as a lily, and if she wants to see the world, why—she shall see it; and though I can't go dancing round with her, I never will dim her bright eyes with—no!"

"That will do, Tilly; another pin in this line; now move that rose to the right—so! Mary Terry, you're a beauty!" Mark Ware's ugly real Mary. She was sunkest and pure, as he had said; and, child as she was, there was a look in her face—a certain expression—which the most audacious eye would have shrunk beneath.

Who the young bride first realized the impact of those words she had been made to utter, "till death do us part," she looked forward to a life of misery—to be spent at the long, monotonous, weary years before her. Her home seemed a prison, and Mark Ware her keeper. As very plainly as words could her. And she clothed and fretted in her gilded fetters, while her restless heart cried out, "Oh! my prison-house!" Must she sit there in her prison-house, day after day, listening only to the repetition of her own trivial hurt? Must the two and the latterly only to free to revel in the bright sunshine? Must she, with her young heart, be ex rosis to some gay assemblage. To her own unpleasant and unwelcome fetish must she bow? Her husband never remonstrated—on the contrary, she often found upon her dressing-table some choice gift, which seemed to be had provided for the occasion; and Mary, as she fastened it in her hair, or around her throat, would say, "Thank you, dear!" like the other appendages of his establishment, should reflect credit on his faultless taste!"

Time passed on. Mark Ware was "patient," as he promised himself to be. His every appearance was so lonely now, for his little babe kept him company; the mysterious nurse, only too glad to escape from the nursery and a "chat with the cook over a back gate." It was a pretty sight—Mark and the baby. Every one knew that we always a fondness sight together. Not a smile or a cloud passed over that little face that did not wake up all the father in Mark Ware. He was proud of his son—that was with it, or rocked it to sleep on his breast, talking to it, as if it could understand the strange, wild words which it was the unconscious object.

"I am weary of it!" said Mark's young wife, as she stepped into her carriage, at the close of a brilliant ball. "I am weary of seeing the same faces, and hearing the same insipid remarks night after night. I wonder shall I ever be happy?" Mary paused. "I ever be such a thing, or am I only? Mamma is proof of me, because I am beautiful and rich, but she does not love me. Mark ware's best friend—and Mary's guilty fear circled scornfully. "Life is so weary, and I am only eighteen!" and Mary sighed wearily.

On whirled the carriage through the deserted streets; deserted—save by some inveterate pleasure-seeker, or the ever-present, ever-watchful policemen. Occasionally a lamp twinkled from some upper window, where a half-tired servant-maid was stitching her life away, or a heart-broken mother bent over the dead form of a babe, which her mother's heart could not spare, although the angels were there to find food for the remaining babes who only beside her. Mary saw all this, although in all that makes women lovely, daunted under the flickering gaslight, while her mocking laugh rang out on the night air. Mary shuddered, and drew back—there was that in its hollowness which told of a heart-ache and secret trouble. Mary's determined stare kept their tireless watch, and Mary's heart grew soft under their gentle influence, and a tear-drop rested on her cheek; others of the like pearls upon her bosom.

"You could not wait to undress me," said Mary to the weary-looking waiting-maid, as she averted her swollen eyes from her gaze; and, taking the hint from the tone, the girl left the room and chamber. So noiseless was the fall of her light foot upon the carpet that Mark did not hear when she entered. He sat with his back to the door, bending over the cradle of his child, till his snow-white head rested on the ivory cheek; then he spoke. It was his wont, to beguile his loneliness.

"Mary is a pretty name, eyes—Mary's mouth; no more like your old father than a rose and a lily—a honeysuckle-bower. You will love the lonely old man, little one, when perhaps she will, by-and-by; who knows?" and Mark's voice trembled.

"She will"—he dosn't" said Mary, dropping on her knees at the head of her child, and turning her face in Mark's hands; "my darling, poisoned husband!"

"You don't mean that?" said Mark, holding her off at arm's-length, and looking at her through a mist of tears; "you don't mean that you will love an old fellow like me? God bless you, Mary—God forever bless you? I have been very—very lonely;" and Mark wept for their happiness.

The gaping world, the far-sighted world, the flattering world—all saw the bright, happy star of fashion became a fixed star. Some said "her health must be failing;" others, that "her husband had become jealous at last;" while old stagers maliciously insinuated that it was wise to retire on Fresh Lands. But none said—what we say—that a true woman's heart may always lie won—ay, and kept, too—by any husband who does not consider it beneath him to step off the pedestal of his "dignity" to learn how.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

An English journalist, eye-witness of Inkia, says: "It is the custom on the occasion of a marriage for a dense square, inhabited by merchants of small or large subjects, to defend the house of the bridegroom, and to fire guns in order to celebrate the happy event. Of course, this is a most annoying disloyalty indulged by imprudent domination."

The foot, water, and air which a man receives amount to the aggregate more than 3000 pounds a year; that is, about a ton and a half, or more than twenty times his weight. The importance of these facts should direct our attention to the expenditure of material required for supporting life, and to the value being of the most trifling action of change on a prodigious scale.

At the annual fair of the New York State Agricultural Society, which came recently to a conclusion reporter, "Among the articles exhibited was a pumpkin which will be contained in a flour barrel; also turnips and beets of the same size. Wheat and potatoes were in a like grower, or knuckler, place upon such Brobdignagian vegetables."

The English papers give an account of a successful resort to the process of transfusion, recently made in Staffordshire. A woman had lost a pint of death, when transfusion was suggested and adopted. Seventeen ounces of blood were taken from the veins of her husband, and injected into her own. The operation was performed up and proceeded herself "better." The French faculty have recently been much interested in the use of chloroform with complete success. We believe it has never been used in the case of three hens—a pair and one. Recently, the blood of a healthy domestic animal has been injected into the veins of a lunatic in the mind of the tyrannical man, by professing his wretched life, took a daily dose of the blood of a lamb, which was slaughtered for the occasion.

The general opinion is that men have physically degenerated since the early ages of the world. But all the statistics of insurance companies which have turned on this subject tend to show that the human form has not degenerated, and that the life of man continues the same stature as at the beginning of the world. Thus, all the records of the Pharaohs show the bones and particularly the teeth, which have been found unchanged in the mummies of the oldest dynasties, to be perfectly sound to this point clearly. The oldest coffin in the world is that found in the Great Pyramid of Egypt, and it is constructed of hardly exceeds the size of our ordinary coffin, being six feet long by two wide. It is clear in the mind of the tyrannical effects of civilization is clear, because the savages do not suffer from them.

It may seem strange, but it is a fact, that men generally save more money than the wives of women, then women of men; and fearing to "break the ice" is a fruitful source of old bachelorism.

An old plain-looking and plain-spoken Dutch farmer of the interior, dropped in at a newspaper office, and paying the editor for a year's subscription, asked: "Editor, is not the Bible a good book?" "Certainly," was the reply, "the most instructive, and strict collar—our honest Mynheer ordered up his team.

"What will it be, Sir?" said the driver, with a sigh. "You get another dollar, if you are always a Dutchy. You."

"You gas sour-crout, Ize, boy?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well, give me some both."

Off started white upon on a keen jump, and presently returned with the sour-crout, and of women, then women of men; and fearing to "break the ice" in a fruitful source of old bachelorism.

An old plain-looking and plain-spoken Dutch farmer of the interior, dropped in at a newspaper office, and paying the editor for a year's subscription, asked: "Editor, is not the Bible a good book?" "Certainly," was the reply, "the most instructive, and strict collar—our honest Mynheer ordered up his team.

"What will it be, Sir?" said the driver, with a sigh. "You get another dollar, if you are always a Dutchy. You."

"You gas sour-crout, Ize, boy?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well, give me some both."

Off started white upon on a keen jump, and presently returned with the sour-crout, and of women, then women of men; and fearing to "break the ice" in a fruitful source of old bachelorism.

"Another messenger came to announce that she was at the door."

"Tell her to wait a minute," answered he, "and then I'll go to her."

In a minute the door was brought to him and she had expired.

"Alas! I'm very sorry for it," re'mined the tranquil husband. "She was the best wife in the world."

Then he returned his brief funeral oration, he went on with his work.

An industrious rain happened in New York last week, when the water was let on to the Croton distributing reservoir. "Think to discover whether or not the child was born with a caul," is the query.

It is a custom in Barnwickshire, Scotland, among women who have lost a child, when they become pregnant again tired by bearing low down, while singing lullaies with sweet sadness of the tone. At last, the song dies away around, allowing others to step across the lower part of the cradle, which is supposed to prevent the next arrival time, until all pain of fatigue is removed. Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," mentions a similar custom in Italy, and says: "Some will have the cradle rocked forward and when 'tis at full length, pause, stand upon the bottom, and so rock it backward, and so forward by turns, and rise likes greatly refreshed." This custom is called "leglen" (Scotch). In Scotland it is termed "straddlesing the rock."

Sailors are often shipped without knowing where they are going, or for long about it. A black cook having been shipped in this way, he contented to ask to what port they were bound. "Why, we're going to Liverpool," was the reply. "Ah! dat big disgusting place, where it rains all de time!" "If you're inquisitive altogether, you'll be trying to find out what day of the week it is next."

"Come, get up—you've been in bed long enough," as the gardener said when he was pulling up carrots to send to market.

An intelligent agriculturist out West thinks the best way to make farmers grow madder, is to poke 'em with sharp sticks!—

When a certain bankrupt crossed the English Channel to avoid his creditors, Sydney Smith remarked, it was a pore over which would not be relished by the dove.

"Mr. Jones," said a schoolmaster to his boy, "I have died fortieth time to-day, and I shall be obliged to you if you will not give me occasion to die a fortieth and first."

The man who was "moved to tears" complains of the dangerous of the promises, and wishes to be moved back again.

Kitchen girls are now termed "young ladies of the order parlor."

As Irishman says that a coffin is the house a man lives in when he is dead.

"Pope, what does the editor lick the Price Current with?" "Whip it! he don't whip it, my child." "Well, then we paper boys, 'Price Current carefully corrected,' and when I get corrected I get licked, hey? don't I?" "Sniff and, my son!"

[Lady reads Indigestion pre-eclipses.] "On motion of Mr. Sparkle, the question submitted to a seat on the floor of the house." (Indignant lady flutters.) "A seat on the floor indeed. Indeed! I presume the Empire State had better buy chairs, instead of treating the Legislature to wine parties on Blackwell's Island." "I am sit on the floor to oblige the Legislature, nor the Governor himself, I know."

Had Tully himself pronounced one of his orations with a blanket round his shoulders, more people would have laughed at his dress than would have attended to the eloquence.

"Come in, Jer, and let's take a drink." "No, Thomas, can't afford it." "But, Jer, I'll pay for it." "Oh, I am not speaking of loss of money, Thomas but of loss of health and energy, moral principle, character, peace of mind, and self-respect."

There is a little fellow of our acquaintance, not yet in breeches, and just able to totter after a hoop—not that which his mother wears, for he has discovered the independence of her, as Young America should—his first hoop. When the hoop was handed to him, he ran as wherewith to dress it; another fellow than boots was in the way, and he ran over him, and then proceeded to hit the other by the young gentleman was endeavoring in pursuit of his hoop, which was running away from a rough slip of nine-cent with the hoop in his possession. He was asked what he had done with his proper stick, and he replied that he had put that over the hoop to do it. "But," said his interlocutor, "your hoop will be worn out, and the stick will be left." "I don't know about that, but when I buy a new hoop, I won't have to buy a new stick, for," replied the young financier in petticoats. That youngster, when time shall make him an orator, won't be caught slapping worries and hoops into the unforeseen.

A bonnetmaid, who was sent to call a gentleman to dinner, found him engaged in using a tooth-brush. "Well, he is coughing," said the lady to her mistress, on her return. "Yes, ma'am, directly," was the reply: "he's just shaggering his teeth."

Uncle Isaac was a great stickler for grammar. He always stuck to it that the adjective good admitted of no degree of comparison, and was wrong, for he said that it is good, and good is good enough." One day brother Jake was reading about the electricity of the air, and was somewhat remarkably bright result. When he came to the sentence, "Electricity is a good servant," he looked up and exclaimed, "I have occasionally had a good servant, but that's the very bad grammar—read correctly—long-ago!" "There is no such comparative as long ago," said he.

An anecdote is related of a young preacher at a church in this city, who had for his text a verse from the parable of the Virgins, and in the course of his sermon he explained, "Thatin old time it was customary, when the bridegroom and groom were coming, for both parties to go out and meet them, and escort them home—five of these virgins being wise, and five foolish."

Lord Shaftesbury says that he would be virtuous for his own sake, and Bishop Butler votes for virtue as it would be clean for his own sake, though nobody were to see him.

BILL ROPEYARN'S DIFFY.

I have by the smoke that so gracefully curled
Around the furbelish, flimsy cap of a girl,
And I said, "If there's any thing good in this world,
It is found in the smoke of a cigar, my girl."

'Twas twelve—and the boustrous was ordered to "pipe,"
His mates they started to answer the call,
But oh! how much sweeter when the pet's in yourhand,
Yes, child, and you're the sweet cause of it all.

"And thus, in a song man-o'-war," did I say.
"With a rock to windward and a lee shore aback,
With my hell-pint of whisky to shrink every day,
How regal could I live, and how calm could I die!"

"Yes and I am much older," said the lawyer to the banker. "How so?" "Why you contrive to live on the labor of others." "But I carry on my profession as a living," said the banker. "So do I," said the lawyer; "but there is this difference: I get the money and you get with their consent—you get their property without their consent."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, January 4, 1858.

THE recurrence of New Year's Day has limited the business week to five days. The Produce and Provision Markets have been devoid of animation. Breadstuffs have been but moderately inquired for, both by shippers and dealers, and prices have varied but very little. Cotton opened very firmly, but closed with some a lower tendency, and yet prices did not improve. Provisions were somewhat freely dealt in at irregular rates, but generally closed firm at unchanged figures. The Dry Goods trade continues very active, most jobbers being engaged in taking stock and preparing for annual settlements. Prices are generally nominal. The movements in Gold and Sterling were moderate and unproductive of any remarkable alterations. The following is a detailed list of the articles mentioned in this review:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, bbl. $4 15@ $4 25
Superfine to fancy Western do. . . . 4 40@ 4 60
Extra Western Flour, per barrel . . . 4 65@ 4 75
Fancy to extra Genesee per barrel . . 4 75@ 5 00
Extra Canadian, per barrel . . . . . 4 75@ 5 00
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel . 4 75@ 5 00
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.. 3 90@ 4 00
Meal, per barrel . . . . . 3 00@ 3 12½
White Wheat, per bushel . . . . . 1 10@ 1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel . . . . . 1 05@ 1 18
New Crop Corn, per bushel . . . . . 81@ 82
Oats, per bushel . . . . . 53@ 55
Barley, per bushel . . . . . 60@ 75
Peas, per bushel . . . . . 80@ 85
State Oats, per bushel . . . . . 53@ 54
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel . . 52@ 54
Southern Oats, per bushel . . . . . 50@ 52
Cotton, middlings, per pound . . . . 6@ 6
New Pork, per barrel . . . . . 15 00@ 15 75
Prime Pork, per barrel . . . . . 13 00@ 13 25
Country Prime Beef, per barrel . . . 6 00@ 6 50
Country Prime Beef, per barrel . . . 8 75@ 9 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel . . . . . 10 50@ 11 00
Cut Hams, per barrel . . . . . 14 00@ 15 00
Lard, per pound . . . . . 8@ 9
Lard, per barrel . . . . . 8@ 9
State Butter, per pound . . . . . 24@ 25
Western Butter, per pound . . . . . 21@ 22
Cheese, per pound . . . . . 9@ 11½
Rice, per 100 pounds . . . . . 3 87½@ 4 12½
Rio Coffee, per pound . . . . . 10@ 10
Cuba Sugar, per pound . . . . . 5@ 5½
Cuba Molasses, per gallon . . . . . 27@ 28
Cuba Molasses, per gallon . . . . . 17@ 18
Young Hyson, per pound . . . . . 25@ 50
Hyson & Young Hyson . . . . . 25@ 50
North River Hay, per 100 pounds . . 75@ 75

Stock of several Articles on hand, 1st Nov. 1857, and January 1.

	1857.	1858.
Ashes, barrels	1,500	1,500
Coffee, packages	102,020	117,237
Cotton, bales	10,117	15,313
Dry Codfish, quintals	20,030	9,000
Mackerel, barrels	2,300	2,300
Pickled Salmon, packages	450	400
Pickled Herring, barrels	3,000	3,000
Smoked Herring, boxes	20,000	20,000
Rice, packages	6,000	6,000
Sugar, hogsheads	325,000	325,000
Corn, bushels	1,067,000	1,067,000
Wheat, bushels	50,000	50,000
Hemp, tons	200	200
Flour, barrels	25,000	25,000
Hides, number	6,000	6,000
Saltpetre, tons	577,768	577,768
Leather, Side, sides	9,000	9,000
Leather, Sole, sides	97,000	97,000
Molasses, hogsheads	1,000	1,000
Molasses, barrels	1,773	1,773
Molasses, casks	100	100
Turpentine, barrels	4,573	4,573
Tar, barrels	8,859	8,859
Pitch, barrels	8,000	8,000
Rosin, barrels	13,000	13,000
Pork, barrels	10,000	10,000
Beef, barrels and tierces	20,144	20,144
Rice, tierces	2,000	2,000
Tobacco, hogsheads	10,000	10,000
Sugar, hogsheads	10,476	10,000
Sugar, tierces	2,000	1,000
Sugars, loaves	10,021	9,000
Cocoa, bags	1,000	1,000
Tobacco, Cuba, bales	2,000	2,000

Freights were quiet, and rates were essentially unchanged. The number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 6.71.

The Cattle Market last Wednesday were scantily supplied with Beeves and these commanded higher prices than for some weeks past, which Cows were in demand and sold readily at unchanged rates. Veal Calves were in limited supply and demand at former prices. Sheep were rather dull, raised by the drove of Dover, N. Y., weighing 840 pounds, sold to M. Foley at 6½ cts. per lb. live weight. Hogs were in good demand, and a splendid specimen, Sheep and Lambs were scarce and sold at full prices. The following statement of Cattle were less freely offered and purchased. Prices declined during the first fortnight of Live Stock Fair during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Jan. 7.	Week ending Jan. 14.
Beeves	1,477	1,351
Milch Cows	218	161
Veal Calves	400	310
Sheep and Lambs	8,359	8,712
Swine	2,500	2,500

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

New York . . . . . 928 | New Jersey 12
Ohio . . . . . 311 |

The total receipts of Live Stock at all the City Markets, including those from Brighton, Bull's Head, and the City Markets, during each of the last two years, were as follows:

	1856.	1857.
Beeves	317,027	317,027
Milch Cows	12,557	12,574
Veal Calves	33,453	33,453
Sheep and Lambs	463,170	446,259
Swine	260,000	260,000

The following table shows the average number of all kinds of Live Stock brought to the city per week:

Beeves.	Cows.	Veals.	Sheep.	Swine.	Total.
1853 . . . 7,257	753	1,215	10,028	4,853	24,350
1854 . . . 6,097	521	1,021	11,238	6,117	24,993
1855 . . . 6,097	541	628	8,856	6,450	22,524
1856 . . . 6,097	541	628	8,856	6,450	22,524

The range of prices, according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

	Poor to Ordinary.	Fair to Good.	Prime to Extra.
Poor to premium Beeves, per pound . .	6@ 6	6@ 6½	6½@ 7
Extra and premium Beeves, per head. .	70@ 75	75@ 80	80@ 90
Veal Calves, per pound	5 @ 5	5 @ 6	6 @ 6
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 00@ 2 50	2 50@ 3 00	3 00@ 3 50
" per pound	6 @ 6	6 @ 6	6 @ 6
Live Swine, per pound	6 @ 6	6 @ 6	6 @ 6
Dressed "	6 @ 6	6 @ 6	6 @ 6

The Country Produce Markets have generally been well supplied, and prices have not varied much. The annexed list has been good for Poultry, and moderate for other articles.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$2 @	$5 00
Apples, dried, per pound	3 @	4
Peaches, dried, per pound	15 @	20
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	2 00 @	2 50
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 00 @	2 25
Chestnuts, per basket	1 00 @	1 25
Cranberries, per barrel	7 00 @	8 00
Potatoes, per bushel	1 00 @	1 50
Onions, per bushel	1 50 @	2 00
" per barrel	3 50 @	4 00
Onions, per barrel	3 50 @	4 00
Turnips, per barrel	50 @	75
Carrots, per barrel	75 @	1 00
Pumpkins, per 100	25 00 @	30 00
Squash, per barrel	1 00 @	1 50
Cabbages, per 100	2 50 @	4 00
" per dozen	25 @	37
Parsnips, per barrel	1 25 @	1 50
Beets, per barrel	1 @	1
Leeks, per 100	3 50 @	4 00
Celery, per dozen	25 @	50
Garlic, per 100	5 00 @	8 00
Eggs, fresh, per dozen	30 @	35
Eggs, Pickled	15 @	20
Chickens, per pound	8 @	12
Fowls, per pair	75 @	1 00
Guinea Fowl, per pair	50 @	62
Ducks, per pair	75 @	1 00
" per pair	15 @	20
Turkeys, per pound	12 @	14
Turkeys, Wild, each	4 00 @	6 00
Geese, each	75 @	1
Pigeons, per dozen	1 25 @	1 50
Prairie Hens, per pair	1 50 @	2 00
Partridge, per pair	50 @	75
Quails, per dozen	1 50 @	2 00
Rabbits, each	10 @	15
Hares, each	10 @	15
Venison, per pound	8 @	10
Venison, per pound	8 @	11
Bear Meat, per pound	12 @	16

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Jan. 4, 1858.

THE year opened on a depressed state of trade. Though less is heard about failures than was the case two months ago, it is believed that the instances of mercantile defaults are nearly as frequent now as then; all branches of business are suffering from a great want of ready currency, and all articles of commerce have undergone, and are still undergoing, a serious depreciation. On the other hand money abounds in Banks; it is believed that the amount specie in the New York City Banks does not fall short of twenty-nine millions. First-class paper is in demand at the lowest rates, and loans on call can be had on approved stock, even on railroad securities, at 6 per cent. The imports continue to fall off, and there remains in the country a large quantity of produce to come forward.

The foreign trade of the port for the week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Jan. 2, 1858 . . .	$1,303,711 . . .	$1,501,621
Corresponding week, 1857 . . .	1,190,037 . . .	1,349,751
Decrease	$5,673 . . .	$4,0,152

The export of specie for the week slightly exceeded half a million, the bulk of which was sent to Boston for shipment. The Persia, on Wednesday, will probably take over two millions.

Considerable excitement has been occasioned by the failure of several railroad companies on 1st January. That of the Michigan Central—which corporation had sunk $700,000 of debt falling due on the 1st—was among the most surprise, as the concern was reputed highly prosperous. Were it not for these events, money would have been considerably on the opening of the year.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL FOR 1858.

"THE FAVORITE PAPER OF NEW ENGLAND."

PUBLISHED DAILY, SEMI-WEEKLY, AND WEEKLY.

In announcing the terms for the BOSTON JOURNAL for 1858, the proprietor does not deem it necessary to declare the principles and characteristics which have made it, now, at its eighteenth year, the favorite paper for the times. He deems it sufficient to say that WHAT THE JOURNAL has been in the past will be in the future. It has the undoubted unanimous consent of its contemporaries throughout New England, The Journal stands at the head of the New England Press in all those qualities which go to make up a reliable, enterprising, family newspaper. The opinion it has attained by pursuing a steady, straight-forward course in all respects, and by spying neither labor nor money to give the latest intelligence and the fullest reports of all matters of interest to the community. It has relied upon its own merits, and not upon the representations of canvassers or "runners" to secure for it the confidence and patronage of the Public—and the result has been that it has a larger list of bona fide subscribers THAN ALL OF ANY THREE OF THE PAPERS IN NEW ENGLAND—and at no previous time has its circulation increased more rapidly than during the past six months. The proprietor intends by the employment of experienced and competent men in all the departments of the establishment, and by the most liberal outlay of money in the procuring of intelligence, to keep the paper fully to make THE JOURNAL still more worthy the name of "the favorite paper of New England." He begs to call with confidence to its announcement to invites the attention of newspaper readers and advertisers to the following terms for the several editions of THE JOURNAL:

THE BOSTON DAILY JOURNAL

MORNING AND EVENING,

Contains the latest news by telegraph and mail, and telegraph up to the hour of going to press. It is printed on a large sheet, with new type, and is furnished at $6 per year, which enables it to be sent into the towns well before the latest moment, and still work off the edition in season for the early mail expresses. It is published at the low rate of

SIX DOLLARS A YEAR; SINGLE COPIES TWO CENTS.

THE SEMI-WEEKLY JOURNAL,

TUESDAY AND FRIDAY MORNINGS,

Contains all the matter published in the Daily but the Daily Journal for the three days preceding—averaging from twenty-four to thirty columns. The subscription price of the Semi-Weekly Journal is

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR

TO CLUBS.

Five copies, one year . . . TWELVE DOLLARS FIFTY CENTS.
Ten copies, one year . . . . . TWENTY DOLLARS.

THE WEEKLY JOURNAL,

PUBLISHED ON THURSDAY MORNING,

Contains the choicest kind of reading matter, prepared especially for its columns, and embraces all the news of interest for the week. It is furnished at the following very low rates:

One copy, one year . . . . . TWO DOLLARS.
Two copies, one year . . . . . THREE DOLLARS.
Five copies, one year . . . . . EIGHT DOLLARS.
Ten copies, one year . . . . . FIFTEEN DOLLARS.
And one to getter up of club.
Twenty copies, one year . . . . . TWENTY DOLLARS.
And two to getter up of club.

JOURNAL FOR CALIFORNIA.

SEARS, CANFIELD, SMITH & CO.,

Are ADVERTISING AGENTS.

The Journal has no equal in New England. Its prices are low, and its terms of settlement such as to make it a cash and conspicuous manner. Orders promptly attended to. Address, with remittance, to the publishers, both the MORNING and EVENING papers without extra charge.

NO SPECULATION

Is more than double that of any "two cents" or enterprising penny paper in Boston. The publishers consider that no advertisers for advertising are ever employed by this establishment.

THE CASH PRINCIPLE.

In all cases the "cash principle" will be adhered to, and no notice will be taken of any orders not accompanied by the money. All papers are discontinued at the expiration of the time paid for.

☞ THE JOURNAL is for sale at all the Newspaper Depots, and on all the Railroads throughout New England. All orders should be addressed to

CHARLES O. ROGERS.

JOURNAL BUILDING,

No. 12 Franklin Square, Boston, Mass.

WILL CLOSE, Saturday next, JANUARY 9, EXHIBITION OF FRENCH PAINTINGS, AT 497 AND 499 BROADWAY.

Open from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M., and 7 to 10 in the evening.

CLOAKS! CLOAKS!! CLOAKS!!!

BRODIE'S

CELEBRATED CLOAKS

ARE NOW

STILL FURTHER REDUCED IN PRICE,

IN ORDER TO CLEAR OUT

THE ENTIRE STOCK,

IF POSSIBLE,

DURING THE HOLIDAYS.

WONDERFUL BARGAINS!

No. 330 CANAL STREET, N. Y.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S NEW BOOK!

"NORTHERN TRAVEL,"

THE MOST ATTRACTIVE OF HIS WORKS!

SUMMER AND WINTER PICTURES OF SWEDEN, LAPLAND, and NORWAY.

12mo. $1.75.

Now ready at all Booksellers.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

G. P. PUTNAM, Publisher,

321 Broadway, New York.

 BAYARD TAYLOR'S HISTORY OF GERMANY, complete in 1 volume, $2 50.

SUBSCRIBE TO

IRVING'S WASHINGTON.

Who have not yet been supplied by Local Agents, can have any volume, post-free (POST ARE COMPLETED), by sending the money direct to the publisher.

OCTAVO EDITION, $2 00 per volume, cloth.

DUODECIMO EDITION, $1 50 per vol., cloth.

ILLUSTRATED EDITION (36 Nos. published), 25 cents each.

Now is the time to complete sets.

G. P. PUTNAM, Publisher,

321 Broadway, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.

THE only reliable, though cheap and effectual vegetable remedy for purifying the blood, and the cure of scrofulous and constitutional diseases. Sold at this season with the greatest benefit by everyone. The only genuine preparation to be used is the English original, the genuine article.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!

BULWER, TYACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, AND WILKIE COLLINS.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL "THE VIRGINIANS" with many humorous illustrations by the author, was commenced in the DECEMBER NUMBER of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets corrected from the author, and will be published simultaneously in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of $1,000 per Number.

MR. CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF CLUBS; OR, THE ODD TRICK OF FAIR DEMARCE," written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, was also commenced in the DECEMBER NUMBER.

MRS. GASKELL, Author of "MARY BARTON," has become a contributor to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and a sterling story from her vigorous pen will be found in the JANUARY NUMBER.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE MARRIAGE TRAGEDY," will appear complete in the FEBRUARY NUMBER.

The above three stories are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the most powerful production of his life, and learned English, special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in London.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
One Copy for Three Years 6 00
Five Copies for One Year 12 00
Ten Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, $1 00, is now ready.

Muslin Covers for binding, sent by mail to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT discount allowed to Booksellers who trade for them.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" will be stereotyped after the present Volume of each DOLLARS a year.

Postage.—From the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY one still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratis. Postage Stamps and Orders supplied for the current Volume.

Postage.—Upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage to THIRTY-TWO MILES is Three Cents a No. and Twenty-five Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Postage.—Upon the MONTHLY MAGAZINE will (until, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-four Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,

Franklin Square, New York.

RETRENCHMENT IN HIGH PLACES.

NOVEL AND ALARMING INCIDENT.

YOUNG WIFE (who, in consequence of the fixed Times, intends to discharge her Servants and do her own Housework). "Good gracious, Cook, what can have happened? Here's the Water running out of the Kettle, and oh! such Steam!"

YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER to Milkman. "Well, I think, such a morning as this, you might step down and hand the Milk in at the door."

BRUTAL MILKMAN. "Guess you don't want to earn your wages, Sis."

GENTLEMAN (who has dropped his Wig, and is not aware of his loss.) "This, I believe, is our Schottisch."

LADY. "Sir! you—you—you must be mistaken." (Gentleman is hurriedly called away by a friend.)

GENTLEMAN (who has recovered his Wig.) "A thousand pardons, I was called away! May I have the pleasure?"

LADY. "Oh! I am so glad you have come. There was an odious, bald, old man here just now, who insisted on it that I had promised to dance with him."

"WANT YER SIDEWALK DONE, MUM?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MRS. SIGOURNEY'S LUCY HOWARD. Lucy Howard's Journal. By Mrs. L. H. SIGOURNEY. 12mo. Muslin, 75 cents.

LP HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (or any Volume in the United States), on receipt of the Money.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS.

THE FIFTEENTH THOUSAND.

A fresh delivery of the extraordinary work will be ready next week, when copies may be obtained of the Booksellers generally throughout the country.—HARPER & BROTHERS will send it to any part of the United States, by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of Three Dollars.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

EVANS'S DAY OF JUBILEE.—All the points of the "Gifts" made a "Gift" to the Clerks.

O ladies bright! O ladies fair!
Sweet sisters, dear to every bosom!
And mothers, by whose tender care
The buds of love are blown to blossom!
For you, whose joys are few and scant,
While sun each costly freak indulges,
Some harmless NEW-YEAR present you want,
And this the maestest row divulges.

While varying Fortune gleams and shifts,
In nothing constant but to waver,
And new ists fall, and new uplifts
The mantle of her friendly favor,
Shall you so tedious home beguile
By sowing CHARADES? Forbid it heavens!
The golden joys of Fortune's smile
ARE SCATTERED BY HER HIGH-PRIEST, EVANS!

EVANS & Co., Gift Bookstore, No. 677 Broadway.

SANTA CLAUS HAS COME.

GIFTS! GIFTS!! GIFTS!!!

A Gift worth from 50 Cents to $200.

What better Gift for all who read the previous ad

"THE GIFT BOOK STORE" than to call at No. 9, J. PHILBRICK, "Astor," or at 475 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C. SPLENDID BOOKS from any of the following Houses: Harper & Brothers, Sheldon, Blakeman & Co., Dodd & S., Derby & Jackson, Miller, Orton & Co., C. Scribner, Leavitt, Allen & Co., Appleton's, Francis & Co., &c., &c. All the Books sold at Publishers' prices.

Gifts of Gold and Silver Watches, Lockets, Pins, Canes, &c. For particulars, send, per mail, for a Catalogue, or call and see us.

"THE TEST UNMATCHED."

THE HOLY BIBLE,

In over a Hundred Styles,

Suitable for Holiday Gifts.

Elegantly illustrated, and ranging in price from One to Fifty Dollars. Be sure to obtain

HARDING'S EDITIONS.

They can be had of all the leading Booksellers and Dealers in America.

When they can not be obtained direct, a person forwarding any sum of money will receive, by return of Express, a fine Edition, for the change as can be had of Dealers.

Address JESPER HARDING & SON,
111 South Third Street,
Philadelphia.

RICH CLOTH COVERS

FOR

VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY

ARE NOW READY.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Booklenders will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

HARDING'S PEARL EDITION OF THE BIBLE.

For Christmas and New Years.

Fine Gift Book of Christ—for—the Fire.

Sent by mail, at any address, on receipt of postage stamps to full value.

With a Turk, gilt edges	75 cents
Bound in Turkey antique	$1 25
" " " clasped	1 75

This edition contains the Psalms in metre, and finely illustrated with steel engravings.

Address JESPER HARDING & SON,
111 South Third Street,
Philadelphia.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.

SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY

LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.

CONTAINING

THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES.

PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

SUBSCRIBERS TO IRVING'S WASHINGTON, who have not been supplied by the Agents can leave either volume sent to them by Mail, postpaid, if they remit the price to the Publishers, viz.: Octavo Edition, cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Half Calf, $9 25; Presentation Edition, cloth, $4 00. Illustrated, 25 cents per Number. To complete sets, orders should be sent at once. The Four Volumes complete the History of the Revolution. G. P. PUTNAM,
321 Broadway, New York.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S NEW BOOK—"NORTHERN TRAVEL"—will be sent by Mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price, $1 25. Address G. P. PUTNAM,
321 Broadway, New York.

METROPOLITAN GIFT BOOK STORE.

A Great sale of Books at the Gift Establishment.

This sale of books is no humbug.

We do not advertise a list of Gifts to the amount of $50,000 or more, at double their real value, as is done with some of our competitors in this and other cities, but will guarantee to sell books at lower prices, and to distribute a larger amount of gifts than at any other Gift Book Store.

Iowa Trumpets and Pewter Swords are not included with our Gifts.

Those wishing to purchase books will do well to favor us with their patronage, and judge for themselves of our manner of selling books.

Catalogues sent to any address.

J. S. ANDREWS,
No. 140 Nassau Street near Beekman Street.

THE BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE

IS THE

GROVER & BAKER PATENT.

495 Sewing Machines,
495 Sewing Machines,
495 Sewing Machines,
495 Sewing Machines,
495 Sewing Machines,
495 Sewing Machines.

These Machines are warranted to give entire satisfaction. Hem, HEMS, SIMPLE, ACCURATE, AND RELIABLE THAN ANY OTHER FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Best City references given.—Wholesale and Retail.

GROVER, THOMAS & CO., 495 Broadway, N. Y.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE, one year and a quarter. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 55.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

PUBLISHERS' CARD.

MR. THACKERAY'S new Story, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous illustrations by the author, will be commenced in the DECEMBER number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets, received from the author in advance of publication in England; for which the Publishers pay MR. THACKERAY the sum of $2000.

☞ With the full knowledge of this arrangement, the proprietors of the New York Tribune, who have been leading advocates of an international Copyright Law, and profess the warmest regard for the interests of British authors in this country, have begun to copy this Story from our Magazine

into their paper, though without the author's admirable illustrations. The same parties, under the same circumstances, reprinted upon us MR. Dickens's "Little Dorrit," for which we paid the author Two Thousand Dollars.

No American publisher can afford to give two thousand dollars for early sheets of a foreign work which is instantly reprinted upon him by a rival in business.

The course of the Tribune is, therefore, decidedly calculated to deprive the British author of the only compensation he can get, in the present state of the copyright law.

A MORNING AT A FASHIONABLE CHURCH.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

MY DEAR SIR,—Why don't you send reporters to the fashionable churches? Why, I want to know, do the newspapers report lectures, concerts, operas, dramas, vaudevilles, comedies, ay, even dirt-eartmeet's meetings, yet have never a word for the assemblies at the fashionable churches, which, as every one will admit, are far more instructive and edifying? I do, now and then, see a sermon reported. When the Rev. Ichabod Surplice, who was perverted from Protestantism, preaches on the gross errors of the Reformation; when the Rev. MR. PAULA LOONS preaches on the text "WIVES, submit yourselves unto your husbands," and proves (this discipline merely an outward thing, but the very opposite—then, indeed, I perceive that the daily papers send reporters; and you, Sir, frequently give us the marrow of their report. But why is the practice not general? Believe me, you would do the public a vast good were you to send your corps of artists and writers to each fashionable church in town, and daguerreotype for us the scenes which take place there every Sunday morning. Who knows but you might be the means of bringing some erring soul from the depths of vulgar religion to the shining light of gilt-edged and perfumed piety?

I am a plain fellow, myself. We live in a pretty fair town in the interior of this State. We are plain folk, and carry out the Main Law among us, though we're only convicted one chap, and he was an Irishman. We have a nice, trim, little church, and a first-rate minister—A. DOWN-EASTER—who preaches twice a day on Sunday, and teaches our young folk a'most every day of the week. He ain't what you'd call a smart fellow: he never pitches into the Catholics or the Unitarians; he never gets into a fume about slavery; he don't muddle plain folk's brains about transubstantiation or other tough doctrines, which are not for farmers to understand. But he just reads a few plain chapters from the Good Book, and explains all the hard verses as he goes along; and then he gives out a few verses of a psalm, and Aunt Betty and Cousin Mary they lead the singing, and we all join in, some in tune, some out of tune: and then he preaches a plain sermon, and tells as we ought to be, all short-weight, or to mix our seed, or to overwork our help, or to let our children be idle and ignorant, or to suffer any poor, houseless creature to go hungry from our door. So, you see, preaching this, and being besides a very kind sociable man, who comes every day to see any body who's sick, and a mighty favorite of the young ones, our minister rather suits us plain folk. I reckon that if he was hard pressed there'd be a good many purses open to him; and a good many sheep chaps, I tell you, a standing before his door if any one wanted to do him a hurt. But bless you, there doesn't live the creature that doesn't love our minister Jeremiah— Never mind his other name.

I was going to say that having come to New York on business, my cousin, John Brown, whom you know I favour, asked me what I did o' Sunday? adding, with a kind of snigger, that if regalias and cherry suited me, I would find him and them in the library all day.

I said I was a country chap, and mostly worshiped once a day at least.

On this he laughed, and bade his wife—a monstrous fine woman, I tell you—take me to church with her.

So I went, walking after MRS. Brown, for she and her daughter, Arabella, quite filled the sidewalk with their dresses. When we reached the church door a fashionable sort of man bowed to MRS. Brown, and came forward to meet her. Seeing him bareheaded, I thought he was the minister, and, says I—wanting to be civil—"How do you do, Reverend Sir?" Upon which that minx Arabella nearly choked herself with a laugh, and cried, "Uncle Gudlah, why that's the sexton!"

He led the way to a pew, and opened the door; after we had gone in he closed it. I had a mind to give him 6*p*-pence, but hadn't change handy, so I nodded, as much as to say, "You score one." He started in a mighty insolent way, and walked down the aisle like a Rajah's state elephant.

I noticed that the gentlemen, the moment they entered the church, poked their noses into their hats, and held them there for a good minute. Why is this, Mr. Editor? Do they find the air of the church overpower them? Do they carry snuff in their hats? I like to know the reasons of every thing; so when the gentleman before us had gone through the ceremony, I just stretched over and took up his hat to look at it. It was a common hat, much like my own. There was nothing in it that I could see but the maker's name. So I gave it back to him, apparently much to his relief.

I was thinking over it when the music struck up a lively air with variations. I am good at music myself, and would have given a good many dollars to have had my old banjo with me at that moment to have accompanied the organist; as it was, I tapped time with my fingers on the pew—till I saw the minister walking up the junior pulpit.

Then I stopped, of course, and the service began. I will say nothing of that old Anglican service, Mr. Editor, except that it seems to me the most touching and beautiful composition in our language, all written as it is in the grand old Saxon tongue; so plain that a child can understand it; so noble and mighty that the greatest mind finds it fill its grasp; cunningly adapted to touch some chord in every breast, and by turns to appeal to the rich, to the poor, to the happy, to the sorrowful, to the believer, and even to the skeptic. There was a Roman Catholic, or mayhap an infidel (poor fellow!)—a Frenchman and a poet of infinite grace and sympathy—ah! he died only a few months ago—who used to say that he could never read the Anglican Liturgy without tears. How few of us Protestants have as much heart as poor DE MUSSET!

There were not many tears shed in my part of the church that morning. If there had been I should have seen them, for the ladies' hats didn't even cover their ears. Their eyes were very busy—a millinering, I should say. The laity in front of us had her book upside down; the two behind us got into a violent quarrel about somebody's bonnet, which one of the two said was new, while the other pretended it was an old one turned. They carried on the quarrel furiously, making the responses all the time. The effect was curious.

FIRST YOUNG LADY (angrily). "I tell you I saw it hanging at MRS.——" (Sighs.) "Good Lord deliver us!"

SECOND YOUNG LADY (furiously). "I tell you it was brown, with feathers, last summer. (Presently.) We beseech Thee to hear us."

FIRST YOUTH LADY (severely). "You're a fool! (Beseechingly.) Grant us Thy peace."

SECOND YOUNG LADY (with dignity). "MRS. Impudence! (With meekness.) Have mercy upon us."

THE MAMMA (authoritatively). "Hold your tongues! Reward us after our iniquities."

One of the churchwardens, or deacons, or vestrymen (I don't know what they are called), took out his note-book and figured away during the pray-

COMING OUT OF A FASHIONABLE CHURCH.

ers. I can see a long distance; and, being of an inquiring mind, I just looked to see what part of the service he was noting down. His little way was to this effect:

Sold 500 N.Y. Central, at 83..... $86,500
Bought 500 N.Y. Central, at 79..... 27,000
Balance..... $59,500

Less brokerage, 1 c. w.

I couldn't make out whether this was part of the Library or the Commission. If you can make out, will you let me know?

The sermon was excellent, I must say. I think that minister must be one of the great guns of your city. I don't like to mention his name, but I may be just it into that post, miserable Pope of Rome dis my heart good. Wonder, he didn't leave him in, too, with his 4,000 souls. I should think he would send in his resignation, and take to making sermons, if he hasn't all this to do, of course. And he must be a great preacher that; and how much good he must do!

When the sermon was over and the collection made (I put in a flippany bit, but it rolled off the plate, and the gentleman who collected didn't, the time th step to pick it up. I noticed that it contained no end of dollars—scallywag, marry-on Canada Jhar was he gets rid of all his deceitful money that way), we all gathered ourselves up to go home. Again I saw the gentlemen the ladies furiously into their hats and hold them there. One young fellow did this straight before me; so I just took him by the arm, and, says I,

"Mister, I reckon you don't put your nose in your hat for nothing; you just tell a feller your why?"

He looked at me a minute, half-laughing, then, says he:

"You won't tell?"

"No."

"It's a tyme," said he.

"A what?"

"A tyme," he repeated, solemnly: "ask the bishop." And he went away.

The going out of church is the only scene that reminds me of going in to the Opera. Of the two, I think the former the shoviest and the freestest. I asked Arabella—wishing to show her that we country folk, dull as we are, had some wit—whether she would let me carry her Opera-glass (including her prayer-book) home?

"No, thank you," said she, with a sweet smile; "but here, take my fan; and just tell that young man with the light mustache that I count on him for the Lancers to-morrow."

So I saw that the sermon had already begun to do good.

OLIADAR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1858.

OUR MEANS AND OUR LIABILITIES.

THE news from Europe goes to show that, after all that has been said about our insolvency, our extent of our reckless method of trading, our dependence upon England, and our unlawful expansion of paper credit, they are in Europe more expanded, more rotten, more reckless, more insolvent, and farther from the legitimate rules of trade than we ever were. No one believed in the gigantic bubbles which have been blown in France since the Empire, but people generally did place reliance in the solidity of British trade. It has remained for this revulsion to teach us that, of the two nations, this is the soundest; not only because, as the London papers state, trade in England is more reckless and less solidly based than trade in the United States, but because we possess in our annual crop an annual income of real wealth far beyond any thing that England, or any other nation, can show. The fact lends a peculiar interest to the commercial statistics on which we touched a few weeks since.

Our whole sales to the world were, for the last fiscal year, over three hundred and sixty millions of dollars, or over thirty millions a month—nearly a million a day. Of this, nearly twenty-four millions were foreign goods, which we bought and sold again—in Canada, South America, Mexico, the East Indies, etc. Many nations with which we trade require to be paid in foreign manufactures, and we buy them accordingly.

The balance—say three hundred and forty millions—is our own produce. And this is the annual contribution to the world's wealth; and a very splendid contribution it is. This is the nonguinea we can put forward against our debts and pensions, and panic. Sixteen dollars per head we may say, counting men, women, and children (white), is the average annual production of the people of the United States. Where is the people that can say as much?

Of this grand figure the leading item, but year, was cotton, of which we sent abroad nearly $122,000,000. The crop was large, and the price was high. Thus the cotton crop alone was nearly equal to six dollars per head of our whole population. But for the cotton crop we should now be a hundred and thirty millions in debt to the foreign world. But for the cotton crop our Northern States, which are the great consumers of foreign goods, would need, this year, to retrench to that extent. But for the cotton crop the revulsion would have left us prostrate.

One may judge of the importance of the cotton export from the fact that the next greatest export—specie—was less than half as much. We send abroad, in round figures, sixty millions of specie, almost entirely from California. But as we imported eleven millions against an export of nine in foreign bullion, we must deduct two from the gross export; and our net outgo of specie is thus reduced to fifty-eight millions, which is less than our export of breadstuffs.

Of this great staple we sold to foreign nations nearly fifty-nine millions—less than one half our cotton export. This was the contribution of the West to pay for the goods of Europe. The West also contributed something to make up our export of forest produce, animals, etc.

New England and the Middle States contributed over thirty millions, in the shape of manufactures; and to this Maine added her quota, Vermont and Delaware, and Vermont, New Hampshire, and New York helped to make up the sixteen or seventeen millions which we got for cattle and minor produce.

The Southern sea-board States gave over twenty millions' worth of tobacco, besides rice, naval stores, and various smaller articles. Sugar does not figure among our large exports, the crop having been unusually scanty and the demand large.

On the other hand, our largest import was dry goods. Of linen, cotton, woolen, and silk goods, we took from abroad, in round figures, one hundred millions' worth—mostly from England. Of sugar, which comes from the West Indies, forty-two millions, thirty-eight of which were from the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. Hardware, and the various metals, we bought thirty-six millions' worth—mostly from Great Britain. Then we have an item of two millions for manufactures, a number of ten millions for hides; another of eight for molasses, etc. All these are articles of prime necessity, and the increase of the import implies no extravagance (save, perhaps, in the finer qualities of silks and dry goods), but a healthful prosperity and comfort. But what can we say of near seven millions' worth of liquors; over five millions' worth of tobacco; nearly three millions' worth of watches; four and a half millions of embroideries — not to go deeper into the items of objects of luxury? Surely these expenses might be curtailed.

For the last two years we have spent our income. Last year we had a balance of over two millions in our favor. We shall continue to do so. So long as we can add to the world's wealth, in such single staples of human action, breadstuffs, and tobacco, between three and four hundred millions annually, it will pay us well to buy such goods and luxuries as suit foreign nations, and to go on opening up our waste lands. The more farmers we have, the better we shall be. The manufactory is the slave of the agriculturist.

GOVERNOR KING ON BANKING.

EVERY man has his vocation; and it is plain that whatever else Governor King may succeed in, banking is not. He proposes, in his Message, in order to prevent revulsions and bank suspensions in future, that our city and State shall agree to keep a sum equal to one-fourth of their total liabilities in specie. This would have obliged them to have on hand, during the past year, twenty-five millions of specie—that is to say, nearly as much as they have now, under the peculiar influence of terror and panic, and their state of things.

Why a quarter? Why not a third? Why more than a fifth? If the idea is to enable the banks to meet demands upon them in ordinary times, the present law is sufficient; and if it is to meet panics, the design to be to enable them to meet demands in time of panic, the law should oblige them to have on hand specie equal to the whole of their liabilities, not a quarter. What guarantee have we that the public will only want a quarter of their deposits? If they happened to want a third, where would be the benefit of Governor King's law?

It is quite evident that the members of the State Legislature are hungering for a crusade against the banks, with what designs every one can conjecture. It is, perhaps, a trial by that Governor King, whose motives are above suspicion, should have given the jackals the scent.

THE END OF WALKER.

IT seems to be very generally admitted that the President's Message on Walker's arrest—the main points of which were anticipated by our editorial article last week—has given him a new blister. There is so much hard, practical common sense about the Messages of James Buchanan that they are more and more valued than those of any of his recent predecessors; his candid confession that Walker was wrongly arrested, and his appeal to the good sense of the community to make the best of it, and put a stop to filibusterism for the future, is admirably calculated to tell upon the mind of the American people.

There is, under the sounding phrases of General Walker's last letter to the President, an evident prevarication or conscientious of failure. His great filibuster scene is that in which he played out his game and lost it. He seems to realize that the Administration has taken its side, once for all, and will wink at no more recruiting operations. He must perceive that, in spite of the noisy congratulations which he is receiving from his Southern friends, his repeated failures have impaired the confidence of the filibusters in his availability as a leader. And he ought to know, if his discernment be as clear as it was, that General Henningsen is doing him no good by the rather juvenile letters which he is publishing in the papers in defense of filibusterism in the abstract, and of Walker as its living embodiment.

A very few days in the present day have had as many chances as General Walker. There was a time when not only this country, but all the leading powers of Europe would have gladly recognized him as the ruler of Nicaragua, and afforded him every encouragement and aid in the consolidation of his government and the reincarnation of his country. He threw away the golden opportunity, and is now reaping the bitter consequences. Yesterday is so invariably the rule of politics in Central America that, even now, to a student of Walker's perseverance, a recovery of his lost paradise may not seem utterly impossible, but so far as probabilities go, they are overwhelmingly against him, and he is the fit ground subsidence into obscurity and oblivion.

A LOST FRAGMENT OF A GUBERNATORIAL MESSAGE.

A GENTLEMAN who arrived here by a late train lost night has brought us the following fragment of a Message to have been formed part of the Message of a State Governor, and to have been lost in transmission to the Legislature. Our daily correspondence will doubtless reprint it in the right place.

Over the top are the words [to follow the directions to the Federal Government on Political affairs]:

"I have noticed with great regret that the Queen of England has taken steps to adopt mischievous measures with regard to the revolted Indian Sepoys. Through their native ruler (Nana Sahib), I perceive that it is said that the blowing of human creatures from guns is an atrocity of a peculiarly revolting character. I shall not pass to place on record your disapproval of the practice. I am prepared to go to the length of concurring in any measure of the conduct of Captain Hodgson who, it seems, has blown away the Nana Sahib's wife, and to propose he spend it be surrendered himself. This matter falls entirely within your province.

"If devotees upon me to direct your attention to the measures which the Government of France have taken, with a view to ward off the evil consequences of the revolution, namely, by indemnifying manufacturers for the loss they may sustain in their employ at a loss. A similar course, I regret to say, has been adopted by the King of Dumb Ass, however, in so ill that perhaps he doesn't know what he is doing, and ought not to be held strictly responsible for his acts. Some measure would, I feel satisfied, elicit from you the concurrence which they do not. I shall be happy to transmit to the proper powers of France and Prussia any resolutions which you may frame on the subject. I am prepared to say that my vocabulary, as they decree, as action consideration as any in the country, and would authorize me to depart from special envoy from this State to be the bearer of your recommittances to the court of Dumb Ass, should the Federal Executive would cheerfully perform this trifling service.

"Finally, it is my painful duty to bring before you statistics of the progress of cannibalism in the Marquesas Islands. I regret to say that the progress of that horrible branch of gastronomy has led to a decided change in the old customs, and to an entire abandonment of male flesh for that of females. The consequence is that the inhabitants of those islands, having devoured nearly the whole of their marriageable girls—a rude and unartistic proceeding—have now no alternative except of getting from insularity to perpetuate their race. You will, I doubt not, see the propriety of bringing back Hodgson to their senses by some resolutions framed in a kindly yet firm spirit.

"These matters fall as clearly within your cognizance as the political affairs of the confederacy of the United States, and I trust you will devote an equal attention to the one as to the other."

THE NEW U. S. DISTRICT-ATTORNEY.

AFTER a contest of some days, Theodore Sedgwick, Esq., of this city, has been confirmed by the Senate as United States District-Attorney for New York, in the room of Judge Keen, removed. For the information of persons at a distance it may be well to add that the Senate should have in confirming Mr. Sedgwick was caused, not by any question of his fitness for the post—that was admitted by all—but by the unwillingness of many Senators to sanction the semblance of proscription involved in the removal of John M'Keon, on the ground of his political views, by the late municipal rulers of this city.

We are happy to republish the following extract from the Evening Post, in relation to Mr. Sedgwick's appointment:

"Viewing the nomination apart from the circumstances in which it originated, we are disposed to congratulate the country upon it. Mr. Sedgwick is a lawyer of high standing, of great ability, and of unquestioned character. There is, therefore, every reason to believe that the duties of the office will be discharged with as much skill and zeal by him as they were by Mr. M'Keon."

The great difficulty seems to be that Mr. Sedgwick will bring to bear on the duties of his office a forensic skill, a fund of legal and general information, and a high sense of honor, which very few incumbents of the office have possessed. No member of the New York bar would have made a better representative of the Federal Government.

The Evening Post, referring to some trifling effusion which Mr. Sedgwick threw off some years since in his idle moments, and published in the Post, considers that his appointment was a reward for these performances. The Post's estimate of the merit of these communications is probably based upon their effect upon its own character and circulation. They are not likely to have been so well remembered by the President-elect as the letter and far abler productions of Mr. Sedgwick, which, as our associate editor, he published in this journal during the early months of last year; these, we have before seen, no doubt, to the Post, a windfall as rare in former times as now.

BRIBERY OF THE PRESS.

A PARAGRAPH has been going the rounds of the papers for some days to the effect that a Boston mercantile firm, which recently failed, spent a sum of $87,000 in obtaining a modification of the tariff, and that $8000 of this money was paid out by the New York house in corrupting the press here. No papers are mentioned, nor is the service specified for which the money was paid.

We have no hesitation in pronouncing the whole story—so far as the press is concerned—a baseless fabrication. It is said to be possible to purchase the good-will of a man, but not that very obscure papers in this city; that is to say, it is alleged that certain individuals have purchased, or would every week, type or write down a measure in consideration of advertisements or "a loan" to the proprietors. But every one who is acquainted with the New York press knows that the opinion of none of the leading dailies can in any instance be purchased for money. A journalist may receive his leisure to the service of a cause, and receive pay for his services, as a lawyer does; this is a perfectly natural, and implies no sale of his credit with which he is connected. It sometimes happens that simple persons—foreigners or Western men—are swindled by adventurers who pretend to have access to the columns of this or that paper, and who sell their supposed influence for what they are worth. If the New York newspapers of Messrs. Lawrence, Stone, & Co. were fleeced by rogues of this order to the tune of $87,000, all that can be said is that they were the best job the rogues ever had. But to suppose that either the Herald, or the Times, or the Tribune, or the Journal of Commerce, or the Commercial received money to advocate a change in the tariff, is absurd and preposterous.

The New York dailies have themselves to blame for the utterness of such calumnious reports. If they were not bought by the spirit of rivalry, and more careful of the honor of their order, these stories about black-mail and the corruption of the press would scarcely serve to occupy the imagination of slanderers, and the public at large would form a juster appreciation of the character of the press.

PROSPECTS OF THE TRADE IN BREADSTUFFS.

IT seems generally agreed that our stock of breadstuffs in the city of New York at the opening of the year just amounted to about 2,000,000 barrels flour, and some 500,000 bushels wheat; say about as much as we had on hand on 1st January, 1857, and nearly a third more than we had on 1st January, 1857. There is still, it is calculated, some $15,000,000 worth of breadstuffs remaining in the hands of farmers in the West; deemed there partly by the disorganization of exchanges consequent upon the crisis, and partly by the desire of holders to wait for better prices. This will not come on in any quantity till the opening of navigation. Those whose means enable them to wait for the full effect of the revulsion has blown over, and trade is itself again, may do well by waiting and keeping out of the market; but those who rely on their crop as a means of subsistence or of trade are running great risk in holding over to the spring.

THE LOUNGER.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

"PERRY CRANIUM," writing from far away, says, "You have amused us much; be in turn amused." He is a boarder in a large and select and very long prospectus of a school, somewhere toward sunset. It contains a philosophy of education, and appeals to the public spirit of parents in which young gentlemen and young ladies study together. This latter point is developed with ornate and obscure eloquence. Thus:

"The plan of the institution, as a society, rests back on a primary law, that either sex alone is not society—social, domestic, or national—but both taken together constitute it. Hence, associated with, as much as young ladies and young gentlemen are required to study apart and recite in separate classes, the great object of the school is to institute a studied formality for the result of discipline, but not a spontaneous charm. Mutual deficiencies are passed by in refined silence; the young and ardent temperament is checked in its courtvitality by the ever-present consciousness of the duty of politeness; the mind is roused to emulation by this species of competition, and upon this same principle that those whose productions are most severely criticised become in time the most accurate, education reserved upon the ordeal system, serves its recipient in after life, when that received upon the hot-house plan lives a short life in the unimpressive atmosphere of years and no, and breathes at last but when exposed to the telegust circus at a premature period of imbecility. The contrast implied in the separation of young ladies and young gentlemen in the educational economy of this age throws a great many shades on the former picture. Either sex in the cloistered Halls of Modern Fashionable Boarding Schools and Colleges is over and soon clothing the other in idealcurs dreams; real beings, and often in forests at that, are transformed into angels of light, and the desire which the God of nature has wisely planted in the race for society is prostituted and converted into systematic fiction; and as a natural consequence the unsocial and anti-philosophic infraction in the framework of civilization, to the certain extreme of shyness and impudence is not unfrequently reached, and the great basis of passion is thrown down at the feet of art.

As for Education in general, the worthy Principal has this to say:

"Education at last consists in three things:

"FIRST—Knowledge.

"SECOND—Language to express it.

"THIRD—A modest assurance of accuracy in supplying it, to banish fear of criticism in speaking. So accomplish these things collectively, the arranged burlesque of question and answer will be found as much as possible, and the student is required to give a digest of the lesson in his or her own language, to answer all arguments by which the scope of the subject is brought to view."

Finally, that the world may know the local influences and the kind of assistance which may be expected at this desirable Seminary, the world will be glad to hear that

"The Institution is situated in a quiet village in ——County, long celebrated for mineral and other natural and alive to the responsibility that rests upon it to the rising race, the moralists, and intelligent Christian element is the endowment of retrit, and upon this let it rise or fall.

"The Associate Principal, Miss ——, was recommended and received with special reference to the permanency of the Institution, having resided in the place now before and not found wanting. And also to afford abundant opportunity, not only for a thorough English Classical and Ornamental Education, but to afford facilities for the proper accomplishment of Natural Instrumental Music How judiciously the trust has been reperson, is unquestionably evident from the fact that a single, the interest taken in her welfare, and the unanimous solicitude for the success of the Institution on the part of this. Her happy temperament, composure, dignity, greatness of mind, patience, and self-possession, combined with her varied attainments and refined conscientiousness, eminently qualify her for the responsibleness, and rector her a valuable guide to young ladies."

"H. M." AND ROBBINS REMOVED.

JOHN BULL, long prided himself upon his ancestor Robbins, who gave up the world to retire to a picturesque local habitation, and such a romantic name, that even his advertisements of country seats to be sold was like reading the last page of one of the Annals of Paradise. And following the current into which the school-boy naturally drifts, the name Lounger and his readers, every man who has too much money and a taste for country life, will be delighted to hear of the advantageous change in the fortunate purchaser of a certain country seat described by a certain "H. M." Robbins. Previous to previous style even that of the famous Robbins dwindle and grow pale.

After quoting the houses and barns in careful detail, "H. M." immediately spreads his wings and soars into the empyrean, where, with a view to avoid it is clear whoever means to send his children to the school to which the Lounger has interduced his friend, should very well like to make the his residence as his home:

"The scenery around this place presents a perfect panorama; in front of the house the turnpike, the railroad, the river, and the canal of the Navigation Company enliven the scene. The tides are navigable, the steamers are beautiful, the roads good, and the country beyond description; some of the summer views surpassing in beauty and grandeur, the romantic drives along the ——. Within a contemplation that may be had of the acknowledge and worship the Deity; seeing, as all must, from the mountain tops, and by the water's edge, the mighty, the greatness and goodness of an all-wise and benificent Creator. It, however, is not enough to be thought necessary to worship the Almighty through the forms created by weak and erring mortals, as many religious denominations can be found within a very short distance; every denomination could be heard in the village for miles. In regard to education, the public schools are close at hand; in addition to which, the commercial seminary of the Rev. Mr. ——, for young ladies, and the Academy of the Rev. Mr. ——, for young gentlemen, are, are but four miles from the place, and highly recommended by numerous scholastic testimonials. At either of these institutions a polished and accomplished education may be obtained. To fully appreciate this place it must be seen, as no one can properly describe it."

TO THE FRIENDS OF PICKLED OYSTERS.

ALTHOUGH NEW-YEAR'S Day has just passed, there will yet be many years, and other days of festal visiting. And while such men as Lounger and myself will be other and a still increasing number of friends of pickled oysters, it will still thank the Lounger for a word in season, and for bringing under their eyes the following lukewarm circular in relation to the esteemed bivalves. We do not regard for the next year as for the recent occasion; for which we can especially plead the plea, that it merely continues the charming vein of advertisements upon which the Lounger has this week fortunately fallen:

"Mr. and Mrs. ——

"The approaching Holidays may bring to your table many things connected therewith.

Pickled Oysters & Boned Turkeys, is having become a pretty general thing to have these two dishes on New-Year's day guests.

"I believe that I have the largest and finest, selected a very choice lot of OYSTERS for pickling: a new large, no coarse, fishy taste, but sweet and delicate flavor; are two pints in producing superior pickled Oysters. Next, the Oyster must receive particular attention, and known by everybody, though many say they know, the other essential point is the preparation.

"Your oft repeated orders, together with testimonials in the form of Diplomas awarded, and now in my possession, are the evidences I present as to the quality of my pickled Oysters.

"Your order is respectfully solicited early, that you may be better served.

"Evening, Wedding and other Parties supplied with Lunch, Confectionery, Attendants and every requisite."

ENTERTAINMENT FOR MAN AND BEAST.

THE preceding advertisements of every kind of Journey for the human race remind the Lounger of the famous Pompeii circular, which is the most perfect of all offered to the eager traveler in Europe.

WHEN it was first sent to the world, a merry party who had gone out from Naples on a bright May morning, a few years ago, they laughed so long and loud that they can well believe Vesuvius still recalls the echo of their shouts; and they equally recall remembrance of the Vine-Clad Hill, which upon its side, when they came to settle for their little dinner of wine, bread, and fruit.

IT was printed side by side with a French copy of which it is a literal translation.

A RESERVED LIFE FOR A DEVOTED LOVE.

"KEPT BY FRANK FREEPORT.

"Forms the Military Quarter

"AT PEDRO.

"That hotel open every day for days, is reserved for the cleanness of the apartments and linen; for the courtesy of the waiters, for the moderation of the prices, for the true French-cookery: Being situated at proximity of the encampments, it is the rendezvous of the officers, whether, which will desire to reside alternatively into that town, or to come there, when they are found, and to breathe thither the salubrity of the air.

"That establishment will avoid to all the travellers, visitors, of Pedro, the annoyance of the guides, drilling draw the anticipated a great disorder, occasioned by the lazy, and accompanied with a great loss of time. Also one will find quickly thither, a complete assortment of stranger shoes, and of the best manufacture, as boots, shoes, sandals, and coach-houses, the whole with very moderated prices.

"Now, all these conditions, and endowments of the hotel, will tend always, to correspond to the tastes and desires, of those customers, for whose interest without doubt, to him, into that town, the reputation whome, is attached.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S BOOK.

IN his preface Dr. Livingstone says that he is not a literary man, and does not know how to write a book, and therefore he has taken the time of the most valuable and interesting books of modern travel. His modesty in this unique excellence—that it is a positive addition to the interest with which he deals with new facts, and consequently it has a direct influence upon the true theories of races and destinies.

It is full of adventure in a book in which it always interesting; and the simple style of the narrative is as good a setting for the unconscious heroism of the author as could be found in the English. There is no line so savage that his rear or shake into frightful Doctor Livingstone out of his presence of mind. He calmly proceeds to write, and in the language of the king of beasts; and when he is out of it he correct it to the more appropriate word "majesty" as a characteristic of the rear of that animal.

INDEED the book finds so much of absolute interest in all he meets, and in all he does, that cool and calm, that he has no occasion for epistles of romance. The simple narrative of his daily methods of life, are so dissimilar to all our own that the description is romance enough. Living, alone contents the author of the stories of Zebehr, don Cumming, whom he knew in Africa, and to whom he frequently refers for comparison.

Besides the constant necessary adventure of such life in an utterly wild land, the great interest of the book consists in the view it gives us of the mere chances for the civilization of the future.

DR. LIVINGSTONE traversed the African continent and crossed it; and his observations upon the African races, their capacity and possible development, are of the profoundest interest. He is a missionary by or dull in his work. He was so heartily in earnest in his mission, that he was never in a hurry and he say thing but commonplace. You perceive, and honor the sun throughout; and you secretly say to yourself, "I wish Livingstone were in a mission-ary." If there were more such, Heathendom would shortly be in better case.

IT seems that the English Government understand the value of such a subject as Dr. Livingstone, and will soon have a line of steamers at each of its contemplated journey up the Zambesi.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S further travels will push through all the African mysteries, including the equator, and pass from the Cape of Good Hope to the Nile.

OUR LETTER-BOX.

IF all who have the charge of letter-boxes are as much pleased with the contents of their letters as he does not wonder at the anxiety displayed by multitudes of the fashionable, gayer, and more wealthy of each new Administration, to be appointed to the delightful post, or at the singular tenacity with which they hold on to the office when once in possession.

WE have not, indeed, like the more fortunate Lounger, the opportunity of looking into all the letters which are dropped into the box; but the very consciousness of that privilege is a suggestion which conveys such pleasure to their fellow-creatures, that the Lounger is sometimes tempted to the fectionate natures of the official Loungers of the government whose class of sensible philanthropists by whom our happy republic is so eminently blessed, of—simple, disinterested citizens! They have no other aim than to confer happiness upon their fellow-beings!

"BROTHER, January, 1858.

"MR. LOUNGER,—From some little indication that I have occasionally seen exhibited in your magazine I intend to reform the absurd thing generally ago, and I feel encouraged you will give me the aid and endeavor to reform one of the most detestable nuisances that ever existed in a country like ours. Many of the unfortunate females who are compelled by force or circumstances to ply the streets of this city, and more particularly of New York in the beats of the Fulton Ferry Company? No doubt you are aware that the disorderly dressed she may be, but what must suffer from being compelled to walk through the streams of tobacco juice that are constantly spirted from the non-receptacular lips of a very large majority of the 'Lords of Creation' that throng this great thoroughfare.

"They do not seem satisfied in subjecting us to the trouble of clearing our skirts from the huge balls of quid tobacco that are scattered in profusion from one end of the boats to the other, but oftentimes compel us to make a sickle-deep through streams of filth that would disgust a Hottentot. I would suggest to the managers of the Ferry Company the propriety of compelling the same delinquents (including from the ladies' cabin Sabbath) observe that they use the spittoons, provided evidence enough can be found for the offence by taking. If men are determined to be hogs, they should be confined to the pens in which where they can puff its fragrance and extract its essence without inflicting a nuisance of malice to the benefit of others. It is a nuisance that can not be longer tolerated; and unless the Ferry Company will take some steps in the matter the ladies of New York and Brooklyn to take into consideration the propriety of applying to the Ferry Company of the appropriate a boat for the exclusive use of their lady patronage, and to which the gentlemen will have no objection, as they will be accommodated even those who are now compelled by the magnitude of the boats, and a desire to appear fashionable, to forego a trip to New York, in consequence of the unendurable nuisance of the tobacco accommodations afforded them.

"I now offer this in a cause of this kind will give your lady friends every encouragement to hope that ere they can be in the dangers ever ready to protect them in their rights, and will be prepared to battle manfully in their behalf in rendering a grievous wrong.

"Yours, &c. A MERCHANT'S BROTHER."

—MR. Brookhurst may be very sure of the Lounger's hearty co-operation and assistance in this good work. He will most cordially advocate the calling of such a meeting, and he hereby invites Mayor Wood to call it, and to fulfill the hope that his re-election has excited, to bring the matter before the public, and to preside over the discussion in meeting.

AND when the Ferry Company, with their notorious readiness of compliances with the public will, have established a separate boat for the ladies, Mr. Lounger submits to Mr. Melinda, whether he will not be entitled to the privilege of making his voyages to Brooklyn in such a boat.

MEANWHILE, in anticipation of that bright result, he will send his correspondent to hearing the matter with their own weapons, by helping smoke them out of the places they now infest.

"CHRISTMAS DAY 1857.

"I inclose in this my subscription. My wife desires that she were remembered, as she says she could not get along go without it. Saying the Loungers department is worth the price of subscription, I am sure it is good health and better acquaintance in my best bumper of egg-nogg. More I have to say when I see you next.

"May he is to improve the present age by his Wisdom will succeed to the work and see his grate grate grand children profit by his wisdom and virtue.

"Send it around to your seventy five thousand Subscribers my best wishes and a multiply of the stamps and to gratefully contented admirers as your

"OLD FRIEND."

—The Lounger will not mention his friend's name; but he thanks him with the same sincerity with which he writes, and will ask him one question.

DR. KANE once said in the hearing of the Lounger, that one bitter day when his little vessel was fast in the shadow of the great Greenland glacier, he was sitting and writing absorbed in a book he was reading. His interest was so profound that his Doctor was compelled to call him to his couch to be, and upon going up to him and asking him, the sailor answered "Pendennis."

NOW, dear Mr. Lounger's friend, suppose Thackeray was more pleased to hear of the last little baby than to know that Prince Albert had been reading the same story in Buckingham Palace?

SING SING, Jan. 3, 1855.

MR. LOUNGER,—Your "Old Bachelor Contributor," wishes me to inform you that I have duly enumerated the different kinds mentioned in the Bible. I subjoin them, to add a quota toward completing the list. Years truly,

A BENEDICT.

The Kine of Salutation..... Rev 3 Sam. xx. 41.
The Kine of Benevolence..... Ps. xc. 2.
The Kine of Approbation..... 1 Prov. ii. 12.
The Kine of Valedictory..... Rom. ii. 9.
The Kine of Subjection..... 1 Ps. ii. 12.
The Kine of Affection..... Prov. xvi. 13.
The Kine of Affection..... 1 Gen. xx. 15.
The Kine of Treachery..... Matt. xxiv. 49.

Bohemian Walks and Cafés.

"BOHEMIA IN NEW YORK."

A JOURNAL which I always read with pleasure, the Daily Times, has lately published a graphical chronicle of Bohemians in this city, dealing with them tenderly, kindly, and in a thoroughly good-humoured way. I quite indorse the conclusion to which the writer arrives, that—

"Any one who will cultivate a familiarity with any kind of coarse and honest art, or any sort of regular employment, has it in his power to enjoy and actually to exist in the company of the Bohemians. They are seductive in their manners, they hold the finest sentiments, and have a distinctive aversion to all that is mean or low in morals, or coarse or malignant. Still, the Bohemian can not be ranked as a member of society, and it is not an encouraging sign for us that the tribe has become so numerous among us as to form a class of distinguishable citizens, who do not object to being called by that name."

I can not, however, agree with the premises laid down, that the "Bohemian is either an artist or an author whose special success is work;" that he is "one for living from day to day;" and that he must always have done something better than true, the Bohemian must be an artist or an author, but not necessarily an unsuccessful thing. Nor, or a lazy one. Let me mention the names of a few Bohemians of my acquaintance, such as BAYARD TAYLOR, PLANCHE, DURIVAGE, the elder, LESLY, WYATT, and Commodore STOCKTON. Have they been unsuccessful? VIVIER is the richest of them all, and has no fixed habitation. If you desire to meet him you must leave a note addressed to the cigar shop in the Boulevart des Italiens, making an appointment in the Café de Helder. In London the Bohemians have had in their ranks CHARLES DICKENS, WILKIE COLLINS, ROGERS (of the Times), ALBERT SMITH, the brothers BROUGH, JOHN LEECH, and a host besides—in fact, almost every author whose name is known on this side of the Atlantic. It is the Bohemian spirit which gave us the MOORE, Weller, Mr. Richard Swiveller, Mr. Montague Tigg, and a thousand other of Dickens's splendid portraits in full surface water; while we need hardly refer to Mr. Micawber and to Mr. Harold Skimpole, to show that he continues his life-studies from the Bohemian point, and that perhaps he has not a Bohemian could have given us these exquisite human stupes! "Dombey and Son" is not a Bohemian could have "done" the Bilker for the foibles of Albert Smith? Who but a Bohemian could have touched it as the author of "Punch" touched it? Have they been shown any aversion to work? Why, they have been industry, and spent much time in taverns, and the streets, and the fields, but I could name now the chief of the London Bohemians, whose labors extend over a greater number of hours in the whole year than any mechanic in the United States, except, perhaps, the printers employed upon the daily papers. Likewise could I give the names of Bohemians in New York, whose works are well-known in every home. The broad difference between the Bohemian worker and other workers is not that the former takes, sometimes, rather odd hours in which to do his work. The distinction lay be in a fool; but he regards the majority with contempt, and does not relish them as he does Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, and DICK STEELE were all more enjoyable than the worst Bohemians of the present day.

THE true Bohemian I think I have already defined to be one who is a worker in any profession, with no particular attachment to any abiding place, with no particular affection, or respect for conventionalities or forms, or of persons, with no reverence or shame, or false pretence or nonsense of any kind. He is one who cannot help but like humanity, be the man, or militate against his success, or induce him to hypocrisy—because—that is, if any literary man or artist, without other resources than his salary or his copyright property, were to write a book that he simply endeavored to define, by an arbitrary standard, what a Bohemian was, he would know nothing of rules whatever, and who are therefore utterly Bohemian besides.

I DO not write this in self-defense, as every one will see. The papers to which this distinctive title has been affixed, as well, as heretofore, wander, gipsy-like, still, or gallop over a great variety of subjects, and it is that element of discursiveness which is the soul of Bohemianism. Besides, I do not think that even the Times writer would object to being called a Bohemian, when he thoroughly understands the definition of the term. I am quite sure I should not.

A DIT OF ADVICE.

A correspondent desires to know how he shall escape being swindled by the omnibus-drivers, or suffering it in the city railways.

REPLY.

A HINT FOR NEW BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARIES.

BOWLEGS, W., Esquire. I do not intend to give an extended biographical sketch of the eminent Bowlegs, gentleman whose name I have mentioned; but, actuated by a sincere desire to assist the honorable who are now at work upon new biographical dictionaries, I will add a few items to the gay deceased tribute to a gallant band of the defenders of our country's glory. I have picked out a bit of information about William from the Washington correspondence of one of the dailies.

Nobody reads the Washington correspondence, and I only lighted upon this in a moment of despair when I had finished the elegant extracts of the money-market, neither of which departments is of the slightest interest to me, for obvious reasons. William, it will be remembered, is a Florida soldier of whisky and slayer of white men. He inhabits some outlandish country, I have picked out a list of cavalry, and infantry, and militia, and volunteers have been sent after him. I suppose that the efforts to dislodge Mr. Bowlegs from his new natural Uncle at least half a million of dollars. He has had like Uncle Sam, Secretaries of Pochuton, or Osceola, or any of the "big Indians" of former days. He is only a whisky-drinking old blackguard in Southern Florida. Some time ago he found himself in a tight place, and surrendered. He paid his white to Gen. Jesup, and left Washington, and gave his parole d'honneur that he would take himself off to some lands which were reserved for him west of the Mississippi. I suppose he must have become corrupted by his stay in the Capital, for he broke his parole, and sent word to Great Jesup that he couldn't think of leaving Florida while the whisky held out. This took place over two years ago, and since that time all sorts of efforts capture Mr. B. have been unsuccessful. At last, however, Gen. Harney has made a treaty with Mr. Bowlegs, Mr. Bowlegs and some of her female friends. At the head of one hundred and fifteen men this gallant band of battle-fighters, with their squaws, over five squaws, and thirteen children—the eldest child seven years old—started and killed one Indian—and off! One of the squaws had Mr. Bowlegs's dagger-type, taken in Washington, and the conclusion is that Mr. Bowlegs is dead, and that Harney can't be for off. It seems, however, that the brave army retreated to camp. Captured two of the squaws and the women and children, and killing the boy two years old, was glory enough for one day. The dispatch says that the command deserve great commendation, etc., etc. We hope they will get it; and we hope that Harney will not leave the land dead of killed and wounded to regret. The country cannot afford to lose the services of heroes who capture squaws and children, and kill Indians. The great achievement is only paralleled by the grand campaign of Captain Scott, commanding at Greytown and the seizure of Walker and his men at Pasta Arenas. In both the last-named brilliant battles no lives were lost on our side, and the officers and men behaved in the most gallant manner. I hope that Congress will vote all of them swords, or thanks, or medals, or something of that sort; and as I see that some Pawnee Indians are soon to visit this city, I would recommend that the smallest, tenderest child in the group should be mounted in the Park, under the direction and supervision of the Common Council. Meanwhile let the young in Dorcas stick to hunting the female members of the Bowlegs family. It is quite good sport, I have no doubt, and much safer than attacking the old rascal in his proper person.

BELIEVING BROADWAY.

I DON'T think the Arcade plan suggested lately in the Weekly will answer. Shops in Arcades are never popular. The Grand Passage in Brussels is the only exception. The Rue de Rivoli, perhaps the only Panorama, and the Passage de l'Opera, in Paris, are occupied chiefly by small dealers. The grand shops are on the Boulevards, in the Rue Vivienne, the Rue de Richelieu, and the Rue de la Paix. The carriage way in our chief avenue is wide enough if we were not bored by an overplus of omnibuses, which saunter lazily along at the rate of two miles an hour. Why should not half these nuisances be obliged to drive up the side streets, and turn into Broadway at Union

THE LOW DOG. THE FAST DOG.

Square? To make it perfectly fair, the several lines might be divided so that they could take Broadway on alternate days. There would still be omnibuses enough for the public in Broadway, while persons who had a long distance to ride would get over the ground much faster, because the omnibus-drivers being of a speculative inquiring, and imaginative turn of mind, as well as extremely social in their habits, have so much swearing, and talking, and looking at the shops, or fights, or horses who have fallen down, or exchanging salutations with numerous Bills and Jims in a crowded thoroughfare, that their progress is considerably impeded. I hope that the new Mayor does not owe any omnibus snuff, and that as soon as he gets through with Mr. Flagg's figures he will look into the matter, and also do away with the nuisance of a crowd of omnibuses in front of the places of amusement at night.

ANOTHER SMALL NUISANCE.

"Boots of the Opera, Sir! Book of the Opera! Book of the Opera!!" That's the entr'acte at the Academy every night. It must be trapped altogether, or else the artists must be out of front to sell the books. The words might be bearable if arranged in a cadaletta, and sung by Madame de la Grange, as Mary Taylor used to sing "Hot Corn" long ago; but the youths who chant them now have singularly bad voices, and are shockingly out of time and tune. Away with them!

DOGOGRAPHS.

BY A FAST YOUNG PUPPY.

I.—THE LOW DOG.

His name is Towzer, alias Pincher, alias Boxer, alias Dash, alias Now-then, alias Here-you, alias Get-out, alias Come-out-of-that. He has also been called S-s-s-t. He is of a mongrel breed—as you could S-s-s-t. He is of a mongrel breed—as you could see by his ears—but aristocratic dogs looked down upon him in his most prosperous days. He was born in a neighborhood known by the euphonious name of "Back-alleys," and his mother and father made their living in ways not recognized by, and scarce to be mentioned to, the ears polite of reputable dogs. The one found her means of subsistence among the offal and garbage of the street; while the other—rather a vicious dog in his way—was an adroit thief, always upon the alert to pry into neglected markets, baskets, and known and feared of the corner butchers, from whose stalls he had made a stolen meal.

In his puppy days, our low dog was bright and quick. His sportive gambols won him many a kindly glance, and more than an occasional bone, from the dwellers in his street. And there was a time when, had the little puppy fallen into proper hands, he would have been something better. But posit ostentatiously in its coat pocket a sausage, wrapped in a handkerchief, the end of which was permitted to stick out in view of our low dog's hungry eyes. The master turned his attention to another part of the room. Driven by hunger, Towzer made his way cautiously to the lay-figure, and, leaping one eye upon his master, who pretended to be looking out of the window, carefully and silently drew the handkerchief and coveted sausage from the pocket. Three gulps put down the last, and then Towzer, looking up guiltily, found the eye of his master fixed upon him in an approving smile.

In short, Towzer had taken his first lesson in picking pockets. His new master had discerned in him an apt scholar—and he was not deceived. A few weeks' training sufficed to make our low dog an expert at his new business; and now he was started out at ten o'clock each day, on an empty stomach, to work for his dinner—which was earned by it when he had carried to his master at least a dozen handkerchiefs.

Towzer rather liked the excitement of his profession. But one day a watchful policeman saw him in the act of making off with a pocket-handkerchief, followed him, and caught both him and his master. Towzer's master was jagged, Towzer was cast upon the world with the habits of a bad trade upon him, fell into ill hands, lost character upon the street, sunk lower and lower till even his former companions disowned him; and, finally, having contracted all manner of bad habits, became a confirmed and notorious market-loafer, brawler, and common thief. His will to get rid of his career by a violent death; in fact, he would probably have been shot ere this, had any one thought him worth the necessary powder.

II.—THE FAST DOG.

The fast dog is something of a braggart, and tells his own story:

"I am sick of life—sick as a dog. I have exhausted every pleasure in it, and am prepared to say that the world is a bore. Nothing excites me; nothing amuses me. If you were to get up, for my especial gratification, a concert of sixteen cats and fiddles; if you were to train a whole herd of cows to jump over the moon in my presence; if you were to take me to a coursing match, where the swiftest of gravy-spoons should be hunted by a pack of thorough-bred dishes—none of these exciting sports would make this dog laugh.

"I am a British dog. I need not tell you this, for your true-born Briton is recognized at once. He is superior to all other beings. I come of one of the first families in the land—am, in fact, one of those envied dogs who may be said to be born with silver shovels in their mouths. My habitual residence through life has been in the smuggest corner of the comfortable land of Clover. I have been nourished exclusively on that agreeable oleaginous compound known as the 'fat of the land.' My first draught of milk was taken in the lap of Luxury. I have never had the slightest distemper; and can lay my paw on my heart and affirm, on the honor of a Blenheim, that I never saw a flea in my life!

"I was the eldest and handsomest of a litter of five; the other four brats were drowned. It is the fashion—which is as much as to say the law—among dogs of high birth to sacrifice the majority of a family to the interests of one favored member. Some two-legged people in Britain have the like fashion, I have been informed.

"Of course I was brought up by hand. My mother, being high-born, was delicate, and could not be expected to take the trouble of nursing me. Besides, in our station in life family ties do not count for much, and we have long ago done away with squeamish affections.

"Having grown up into a handsome dog—as it was quite natural I should—I became a member of the family of Lady Flora Puglove; pleased with the thought of there seeing something of life, and earning the distinctions which I coveted.

"I have heard in my time a great deal of nonsense about the fidelity of the dog. I dare say it may be a very necessary virtue among the lower canine orders. For my own part, I admit frankly that I was always remarkably fickle in my affections. I got tired of Lady Flora in a fortnight. Her lavish attentions bored me, and, after all, her society was not strictly fire-flashes. Among her visitors was a lovely marchioness (who shall be nameless) whose manner pleased me very much. I determined to effect her conquest. She was fond of handsome puppies; it soon became evident that she was pining for me. I timed matters correctly—bit Lady Flora in the finger on the very morning when my Countess came modestly to make known to that lady her love for me. In her indignation Lady Flora yelled me—and I was happy.

"But I soon got tired. I got tired of everything, in fact—tired of worrying Angora cats and pet Canaries, of killing parrots and wounding the calves of favorite footmen. Tired eventually of my Countess—who also tired of me, and gave me away. I began going down hill. Fast Dogs do, I have noticed, at a certain period of their lives; and perceiving this I did what Fast Dogs under such circumstances generally do—made love to a rich old lady, with a view to settling myself in life. I was successful, as usual. She adopted me—died, and left me a fortune during my lifetime, with two servants to wait upon me. They have the care of me, and of course are my slaves. We have been traveling for a little wholesome excitement. But I am tired of it.

"I am tired of writing, too."

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXV.

(From our own Correspondent.)

An Accident and a Delay.—The Euphrates Railway.—Lake the Physician.—The Start for Antioch.—A romantic Adventure.—Six beautiful Ladies.—An American or English Lady among the Armenians.—A strange Interview.—The Ladies disappear.—Arrival at Antioch.—Who is she?

ALEXANDRETTA is, as you probably recollect, the proposed terminus on the Mediterranean of the new railway to the Euphrates Valley, and I confess that I have great confidence in the ultimate completion of this road.

In old papers that have from time to time reached me from America, I have seen curious speculations about a railway in Holy Land, and writers have suggested that Jerusalem and other places would be important stations on the line. I know not out of what these notions have grown. No railway project is known of in the East which has a line within a hundred miles of Jerusalem; nor does it seem probable that within knowledge of the present generation there will be a rail laid in what is properly Holy Land. But if this line be completed which is now sincerely projected, it will be curious enough to go over it, especially for those who have in former years traversed these countries on horseback, and with slow baggage trains.

How would Lake, the good doctor of old Antioch, be astounded by a railway train! I fancy that even he would have been puzzled to attend to the exigencies of a collision! And then to run by Aleppo at express speed, and be landed on the bank of the Euphrates in the evening of the same day you left the sea-coast!

I had a tedious time of it in getting up to Antioch.

On the day that I rode out to the battle-field of Issus, my mare, in crossing a dense, thorny cover that I was forced to take, hurt her off fore foot, and when I reached the town was dead lame. The poor creature, with the determination that her breed is so celebrated for, shored no sign of injury so long as I was on her. She must have borne great pain all the way home, for I found a thorn run nearly into the joint, and it was marvelous she did not fall with me. The accommodations at Alexandretta were of the vilest. Our English friends had the only tolerable rooms in the caravanseras, to which, by using blankets and Persian carpets, and shawls and cloaks, they imparted something of an air of comfort, but John and myself slept on the ground floor, in a hole that I was ashamed to bring my horse into.

For I did bring her in as soon as I ascertained her condition. The night was cold, and I was alarmed by the nature of the wound. We all slept together, therefore, that night, as indeed we had done a great many times before.

The next morning she was doing well; but on the third day, seeing that it was out of the question for me to go, I sent the party off, promising to come up to Antioch in as few days as the animal's injury would permit.

I had a lonely time of it in that little town for a week. Occasionally I rode out on a donkey to the battle-field, and sometimes I climbed the steep hill-sides and looked off over the sea and around the sweep of the northeast corner of the Mediterranean, striving to catch glimpses of the hills near Tarsus, but in vain.

At last she was well, and I tried her a day on the beach, and another day on the hills, and then started for the old city of grandeur and of fame, where the disciples were first called Christians.

We left Alexandretta in the early morning, thinking to reach Antioch by evening. The distance can scarcely be forty miles, and although the roads are not exactly fit for a fast gait, one would suppose we could have accomplished that in a day. And we should have done so under ordinary circumstances, but an incident occurred on the way which not only delayed us over the night, but which was, and still is, a puzzle to both Selim and myself, nor have we found any one in Antioch who is able to explain it to us.

We had crossed a ridge and were descending to a plain that stretches away to the northeast, rattling along at a somewhat better pace than usual, when from a sort of cross-ravine dashed out a party of men, twenty-two in all, dressed in a costume approaching more nearly that of the Mount Lebanon Druses than any other Orientals that I have hitherto seen. They were the Nizam dress, that is, the broidered jacket and flowing trousers, and their faces were wrapped up in white cloths, giving them the appearance of dead men on horseback, with the grave bandages still on them, only their black eyes flashed out on us.

They were around us in an instant, and we were captured without so much as a chance to make any resistance. It was altogether an inglorious affair. I am sorry to be obliged to write it, but I must, if I would be a faithful historian of my own adventures.

Yielding to the inevitable necessity of the occasion, we acknowledged ourselves captives, and sat silently waiting the demonstrations of the enemy. Very singularly there was not a man among them that could speak any language that we knew, and it was impossible for us to exchange a word with them. They spoke what I supposed to be Armenian, but it was of a barbarous sort, if there be any such, for out of a dozen or so of Armenian words that Selim and I could produce between us, they could not understand one; and it was by dint of the most unmistakable signs—to wit, their taking our horses' bridles and leading us—that we were informed that they desired our company.

"Neele must go when the devil drives, Selim," said I; and Selim appreciated the proverb, though he had never heard it, and grunted a guttural "Inshallah," which is an Arabic way of saying the same thing.

I have not space to give you details of the adventure. They led us up and down the passes until, at sunset, we found ourselves in a wild gorge of the hills, and approaching an encampment of a dozen tents.

One of these was larger than the others, and before it a guard was standing, indicating that a person of rank was within the curtains. To this we were led, and they beckoned us to dismount. I obeyed, and entered the tent, accompanied by two of the guard. The interior was a splendid affair. Curtains of the richest silks hung over the upper part, and the ground was covered with the rarest and richest Persian carpets. An odor of delicate perfumes filled the air. The cushions were of splendidly embroidered silk, and altogether the view was astonishing and bewildering.

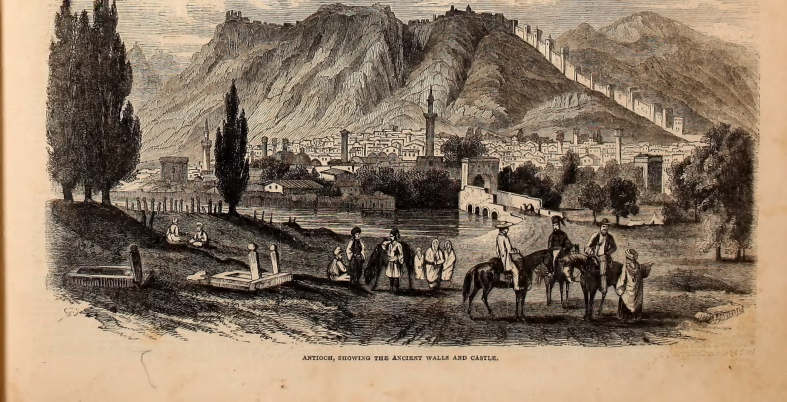
The guards who entered with me bowed their heads and covered their faces as they entered. It was none of my business to follow their example, and I looked boldly around me.

The tent was occupied by half a dozen ladies, of whom one was chief, and also chief of the men who had captured me. This was sufficiently evident by the deference paid to her. I was not so much struck with this, however, as with her splendid beauty. She was not young, that is to say, she was perhaps forty; but her complexion was faultless, her eyes were blue as the sky, her lips were red, her whole bearing was queenly. It is seldom that such women are seen in the East, and still less frequently are they seen as this lady was, with face uncovered.

She addressed me in Arabic, and I replied in the same tongue.

"I trust that my people have not too much delayed your journey by bringing you to see me?"

"If it was by your orders that they have acted I have no complaint to make, but, on the contrary, I have to thank them."



"You are kind"—and she waved her hand to her guard, who vanished, leaving me alone with the ladies. five lustrous girls, who now obeyed their mistress's example, and threw off the veils from their dazzling faces. Imagine my astonishment and perplexity; but imagine, if you can, my overwhelming wonderment when the lady addressed me in as plain English as you talk in New York!

I must pass over this evening rapidly, for were I to relate to you every word of the conversation, which lasted till after midnight, you would in no wise wiser than I am about my fair hostess or captor. We talked of every thing under heaven except herself; for, whenever my questions were that way inclined, she checked me with a smile, and turned to other topics. She had been in New York, in Boston, in Philadelphia. She had been, too, in many European cities. I could not even tell whether she was English or American. As the evening advanced we had a delicate supper that would have done honor to the Place Vendome in its best days, and a cup of coffee that Very never equaled.

The other ladies chatted away in Armenian, or whatever was the unknown tongue that the men had used, and sometimes they gathered around their beautiful mistress and listened, wondering with large eyes wide open, to the unintelligible talk of their lady and the stranger. I wish, for the benefit of your lady readers, that I could describe their dresses; but I should fail in that. Their white necks and shoulders and flashing eyes, as they

PILGRIMS ENCAMPED NEAR ANTIOCH.

ANTIOCH, SHOWING THE ANCIENT WALLS AND CASTLE.

grouped around their queenly mistress, made a picture in Oriental life that I shall not soon forget.

We parted at an hour after midnight. She did not tell me why she had sent for me, and I anticipated further revelations in the morning. The morning came, and I awoke in the tent which had been assigned to me, threw open the curtain to look out, and found myself alone. Tents, guard, and ladies had vanished.

I called aloud, and Selim sprang to his feet from among the low brush that grew near at hand. Shortly afterward one man appeared, leading two mules. He made signs that I was to mount my own horse, and I obeyed. Selim and he struck the tent, packed it and the splendid cushions on which I had slept, and laid them on the mules, and we took up our line of march. In three hours' time our eyes were greeted with a burst of splendor—the full sunshine on the old walls of Antioch.

While we paused to look at them, the stranger slipped something into the hand of Selim and disappeared. The latter handed me a piece of folded paper on which were written, in a very good and rather English hand, these words:

"We are all travelers. You should not be without a tent in this country. Accept one from me, who have to thank you for a pleasant evening and for news from home."

The last word was blotted as if she had begun to write another and then had chosen this.

Such was my adventure, and I submit it to you, if it is not a strange one, sounding like a page out of the Arabian Nights. If you know of any English or American lady that is just now playing the Lady Hester Stanhope in the East, perhaps you can enlighten our ignorance. But, for the present, I and all whom I meet in Antioch, are alike unable to solve the mystery. As for the tent, I'll be hanged if I know what to do with it. But for it and the cushions and the two mules, I believe John Steenburger would think the whole story a fiction, but he knows that such silk does not grow in Iskanderoon. I must leave for my next my sketches of Antioch.

LITERARY.

THE admirers of Mrs. Sigourney—and they are numbered in this country and Europe by thousands—will welcome another book from her pen. LUCY HOWARD'S JOURNAL (published by Harper & Brothers) is an exceedingly delicate and delicious story of the life of an American girl, from the earliest childhood to the mature woman of twenty-two. The blank pages of the Diary which she commences are the pages of the child's future history. Page by page she writes them over as life brightens or blots the days and years. In the whole we have a faithful record of the inner home life of our countrywomen when our mothers were young, in the first part of this century. The very accomplished author suffers no errors of thought or of ethics to mar her lessons. In sketching the life of Lucy Howard she teaches, as none knows better how to teach than she, the lessons of young life; and mothers and daughters will accept and value the book as a charming extract from their own past or present experiences. A year ago we expressed the wish, which we may be permitted here to renew, that Mrs. Sigourney may be long spared to continue her admirable works, and to enjoy the serene and peaceful hours of her "past meridian."

WHITE LIES, Charles Reade's last novel, now published complete by Ticknor & Fields, is exciting some attention in England, from its very "Frenchy" character. So decidedly Gaulish is it that the charge of plagiarism is openly made against it, though no one can put his finger on any origin. The book is remarkable in its character.

Mr. Reade's literary history has not been long, but it has certainly been brilliant. "Peg Woffington" promised great things, which "Christie Johnstone" and "Never Too Late to Mend" fulfilled. We are inclined to think, however, that this last book surpasses the others in character and plan. The plot of the story is ingenious, while it is purely French. The heroine, as in no other novel on earth that we recollect, marries one lover, and marries another while the first yet lives; keeps the secret of the second marriage from the first husband until fate discovers it; is divorced from the first lover, while the marriage with the second is confirmed; and in the end all parties are well satisfied. The book is spirited and Reade-like. Men and women talk like men and women, and not like puppets. Incidents happen very much as in commonplace life, but work out the romance as well as if they were lugged in by the ears. The writer, as usual, rejects all received rules of novel-writing, of rhetoric, and of grammar; but in the end makes a book which, like all he has written, possesses uncommon attractiveness.

White Lies has been dramatized in England, and Miss Laura Keene, of this city, has become possessed of the play, which can not fail to be popular if it has been even tolerably done. The plot is eminently dramatic and lively, full of amusing contretemps.

Ticknor & Fields send us Mayne Reid's PLANT HUNTERS, an admirable book for boys who love adventurous stories in which instruction is faithfully given with the fun and the incident. The Plant Hunters are botanists in the Himalaya country, who seek exotics for European hot-houses, and find elephants and tigers as well as strange trees and plants.

THE YOUNG COMMODORE (published by Sheldon & Blakeman) is also a capital book for the children. We think that we can trace in the story a sketch of the wanderings of the American squadron under Commodore Breese, two years ago, in the Mediterranean, two or three of the incidents being those of which we heard at the time. The hero is a boy who accompanies his father in a cruise, and sees a great many curious things which the boys will be delighted to hear of.

Ticknor & Fields also publish another sparkling book by Grace Greenwood, STORIES AND LEGENDS OF TRAVEL, FOR CHILDREN, in which she collects many of her pleasantest travel memories, and in which the young will be interested. These books—the Plant Hunters, The Young Commodore, and Stories and Legends—belong to the same class with Abbott's Histories and other similar books, which are far preferable for the use of the young, and much more acceptable and useful to children, than the small stuff of which their books are too often built.

In the same class we may place WILLIS THE PILOT; a Sequel to the Swiss Family Robinson, published by Mayhew & Baker, Boston. Few boys of the last twenty years have failed to experience the delight of reading "The Swiss Family Robinson." Next to "Robinson Crusoe," it is the most enticing book of children's reading. This sequel to it is very well done, abounding in adventure, and occasionally in fun. Boys that have grown up since they read the former book will not find this dull. The ingenious intermingling of amusement and instruction, which was a characteristic of its predecessor, is preserved in the sequel with much skill.

We have had lying on our table for some weeks past a small volume, which we have not noticed for lack of space, and which we must even now pass with few words. Dr. Seyfarth's SUMMARY OF RECENT DISCOVERIES IN EGYPTIAN CHRONOLOGY, etc. (with special reference to Dr. Abbott's Museum in New York), is worthy the careful perusal of all readers. Although differing essentially from the learned Doctor in his views as well of chronology as of interpretation, it is still with great pleasure that we recommend this little volume to the public as one of the first contributions of the American press to this most interesting subject.

Writing of hieroglyphics, we are reminded of an interesting fact which has recently come to our knowledge. The author of "Boat Life" brought down the Nile two papyri, which all readers know are the ancient manuscripts of the Egyptians. One of these he left with Dr. Abbott in Cairo, and the other he brought to America. The former has been sent by Dr. Abbott to England, and we have seen a letter from Sir Gardner Wilkinson, stating that the British Museum has purchased it for fifty pounds—a very respectable price for a manuscript. The papyri in the New York Museum are regarded as the most valuable in the world, not excepting the celebrated collection at Berlin.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

IN the Senate, on Monday, January 4, a resolution was introduced by Senator Davis to define the President's authority, under the recent Act to promote the efficiency of the navy. Senator Fessenden gave notice of a French Spoliation Bill. Senator Benjamin moved that 20,000 copies of the Dred Scott judgment be printed for the use of the Senate. Senator Fitzpatrick moved for all the documents relating to the arrest of Walker. Senator Pugh introduced a bill for the admission of Kansas to the Union. The bill provides for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton Constitution, with the same boundaries as were defined by the bill of the last Congress. It also requires that the seventh article of that Constitution, relative to Slavery, shall be submitted to the direct vote of the qualified electors on the 7th of April next, and that the returns of this election shall be made to the Governor of the Territory, instead of the President of the Convention; states that the election shall be conducted in obedience to the laws in force on the 7th of November last; also provides that the Constitution shall not be so construed as to limit or impair the right of the people to at any time call a Convention for the purpose of altering, amending, or abolishing their form of government, subject to the Constitution of the United States. Senator Brown began to speak on the Kansas question, but was interrupted by illness.——In the House Mr. Clingman, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, moved for the documents relating to Walker's arrest; and the resolution having been enlarged so as to include documents relating to Walker's operations prior to his last departure from the country was adopted, after a debate in which Messrs. Clingman, Ritchie, H. Marshall, Jones, Faulkner, Cochrane, Savage, and Kelsey took part. Various local matters were the subject of resolutions. Mr. Quitman asked but did not obtain leave to introduce a bill repealing certain sections of the Neutrality Laws. Mr. Cobb moved a resolution inquiring of the Committee on Territories whether the organic Act of Utah should not be repealed; adopted. A bill was introduced by Mr. Morrill and referred, after some debate, to the Judiciary Committee, to punish polygamy in the Territories.

On Tuesday, 5th, in the Senate, Senator Seward moved a resolution that the petition of Maillard, who claims to have been wronged in Ireland, be transmitted to the Secretary of State. Senator Fessenden obtained a reference of his French Spoliation Bill to a select committee. Senator Gwin submitted a resolution directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire into the expediency of accrediting a Minister to Japan.——In the House, which sat in Committee of the Whole on the Message, the various topics were proposed by Mr. G. Jones to be referred to the appropriate committees. Mr. Quitman moved, in amendment, that the reference to the Neutrality Laws be referred to a select committee; upon which debate ensued, in which Messrs. Quitman, Glancy Jones, Keitt, Stephens, Bocock, Clingman, Maynard, and Lovejoy took part.

On Wednesday, 6th, in the Senate, Senator Crittenden spoke in favor of his resolution for increasing the duty on imports. Senator Fitch moved, in amendment, to tax all bank-notes, so as to drive the small ones out of circulation. Both resolution and amendment were tabled. Senator Pugh presented a memorial from Ohio, praying for the establishment of a National Bank, with a thirty years' charter and $60,000,000 capital. Other local business was also transacted.——In the House, bills were reported by Glancy Jones, for the support of the Military Academy; and by Mr. Washburn, for the better protection of life on board steam vessels. Resolutions were reported by Mr. Clingman calling for documents relating to all differences and negotiations between the United States and Paraguay, New Granada and Brazil. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Message, and the debate on Walker's case was continued by Messrs. Sickels, Haskin, Stephens, Bliss, Bocock, and Gilmer.

On Thursday, 7th, Senator Seward presented to the Senate a petition from Canandaigua in favor of buying up the slaves of the South. Senator King moved for documents on emigration and its troubles; and Senator Foot for official correspondence on the affairs of China. A Message was likewise received from the President on the arrest of Walker, with accompanying documents. Senator Mason moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; motion adopted. Debate ensued on the Message, in which Senators Davis, Mason, Crittenden, Brown, Houston, Seward, Pugh, Toombs, Doolittle, Mallory, Douglas, and Pearce took part. The Senate then adjourned to Monday.——In the House, the debate on the arrest of Walker was continued by Messrs. Thayer, Adrian, and Washburn. The House then adjourned to Monday.

THE ADMINISTRATION PRONOUNCE AGAINST WALKER.

General William Walker has published a long and touching letter to the President, praying for redress for the wrongs he has suffered, defending his whole course, and closing with the following:

"As long as there is a Central American exiled from his native land, and deprived of his property and civil rights for the services he rendered us, in evil as well as good report, so long shall our time and our energies be devoted to the work of their restoration. As long as the bones of our companions in arms, murdered under a barbarous decree of the Costa Rican Government, lie bleaching and unburied on the hill-sides of Nicaragua, so long shall our brains contrive and our hands labor for the justice which one day we will surely obtain."

The sentiment of the Administration on the subject was given in the President's Message sent to the Senate on Thursday. As to Commodore Paulding, the President says:

"In capturing General Walker and his command, after they had landed on the soil of Nicaragua, Commodore Paulding has, in my opinion, committed a great error. It is quite evident, however, from the communications herewith transmitted, that this was done from pure and patriotic motives, and in sincere conviction that he was promoting the interests and vidicating the honor of his country. In regard to Nicaragua, she has sustained no injustice by the act of Commodore Paulding. This has enured to her benefit, and relieved her from a dread invasion. She alone would have any right to complain of the violation of her territory, and it is quite certain that she will never exercise this right. It unquestionably does not belong to her invaders to complain in her name."

But of Walker's expedition he says: "It well deserves the severe punishment inflicted upon it by our laws. It violates the principles of Christianity, morality, and humanity, held sacred by all civilized nations, and by none more than by the people of the United States. Disguise it as we may, such a military expedition is an invitation to reckless and lawless men to enlist under the banner of any adventurer to rob, plunder, and murder the unoffending citizens of neighboring States who have never done them harm."

He concludes with the remark: "The truth is, that no Administration can successfully conduct the foreign affairs of the country, in Central America or any where else, if it is to be interfered with at every step by lawless military expeditions set on foot in the United States."

THE SENATE IN EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate has confirmed the Sound Dues Treaty. The following officials have also been confirmed: Beverley L. Clarke, Minister to Guatemala; K. Isman, Consul to Vera Cruz; Thomas B. Stephenson, Judge of New Mexico; Theodore Sedgwick, United States District-Attorney at New York. It is stated that Mr. Pickens has been nominated Minister to Russia, and Belden, of Indiana, Commissioner to the Sandwich Islands.

THE NEWS FROM UTAH.

Late advices from Utah report the army well, but the cattle dying fast. It is said that the Mormons will resist to the last, and preparations are accordingly being made for a severe fight in the spring. Orders are issued and will be dispatched immediately for the First Cavalry and the Sixth Infantry, now in Kansas, and the Seventh Infantry, now in Texas, to hold themselves in readiness to march by the first of April to reinforce the army in Utah. The War Department has determined on sending immediately large reinforcements to the army now serving in Utah. This force will consist of four full regiments, which will be composed of both cavalry and infantry, with two light batteries of artillery. It is expected they will concentrate at Fort Leavenworth, and take up their line of march at an early day.

THE KANSAS IMBROGLIO.

No positive news of the result of the election of 4th has been received; but the latest telegrams from St. Louis assert that the election went off quietly, and that the Free-State men elected their ticket. Considerable excitement has been caused by the adhesion of Governor Wise, of Virginia, to the side of Senator Douglas. Some persons seem to think that Governor Denver will induce the Free-State party in Kansas to submit to the Lecompton Constitution.

MEETING OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Several State Legislatures have met during the week—among others, those of New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Maine. In the Legislature of Maryland the members, by a vote of forty-three to twenty-seven, resolved not to receive the Governor's Message, which, as they had discovered, contained injurious reflections on the party to which they belong.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

Governor King refers at great length to the revulsion, and recommends a law obliging the Banks to hold one-fourth of their liabilities in specie. In reference to the canals, he announces a deficit of $2,500,000, to meet which there is only the loan of half a million not yet negotiated. He considers the Metropolitan Police Act a signal success, and recommends the Legislature to follow it up. After referring briefly to other local matters, he closes with a review of the Kansas question, and the Lemmon slave case.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF OHIO.

Governor S. P. Chase sent his annual Message to the Legislature of Ohio on the 4th instant. The document goes pretty extensively into the affairs of the State, and descants on the subject of the finances. It also refers to the relations existing between the General and State Governments; and after a long account of the recent collisions of State and Federal authorities growing out of arrests of fugitive slaves, it refers at length, and with extreme warmth, to the dispute now pending in reference to Kansas.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Governor Banks, of Massachusetts, delivered his first annual Message to the Legislature of Massachusetts on 7th. The funded debt of the Commonwealth is $1,314,000. Provision has been made for $1,098,000 of this debt, leaving a balance of $215,000 unprovided for. The current expenses of the last year amounted to $1,362,503, and the receipts of the State from all sources were $1,483,166, of which $735,041 were raised by a State tax. The receipts from ordinary resources this year are estimated at $702,000. Unless the ordinary expenses of the current year can be reduced below the standard of last year there will be a deficit of $650,803, to be paid by a State tax equal to that amount. The banking capital of the Commonwealth is $60,319,720. The number of banking institutions is 173. The aggregate circulation of bank-notes is $18,104,827, and the aggregate amount of specie is $3,611,097, which is equivalent to one dollar in specie for every five dollars in paper. The Governor recommends the suppression of bank-notes under five dollars, and after the lapse of three or five years a suppression of notes under ten dollars, and the substitution of gold and silver. In regard to the naturalization laws the Governor says: "There can be no object of higher importance than that of determining upon what conditions the right of suffrage shall be conferred, and what legislative safeguards are necessary to maintain the purity of elections, and to protect the rights of American citizens. I shall cheerfully concur with you in such measures as you may judge expedient for that purpose." In regard to Kansas, after a review of recent events in that Territory, he says: "Nothing but the direct intervention of federal influence can force through Congress the Lecompton Constitution; and if the Government, with the sanction of the people, can force upon Kansas a Constitution conceived in fraud and violence, it will be the weightiest blow ever given against free governments."

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The Message of the Governor of Pennsylvania, which was sent in on 6th, treats chiefly of the State's finances, banks, and the tariff. It represents that the finances of Pennsylvania have not presented so satisfactory an aspect for a long time. During the year every demand upon the treasury has been promptly paid from the revenue derived from the ordinary sources. For the fiscal year the receipts of the Treasury, including the balance on hand, have been $5,935,000; expenditures, $5,407,000. The interest on the funded debt will be promptly paid, and that due in February will also be paid out of the available means now in the Treasury. Within the last three years the public debt, without resorting to temporary loans, has been $1,816,000. In reference to the suspension of the banks, he states that the amount realized from the banks by the payment of one-fourth of one per centum on the capital stock has defrayed the expenses of the extra session, leaving a balance of $35,000. He suggests a reform in the system of banking and management, and recommends a modification of the tariff to a more liberal protection of manufacturing, especially iron interests.

PERSONAL.

Governor Powell was elected United States Senator from Kentucky on 5th inst. He received 80 votes, Garret Davis 54, and Mr. Thompson 1.

A Boston correspondent of The Evening Post says: "Yesterday I had the pleasure of learning from Senator Sumner's own lips that he has no intention of resigning his seat in the Senate. There is not a man in Massachusetts with heart and head enough to fill Mr. Sumner's place, who does not earnestly wish that he may retain it, though he should not speak another word in it. They would as soon level Bunker Hill because that is silent. His history talks.

A Mobile paper remarks: "John Van Buren made a thrilling speech at the great Democratic meeting at Tammany Hall on the 23d, in support of the President's position on the Kansas question. He was severe in his censure of the disorganizing course of Senator Douglas. It sounds strange to hear John Van Buren rebuking Stephen A. Douglas for faithlessness to the Democratic platform, and defending the rights of the South against him.

Daniel Hicks, a soldier in the Revolution, died at his residence near Boydton, in Mecklenburg County, Virginia, on the 12th ult., in the 99th year of his age.

A communication in the Richmond Enquirer gives some interesting particulars of the history of Dr. Turnipseed, the young American physician to whom the Emperor Alexander recently sent the cross of St. Anne. The writer says: "During his sojourn at Sebastopol he won the admiration and personal regards of General Count Osten Sacken, who was the defender of the city, and who has testified to his fine merits in a letter written to the Russian Government."

The Rev. Dr. Gannett (Unitarian), the Rev. A. A. Miner (Universalist), the Rev. George Richards (Orthodox), the Rev. J. C. Stockbridge (Baptist), the Rev. Dr. Vinton (Episcopalian), and the Rev. S. H. Winkley (Unitarian), who delivered each a lecture last winter at Pitts Street Chapel, Boston (of which the Rev. Mr. Winkley, referred to above, is minister), from the text "What shall I do to be saved?" are to repeat the lectures in February and March next.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Transcript says that Dr. Mackay was lately called upon by an inventor with the model of a life-boat, and offered a hundred dollars if he would write a song about it. The Doctor acknowledging the liberal tender, declining the job, the applicant added a fifty by way of a higher bid, and, finding this did not inspire the muse, asked the poet if he thought Longfellow would undertake the commission at that price?

A Washington letter gives this sketch of Mr. Bernhisel, the delegate in Congress from Utah Territory:

The delegate is one of the most quiet and pleasant gentlemen in the House. In deportment, tone, and voice, person and countenance, he bears a striking resemblance to Robert J. Walker. He is a native of Pennsylvania. He looked haggard and worn after his long journey over the plains, on his first arrival, but has since recruited. Although he has been in the House for six years, I recollect hearing him speak but once, and that was to protest against any discussion of the social and domestic institutions of Utah. His forte is taciturnity. In private conversation he is fluent and agreeable. He is an industrious man of business, and attends faithfully to the interests of his constituents. He is rather short of stature. His head is nearly bald, but iron-gray locks project diagonally from the skull near the ears, upward and forward.

Mayor Tiemann, of this city, received his friends on New-Year's Day. Some of the scenes were amusing. One visitor simply said, "Honesty is the best policy;" another, "Fellow-Democrat, I am glad to see you here, and I wish you a 'Happy New-Year;'" a third said, "I am happy, Mr. Mayor, to see you again surrounded by your friends;" a fourth hoped he "should never regret having given his vote for Daniel F. Tiemann," to which the Mayor replied he hoped not. Prominent among the visitors was Mr. Anthony Tiemann, the father of Daniel F. Tiemann. Father and son heartily congratulated each other. The venerable father then took his seat near where his son was standing, and his countenance beamed with joy and happiness, while the unceasing tide of well-wishers pressed on and passed away.

A correspondent of a Boston paper, writing from New York, says: "One of our clergymen in New York city is quite a sportsman. He keeps his horse and carriage—his town and city house—and also two or three sail boats, and one of the finest yachts in our waters; and in the season he may be found any day in his red baize shirt and sailor trim on board his craft, enjoying the sport like an old tar. The helm he always holds. Some time since he had an appointment to preach out of the city, and went on board his yacht and sailed on Saturday afternoon up to the appointed place, secured his craft, and left his hands on board, while, like Abraham at Moriah, he went "up to worship and return." He put up with a friend at night. Among the family was a little youngster of ten years; he had a keen eye to fun, and the third heaven to his imagination was the ownership of a yacht. He went up to his father and said, "Oh, father, is Rev. Mr. —— to preach for us to-morrow?" The reply was yes. "Oh, I am so glad," screamed out the juvenile sportsman. "And why are you so glad?" gravely asked the father. "Oh," said Jim, "I do want to hear a man preach once who owns and sails a yacht;" and no one heard Rev. Mr. —— with greater delight than "Jim."

Miss Maria Mitchell of Nantucket, who received a gold medal from the King of Denmark for her discovery of a new comet, is passing the winter at Paris.

We observe a notice going the "rounds" of the Press, that Charles Fenno Hoffman, the celebrated poet, who has for some time been an inmate of the Pennsylvania Hospital near our city, is lying dangerously ill. A Harrisburgh paper is requested to state, by Dr. Corwin, the efficient superintendent of the above-named Institution, that the report is without foundation. Mr. Hoffman, so far from being ill, is in the enjoyment of most excellent health, and hopes are entertained that at no very distant day, with the treatment now observed, the distinguished gentleman may be restored to that position in society of which he was an intellectual ornament.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE REVULSION AND COMMERCIAL FRAUDS.

THE total amount of failures in England since the revulsion commenced is now said to amount to $250,000,000. The London Times makes the following severe remarks on the dishonesty which has been developed by the revulsion:

"The public are astounded at the commercial disclosures on every side. Even those most conversant for years past with all the great operations of business had no idea of the degree of corruption that, at each turn, was defeating the efforts of the honest trader. The question is, have they yet any adequate conception of the extent to which the system has been carried? Persons are disposed to comfort themselves by the conclusion that every case of delinquency appears in print and makes a great stir, while the multitude of ordinary transactions are carried on with regularity day after day, and excite no notice. There could not be a greater delusion. On all hands there is a combination to palliate and hush up the practices that have been prevalent, and no more difficult or dangerous duty could be undertaken than that of endeavoring to defeat it. There is abundant sympathy for the speculator, who has lived in good style for years, and whose position may at last be questioned; but none for the great mass of the people, who, in consequence of his operations, have been paying higher prices for all the necessaries of life; none for those who have been tempted by high wages into overstocked branches of labor, and who are suddenly thrown into destitution; and none for society in general, which will suffer through many future years from a generation of young men brought up to the belief that there is no such thing as honest trade, and that he is greatest who most excels in the adulteration of goods, the manufacture of accommodation bills, and the management of fraudulent suspensions. In one case now pending at Glasgow, a house is shown to have had seventy-five real or fictitious correspondents, all insolvent like itself, upon whom it had drawn to the amount of £380,000, the whole finally centering in the Western Bank. Is this a solitary specimen? Are there not hundreds of analogous but more adroit cases that might be developed on every side—often, apparently, without much difficulty, if any judgment may be formed from the leading figures lately presented in some of the London balance sheets; and as soon as the present crisis is over, will not all these persons again go to work?"

FAILURE OF THE LATEST ATTEMPT TO LAUNCH THE "LEVIATHAN."

Great efforts have again been made to get the Leviathan into the river. More hydraulic presses were set to work, heavier chains were applied, but, as in the case of former efforts, the hydraulic presses burst, and the great chains, although having links of two and a quarter inches in thickness, snapped asunder as if they were so many pack-threads. At high water there was nearly four feet water about the vessel's keel, but as that unfortunately happened at the dinner hour, the rams were all suddenly deserted, and the works were suspended until the great business of life had been satisfactorily disposed of by the workmen. For the labor employed on this monster £900 weekly has been paid for the last six weeks, exclusive of the cost of timber and iron. On the following day the launching experiments were resumed, but with only a small modicum of success. A slip was made of thirty-eight inches aft and sixteen inches forward. This, although not much, had the effect of placing the vessel straight in the ways. As in the case of former experiments, the works were interrupted by the bursting or breaking of machinery, a result which now appears to attend every attempt. It is now understood that farther attempts are to be postponed till the spring tides in January. The ship at high tide has six feet of water under her.

THE WEDDING OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

The marriage of the Princess Royal is to be celebrated at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, on the 25th of January, and, in honor of the occasion, the Queen has commanded three performances to take place at Her Majesty's Theatre. They are to consist of a tragedy, a comedy, and an opera. A great many royal and distinguished personages are expected to arrive on a visit to her Majesty, in order to be present at the marriage. The King of the Belgians, the Prince and Princess of Prussia, and the Duke of Saxe Coburg, will be inmates of Buckingham Palace, and for other visitors of less exalted rank a suite of rooms has been engaged at Farrance's Hotel, in Belgravia, where they will be attended by the Queen's own servants, and have the use of her Majesty's carriages. One of the most important fêtes will be a grand court reception, for the purpose of a formal presentation of the élite of the beau monde to the Prince and Princess after their nuptials.

THE WEDDING PRESENTS.

The London Court Journal observes: "On the occasion of her Majesty's marriage the Queen presented to each of her bridesmaids a diamond and turquoise ornament, to be worn on the shoulder on the sleeve of the dress; and the ladies so distinguished always wear this badge whenever they attend at Court. We believe that some such distinction will be conferred on those who occupy a prominent position in the ceremonial of the nuptials of the Princess Royal. Fourteen beautiful bracelets of the same pattern, and with similar jewels, are being manufactured for the event, besides a number of brooches and pins. These latter contain, on a shield of blue enamel, the cipher of the Princess in diamonds, surmounted by the Prussian eagle, also in brilliants. The trousseau of the Princess herself approaches completion, and its magnificence will be in every respect worthy of the illustrious Princess."

ANOTHER PRINCESS TO BE MARRIED.

Rumors have been current for some time of a projected marriage between the hereditary Prince of the Netherlands, born on the 4th September, 1840, and the second daughter of the Queen of England. A letter from the Hague, of the 7th ultimo, in the Cologne Gazette, states that Lieutenant-General Van Omphal has left for London with a mission to officially demand the hand of the Princess Alice, who was born on the 25th April, 1843, for the Prince of Orange.

HOW SWINDLERS LIVE IN EUROPE.

Not many years since a certain gentleman became indebted to one of the Glasgow banks to the extent of several hundred thousand pounds. When he was hauled up it was found that he had "no assets," and the bank therefore "insured his life" to the extent of their debt, upon which they, of course, pay a very heavy annual tax. This gentleman called on the bank, some time after, and told one of the managers, "I am offered a lucrative situation in Sierra Leone, but, you know, if I go out there the policy will be vitiated. However, I must go, as I can not starve." What, then, was to be done? The same man is now comfortably living on the Continent on an annuity granted him by this bank, which annuity, added to the premium of insurance, forms a nice little item in the expenses of the establishment.

LORD PALMERSTON AND THE NEWSMAN.

A few days ago, as Lord Palmerston was walking home from "business," he encountered in Parliament Street a file of those brazen-faced and brazen-voiced hawkers of false news who infest the uttermost parts of the British metropolis at hush of eve. One of these public organs of misinformation happening to recognize the ruler of English destinies, shouted at the top of his voice (with a knowing wink to his comrades), "Himpawrt'nt Nooze! Capshur of Nena Sahib!" Startled at this shameless fiction, the noble Premier turned sharp round, and in language not sufficiently parliamentary to suit our columns, accosted the crier thus: "You —— lying scoundrel, why do you deceive the people in this way?" "'Xcuse me, my lord," replied the rival bottleholder, "I'm only follering my trade, as you, my lord, foller yers!" Whether Lord Palmerston made any rejoinder is not known.

A TERRIBLE ESCAPE.

The East Suffolk Railway Company are sinking a well for one of the gate-houses, and strenuous efforts are being made to get it completed as early as possible. A young man named Frederick Dale was lowered, in high spirits, singing "Fare-ye-well." On approaching the bottom he became unconscious. The men above, receiving no reply to repeated questions, became alarmed, and one of their number made an attempt to descend, but had not proceeded more than twenty feet when he was obliged to be drawn up again on account of the fetid vapor. Lighted candles were then sent down, but were extinguished before half-way down. A box of fire was next tried, but with the same result. Grappling irons were then procured, and an attempt was made to raise the poor fellow. The hooks caught the waistband of the trowsers, but not being of strong materials they gave way. Probably, however, the sudden jerk roused him from his stupor, as he laid hold of the rope and was raised thirty feet, when he let go and fell to the bottom. All supposed he must have been dashed to atoms, but providentially he was saved. The rope being again lowered, he fastened it round his body, and was brought to the surface more dead than alive. With the aid of restoratives he sufficiently recovered to be removed home, and is now doing well.

FRANCE.

INTERCESSION OF GEORGE SAND WITH THE EMPRESS.

It appears that Madame George Sand has addressed a letter, through one of the French imperial family, to the Empress Eugénie, describing in the most affecting terms the deplorable condition to which the suspension of the journal La Presse has reduced the families of the workmen to whom it gave employment. The letter gave a most touching description of the state of these unfortunate persons, in whose favor the Empress was asked to intercede. It does not appear to have succeeded. The offense of the Presse was most heinous; it presumed to talk about freedom of speech, liberty, and such other old world fancies, and will very likely be compelled to pay the penalty to the utmost.

GRISI TURNED MEDIUM.

The Paris correspondent of the London Globe, writing on the 24th ult., says: "Grisi has turned a new leaf in her libretto. She is announced as a 'medium' of no common performance; Hume (not the skeptic, but the charlatan) proclaiming her excellence in her new rôle."

EXTRAORDINARY MURDER TRIAL.

A trial for murder has taken place at Evreux, which is destined to take rank among the most celebrated of causes célèbres. A lady of noble family, handsome fortune, and hitherto unblemished character, inhabiting the ancestral mansion of her late husband, her two sons, and an old faithful servant, were accused of the willful murder of a neighbor who was at one time on intimate terms with the family, but whose acquaintance it was lately desired to drop. Madame de Jeufosse belonged to an old and much respected family of Vexin. She is now forty-nine years of age. Her two sons, Ernest and Albert de Jeufosse, are now respectively of the ages of twenty-five and twenty-two years. The daughter, Mademoiselle Blanche de Jeufosse, is in her nineteenth year. Since the death of her husband Madame de Jeufosse lived a very retired life, and devoted herself to the education of her children. At the time of the tragical event to be presently mentioned there was a governess in the house, named Mademoiselle Laurence Thouzery, a young lady about twenty years old. Crespel, the man servant (forty-three years old), was born at Jeufosse, and has passed all his life in the service of the family. The name of the individual whose violent death is the subject of the now pending inquiry was Emile Guillot, and this completes the dramatis personæ. M. Guillot belonged to a rich tradesman's family, of Gallion, a village not far from Jeufosse. His father was a Government contractor, and had left all his sons, of whom there are several, 25,000 francs a year apiece. M. Emile Guillot, who was thirty-two years of age, was married to a young wife, and had two children of tender years. He is described as having been a person of frank, pleasing manners.

THE CAUSE OF THE HOMICIDE.

Some two years since a more than ordinary intimacy sprung up between the Jeufosses and M. and Madame Guillot. This intimacy continued down to January in this year, when, for reasons which, as Madame de Jeufosse is alleged to have stated, concerned the honor of her family, she determined to break off the acquaintance. In fact, Guillot had paid improper addresses first to the governess and then to the daughter; had openly boasted of his success in both cases, and had ostentatiously forced himself into the premises after dark, as he said, to meet one or the other. He used to carry a horn to these nocturnal rendezvous, and blow it from time to time. Madame Jeufosse, feeling satisfied from what her daughter and the governess told her that they were disgusted with the fellow and that he was an impostor, broke off the acquaintance. Madame Guillot at once resigned herself to this rupture, but M. Guillot could not, or would not, bring himself to believe that it was serious and final. He thought Madame de Jeufosse had merely given way to a momentary caprice, and that there would be no difficulty in renewing the old friendship, which he appeared greatly to desire. He waylaid the family whenever they went out, and spoke to them gayly as if nothing had happened. Madame de Jeufosse was greatly annoyed at these attempts to make her revoke what, on her part, was a settled resolution. Many anecdotes of these forced interviews are current.

HOW THE MAN WAS SHOT.

The Chateau de Jeufosse is a building of the time of Louis XIV. At the back there is a lawn sloping to a garden, beyond which there is a park surrounded by a low wall. It is stated that M. Guillot had several times got over this wall at night in order to deposit in a certain hollow tree a letter for some inmate of the Chateau de Jeufosse. However this may be, it is certain that, on the 12th June last at about ten in the evening, he, accompanied by a servant named Gros, rode on horseback along a lane that bounded the park wall, and choosing a favorable spot, slipped off his horse upon the top of the wall, and jumped down into the park. Hardly had he done so, when the report of a gun was heard, and M. Guillot fell mortally wounded. He called out for help, to his servant Gros, but the latter, panic-stricken, ran as hard as he could to the chateau, where he knocked hard at the door, but could get nobody to answer. He then ran back to the spot where his master fell, and found him writhing in the dust in the agonies of death. M. Guillot charged him to carry his dying farewell to his wife and children, and to ask their pardon, and then breathed his last.

THE EVIDENCE AND VERDICT.

It was pretty well established on the trial that the fatal shot was deliberately fired by Crespel, the old servant, by the orders of Madame de Jeufosse and her two sons, and that it being known that M. Guillot had been in the habit of getting over the park wall, Crespel had been lying in wait for him with his gun for several nights successively. But on proof of the conduct of Guillot to the young ladies, and of his idle boasts about their sacrificing themselves to him, the jury acquitted all the prisoners, but condemned Madame de Jeufosse to pay the costs.

THE LITTLE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald tells the following story: "I will mention a trifling incident which occurred yesterday opposite my window, and which created more enthusiasm than I had ever witnessed on any previous occasion toward the Imperial family. The little Prince Imperial was on his return from the Bois de Boulogne, escorted as usual by a body of smart Lancers whose fluttering pennons danced gayly in the breeze, when the carriage of the Empress met him just as his cortége was ascending the brow of the slope leading from the Avenue de l'Imperatrice to the Arch of Triumph. The Empress made a sign for the carriages to pull up, and immediately afterward the little Prince was conducted across the road to her Majesty. The Empress, taking him up in her arms and kissing him, held him out for the by-standers, who were now clustering in thousands round the carriages, to gaze at, and as the little fellow laughed, and crowed, and waved his tiny hand, you could see the tears of delight rolling over the rough cheeks of men and women while they poured out their heartfelt benedictions upon him. It was really a pretty sight, and one that placed power and people in a most pleasing point of view. The fair Eugénie seemed to unite all hearts by her gracious and winsome manner, and when the little fellow was again conveyed back to his nurse's arms, and kissed his little fingers in token of adieu to those that looked on him so kindly, many a sturdy Democrat in the moment ceased to think of the Imperial dictatorship which was over the boy's future inheritance, and to remember only that he was a child of France, and a bonny one to look at.

THE RIGHTS OF COUNSEL.

A duel has just taken place in Paris which has been the subject of much conversation, but fortunately it was not attended with any serious consequences. The parties were M. Gustave Chaix-d'Est-Ange, advocate, and the Marquis de P——. The origin of the affair was some remark made by the young barrister in pleading against M. de P——, who having been separated from his wife, claimed a right to pay a weekly visit to his children at the school where they were being educated. The learned gentleman, in endeavoring to reduce that right to a monthly visit, made some observations which led to an insulting letter from the Marquis. The council of the order of advocates did not wish to establish the precedent that its members should be personally responsible for any remarks they might make in their judicial capacity, but M. Chaix-d'Este-Ange, in spite of their opposition, met his adversary, who received a slight sword-wound in the arm, and the matter terminated.

A BLIND SCULPTOR

"There is now in Paris," says the Courrier de Paris, "a young sculptor, named Vidal, who, although deprived of sight, models animals with a skill and exactitude which is really wonderful. He has only to carefully touch the different parts of a dog, a horse, a sheep, or a bird, to be able to model them in all their forms and proportions, and his animals are full of life and movement. M. Vidal was at first, when his eyes were unharmed, a pupil of Barye, and evinced great talent for modeling animals, when by an unfortunate accident he lost his sight. Having no other resource than a trifling pension of 200 francs a year, allowed by the Hospital of the Blind, he applied himself to his old profession, and by degrees acquired the delicacy of touch which has enabled him to accomplish what is above stated."

A GIRL EXCHANGED FOR A DONKEY.

An elderly farmer, named Villy, of Frejus, appeared three days ago before the Tribunal of Correctional Police of Draguignan to complain of a female named Annette for having robbed him. The tale he told was rather curious. At the last fair at Frejus he made the acquaintance of a traveling dentist named Delacour, a Pole, and in the course of conversation told him that as he was alone in the world he should like to have a nice young woman to live with him, and he proposed to Delacour to purchase from him for 20 francs Annette, who had traveled with him. Annette, who was present, laughed at the proposition, but Delacour entertained it seriously, and said that as the law did not allow people to be sold, he could not take money for the young woman, but was willing to accept the man's donkey for her. Villy consented, and Delacour at his request drew up a certificate on stamped paper to the effect that "Annette had lived with him five years, and that he had always been satisfied with her." Villy then delivered up his donkey, and took the young woman home. Two days after, to his great vexation, he found that she had decamped, carrying off not only two new gowns, which he had bought for her, but a quantity of linen and his watch. The young woman, who has not yet been found, was condemned by default to four months' imprisonment.

RUSSIA.

THE EMANCIPATION SCHEME.

It appears certain that the Russian government has fixed in the following manner the mode in which the emancipation of the peasants is to be effected. It will take place, not all at once, but successively, at three periods. In the first, the relations between the peasants connected with the soil (glebæ adscripti) and the State will be fixed, that is to say, they will be admitted to possess a political existence, and their obligations to their lords will be rigorously traced out. In the second period, serfdom will be suppressed; and in the third, the payments in kind will be converted into a fixed rent, and the mode of redeeming such rent and the acquisition of free property of the peasants will be regulated.

THE EMPEROR AND THE PEASANT WOMAN.

The Emperor Alexander II., a letter from St. Petersburg states, has just been the hero of the following adventure: "At a short distance from Warsaw, between that city and Dublin, the carriage in which his Majesty was traveling broke down, and while waiting for it to be repaired, the Czar asked for shelter from the owner of a cottage near the road. The honors of the humble dwelling were done with most perfect ease by the mistress, who, although she considered that her visitors were nobles, little imagined that she had under her roof the Emperor and his aid-de-camp. The Polish woman spoke of the Czar with such praise that she was asked what she would do if the Prince, whom she appeared to like so well, was ever to visit her cottage? 'Well, then,' said the woman, 'I would take my little boy by the hand and show him to the Emperor, saying, Lord, King of Poland, look at this child; he is my only blessing, and I would give my life for him; but some night strangers will come, and seizing on the poor child, will carry him off to the chief town of the arrondissement, where they will crop off his hair like that of a dog, put a long coat on his back, and tell him he is enrolled in a regiment! Oh, my God! preserve me from such a misfortune! I should die of despair!' The poor woman at the bare idea of such an event hid her face in her hands and burst into tears. Nevertheless,' said the Czar, 'the country can not be without an army!' 'That is true,' replied the young mother, 'but if the soldiers remained in their own part of the country one might go and see them from time to time. But in the Russian army a soldier is sent no one knows where, and there is no chance of seeing one's child, or even of knowing if he be alive. We poor people have our feelings, and the proof is that, with us, the conscription is watered with floods of tears by wives and mothers.' At this moment the suite of the Czar arrived, and the poor woman soon found that she had been talking to the Emperor himself. His Majesty, on leaving, told her that he should not forget the welcome which she had given him; and some days after she received his portrait ornamented with brilliants, and suspended to a gold chain, with permission to wear it round her neck. The bearer of the present was charged at the same time to assure the poor woman of the kindness felt toward her by the Emperor, which is supposed to mean that she will not have her child taken from her."

PRUSSIA.

DAMAGES FOR HAVING THE SMALL-POX.

A curious lawsuit is going on just now in Berlin. A rich banker of that city, who is ill of the small-pox, has had two actions brought against him, one by his barber and the other by his upholsterer, who claim damages because he communicated the malady to them. They demanded compensation for the doctor's expenses and the time they have lost. According to the Prussian law the banker was bound to hang up outside his door a notice with the words, "There is a person here ill of the small-pox."

SPAIN.

BAPTISM OF THE BABY.

The España says: "During the ceremony his Royal Highness cried frequently; and his cries, which were loud, sounded most agreeably in the ears of all present, for they proved that he is a robust infant. After the baptism, the Royal child was conveyed by the King, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier, to the Queen, who had remained in her chamber. A little later, the Prince was made a Knight of the Order of the Golden Fleece, with all the ceremonies usual on such occasions. The King himself decorated him with the collar and other insignia; among the latter was a crucifix of oak, ornamented with brilliants, called the 'Cross of Victory,' famous for having figured in battles against the Moors, which was presented to the King by M. Mon and some other gentlemen as a deputation from Oviedo, in the Asturias, to which town it belonged."

ITALY.

GREAT EARTHQUAKE AT NAPLES.

A great earthquake took place in the Kingdom of Naples on 16th ult., and destroyed much life and property. A letter dated from the city of Naples describes some of the scenes: "On Wednesday night last, however, I was writing when the table began to shake violently, the lamp to rock, and the bells of the house to ring as if they had been pulled by a strong hand. The walls of my room, too, visibly waved backward and forward, and creaked as might a boat straining heavily at sea. There could be no doubt as to the cause of these awful phenomena, and I rushed out of my house. There had already been two shocks up to this time, then came a third so strong that I thought that the house would have fallen and buried me in its ruins. Some women were seated on the ground, and in nearly a fainting state leaning against the wall, to whose movements they yielded, rocking backward and forward as in a cradle. By this time people were escaping rapidly into the streets, and making inquiries as to each other's experience. Every one came to look at Vesuvius, but the mountain gave little comfort; it threw out but little fire, and seemed sulky and gloomy. It was not an agreeable prospect in view in returning to one's own house, so that I resolved to walk the streets, and the scene which presented itself will never be effaced from my memory. They were full of anxious, trembling persons, some half-dressed, some in their shirts, some wrapped up in sheets or blankets, and some in the gay dresses in which they had escaped from the drawing-room or the theatre. All the piazzas were full of carriages, which were occupied by families who had abandoned their houses. At every hundred steps fires were lighted, round which were bivouacked from fifty to one hundred persons of all ranks. The palace-yard, the Largo Castello, and other open places, were full of carriages, in which their inmates were reposing for the night. Hundreds of persons were couched on the steps of the churches, and later in the night the images of the Saints were carried in procession, while the people sang litanies." Full details of the mischief done have not yet been received.

ROBBERY IN THE PAPAL STATES.

A letter from Rome of the 5th ultimo says: "The brigands in the neighborhood of the Eternal City have just resumed their periodical practice of spoliating such incautious travelers as take more money with them than is necessary for their own wants or less than will suffice to pacify the auri sacri fames of highway assailants. On Monday evening at seven o'clock a vetturino carriage was plodding its weary way from Civita Vecchia toward Rome, and had reached a spot four miles on this side of Palo, when its farther progress was opposed by seven bandits armed with bludgeons, pistols, and daggers, who stopped the vehicle and proceeded to rifle the passengers, consisting of Doctor Conolley, Roman Catholic Bishop of Halifax, on his way to Rome to pay homage to the supreme head of the Church, Mr. Blake, and Mr. and Mrs. Harper. The Bishop was eased of one hundred and forty pounds sterling, besides his episcopal chain and cross, and the pastoral ring, a fine emerald, which he wore according to custom. Mr. Blake, feeling greatly averse to submitting to spoliation, in his turn manfully resisted the outlaws' invitation to stand and deliver, but he was finally overpowered by numbers, after being severely beaten and having had a pistol presented at his head, which fortunately missed fire. Mr. and Mrs. Harper were robbed of their watches, chains, and purses; and altogether the plunder realized by the marauders may be valued at about a thousand scudi, or over two hundred pounds sterling. At any rate, this inconvenience, which always threatens travelers to and from Civita Vecchia and Rome, will disappear so soon as the railway, which is promised for next July, is actually opened to the public."

TRANSYLVANIA.

AN EXECUTIONER FIGHTING FOR HIS PERQUISITES.

About six weeks or two months ago fourteen Wallachs were tried at Lugosch, on the Transylvanian frontier, for highway robbery, burglary, murder, etc. Seven were sentenced to death by the court-martial, and while the military judge was reading the sentence one of the condemned men was quietly taking the life of an insect which had fallen from his hair on to the sleeve of his dress. When led out to execution one of the seven men had a serious misunderstanding with the executioner, because that worthy was unwilling to allow him to deprive him of a part of his perquisites. According to the law of the land, all the articles of clothing which a man has on when he is hanged belong to the executioner; and, therefore, one of the men insisted on his boots being taken off and given to his wife. The executioner seriously objected to such an arrangement; but the man at last carried his point, and was then as much resigned to his fate as his companions.

INDIA.

LATEST NEWS FROM THE SEAT OF WAR.

The latest news from India is dated at Bombay on the 4th of December. The English garrison in Lucknow was relieved by the troops under command of Sir Colin Campbell on the 19th of November, and the sick and wounded and women and children sent in safety to Cawnpore. The British commander-in-chief reached the Alumbagh on the 12th of November, and engaged the Sepoy army next morning. The rebel forces fought with such energy and determination that the conflict, or series of fights, endured for six days, when the mutineers were routed, and General Havelock, with his command, saved. During these engagements Sir Colin Campbell was wounded slightly, and had four of his officers killed and forty others wounded. It was said that Sir Colin had twenty-two thousand men under his command, with which force he would march to the conquest of Oude. English reinforcements were pouring in daily. The Sepoys had been dispersed at Musserabad, Mehidpore, Malwa, and Rohilcund. Twenty-four members of the royal family of Delhi, with a powerful rebel chief, had been executed near Delhi. The Punjab was quiet, but there was a slight rising in the southern Muratta country. The rebellion, however, was regarded as ended.

EXECUTION OF A BANKER.

Byrapersaud, the great banker at Benares, with his Jemadar and eight Hurkaras, have been tried at Jaunpore, for carrying on treasonable correspondence with the insurgents in Oude, condemned, and hanged. It is said that he offered four lacs ($200,000) for his life.

COST OF FIDELITY.

A lady writes from the Punjab: "A few days ago a melancholy thing happened in our own household. A favorite and faithful servant poisoned himself to save our lives. I must tell you how it happened. We were sitting at whist about 10 P.M., when in rushed Kootadine with a face of horror I shall never forget. He was dreadfully excited. He said, 'Sahib, Sahib, you are in great danger! There is a plot to murder you this night, after you are asleep! The murderer will enter in by your bathing-room door, and will cut your throat with a carving-knife which he has for the purpose.' We, of course, made inquiry, and seized the accused party (a table servant), and had him put under a guard, where he remained all night. Poor Kootadine was crying bitterly the next morning, and, on asking him the reason, he said the Mussulman servants were bullying his life out about having saved the life of a Christian dog, or soor (pig), as they politely call us. Well, this went on all day. Nothing we could do to comfort the poor man was of any avail. He took a dose of arsenic, which killed him in two hours. Almost his last words were, 'Sahib, you are saved, but I must die for you.' And most assuredly he has done so, dear C——, for a better and more faithful creature did not exist. He had been with us for years, and had served us to the last. This man was the highest caste of Mussulman—a kind of priest—which makes it still more wonderful. I can not tell you how grieved I am for his loss. We shall never get his like again. The courage with which these people lay down their lives is more than I can understand."

VICTIMS OF SEPOY BRUTALITIES.

A writer in the London Medical Times says: "We have been assured by a medical friend that he has been consulted by a lady who has recently arrived at Bayswater, from India, whose nose has been cut off. Her child, three years old, has neither hands nor feet; they were all cut off by the mutineers. How the child survived is a mystery. The governess to this family escaped with the loss of her ears, which were cut off as an easy way of getting her ear-rings. Another friend is attending a lady whose nose has been slit open and her ears have been cut off. She has brought home to England three young children, all blind. Their eyes have all been gouged out by the Sepoys. We have heard from another source, quite beyond question (a lady, who speaks from personal knowledge), that there are several ladies now in Calcutta who have undergone such unspeakable degradation that they obstinately refuse to give their names. They prefer to be thought of by their relations in England as dead. There are also in Calcutta several young children whose names are quite unknown. One little creature says she is 'mamma's pet,' and that is all we are ever likely to know of her past history."

ANOTHER UNHAPPY LADY.

A Bristol (England) paper says: "We regret to state that a young lady, the daughter of a highly respected clergyman of this city, who married a gentleman connected with the Indian service about a year since, has just returned, not only widowed, but terribly mutilated. The Sepoys have cut her tongue out, and inflicted other injuries. The melancholy circumstance has created much sensation, for it has brought the horrors of the war before us in their reality, and not the least in the parish from whence the lady went forth, so short a time since, in the bloom of beauty, to the enjoyment, as it was believed, of a very happy lot in life."

MARKETS IN LARGE CITIES.

We engrave on these pages a picture of the great Paris Market, Les Halles Centrales, which is one of the greatest architectural works of the present Empire. It suggests important reflections on the subject of markets generally.

We are told that when the good old Greek colonists, the filibusters of ancient time, landed on a strange shore to found a new "city," they invariably devoted their first leisure, and the best land they could find, to a public place of assemblage to the gods, a market-place, and a gymnasium. When there were leisure or stinted soil, these all-thinkers began to take thought for their private well-being—but not before. To tell the truth, the market-place, as such, was evidently a more remarkable fundamental establishment for some time, from the simple reason that the Greeks had nothing to buy, no one to buy, and no money to pay for purchases; but during the period which elapsed before the marketplace became really a place of trade, it was at least a place of meeting for the citizens, and was the scene of their political strifes. Even after trade sprang up, and the agora was filled with hucksters, it continued to be the resort of political men, and whose general assemblies of citizens, at which all political questions of moment were adjusted, were held there. A similar custom prevailed at Rome, and in the cities which were dependent on Roman dominion. The fora were market-places, where country people sold their produce; but on stated occasions the citizens met there to hear political orators; and whenever a revolution of state effected, the impulse was given from a forum.

Round the great forum at Rome ran rows of stores, low, one-story buildings, divided by pillars, without doors or windows; these were mostly occupied by money-changers, perfumers, barbers, and the like. The real market-men sold their wares in the open spaces, and shoemakers on the backs of mules or asses. It does not appear that there were any stalls: almost each trade had its own market-place together, with ample convenience.

It must be remembered, in defense of these ancients, that their ignorance was such that they despised trade. A Roman Senator who was found guilty of having made money, and even when the King of Persia heard of the market at Sparta, he declared that nothing need be feared from a people who met in a public place to cheat one another—though, for the matter of that, the Spartans had very little to boast of as commercial men.

Under the feudal tenure, the advantages of a stated market for the sale of agricultural produce soon became so obvious that the feudal lords usurped the right of licensing markets, and of selling licenses for the same. In England the right was assumed by the Crown; and towns became distinguished as market towns, and towns where there was no market. A variety of laws and ordinances were made in all European countries to secure the safety and validity of bargains made in public, and as a large revenue was collected by sovereigns and feudal lords from toll on merchandize sent to or disposed of at markets.

Many markets, even in metropolitan cities, were established by wealthy lords, and remained in their family—the privileges to use them being conceded to the family by complaisant monarchs. Thus, Covent Garden Market, which is the great vegetable and flower market of the city of London, is the property of the Dukes of Bedford. The first great market building was erected at the cost of the house of Bedford, by Inigo Jones, during and after the Commonwealth. Within the last quarter of a century this edifice was torn down, and a new one constructed, with a Doric colonnade and granite columns; a fine structure to be sure, and handsome enough, when garnished within with the beautiful flowers and really choice flower-girls of England; but very far from what a market should be, both in size and in arrangement.

The best London market, so far as distribution and mechanical convenience go, is Billingsgate, the great fish-market. Formerly this market was so disgracefully managed that it came became proverbial. Of late years, new and very excellent arrangements have been made, by which the health and morals of the fish-dealers and the comfort of purchasers are largely promoted. By no means unnecessary, since the air is constantly renewed. Fifty thousand cubic feet of foul air are pumped out every minute, and a corresponding quantity of fresh is forced in. There, the supply of water is constant, and well distributed. The daily consumption of cleanliness, two tuns of water are thrown, every minute, into a fountain standing in the centre of the market, and allowed to waste through channels conveniently placed for the dealers. Besides, a ton per minute of filtered water is forced into miniature gutters which pass through every stall, and in which the fish are washed and cleaned. The refuse and offal are carried off by the stream. No soft stone to have been made to preserve them for fertilizing purposes. The sea-water in these arrangements is that Billingsgate is a healthy place, without the miasmatic fevers which might have been expected. Excellent police regulations, which are rigidly enforced, still further improve this market. In which is it true that the cats tainted is instantly seized, confiscated, and destroyed, and all under exposed to fine. This judicious regulation enables shrewd house-keepers to lay in a stock of fish at low rates. At a late hour in the afternoon, in summer especially, fishmongers will sell the balance of their stock at almost any price, for fear the street and indefatigable Inspectors should next morning pronounce it unfit for sale.

Another advantage which Billingsgate Market possesses over almost all other markets in the world is that it has a part of its own, at which fish is unloading the tall being still the favorite method of driving them in the desired direction. Since Smithfield market was shut up these remarks do not apply to it, but they are not far from the truth to far as concerns Whitechapel or Aldgate market.

A recent Special Report of the Medical Officer of Health to the Strand district, on slaughter-houses, describes a exhilarating abomination in the butchering of meat: "But confining myself strictly to a common-sense view of the subject, let us ask you for a no meat if you consider it ordinarily decent that some of the meat which is sold in this district should, as is the general of the case, have been permitted to be killed in an underground slaughtering-cellar, in which the water-closet used by the butcher's men is situate, and the meat hung up within two or three feet of such closet; or that sheep, previously to being killed, should be kept in the water-closet adjoining the slaughtering-cellar or kitchen, with their heads literally in the pan of the closet? Need I remind you that sheep are habitually kept in many of these underground slaughterhouses for at least twenty-four hours prior to being killed? This is no exaggerated picture; and the very facts described were witnessed by a gentleman who accompanied me in my inspections—a member of the board." Surely the meat which these men sell must be to other men poison.

A very different scene meets the eye when the channel is crossed, and the Paris market-hall under review. They do order these matters better in France.

It was Napoleon the First who said that the poor should have their Louvre. He said no a-propos of the Marché St. Sulpice, which was built under his reign in the Quartier St. Germain, and which certainly, as compared with our markets, or many others on the Continent of Europe, would appear a very palace.

It was left for his nephew, the present Emperor, to realize the idea in connection with the great market of Paris—Les Halles Centrales. Those who have not visited Paris need to be told that the great market lies very nearly in the centre of the city, near the Seine, and close to the famous old church of St. Eustache. It is a place of historical interest. Five centuries since the fate of the monarchy was discussed and decided at the Halles. During the long wars between the Kings of France and the Burgundian faction, and between France and England, the balance of power often rested with the Halles. Once the fishwomen of the Halles, backed, you may be sure, by a strong band of stout porters and market-men, waited on the King, and by so doing created so strong an impression in his favor, that a factious aristocracy abandoned the idea they had formed of dethroning him. Even the great King, Louis the Fourteenth, rejoiced at receiving a deputation from the women of the Halles, and condescended to kiss the fattest of the body. During the Revolution, the Central Market was one of the chief head-quarters of the revolutionists. Several clubs met in its immediate vicinity; and the women of the market and their streets. This space is occupied by ten buildings or market-houses, constructed of iron, glass, and wood. Each market-house rests on hollow iron pillars; the roof is perforated at regular intervals, and immense windows shed a flood of light on the space beneath. Round each house runs a brick wall, to divide it and its dealers from the other establishments. The rain-water which falls upon the roof passes through spouts and pipes in the hollow pillars into cisterns underground, from whence it is pumped up as occasion requires. Each markethouse is appropriated—after the Eastern bazar fashion—to the sale of one particular article or commodity. There is a building for auction sales, another for butcher's meat, another for game, another for fresh fish, another for vegetables, another for cooked meats, another for butter, eggs, and cheese, another for poultry, another for salted provisions, another for flowers, and so on.

THE CENTRAL MARKET (LE

Each building is calculated to contain 260 stalls, of two square yards each. Each is separated from its neighbor by an iron grating, or a wooden partition. The furniture of each varies according to the articles to be sold there. In the fish department, each stall contains miniature pools in which live fish can swim about and even get fattened for the table. It sweeps again, rows of shelves and ingeniously contrived cupboards supersede the necessity of smooth barrels and baskets. Each building—all being circular—is traversed by two highways which cross each other at the centre of the structure; a fountain stands exactly at the centre; but in order to prevent a useless waste of water, and also, lest the air of the place should be unduly moist, the fountain only flows when a spring is pressed; thus every one who desires water can obtain it in abundance, but when it is not required the fountain is quiescent. These admirable buildings are so contrived that the temperature within them is nearly ten degrees lower than that of the atmosphere outside during summer, and correspondingly higher during the winter; a boon of no slender value to the vendors of fresh animal food.

But the most curious part of the Central Market of Paris is the underground story. One story below ground there is another market as spacious as the ten above, in which a number of stalls are situate, and a vast amount of business is transacted. Air from above is obtained by ingenious machinery for ventilation, and stupendous windows furnish an abundant supply of light. The market, however, is the least important part of the subterranean palace.

There is a railway terminus there, with trains incessantly arriving and departing, and a crowd of human beings and cattle constantly thronging round the passage to the regions above. All live and dead stock from the country destined for the Central Market must come by this railway. The line enters a tunnel near the outside barrière of the city, and burrows its way under streets and houses to the market. There it emerges from darkness, and the cars which have received their load of beef, mutton, geese, poultry, oysters, fish, etc., from all parts of France, discharge them at the foot of the inclined plane which leads direct to the stalls. By this contrivance the streets of Paris are never blocked—as ours are only too frequently—by droves of cattle and flocks of sheep. No Parisian's nose is ever offended or his eyes shocked by the sight of a farmer's cart laden with fresh meat on his way to market.

Transcribed for The Internet Archive by Allison Meier

Connected with the subterranean railway terminus is a sink, which receives from above all blood, offal, bones, and other waste and entrays of the markets. Butchers, poulterers, and dealers in all kinds of produce, throw their waste into this sink, and see it instantaneously disappear from sight and from smell. It is not lost, however. Men are ready to shovel it into vans prepared for it; in which it travels every few hours to dépôts outside the barrière, where it is sold to farmers for manure. Since the system of agriculture has begun to be understood in Paris, the demand for this kind of manure has become enormous, and the offal which the butcher throws away in the morning is often fertilising the earth before night. It is stated that were it twice as plentiful it could be readily sold at remunerative prices.

This Central Market, is, in fact, one of the most wonderful works of the French Empire. One only needs to read the above to feel satisfied that, for all practical purposes, it is as far superior to our markets as these latter are to the markets of some Far West village. It is, besides, one of the most elegant and beautiful architectural monuments of Paris.

LES CENTRALES) AT PARIS.

Our illustration, which is vouched for as correct, will testify to this.

It is not gratifying to one's patriotism to turn from the description of the Central Market of Paris to the markets of New York. The contrast may, however, be useful: we are always on the moral.

Through the kindness of Mr. Valentine, Clerk of the Common Council, we are enabled to furnish a few historical memoranda of our city markets. The first market of which we have any record was established by a city ordinance bearing date just 202 years ago; the site was "on the beach opposite Hans Kierstedt's house;" the market-day was Saturday. Thirty years afterward, under the English government, there were three market-days; the market was removed to "the vacant space before the Fort"—the present Bowling Green (?); and butchers were required to erect stalls at their own expense. A singularly-worded ordinance of 1693, acquaints us with the division of business, directing that "there be two markets for flesh kept—one in the Broadway, the other under the trees by the Slip. Fish shall be brought into the dock over against the City Hall, or the house that Long Mary formerly lived in." The spot indicated was near the head of Counties Slip; but who was Long Mary, who is immortalized in this fishy connection?

It seems that the market "under the trees by the Slip" took over all the business from the old establishment in Broadway; for we find that the market-house in Broadway was rented in 1695 to Henry Crosby, butcher, for seven years, at £1 per annum. Still it continued to be used as a market. In 1700, Mr. Valentine informs us that there were two flesh and one fish market in the city; but it was not till 1731 that every day in the week except Sunday was pronounced to be a market-day; at which time, it would appear from the Montgomerie grant, that there were five markets in the city—far more than would seem to have been required for a town such as New York was at that time.

Some of these markets seem to have been the private property of the citizens of the ward in which they stood, and subject solely to the control of these citizens. In 1735 the Common Council assumed charge of all the markets, abolished all fees, and leased the stalls to butchers. Strange to say, the interests of the dealers/growers was such that all hawkers were excluded from the markets. The Corporation likewise undertook to keep the markets in repair. It would appear that corporations of that day were but little better than those of our own; after six years' trial of the administration of the market business, the Common Council agreed that some less burdensome method should be tried, and accordingly, in 1741, leases of each stall for one year were sold at auction. The aggregate amount of the products of the leases averaged £600 per annum. Twenty-five years afterward the value of the property had quadrupled.

After the evacuation of the city by the British the markets were repaired by the Common Council; they needed it sadly, most of them having been very badly used by the troops, and having had no repairs for many years. After the Revolution the practice of letting the markets to individuals appears to have been abandoned; we find the Mayor, who was ex officio Clerk of the Markets, reporting that the market fees collected by him amounted to nearly £700, of which the Common Council allowed him to retain one-half.

A new plan was tried in 1796. Stalls in the City Market, at the foot of Maiden Lane, were sold to butchers at prices ranging from £20 to £630. When the Fly Market was pulled down, in 1822, and the Fulton Market established, the butchers who had purchased stalls twenty-six years before had the Corporation for damages, and—such is the luck of the city—actually obtained reimbursement of the total amounts they had paid.

For some time during the present century the choice stalls in the city markets were disposed of at a premium to butchers; and competition at one time ran so high that very choice stalls sold for $4000. This system was abandoned in 1835; since which time the stalls have been disposed of by lot.

There are at present in New York twelve markets, which, altogether bring the city in debt many thousand dollars a year, the fees and rents of stands and cellars falling considerably short of the expenses of repairs, salaries, and gas. None of these markets, it may be safely said, is worthy of a great city as this. Though Fulton and Washington Markets are vast improvements on the establishments which stood their place in the days of our ancestors; though the new Tompkins Market will doubtless be our improvement on these; still, when they are compared with the great markets of Paris and other foreign cities, they are as far in the distance as our municipal government is inferior to that of European capitals. They are neither built, nor ventilated, nor distributed, nor regulated in a manner worthy of New York, or calculated to serve the interests of trade, or to protect those of purchaser and the public.

It has been urged that our markets should be disinvested from municipal control, and left entirely to the management of private individuals; that the ground should be sold, with the buildings on it; and that the corporation should have no more to do with the sale of beef and country produce than with that of paper or flour. One strong argument in favor of this change is the superior success of the private over the public markets. Many butchers and hucksters have established private markets in various parts of the city, and have been able to pay heavier rents than the city receives from any of our public markets. Hence the inference that the failure of our public markets, as pecuniary enterprises, is due to the incapacity of a public body like the government to compete with private enterprise.

There can be no question but trade can be better carried on in a market where two hundred people assemble to sell the same articles, than in isolated shops scattered through the city. The private markets at present in existence obtain customers because they are nearer the residences of lazy housekeepers than the public markets; but their prices are notoriously higher than are obtained at Fulton Market, and the choice of commodities is necessarily less. It is undeniable that the public interest would be better served by the erection of three or four model markets, with two hundred and fifty stands apiece, than by the establishment of a thousand private markets.

This, however, does not touch the question whether such public markets should be under the control of the corporation or the property of private individuals. According to the teaching of experience and analogy, it would appear that such markets, established under municipal authority, and subject to a certain specific municipal supervision, would be more successful, as commercial enterprises, if they were in the hands of private individuals, than if they remained in those of the corporation. But in either case, to insure success, and to make them worthy of general public support, they should be a great improvement on the markets now in existence, and some approach—at all events—to the model market which we engrave elsewhere.

After the new reservoir is built there will be no lack of water for market purposes, and fresh air can always be had with a proper system of ventilation. Sound regulations rigidly carried out are likewise within the scope of possibility, provided we elect good mayors. The subject is one of too much importance to the interests of producers and consumers, to the advance of trade, and to the public health, to be passed over lightly.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VIII.

Corrections from the problem suggested in Chapters VI. and VII.

Broad daylight, nearly nine o'clock indeed, and Jasper Losely is walking back to his inn from the place at which he had dined the evening before. Now, he has spent his night drinking, gambling, and though he looks heated, there is no sign of fatigue. Nature is so sorting on this man many of her most glorious elements of happiness, bad and temperate a Herculean constitution—always restless and never tired, always drinking and never drunk. Certainly it is true that exhilaration is elicited from alcohol, as it seldom happens that the sickly are very wicked. Criminals are generally athletic—constitution and conscience equally strong. large bucks to their heads—strong sunpersonal muscles—digestion that save them from the over-excitement nerves of the virtuous. The native animal must be vigorous in the human being, when the moral safeguards are daringly overthrown. Jasper was not alone, but with an acquaintance he had made at the dinner, and whom he invited at his inn to breakfast; they were walking familiarly arm in arm. Very unlike the brilliant Losely—a young man under thirty, who seemed to have washed out all the colors of youth in dirty water. His eyes dull, their whites yellow; his complexion sodden. His form was thick-set and heavy; his features pug, with a cross of the bull-dog. In dress, a specimen of the flash style of sporting man, as exhibited on the turf, or more often, perhaps, in the Ring; Belcher neckcloth, with an immense pin representing a jockey at full gallop; cut away coat, corduroy breeches, and boots with tops of a chalky white. Yet, withal, not the air and walk of a genuine born and bred sporting man, even of the vulgar order. Something about him which reveals the pretender. A would-be hawk with a pigeon's liver—a would-be sportsman with a cockney's nurture.

Samuel Adolphus Poole is an orphan of respectable connections. His future expectations chiefly rest on an uncle from whom, as godfather, he takes the loathed name of Samuel. He prefers to sign himself Adolphus; he is popularly styled Dolly. For his present existence he relies ostensibly on his salary as an assistant in the house of a London tradesman in a fashionable way of business. Mr. Latham, his employer, has made a considerable fortune, less by his shop than by discounting the bills of his customers, or of other borrowers whom the loan draws into the net of the custom. Mr. Latham consorts at the sporting taste of Dolly Poole. Dolly has often thus been enabled to pick up useful pieces of information as to the names and private of such denizens of the sporting world as might apply to Mr. Latham for temporary accommodation. Dolly Poole has many sporting friends; he has also many debts. He has been a dupe, he is now a rogue; but he wants decision of character to put into practice many valuable hints that his experience of dupe and his development into rogue suggest to his ambition. Still, however, now and then, whenever a shabby fiver falls to his safely done, he is what he calls "lucky." He has conceived a prodigious admiration for Jasper Losely, one cause for which will be explained in the dialogue about to be recorded; another cause for which is analogous to that loving submission with which some ill-conditioned dogs acknowledges a master in the hand that has thrashed it. For at Losely's first appearance at the convivial meeting just concluded, being settled at the unpretious nice of superiority which that sycotree unmanly, mistaking for effeminacy Jasper's elaborate dandyism, and not recognizing in the brave's elegant proportions the tiger-like strength of which, in truth, that tiger-like suppleness should have warned him, Dolly Poole provoked a quarrel, and being himself a stout fellow, nor unaccustomed to athletic exercises, began to spar; the next moment he was at the other end of the room full sprawl on the floor; and two minutes afterward he received made up to conciliating banqueters, with every bone in his skin seeming to have been the generous's slobbering out that he never bore malice, and shaking hands with Jasper Losely as if he had found a benefactor. Such was the explanation.

Jasper. "Yes, Poole, my hearty, as you say, that blow dropping up by chance, was the safest luther. There's no certainty in whist, if one has a spoon for a partner."

Poole. "A certainty in every rubber, but next to certainty in the long run, when a man plays a game for life—as I do, Losely. Your winnings to-night must have been pretty large, though you had a bad partner almost every hand—pretty large—eh?"

Jasper (carelessly). "Nothing to talk of—a few pounds."

Poole. "More than a few; I should know."

Jasper. "Why? You did not play after the first rubber."

Poole. "No, when I saw your play on that first rubber, I cut out, and left on you; and very grateful to you I am. Still you would win more with a partner who understood your game."

He shrewd Dolly paused a moment, and leaning significantly on Jasper's arm, added, in a low confidential tone, "I do; I am that man."

Jasper did not change color, but a quick rise of the eyebrow, and a slight jerk of the neck, betrayed some little surprise or uneasiness; however, here joined without hesitation—"French, ay! In France there is more dash in playing out trumps than there is with English players."

"And with a player like you," said Poole, still in a half whisper, "more trumps to play out."

Jasper turned round sharp and short; the hard, cruel expression of his mouth, little seen of late, came back to it. Poole recoiled, and his bones began again to ache. "I did not mean to offend you, Mr. Losely, but to caution."

"Caution!"

"There were two knowing coves, who, if they had not been so drunk, would not have lost their money without a row, and they would have seen how they lost it; they are sharpers—you served them right—don't be angry with me. You want a partner—so do I; you play better than I do, but I play well; you shall have two-thirds of our winnings, and when you come to town I'll introduce you to a pleasant set of young fellows—green."

Jasper mused a moment. "You know a thing or two, I see, Master Poole, and we'll discuss the whole subject after breakfast. Arn't you hungry?—No!—I am! Hillo! who's that?"

His arm was seized by Mr. Rugge. "She's gone—fled!" gasped the manager, breathless. "Out of the lattice—fifteen feet high—not dashed to pieces—vanished!"

"Go on and order breakfast," said Losely to Mr. Poole, who was listening too inquisitively. He drew the manager away. "Can't you keep your tongue in your head before strangers? the girl is gone!"

"Out of the lattice, and fifteen feet high!"

"Any sheets left hanging out of the lattice?"

"Sheets! No."

"Then she did not go without help—somebody must have thrown up to her a rope-ladder—nothing so easy—done it myself scores of times for the descent of 'maids who love the moon,' Mr. Rugge. But at her age there is not a moon—at least there is not a man in the moon; one must dismiss, then, the idea of a rope-ladder—too precocious. But are you quite sure she is gone? not hiding in some cupboard? Sacre!—very odd. Have you seen Mrs. Crane about it?"

"Yes, just come from her; she thinks that villain Waife must have stolen her. But I want you, Sir, to come with me to a magistrate."

"Magistrate! I—why?—nonsense—set the police to work."

"Your deposition that she is your lawful child, lawfully made over to me, is necessary for the Inquisition—I mean Police."

"Hang it, what a bother! I hate magistrates, and all belonging to them. Well, I must breakfast; I'll see to it afterward. Oblige me by not calling Mr. Waife a villain—good old fellow in his way."

"Good! Powers above!"

"But if he took her off how did he get at her? It must have been preconcerted."

"Ha! true. But she has not been suffered to speak to a soul not in the company—Mrs. Crane excepted."

"Perhaps at the performance last night some signal was given?"

"But if Waife had been there I should have seen him, my troop would have known him; such a remarkable face—one eye, too."

"Well, well, do what you think best. I'll call on you after breakfast; let me go now. Basta! basta!"

Losely wrenched himself from the manager, and strode off to the inn; then, ere joining Poole, he sought Mrs. Crane.

"This going before a magistrate," said Losely, "to depose that I have made over my child to that blackguard showman—in this town, too—after such luck as I have had, and where bright prospects are opening on me, is most disagreeable. And supposing, when we have traced Sophy, she should be really with the old man—awkward! In short, my dear friend, my dear Bella" (Losely could be very coaxing when it was worth his while), "you just manage this for me. I have a fellow in the next room waiting to breakfast; as soon as breakfast is over I shall be off to the race-ground, and so shirk that ranting old bore; you'll call on him instead, and settle it somehow." He was out of the room before she could answer.

Mrs. Crane found it no easy matter to soothe the infuriate manager, when he heard Losely was gone to amuse himself at the race-course. Nor did she give herself much trouble to pacify Mr. Rugge's anger, or assist his investigations. Her interest in the whole affair seemed over. Left thus to his own devices, Rugge, however, began to institute a sharp, and what promised to be an effective investigation. He ascertained that the fugitive certainly had not left by the railway, or by any of the public conveyances; he sent scouts over all the neighborhood; he enlisted the sympathy of the police, who confidently assured him that they had 'a net-work over the three kingdoms;' no doubt they have, and we pay for it; but the meshes are so large that any thing less than a whale must be silly indeed if it consent to be caught. Rugge's suspicions were directed to Waife—he could collect, however, no evidence to confirm them. No person answering to Waife's description had been seen in the town. Once, indeed, Rugge was close on the right scent; for, insisting upon Waife's one eye and his possession of a white dog, he was told by several witnesses that a man blind of two eyes, and led by a black dog, had been close before the stage, just previous to the performance. But then the clown had spoken to that very man; all the Thespian company had observed him; all of them had known Waife familiarly for years; and all deposed that any creature more unlike to Waife than the blind man could not be turned out of Nature's workshop. But where was that blind man? They found out the wayside inn in which he had taken a lodging for the night; and there it was ascertained that he had paid for his room beforehand, stating that he should start for the race-course early in the morning. Rugge himself set out to the race-course to kill two birds with one stone—catch Mr. Losely—examine the blind man himself.

He did catch Mr. Losely, and very nearly caught something else—for that gentleman was in a ring of noisy horsemen, mounted on a hired hack, and loud as the noisiest. When Rugge came up to his stirrup, and began his harangue, Losely turned his hack round with so sudden an appliance of bit and spur that the animal lashed out, and its heel went within an inch of the manager's cheek-bone. Before Rugge could recover Losely was in a hand gallop. But the blind man! Of course Rugge did not find him? You are mistaken; he did. The blind man was there, dog and all. The manager spoke to him, and did not know him from Adam.

Nor have you or I, my venerated readers, any right whatsoever to doubt whether Mr. Rugge could be so stolidly obtuse. Granting that blind sailor to be the veritable William Waife—William Waife was a man of genius, taking pains to appear an ordinary mortal. And the anecdotes of Munden, or of Bamfylde Moore Carew, suffice to tell us how Protean is the power of transformation in a man whose genius is mimetic. But how often does it happen to us, venerated readers, not to recognize a man of genius, even when he takes no particular pains to escape detection! A man of genius may be for ten years our next-door neighbor—he may dine in company with us twice a week—his face may be as familiar to our eyes as our arm-chair—his voice to our ears as the click of our parlor-clock—yet we are never more astonished than when all of a sudden, some bright day, it is discovered that our next-door neighbor is—a man of genius. Did you ever hear tell of the life of a man of genius, but what there were numerous witnesses who deposed to the fact, that until, perfidious dissembler, he flared up and set the Thames on fire, they had never seen any thing in him—an odd creature, perhaps a good creature—probably a poor creature—But a MAN OF GENIUS! They would as soon have suspected him of being the Cham of Tartary! Nay, candid readers, are there not some of you who refuse to the last to recognize the man of genius, till he has paid his penny to Charon, and his passport to immortality has been duly examined by the custom-house officers of Styx! When one half the world drag forth that same next-door neighbor, place him on a pedestal, and have him cried, "O yez! O yez! Found a man of genius! Public property—open to inspection!" does not the other half the world put on its spectacles, turn up its nose, and cry, "That a man of genius, indeed! Pelt him!—pelt him!" Then of course there is a clatter, what the vulgar call "a shindy," round the pedestal. Squeezed by his believers, shied at by his scoffers, the poor man gets horribly mauled about, and drops from the perch in the midst of the row. Then they shovel him over, clap a great stone on his relics, wipe their foreheads, shake hands, compromise the dispute, the one half the world admitting that though he was a genius, he was still an ordinary man; the other half allowing that though he was an ordinary man, he was still a genius. And so on to the next pedestal with its "Hic stet," and the next great stone with its "Hic jacet."

The manager of the Grand Theatrical Exhibition gazed on the blind sailor, and did not know him from Adam!

CHAPTER IX.

The aboriginal Man-eater, or Pocket-Cannibal, is susceptible of the refining influences of Civilization. He decorates his lair with the skins of his victims; he adorns his person with the spoils of those whom he devours. Mr. Losely introduced to Mr. Poole's friends—dresses for dinner; and, combining elegance with appetite, eats them up.

ELATED with the success which had rewarded his talents for pecuniary speculation, and dismissing from his mind all thoughts of the fugitive Sophy and the spoliated Rugge, Jasper Losely returned to London in company with his new friend, Mr. Poole. He left Arabella Crane to perform the same journey, unattended; but that grim lady, carefully concealing any resentment at such want of gallantry, felt assured that she should not be long in London without being honored by his visits.

In renewing their old acquaintance, Mrs. Crane had contrived to establish over Jasper that kind of influence which a vain man, full of schemes that are not to be told to all the world, but which it is convenient to discuss with some confidential friend who admires himself too highly not to respect his secrets, mechanically yields to a woman whose wits are superior to his own.

It is true that Jasper, on his return to the metropolis, was not magnetically attracted toward Podden Place; nay, days and even weeks elapsed, and Mrs. Crane was not gladdened by his presence. But she knew that her influence was only suspended—not extinct. The body attracted was for the moment kept from the body attracting by the abnormal weights that had dropped into its pockets. Restore the body thus temporarily counterpoised to its former lightness, and it would turn to Podden Place as the needle to the Pole. Meanwhile, oblivious of all such natural laws, the disloyal Jasper had fixed himself as far from the reach of the magnet as from Bloomsbury's remotest verge is St. James's animated centre. The apartment he engaged was showy and commodious. He added largely to his wardrobe—his dressing-case—his trinket-box. Nor, be it here observed, was Mr. Losely one of those beauish brigands who wear tawdry scarfs over soiled linen, and paste rings upon unwashed digitals. To do him justice, the man, so stony-hearted to others, loved and cherished his own person with exquisite tenderness, lavished upon it delicate attentions, and gave to it the very best he could afford. He was no coarse debauchee, smelling of bad cigars and ardent spirits. Cigars, indeed, were not among his vices (at worst the rare peccadillo of a cigarette)—spirit-drinking was; but the monster's digestion was still so strong, that he could have drunk out a gin palace, and you would only have sniffed the jasmin or heliotrope on the dainty cambric that wiped the last drop from his lips. Had his soul been a tenth part as clean as the form that belied it, Jasper Losely had been a saint! His apartments secured, his appearance thus revised and embellished, Jasper's next care was an equipage in keeping; he hired a smart cabriolet with a high-stepping horse, and, to go behind it, a groom whose size had been stunted in infancy by provident parents designing him to earn his bread in the stables as a light-weight, and therefore mingling his mother's milk with heavy liquors. In short, Jasper Losely set up to be a buck about town; in that capacity Dolly Poole introduced him to several young gentlemen who combined commercial vocations with sporting tastes; they could not but participate in Poole's admiring and somewhat envious respect for Jasper Losely. There was indeed about the vigorous miscreant a great deal of false brilliancy. Deteriorated from earlier youth though the beauty of his countenance might be, it was still undeniably handsome; and as force of muscle is beauty in itself in the eyes of young sporting men, so Jasper dazzled many a gracilis puer, who had the ambition to become an athlete, with the rare personal strength which, as if in the exuberance of animal spirits, he would sometimes condescend to display, by feats that astonished the curious and frightened the timid—such as bending a poker or horse-shoe, between hands elegantly white nor unadorned with rings—or lifting the weight of Samuel Dolly by the waistband, and holding him at arm's-length, with a playful bet of ten to one that he could stand by the fire-place and pitch the said Samuel Dolly out of the open window. To know so strong a man, so fine an animal, was something to boast of! Then, too, if Jasper had a false brilliancy, he had also a false bonhommie; it was true that he was somewhat imperious, swaggering, bullying—but he was also off-hand and jocund; and as you knew him, that sidelong look, that defying gait (look and gait of the man whom the world cuts), wore away. In fact, he had got into a world which did not cut him, and his exterior was improved by the atmosphere.

Mr. Losely professed to dislike general society. Drawing-rooms were insipid; clubs full of old fogies. "I am for life, my boys," said Mr. Losely:

> "'Can sorrow from the goblet flow,
> Or pain from Beauty's eye?'"

Mr. Losely, therefore, his hat on one side, lounged into the saloons of theatres, accompanied by a cohort of juvenile admirers, their hats on one side also, and returned to the pleasantest little suppers in his own apartment. There "the goblet" flowed—and after the goblet, cigars for some, and a rubber for all.

So puissant Losely's vitality, and so blessed by the stars his luck, that his form seemed to wax stronger and his purse fuller by this "life." No wonder he was all for a life of that kind; but the slight beings who tried to keep up with him grew thinner and thinner, and poorer and poorer; a few weeks made their cheeks spectral and their pockets a dismal void. Then as some dropped off from sheer inanition, others whom they had decoyed by their praises of "Life" and its hero, came into the magic circle to fade and vanish in their turn.

In a space of time incredibly brief not a whist-player was left upon the field; the victorious Losely had trumped out the last! Some few, whom Nature had endowed more liberally than Fortune, still retained strength enough to sup—if asked;

> "But none who came to sup remained to play."

"Plague on it," said Losely to Poole, as one afternoon they were dividing the final spoils. "Your friends are mightily soon cleaned out; could not even get up double dummy, last night; and we must hit on some new plan for replenishing the coffers! You have rich relations; can't I help you to make them more useful?"

Said Dolly Poole, who was looking exceedingly bilious, and had become a martyr to chronic headache, "My relations are prigs! Some of them give me the cold shoulder, others—a great deal of jaw. But as for tin, I might as well scrape a flint for it. My uncle Sam is more anxious about my sins than the other codgers, because he is my godfather, and responsible for my sins, I suppose; and he says he will put me in the way of being respectable. My head's splitting—"

"Wood does split till it is seasoned," answered Losely. "Good fellow, uncle Sam! He'll put you in the way of tin; nothing else makes a man respectable."

"Yes—so he says; a girl with money—"

"A wife—tin canister! Introduce me to her, and she shall be tied to you."

Samuel Dolly did not appear to relish the idea of such an introduction. "I have not been introduced to her myself," said he. "But if you advise me to be spliced, why don't you get spliced yourself? a handsome fellow like you can be at no loss for an heiress."

"Heiresses are the most horrid cheats in the world," said Losely: "there is always some father, or uncle, or fusty Lord Chancellor whose consent is essential, and not to be had. Heiresses in scores have been over head and ears in love with me. Before I left Paris, I sold their locks of hair to a wig-maker—three great trunksful. Honor bright. But there were only two whom I could have safely allowed to run away with me; and they were so closely watched, poor things, that I was forced to leave them to their fate—early graves! Don't talk to me of heiresses, Dolly, I have been the victim of heiresses. But a rich widow is an estimable creature. Against widows, if rich, I have not a word to say; and to tell you the truth, there is a widow whom I suspect I have fascinated, and whose connection I have a particular private reason for deeming desirable! She has a whelp of a son, who is a spoke in my wheel—were I his father-in-law, would not I be a spoke in his? I'd teach the boy 'life,' Dolly." Here all trace of beauty vanished from Jasper's face, and Poole, staring at him, pushed away his chair. "But"—continued Losely, regaining his more usual expression of levity and boldness—"But I am not yet quite sure what the widow has, besides her son, in her own possession; we shall see. Meanwhile, is there—no chance of a rubber to-night?"

"None; unless you will let Brown and Smith play upon tick."

"Pooh! but there's Robinson, he has an aunt he can borrow from?"

"Robinson! spitting blood, with an attack of delirium tremens!—you have done for him."

"Can sorrow from the goblet flow?" said Losely. "Well, I suppose it can—when a man has no coats to his stomach; but you and I, Dolly Poole, have stomachs thick as pea-jackets, and proof as gutta percha."

Poole forced a ghastly smile, while Losely, gayly springing up, swept his share of booty into his pockets, slapped his comrade on the back, and said—"Then, if the mountain will not come to Mohammed, Mohammed must go to the mountain! Hang whist, and up with rouge-et-noir! I have an infallible method of winning—only, it requires capital. You will club your cash with mine, and I'll play for both. Sup here to-night, and we'll go to the —— hell afterward."

Samuel Dolly had the most perfect confidence in his friend's science in the art of gambling, and he did not, therefore, dissent from the proposal made. Jasper gave a fresh touch to his toilet, and stepped into his cabriolet. Poole cast on him a look of envy, and crawled to his lodging—too ill for his desk, and with a strong desire to take to his bed.

THE EBONY BOX.

EARLY in June, in the spring of 1855, it chanced that while enjoying my customary ride along the eastern shore of Manhattan, in the vicinity of the ferry of Astoria, I turned off through a narrow lane to the left, and came near to a cottage-house, standing midway in front of a well-cultivated garden. There were indications of wealth, or at least of competency, about the place, and an air of neatness and elegance which pleased my fancy, prone as it is to look always at the prosperous, the happy, and the fair. My horse, a livery saddle-hack, was struck with equal admiration at the greenness of the grass and herbage within the inclosure, and insisted upon looking at it over the paling. The house, of wood, painted of a delicate cream-color, with white cornices and window-frames, was nearly covered in some parts with sweetbrier, and the white climbing-rose of our grand-parents, now so rarely seen.

The green blinds of the windows were open on the eastern side, and at one of these two heads of flaxen-haired children, with pippin cheeks and roguish eyes, attracted me. They leaned too far out of the window, and the mother had just caught each rather roughly behind; as she drew them back, our eyes met, and I recognized the beautiful face of my friend Alice Liston, of former years. The recognition was mutual. I heard a little scream of surprise. Alice disappeared from the window, and reappeared at the front door. I was not loth to accept the cordial invitation which she gave me to come in.

"How did you get into this pretty house? where have you been these five years? how came little Dick and Alice by those round, red cheeks? and, finally, where, in the name of patience, is that husband of yours?"

"He is within: not a word more till you see him," she said, blushing with delight, and pressing both my hands with genuine and cordial friendliness.

I followed her through the house and into the garden, where, under a grape-arbor which he was pruning and training on the lattice, I found my old friend Liston, the wheel-wright, two inches taller than I knew him, and shining all over with the hues of health and prosperity. To find the pale and stooping workman of former days transformed to such a shape, gave me a shock of pleasurable surprise. He was no less gratified than I at the chance that brought us again together, and the afternoon slipped away pleasantly enough in bringing old times to memory.

Alice, assisted by a rosy Swiss serving-maid, set tea for us on the porch, where we could see the sunset. The air was warm, the sky clear, and the stars came out, as we chatted pleasantly, brightening with new sympathy the somewhat faded pictures of former days. At nine, Alice carried off the children to bed, after a sharp struggle with little Dick, and a shower of tears from his sister; Liston, meanwhile, puffing nervously at his cigar.

As soon as they were out of ear-shot, "Alice," said he, "is spoiling both of them, but I can't find the heart to check her in any thing. She has suffered so many privations it would be cruel to deny her the luxury of spoiling the children. Joking apart, however, she is a good mother; and prosperity has brought out graces and qualities in her that did not appear when we were poor."

"Well, Liston, all this is new and delightful. But, to say the truth, I am positively unhappy till I hear by what chance it happened."

"By no effort of mine; it came to us when we least hoped for it. Five years ago, when you went to Europe, I was earning some fifteen dollars a week at my trade, loving a third of my time, too, with illness and bad luck."

"Yes, I remember Bibb. Little Alice was only two weeks old, and the mother quite feeble."

"We were living, you may remember, in D——— street, in a cheap neighborhood. Our rooms were on the third floor."

"It was there I paid you my last visit."

"I was left me at ten in the evening. I had a bed for myself in the front room, just opposite the door. There was a square table, or light-stand, by the side of the bed."

"Yes."

"As soon as you left me I lay down to read, placing the candle on the table."

"An old habit of yours."

"I have read through many hundred volumes in that way. That night, about twelve, I fell asleep, and the first thing that met my eyes in the morning was a square box, resting on the table, and covered with green cloth, exactly as the top of the box toward myself were three brass letters, S. P. L., the initials of my name. The box had no lock nor hinges. I saw that to open it its brass hoops must be cut with a file and removed. It was in size about equal to a small writing-desk, such as ladies use for their gill-a-gog correspondence. At each end was a strong handle, evidently for the convenience of lifting and carrying. I observed that the table had been moved about three feet from the bed. The candle, which was half-burned out, was fully asleep, was inverted in the socket. It was six in the morning when I waked. On rising and making a personal reconnoissance, I found the door of my room leading into the entry standing ajar; the key was in the inside. I remembered locking it on the inside just after your departure."

"And what was in this box?"

"All in good time. I passed into the bedroom and found Alice, and the baby, and little Dick, asleep. Dick, the shoeblack of my earlier years, as I have told them, for the night was warm."

"Well, the box——"

"After a careful survey I concluded that some person must have come in by the front window, as there was no other ingress; the door and the bedroom being also secured, and the key in the lock, as usual.

"I grasped the handles, and found the box heavy, weighing not less than fifty pounds. Think, my friend, of the fact that it might contain specie. I quickly closed and locked the door of my room, and made a careful examination of the exterior of the casket.

"The initials, S. P. L., puzzled me. They were of an old, fortunate style, and must have been cut by our European or American artisan. These letters seemed to authorize and invite an examination of the contents. With a file I soon cut the brass straps, and soon removed them. Under these were two screws, which I turned easily. It was now only necessary to lift the cover, when the idea offered itself that this might be a torpedo, or infernal machine, placed there with a design upon my life. Not to be outwitted by such a devilish scheme, I cut the casket through, and gradually sawed away the wood, in pieces about an inch square. Within, I found a lining of oakum, saturated with tar, which overspread a second smaller box, of a wood resembling cedar. I carefully drew off the lid, and found within it a box of the other. In this second casket I found four bars of gold, weighing each some twelve or fourteen pounds, and a small leather bag, which, when cut a corner, twenty large diamonds, each of which could not be worth less than two hundred dollars, and two of them three times that sum.

"I searched carefully for some interior marks of ownership. There were none.

"I ran by nature, as you know, cautious, slow, and unscrupulous, but the handling of gold and diamonds roused a fever of cupidity in my blood, and, for the time, I grasped them as if they were my own. Conscience did not awake. It made a fire upon the hearth and burned every fragment of the casket. The handles and the screws were not so easily disposed of. After some reflection, I went up to the scuttle, and getting down upon the roof, threw the screws, one by one, far into an open lot behind the house—among bricks and rubbish.

"The next step was to discover a secure hiding-place for the treasure. Trunks, closets, the cracks of the spaces under the floor, and a multitude of ordinary places of concealment, successively occurred to me as unsafe, and were rejected.

"At length, after an hour of painful and agitating reflection, I asked myself the question, whether, if the real owner of this treasure were to present himself, and make good his claim, or whether, if I had reason to believe that by the aid of advertising and inquiry, he could be discovered, I would confess to his possession?

"The question, literally translated into the vernacular, was, indeed, 'Listen, are you a thief?'

"I was indignant, and felt insulted at the suggestion.

"In that case," continued Conscience, 'will you be good enough, Mr. Liston, to give your reasons for burning and otherwise hiding and destroying the pieces of the casket? Nay, more, will you permit me to open the box at all?'

"I answered, briskly, 'that my initials on the box, and the fact of its being left in my chamber, were a sufficient authorization. That, in fact, I had no intention of appropriating the treasure, and should, that very morning, make a special deposit of the whole in bank, reserving only enough to pay the expenses of advertising.'

"Conscience appeared to be well satisfied with my answers; and not to break promise with one so exacting and inflexible, I took one of the smallest diamonds to a jeweler, sold it for three hundred dollars, made a deposit of my treasure and the money, and inserted a standing advertisement in three daily newspapers, as follows:

FOUND, IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD OF D——— Street, corner of Avenue ——, early on the morning of the 10th of June, a box containing several thousand dollars in gold, and other valuables. The treasure is in the keeping of a bank, and will be restored to the owner, or agent, after satisfactory identification and proofs paid.—Address Z. Y., Post-office.

"Within a week after the publication of the notice I had received three hundred and thirty letters, each giving a different description of some imaginary box or casket. In all of cases, my duty to read each one of these letters. Some of them were written in crimped, Italian hands; others in the bold, practiced style of clerks' writing.

"I soon became weary and disgusted with the paper-collection of fraudulent claims, and left the rid myself of as many as possible, added a few lines to the advertisement, as follows:

"'N. B.—Persons who favor me with attention to communications which fail of a full and accurate identification of the box advertised, will——'

"Five months and seven days after the publication of this second notice, on returning from my office, I found, in the hands of my landlady, a young man, with thinking black hair, and mutton-chop whiskers of the same hue, waiting for me at my rooms. He was engaged in lively conversation with Alice, to whom (if you choose to believe it) I had not mentioned the story of the box. Alice, you know, is painfully conscientious, and if I had made a confession of my first weakness, she would have grieved immediately. But I must tell all or nothing.

"The stranger inquired, with a smile, if I was the party advertising a box of treasure, and at the same moment handed me a card with the initials J. L., written on the back, and the name, Mr. Jacob name. 'J. B. Langdon, Cincinnati,' printed in the middle.

"A thrill of disappointment shot through the marrow of my bones. I had communicated the initials to no person living; the man before me made one step toward the identification of the property by his possession of the card, and I was left without a plea. Happily, it is not what we think or feel, but what we do and say, that tells the moment. With a desperate effort I forced down my disappointment, and from that instant the thieving sentiment did not again visit the secret recesses of my heart.

"I received the stranger with affability, and as Alice had fortunately not mentioned the question as the stranger spoke to me in an undertone, I requested him to step with me into my private room, to a small restaurant, and retired into a private room. 'Now, Sir,' said I, cheerfully, 'let us have a description of identification, and of the property is yours.'

"The stranger seated himself, and called for liquor and cigars; but as I neither drank nor used tobacco, this point of sympathy was interrupted, and he looked disappointed.

"The box of treasure, said he, 'which you have been good enough to advertise, is my property. I am sent by the owner to know what portion of the whole you will consider yours.'

"'I will consider that matter,' said I.

"Certainly; it was a box of stoney bound with brass; measuring about two feet square, with the S. P. L. on one end; brass handles; size about twenty inches by twelve, and seven deep.'

"'Is that all?' asked I.

"Unfortunately, I can give you no information on that point. The owner of the box says, and all that it contains is Madam Danton, a widow Lily in Flatbush. As a friend of Madam Danton, I am authorized by you in the hour of necessity to open the property.'

"I shall certainly restore to Madam Danton whatever of hers may be in my keeping. She has then only of late seen my advertisement?'

"A look of mysterious intelligence was first drawn to it, by the merest accident; and even then she was told only enough to induce her to examine herself so nearly, had it not been for a letter which she had just received from a relative in Batavia in the Netherlands, called Vanderlyn, on his way of Amsterdam. So saying he produced a sealed letter, stamped with the post-office of Amsterdam, and the name of a Dutch merchant-ship, the Slaavoren, Batavia, in writing. The envelope was a strong paper of foreign make. The letter was in French, and the letter was in that language, he volunteered a translation. The purport of the communication, so interesting to myself and the Widow Danton, was as follows:

"S. Paul Lavrenaque, a native of Marseilles, officer on adventurous life as mariner, consul's agent, and finally trader among the islands of the Indian archipelago, had at length settled, in his old age, at Batavia, master of a considerable fortune. Thirty years ago, a stranger under a foreign name, he married a Danton, and soon after a widow, in Amsterdam, named Danton had emigrated to, he resolved to send her, by the hand of a friend, a small portion of his wealth. A buccaneer by profession, this worthy brother had taken the wise precaution to insure his money into human nature; and, on the strength of a letter of credit, he had sent the treasure, hidden in a box of ebony bound with brass, to the care of an American sailor—who wished to return home—addressed to the Widow Danton, at Amsterdam. The messenger, on his arrival, found that Madame Danton had emigrated to America, and was living in New York. He sailed immediately for the United States, arrived safely in New York with the treasure, but failed in discovering the residence of the widow. After seven months of search and inquiry, during which time he had put a letter into the post-office directed to the person he was in search of, indicating also the letter of Lavrenaque. Why he had not called on me was unexplained.

"After reading and explaining the letter of Lavrenaque, Mr. Langdon produced the letter of the sailor, a rude epistle, conveying information to the above effect, and signed 'John Smith.'

"And now,' said the courteous Mr. Langdon, the youthful friend of Madame Danton, 'you will be kind enough to state the expenses which you have incurred, and the skate of the contents of the box which you consider yours.' Madam Danton, though poor, is liberal, and will gladly sacrifice a fourth to recover the remainder.'

"I was silent.

"'In order to convince you, Mr. Liston,' he continued, 'please look over this police report. The box, with the paper, you will perceive, is June 14. The date of your finding the property is June 10.'

"I took the paper from him and read as follows:

"'On the night of the 9th inst. a fatal outrage was committed on the person of a sailor, on the sidewalk at the corner of Avenue —— and Street. A policeman saw two ruffians attack and knock down the sailor, and, on approaching the scene of affairs, apprehended one small villain, upon his shoulder. The policeman saw the villain in the act of having made their escape, on them carrying the box or valise. The sailor was taken to the station-house dangerously wounded, and died before morning. The villain escaped, and died before morning. On his person were found a long Malay kreese, a jackknife, and a pocket-book, on each sheet of which the name John Smith was written on the inside of his tongue.

"So potent was the sentence forced as yet to delay the sale.

"I returned the paper to Mr. Langdon with a feeling of certainty that this Madam Danton was in truth the owner of the property. I was disappointed, but I had by this proposition given me a quarter of the treasure, and frankly told him that I should retain one-fifth of the whole, excepting the expenses and a sufficient sum to pay for the loss of time and trouble—which was considerable.

"'Is that all?' said the astonished, 'he said, 'with a thousand dollars?'

"I replied that that sum is in bank, and can not be delivered to-night.'

"'Yes; I will call early.'

"'Very well; you can have the order. Will you require a personal identification at the C—— bank?'

"A slight change, like a summer cloud, passed over the face of Mr. Langdon.

"'I am a stranger in New York,' said he, 'I think you had better withdraw the deposit yourself, and deliver it to me at your house, say at nine to-morrow.'

"Very well, as you please. And we shook hands and parted in much civility.

"Now, thought I, it is proper to open this matter to Alice. She had made tea and waited for me.

"After a time she perceived that I was preoccupied and anxious. I forgot at the beginning that I developed the affair in his details. She was excited and agitated. I wished to have her opinion of Mr. Langdon. She answered him to be an impostor.

"Impossible; his proofs are complete and satisfactory. Why do you think him false?'

"'He is so plausible—so polite and insinuating. He played with Dick—with Dick—and made himself vastly agreeable.—I dislike his—his—whiskers.'

"I could not forbear laughing. 'Come,' said I, 'Alice, that is nonsense. Mr. Langdon is a gentleman, and has naturally wishes to be agreeable to a handsome woman like yourself.'

"'Shall I accompany you?' asked Alice, timidly.

"'Yes; do.'

"I thought you hated him?'

"'Well, my W——I is a gentleman, and shrewd; I hate his disagreeable puns and jokes, but I like his gentlemanly air. He is certainly handsome for one. You are too trustful by half.'

"I will go and see him to-night.'

"I waited impatiently for W——, at his house. He came home worn and irritated; but on my explaining the affair of the box, and Mr. Langdon, he became deeply interested, and gave it immediate attention. After a searching and minute examination, he pronounced the box, in fact no property, to be at my house, as if by accident, at twelve, the following morning, so as to receive the order for Madam Danton.

"The next day I remained at home. W——d came at the hour's o'clock, and we again talked over the business. At twelve precisely Langdon with his servant arrived. He was received by me, at him as my legal adviser. Langdon shook hands with him, and W——d immediately opened the conversation.

"'Mr. Langdon,' said he, 'will you be kind enough to explain to me by what means you learned the name and residence of Mr. Liston?'

"With pleasure. Feeling that a personal intervview was necessary, I placed myself at the box-office, and waited until Mr. Liston called for the money. He told me that he resided in a large house, and inquired his name at the store opposite.'

"True. It is singular that John Smith, the sailor, left no reference to Madam Danton.'

"Smith was evidently a common sailor; and you can not be aware that writing was unknown to him. He put it off to the last moment.'

"Will you let me see Lavernaque's letter, Mr. Langdon?'

"Langdon gave the letter. W——d, I know, was a master of French.

"He took the letter to the window and read it carefully. He then asked for John Smith's letter, which, I thought, Langdon gave him unwillingly.

"After a close inspection of the two, he folded them up and put them in his breast pocket. 'Of course, Mr. Langdon, you will have no objection to my retaining these letters?'

"None whatever; they are the property of Madam Danton, but she will receive in exchange, I am sure, copies of Madam Danton.'

"Hum. Strange that Lavernaque should not have stated the amount of treasure contained in the box?'

"'Perhaps,' said Langdon, 'you had better let me go for Madam Danton; and you can give the property to her. I presume it is in this house, as we agreed, Mr. Liston?'

"No,' said I, 'we thought it better to make further investigations into the claims of Madam Danton. I have a friend living in Batavia; I will write to him in regard to it.'

"Mr. Langdon became uneasy. He rose and asked for the letters.

"W——d smiled, and shook his head. Langdon's brow grew dark and threatening.

"Sir,' said he to W——d, 'it is not the act of a gentleman to refuse you the letters.'

"I believe them to be forgeries,' replied W——d, quietly, 'and shall not give them up until they have been examined by some person skilled in handwritings. They are safe with me, Sir, and shall be returned when I am sure that I am the propounded genuine. The handwritings of both appear to me to have been executed by the same writer.'

"While W——d was speaking, Langdon, who sat near the door, took up his hat, and escaped as quickly and quickly he seemed to vanish.

"W——d laughed. 'I would have been troublesome to prove,' said he, taking out the letters, that these are forgeries; but the fellow has saved me that labor. A mere experienced swindler could have defied us to the proof.'

"He opened the casket,' said I, 'was accurate. By what means did he arrive at it?'

"'From some knave in communication with the person who wrote the letter in the first place. This morning I looked over a file of newspapers, and found the police report of June 11. I then applied at the station-house for additional facts. There have been an inquiries for the murdered sailor. The papers I found in his pocket-book, correct.'

"It occurs to me,' said I, 'that we have burdened in allowing Langdon to escape.'

"W——d was annoyed by the suggestion, and hurried off to the police office. He would soon be back. The presumptive forger had either disguised himself too effectually for recognition, or had left the city.

"In spite of the succeeding year I moved into a small cottage in the suburbs of Long Island. My business increased, and became profitable. I made a large venture in cotton, and realized several Jonyman. I felt sure that the owner of the treasure would by-and-by appear and establish his claim. I was thinking of Alice. She would never believe that the initials S. P. L. were not intended for my own name. She dreamed of the discovery of the treasure; and in those visions the handsome swindler always made his appearance, which led me to suspect that his presence was to her the more a deeper impression upon her fancy than she was willing to admit.

"The cottage which we occupied was the last one in a row of eight, built alike, each with a garden in front. The one adjoining was occupied by a respectable, quiet old lady and her son, a dark, medium man, reputedly engaged in trade in town. The old lady soon scraped acquaintance with Alice over the railings of the garden, and they seemed to be mutually fond of each other. Mrs. Maxwell—last was the name of our neighbor—commanded Alice's love. She was a widow lady, and sometimes until daylight. In the day time he remained in his own house, reading, writing, and reading flash novels. The old lady engaged his life to that of his father, the Rev. Dr. Maxwell, who was the neighborhood, and a piece of respect bordering on adoration. Old Mrs. Maxwell was poor, but in the neighborhood she reputed charitable; but, for my part, I conceived a thorough detestation for her and her son—the one as a mischievous gossip, and the other as a sullen cur.

"I had rented this cottage for a year, and, notwithstanding the aversion I felt for our neighbors, fancied it necessary to remain in it. The upper rooms were divided into four, by Alice, as a nursery, a parlor of boards, and we found the sewing, bibbing, tucking, and rocking of the baby to be very thoroughly unpleasant, we were forced to leave that part of the house unoccupied, and confined ourselves to the lower floor, and garden.

"One evening, while crossing the South Ferry to New York, I caught a glimpse of a face somewhat familiar. The owner of the face avoided me, but I followed and cornered him; and in spite of his efforts to escape, I recognized the gentlemanly with artificial blackness, I recognized the intelligent and polite Mr. Langdon, the friend of Miss Danton.

"'Mr. Langdon, I think?'

"'I have mistaken the man.'

"Not at all; I have a good memory for faces. Now, Sir, I have you, since we are face to face, you will find it necessary to go with me to the station-house, and to answer you will be to be in a place of greater security. Not a word; I need your services, Mr. Langdon. The less trouble you give me the more I shall be inclined to oblige.'

"I put Langdon in charge of an officer at the landing, and left him in the hands of the police, and paid the friend of Madam Danton a visit in his cell. The officers of the law recognized him as a notorious swindler, and consequently known to me.

"Fare Bill was very liberal of his promises, and agreed to sell all his interest if we would give him liberty, and forbear to appear against him. He then stated that he left the city the night after his interview with W——d, and myself, and that he was himself one of the two men who had attacked the sailor on the corner of Avenue —— and Street; that he and his comrade ran down a blind alley with the box, which they found very heavy. They were met by a man with a cart, and a negro driver. While in this hiding-place they both saw Mr. Langdon and the S. P. L. upon the casket—like the police were still in pursuit; but they had come out, but climbed over a high spiked fence into the yard of the house in which I was living, and of which the lower floor and basement were unoccupied. They entered the basement by a window, taking with them the precious casket, which they felt sure must contain specie, from its weight, and from the fact of its being carried by a seaman.

"At this point of his narrative Faro Bill introduced an episodical sketch of a former adventure of the same character, in which his companion, Black Jack, had left him at a critical moment and made off with the booty. This experience made him distrustful, and he did not quit his hold upon the casket, notwithstanding its weight, which distressed him exceedingly. While they were distressed him exceedingly. While they were hiding and scrambling together in darkness and security, they heard the cry of an infant, and concluded that the third party must be occupied. As the neighborhood was thinly inhabited and many robberies had been committed there with impunity for upon day, Jack proposed that they should finish the night with a burglarious expedition to the rooms above, leaving the casket, meanwhile, in the basement. Faro Bill was averse to the proposition, but finally yielded, while he maintained his own side with a tool ingeniously formed for such an exploit. Thus armed they waited, undecided to see whether I had been wakened by the noise, which, though slight, was inevitable. The door was then opened by the robber, and the two entered together. Seeing nothing of value in the apartment, they concluded that, as the vest of clothes was nowhere visible in the room, it must be under the pillow, and consequently constituted a temptation not to be resisted, as the vest of clothes was nowhere visible in the room, it must be under the pillow, and consequently constituted a temptation not to be resisted, as there was no alternative to ruin the pillow; in order to do this they must move away the table. Faro Bill let go not the light to avoid confusion in case of my awakening, and to ease his left hand, which was overworked and sore with the weight and ile of the heavy casket, he raised the latter and placed it upon the table. A ray from the moon gave light sufficient for the purpose by which to work. They then moved the table carefully away about two feet from the bed, Faro Bill standing with his belt's head facing the entrance of the room in which Alice was asleep with the children. This entrance was through a large chest or bedroom, with two doors of which were open.

"He offered no assault to the fact that, in raising his eyes after they had moved the table, he saw a white apparition coming toward him through the passage. This man would perished from fear and that the eyes were open like the eyes of a corpse. He fled, however, and Black Jack followed him; but nor did the two cease running until they were far out of sight and hearing of the scene of this dreadful occurrence.

"The narrative of Faro Bill accounted for the presence of the casket in my room, which we were still to seek as to the right ownership. W——d expressed no bias in regard to the matter, except the caller. At first he refused to communicate my further particulars, but the promise of money, and the application of a few lively threats, finally induced to a better sense of his own interest. He admitted that Black Jack had found time to return with his load into the pockets of the seaman, and that he drew out a large wallet. That he thought no more of the matter, but brought them with him to the money, and papers in the wallet, but had secretly resolved to appropriate the money but for the same reason that Jack take his chance with the wallet. Had been looking for Jack in Brooklyn when he entered him on the street-cars; thought he might find him, and would undertake the search if we made it an object.

"After some reflection I offered one hundred dollars for the discovery of Black Jack, and nine hundred more to be paid in case the two together could produce the owner of the casket, or furnish papers that should lead to a discovery. W——d approved of the offer, and Faro Bill, after being set at liberty and furnished with a dress suit, promised to lose no time in earning the reward. I returned home that night confirmed in my confidence of finding, at no distant day, the small cause of the treasure.

[TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT NUMBER.]

MY SISTER.

In misty nights of crazy stars,
Where oh—what knocky answers;
With a rickety table, and without chairs,
And only a stool to kneel to prayers,
Dwells my sister.

There is no carpet upon the floor,
The wind whistles in through the cracks of the door;
Only a single hair adorns her brow,
But who feels interest in one so poor?
Yet that is my sister.

She was Mooning, and fresh, and young, and fair,
With bright blue eyes and auburn hair;
But the rose was wan'd from her cheek,
And her visage is mark'd with a grim despair.
Such is my sister.

When at early morning, to rest her head,
She throws herself on her weary bed,
Longing to stop the sleep of the dead,
Yet fearing, from all she has heard and read,
Pity my sister.

But the bright sun shines on her and on me,
And on many and here, and on there and thee:
Whether our lot in life may be.
Whether of high or of low degree,
Still she's our sister.
Weep for our sister,
Pray for our sister,
Succour our sister.

Miscellany.

HUSBAND-HUNTING.

I KNOW that if women wish to escape the stigma of husband-seeking, they must act and look like marble or clay—cold, expressionless, bloodless; for every appearance of feeling, of joy, excitement, friendliness, antipathy, admiration, disgust, are alike construed by the world into the attempt to hook a husband. Never mind! whimpering women have their own conscience to comfort them after all. Do not, therefore, be too much afraid of showing yourself as you are—affectionate and good-hearted—do not to harshly repress sentiments and feelings excellent in themselves, because you fear that some puppy may fancy that you are letting them come out that you may catch a husband. Human nature will live only by halves, because if you showed too much imitation, some pragmatical thing in breeches would have it into his head seriously that you designed to dedicate your life to his insanity.—Jane Eyre.

OBSERVATION.

THE habit of observation is one of the most valuable in life—the habit which has been highly estimated, and it is one that can easily be cultivated. Never do any thing without observing that you do it correct, whether you are walking, talking, or hewing your eyes and ears open, and always try and remember what you see and hear. By this means you will acquire more knowledge than can ever be learned from books, as you will find the information in books of very little use apt capable of receiving it. Read books and newspapers, but, above all, observe observing human life. Mankind will be always with you, and ever ready to store your mind with the truths of nature.

THE ART OF SPEAKING-GLASS.

To break a looking-glass is accounted a very unlucky accident. Should it be a valuable one this will literally ruin, which is more than can be said of similar superstitions. Mirrors were formerly used by magicians for the purpose of revealing, and there was an ancient kind of divination by the looking-glass; hence, it should seem, has been derived the popular notion that the fracture of a looking-glass betokens that its owner will lose his best friend. "Ah!" says Bacon (Essay on Clouds of Aristophanes.) Potter, in his Antiquities of Greece, says—"from divination by water was performed with a looking-glass, and was called Catoptromancy," sometimes they dipped a looking-glass into water, and by the spectacles, you what was to become of a sick person; for, as he looked well or ill in the glass, accordingly they presumed of his future recovery. Consecrated glasses were used without water. Gross tells us that "breaking a looking-glass presages misfortune in the family—commonly the master." Bonaparte's (Napoleon's) superstition upon this head is often recorded. "During the whole campaign in Italy," says M. de Constant, "he broke the only looking-glass which I had. I was in despair, till the return of the courier he forbids with dispatched to assure him of her safety, on seeing the fragments of the broth upon his mind."

PORTRAIT OF COTTES.

MR. HELPS, in his "Spanish Conquest," writes: "Can who has dealt with, and has been descriptions of men are often as minutes as if he were noting us trade for stock in trade. Cortes, he tells us, is of good make and stature—well proportioned and stalwart. The color of his face inclined to pellor, and his countenance is not very joyful. He is grave, when he looked at you, had an amiable expression; otherwise, a gloomy one. He was a good deal and thin, and so was his hair. His chest was deep, and his shoulders broad, and he was a slender, with very little stomach; somewhat how-legged, with well turned thighs and ankles. He walked with the assistance of a cane, and he set all arms, as well on foot as on horseback; and, down all, he had many of the qualities of a man who is most to the purpose. When very angry, there was a vein which swelled in his forehead, and his voice was the threat; but, nevertheless, his words were mild and decorous. He was remarkable by clean and decent habits, temperate, eating much in fine silks and velvets, or gorgeous ornaments. His present grandeur of estate sat upon him with that ease and air which showed that he had long been worn, and he presented in no way the appearance of a man suddenly risen to second rather to have come to some high fortune which had been awaiting him from his birth."

CAPABILITIES OF WOMEN.

"THERE is not a town in Piedmont," said a Vaudois Barbin, in his Memoirs, "in which some of our brethren have not suffered death. Jordan Tertian was burned alive at Susa; Hypolyte Roubier was burned at Briançon; Valentine Antonio was hanged on the Col de Meane; Ugon Chiampo, of Fenestrelle, was taken at Suza, and tendered to Turin, where his bowels were torn out and hung into a basin, without his sufferings being terminated even by this frightful torture. Peter Gemmont, of Bobi, died at Luceras, with a living cat in the interior of his body. Mary Bonnian was buried alive at Rocheplate. Lucrece Paulon suffered the same fate at St. Johan; Michael Goud, a man almost a hundred years of age, was burned alive at Saranoe. Not only were these executions place, was left in a dying state upon the snow. Catholicism Frache, having been backed with sabres, had his wounds filled with quicklime, and expired in this manner at Fenil. Daniel Michelin had his tongue torn out at Bobi, for having praised God. James Bardion, died, covered with brimstone matches, which they had fastened between his fingers, and about his lips, his nostrils, and all parts of his body. Daniel Revel had his mouth filled with gunpowder, which was set on fire, and the explosion of which tore his head in pieces. Daniel Maurin was shot in the Combe de Rora, the flush of her cheeks and of her chin was removed, so that the jaw were exposed, and her teeth left to the sun left to die. Paul Garnier was slowly mangled at Bora, Thomas Margaret mutilated in an indescribable manner at the Fort of Mirabone, and Susanna Jaquin cut in pieces at La Tour. A number of young women of the valley of Lucerna were put upon still more dreadful to them than death, flung themselves from a precipice, and perished among the rocks. Sarah Lantagnat was cleft in pieces from the middle of her body, and was left in a dying state on the road from Tavale to Lucerna. Susanna Charbenier was impaled alive, and borne in this state like a banner, from St. Jean to La Tour. At Chasnay, Jeanne Bertrand had her breast cut off, then his fingers were cut off, then his feet and hands were severed by the knife, and then the arms and legs were separated from his body, upon such refusal that he made to abjure the Gospel.

HOSPITALITY.

A BELIEVER in Christianity feels astonished that the philosophic infidel should overlook the fact that that Christianity alone he despises actual and fulfils all the conditions of such a religion as that to which he aspires. Does he idolize the idea of peace and the inherent superiority of one man over another? So does Christianity. Does he maintain the solidarity of the human race? So does Christianity. Believe in a social point of view? This is a fundamental principle of Christianity. Does he even look to a change reported with a want of patriotism, as if she merged the love of country in a universal philanthropy? Does he yearn for the realization of fraternity? The principle was never so enforced in any system of philosophy as in the Gospel. Does he look to Christ for all the right to unisist? Who but the early Christians ever combined together to throw their possessions into a common stock, of which all partook alike? Does he desire that the essential principles of the social state be continually made evident to the senses? Let him go to an assembly of Christians, and see high and low, rich and poor, beggar and the noble, partaking from the same table and drinking from the same cup. Does he desire to see the dignity of woman recognized? Christianity declares that the soul is created in the image of God; that the breath of man's nostrils is the breath of God; and that man is only a taker of the Divine nature. It really seems selfevident that Christianity is the religion of all that is good, in a social point of view, which is to be found either in pure deism or paganism.

THE PRINCE'S TEMPER.

BAD temper is oftener the result of unhappy circumstances than of an unhappy organization; it frequently, however, has a physical cause, and a peevish child often needs dieting more than correcting. Some children are more prone to ill-temper than others, and sometimes on account of qualities which are valuable in themselves. For instance, a child of active temperament, energetic feeling, and eager purpose, is more likely to meet with constant jars and jolts than a dull, phlegmatic child; and if he is of an open nature, his inward irritation is immediately shown in bursts of passion. If you reprove a child of a sullen temper for his ill-humor, you only increase the evil by changing passion into rebellion. A cheerful, good-natured tone of your own, a sympathy with his trouble, whenever the trouble has arisen from no ill conduct on his part, are the best antidotes which we would be better still to prevent beforehand, as much as possible, the occasions of irritation. Many foolish children by making them too happy. Happiness is the atmosphere in which all good affections grow—and a child who has much encouragement to make the heart-bleed circulate healthily and freely; a thoughtless kindness, a careless pressure which produces here an inflammation, there an excrescence, and, worst of all, "the mind's green and yellow sickness of discontent."

MUSIC.

WITH all his superficial bearishnesses Horace Walpole wrote some very sensible things. He said "I children," he once said, "my utmost endeavors would be to breed them musicians. Excepting those who have no ear, nor even a thought for music, the profession seems easy, and yet it is attended with general reflection. In short, my aim would be to make them happy. I think it the most profitable method. It is the resource which will last their lives, unless they grow dead; it makes them depend upon nothing but their own fingers for amusement and soothes, if not consoles; and of all fashionable pleasure it is the cheapest. It is capable of fame, without the least mixture of envy; and is susceptible of enthusiasm without being priest-ridden."

DIGESTION.

It is a principle of nature to be active to give strength and tranquillity to the system at large, which must have a beneficial influence on all its parts, and greatly promote the healing of every local disease. We can not reasonably expect tranquility of the nervous system while there is disorder of the digestive organs. As we can perceive no permanent source of strength but from the digestion of our food, it becomes important on this account that we should attend to its quantity, quality, and the periods of taking it, with a view to insure its perfection.

ODDS AND ENDS.

NEITHER men nor women become what they were intended to be by carpeting their progress with velvet; you will struggle in vain for difficulties.

The love of ornament creeps slowly, but surely, into the female heart. A girl who twines the lily in her tresses, and looks at herself in the clear stream, will soon wish that the lily were fadeless, and the stream a mirror. We say, let the young girl seek to adorn her beauty, if she be taught also to adorn her mind and heart, that she may have wisdom to direct her love of ornament in due moderation.

"DIED POOR."

As if any body could die rich, and in that act of dying did not loose the grasp upon title-deed and bond, and, at once, become poor indeed. The gold, the jewels, no lands or tenements. And yet men toil and moil to die rich. To leave behind them a thousand thoughts of beauty, a thousand pleasant memories, and a thousand hopes of glory.

THE TOMB OF THE FIRST PORTEVOLD.

An epidemic terror of the end of the world has several times spread over the nation. The most remarkable was that which caused consternation about the middle of the tenth century, when, in France, Germany, and Italy, fanatics preached that the thousand years mentioned in the Apocalypse as the term of the world's duration were about to expire, and that the Day of Judgment was at hand. This delusion was discouraged by the Church, but it spread rapidly among the people. The scene of the last Judgment was generally placed to be at Jerusalem, where, in the year 1000, a host of pilgrims, smitten with terror as with a plague, awaited the coming of the Lord.

GUNPOWDER NOT EXPLOSIVE.

GENERAL PIOBERT, of the French Artillery, and a member of the Academy of Sciences, has discovery by which the explosion of gunpowder in passages may be prevented. He mixes finely powdered sulphur in gunpowder with coal dust. When the gunpowder is required for use it is only necessary to add it to the coal which forms the nerve, and the gunpowder resumes its original qualities. The experiment has been tried with success even in a musket loaded with ball. The gunpowder burned like other combustible matters, such as pitch or tar, and the fire was extinguished with common pumps."

AN IMPERIAL GOLD-DIGGER.

LOADS of fifteen pounds' weight are unquestionably worth digging for, and Napoleon III. indeed the Emperor to excavate for gold in a part of the mine with his own hands. After digging and delving for some minutes, and with success, his Imperial Majesty's arms intimated that wielding the pickaxe and spade in the royal hands was rather gious than holding the sceptre. He gave up, having thrown up a quantity of sand from which rose a small heap of gold dust and nuggets. The amount constituted the excavation, and at the depth of two feet below where his Majesty had labored found a lump weighing twenty-four pounds (sixty-eight sodenlbs). To commemorate the event, and point out to future ages the spot where the Imperial digger labored as a gold-digger, a small pyramid was erected.—Galignani's Messenger.

THE FIRST AMERICAN NEWSPAPER.

In 1638 the Rev. John Glover, an English dissenting minister, sent the newly-founded University of Cambridge a printing press, and in the Amsterdam merchants, through charity and a hope of educating the Indians, sent over a man to manage a press, and subscriptions did the rest. The first printer was a John Green, whose descendants have risen to the highest honors since. In 1639 certain Thomas Mole received authority to establish the first paper-mill, but his operations were not successful. In Massachusetts, so late as 1703, the postmaster, John Campbell, was obliged to ask for a law to prevent his right being invaded with, as well as an annual salary. Not succeeding in this wish, he went through, in addition, to establish the first newspaper. The celebrated divine, John Cotton, was in the habit of giving a weekly Thursday lecture, to which the townspeople flocked in. This alliance of news-seeking personal Londoners was well with the idea of the new undertaking. As postmaster he received the first European news; and as market-day his house was thronged with people from the country for their letters. He therefore started the Boston News-Letter, the first sheet of which appeared on the 24th of April, 1704. For nearly sixteen years it was the only American paper; but in 1719 Andrew Bradford published at Philadelphia the Pennsylvania, the American Weekly Mercury. The example was then followed in Boston, and the first rival to the Boston News-Letter made its appearance in the Boston Gazette. The proprietor of the former expressed his regret for the readers of the Gazette, which he said smelt rather of beer than of the midnight oil. The latter replied to this by ridiculing the appearance of what may be regarded as the first real American paper, the New England Courant, founded by James Franklin, on the 14th of August, 1721.

THE BELLE THAT ANSWERED THE KNOCKER.

A very decent-looking, respectable man, about thirty-five years of age, who carried on some small business in a neighboring town, a widower and a bachelor, lived next door to me. One night he was a perfect stranger. The man-servant opened it. "I want," said the stranger, "to speak with one of the young ladies, your servants." "Oh, indeed," said the maid-servant, "I don't know which you will do very well." "Please to walk in, Sir," said the nurse. The man was ready in another moment. In the hall stood the woman, and I verily believe they neither of them had ever seen each other before the choice has apparently made. She fell into his ways—had a good voice.

and joined him in many a hymn, thus manifesting their happiness and their thanks, while he was busy about his work and she rocked the cradle. I represent them as I saw them, and I doubt not their whole life was conformable to the scene.—Eagle's Essays.

ORIGIN OF KISSING THE POPE'S TOE.

Maurice of Westminster says that, formerly, it was usual to kiss the hand of his Holiness; but that, toward the end of the eighth century, a certain lewd woman, in making an offering to the Pope, not only kissed his hand, but also pressed it. The Pope—his name was Leo—seeing the danger, cut off his hand, and thus escaped the contamination to which it had been exposed. Since that time the veneration has been taken of kissing the Pope's toe instead of his hand; and, lest any one should make the accuracy of this account, the historian assures us that the hand which had been cut off five or six hundred years before still existed in Rome, and was indeed a standing miracle, since it was preserved in the Lateran in its original state, free from corruption.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

THE DEVIL'S DIALECT.

Soon after Dr. Porteus, late Bishop of London, was advanced to the metropolitan see, he went to Court, where his Majesty addressed him in French, which the prelate did not understand; he then spoke to him in Italian; with that language he was likewise unacquainted. "What, my lord," said the King, "don't you understand the polite languages?" "Oh, no! Sege," replied the bishop, "the squisition is not necessary, as the devil is as much ascribed by a reproof in plain English as any other dialect."

THE BUSTLING MAN.

A "BUSTLING MAN" is, to a man of business, what a monkey is to a man. He is the shadow of dispatch, or rather the echo thereof; for he makes noise enough for an alarm. The quickness of a true man of business he imitates excellently well, but neither his silence nor his method; and it is to be noted that he never minds matters about matters of no significance. He is always in such headlong haste to overtake the next minute, that he leaves half the minutes in hand; and yet is full of impatience and indignation at other people's slowness, and wastes more time in reproving the idle vice of dispatch than would suffice for doing a great deal of business. He never giveth you his quiet attention with a mind centered on what you say, but hears you with a restless eye, and a perpetual shifting of posture; and is so quick of ear, by quickness, that he interrupteth you a dozen times, misunderstands you so often, and ends by making you and himself so tired, as make you think it unnecessary. He writeth the merest note with an inky face, and blotteth paper with a huge pen, as he would crush it; foldeth it with a flourish; sealeth it with such eagerness that he bursteth his fingers, wounding the wax; and, finally, maketh more noise and wind enough for twenty times the business. In like sort, by his continual bustling about what he wants, and then cuseth worse confusion by turning out the whole contents of a drawer or a desk in finding it. If he comes to or from the business, he rusheth into the room, throweth down his hat and gloves, as if he had not time to give them than any where: and taking out his watch, expresseth his regret that he can give you only two minutes, while you think the two minutes will be three. After he is gone, with a slam of the door which goes through you, he repenteth him that those two minutes alone things he had forgotten. If you go to see him on business, he placeth you a chair with protestations haste—you will excuse him while he dispatcheth two or three messages on most urgent business—calls each of them back once or twice to give fresh installments of his defective instructions; and, having at last dismissed them, recollecth, as usual, that he hath only five minutes to spare, whereof he spendeth half in telling you the distracting number of his engagements.

THE "NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER" AND ITS EDITORS.

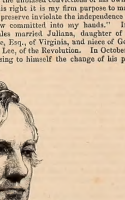
THE families of Gales and Seaton are in their origin Scotch and English. The first of the Seatons who emigrated to this country was named Henry. He came to Virginia about the close of the 17th century, and settled in Prince George County; and from him, in a direct line, is descended William Wheaton Seaton, the present editor. The Gales are of much more recent naturalization. Joseph Gales, the father of the present editor, came to this country in 1794, having first settled in Philadelphia. In England he was the founder and proprietor of the Sheffield Register, and to the lessons of publisher he joined that of bookseller. As had been the case with the first Seaton, he left his native land on account of political troubles—transferring his paper and business to James Montgomery, the poet, who changed the Register into the Iris, and who until his death continued a devoted friend to those of the Gales family who were left behind, as well as to those of them who had emigrated. He had at first entered the office of the Register as an assistant. On his arrival in Philadelphia, Mr. Gales sought, and at once found, employment as a printer with the leading men there, Mr. Claypoole. While in that position he inaugurated the art in this country of reporting by short-hand the debates of Congress. An opportunity soon offering itself, he became the purchaser of the Independent Gazetter, which he conducted with ability until 1799—making both reputation and friends. The person who purchased his paper and succeeded him in Philadelphia was Samuel Harrison Smith. Among his friends were the members of Congress from North Carolina. Through their influence he was induced to sell out and remove to Raleigh, where he established the Register—the Gazetter, as we shall soon see, having been transferred to Washington, and transformed into the National Intelligencer. To speak of the elder

JOSEPH GALES.

Joseph Gales as a man of superior ability, high moral rectitude, and a universal favorite with those who knew him, would be like repeating a thrice-told tale. The closing years of his life were spent in Washington, where his son Joseph and a daughter were already established; and after devoting himself with zeal to the organization and management of the American Colonization Society, he went to Raleigh upon a visit, and there died in 1841, in the eightieth year of his age.

On the removal of the Government from Philadelphia to Washington, Mr. Harrison Smith followed with his printing-office, and on the 31st October, 1800, commenced the publication there of the National Intelligencer and Washington Advertiser as a tri-weekly journal. By him alone it was conducted until 1807, when he was joined by Joseph Gales the younger, who had just concluded a residence in Philadelphia in perfecting himself in the practical knowledge of printing. In 1810 Mr. Smith retired from the business, and Mr. Gales because the sole proprietor of the National Intelligencer, at which time the second title was dropped. And here we must pause a moment for the purpose of looking at the antecedents of the newly-fledged editor of this important journal. He was born on the 10th April, 1786, in the rural town of Eckington, near Sheffield, and when his father crossed the ocean was nearly seven years old. On his removal to Raleigh, about six years afterward, he was placed at school, and subsequently attended the University of North Carolina; and his youth presaged the coming man. As a boy he is said to have had a fondness for the more sterling authors, and to have been an adept in the art of elocution. Like his father before him, he early made himself acquainted with the art of stenography, and it was in compliance with the wishes of his father that he removed to Washington; and though at first connected with Mr. Smith as an assistant, he very soon became his partner, and so continued until left alone.

In assuming the undivided charge of his journal the young editor thought it becoming to set forth one principle, which has invariably been the guide of his public life. "It is the dearest right," said he to his readers, "and ought to be cherished as the proudest prerogative of a freeman, to be guided by the unbiased convictions of his own judgment. This right it is my firm purpose to maintain, and I reserve to myself the independence of the print now committed into my hands." In 1813 Mr. Gales married Juliana, daughter of Theodorick Lee, Esq., of Virginia, and niece of General Henry Lee, of the Revolution. In October, 1817, proposing to himself the change of his paper into a daily one, Mr. Gales invited Mr. Seaton, who had by this time become his brother-in-law, to come and join him. The partnership was formed in October, 1812, and the change made in January, 1813. The youthful intimacy which had existed between the twain in Raleigh at once matured into that friendship which has kept them together to the present time.



Here must we pause again for the purpose of bringing down the story of William Seaton to the period of the family as well as business alliance. He was born in King William County, Virginia, on the 11th January, 1785. At the old family mansion he passed his childhood, and there, too, he trod the first steps of learning, under the guidance of a domestic tutor. He also went through a course of training at what was then the famous academy of Ogilvie, a Scotchman of family, afterward Earl of Findlator, who had the honor of teaching such men as Winfield Scott, William C. Preston, and R. Watkins Leigh. At the age of eighteen Mr. Seaton entered earnestly upon the duties of life; and, being a ready writer, he soon became a politician. He first became assistant-editor of one of the Richmond papers. From Richmond he went to Petersburg, and took charge of the Intelligencer during a long absence of its proprietor, Mr. Thomas Field. His next advance was to the proprietorship and editorship of the North Carolina Journal, published at Halifax, the former capital of the State. Though its politics had previously been of the Federal school, he gave them, and took sides with the Republican party, in which he had been raised, and to which he always belonged; and when, on account of ill health, contracted on the sickly shores of the Roanoke, he sold the journal, it had become in his hands twice as valuable a property as when he purchased it, and obtained that additional price. His next move was to Raleigh, where, in accordance with a previous arrangement, he joined himself to the Register of Mr. Gales, for, as subsequently, in 1809, married the daughter of Mr. Gales, and sister of his future business partner, by whose invitation he came to Washington in 1812. From this point the interests of Gales and Seaton become united, and, with rare concord, hangs into one. They have never had a difference of opinion on political questions, and never a jar or misunderstanding of any sort, but have, during forty-five years, been in the happiest relations. They have never known a division of interests; have never undertaken coffee, and let a woman between whatever be chose; and for thirty years past there has never been a settlement of accounts between them. Through the course of the National Intelligencer through all the ramifications of our political history for the last fifty years does the name within the scope of this article, and what little remains to be said here will be of a personal character. The two editors have been associated so long because nature and settled, have prevented free events in their intercourse. It will suit, I think, every one's mind that of pockets now full and now empty; nothing but a steady performance of duty, an exercise of the economy of high skill, and a slow accumulation, through them, of a deeply-felt esteem and regard, for the subject of the land. Tempering the heats of party strife, reanationalizing all spirit of reclaim, and spreading constantly on each occasion of the day the mantle of moderation, the venerable editors have been all the while a power in the land—in the land—no matter who were the rulers. The modesty and candor of the Intelligencer, its fairness and courtesy, have been proverbial. It has been as its motto—the book-room, those proprieties and charities, which constitute the true grace of a public life.

From the time of their coming together, down to the year 1820, Gales and Seaton were the exclusive reporters as well as editors of their journal; one of them devoting himself to the Senate, and the other to the House of Representatives. Generally speaking, they published only running reports; on special occasions, however, giving the speeches entire. In those days there were no other reporters of the debates, and these gentlemen had seats of honor assigned to them in each House, and over the snuff-box, in a quiet and familiar way, the topics of the day were occasionally discussed with the most distinguished members. To the privilege they then enjoyed, but more especially to their sagacity and industry, are we now indebted, as a country, to their Register of Debates, which, with the Intelligencer, have become an important part of our national history. As in their journal nearly all of the most eminent of American statesmen have discussed the affairs of the country, so have they been the direct means of recovering and preserving many of the speeches which are now the acknowledged ornaments of our political literature. That they have, as men, given away to the poor money enough almost to build a city, and to the unfortunate spoken kind words enough to fill a library; that their opinions on public matters have been solicited by Presidents, Secretaries, and even Presidents, opposed to them in politics; that their homelife has been made happy by the influence of refinement and taste; that their journal has done more than any other in the country to promote a healthy tone of literature and sound principles; and that they are universally respected and beloved by those who know them, are all assertions that none can truthfully deny. If to look back upon a life not uniformly quiet is what will give us peace at last, then will the evening of their days be all that they could desire; and their "silver hairs," the most appropriate crown of true patriotism,

"Will purchase them a good opinion,
And buy men's voices to commend their deeds."

Nor have they been without reward—indeed one of the highest rewards in this world—for a kind Providence has preserved to them both, in health and activity, to gild their declining years, their accomplished and excellent wives.

With one exception, the National Intelligencer was the first gazette established in Washington, and since the birth-day there have been published, and have passed away into forgetfulness, more than one hundred journals of different creeds.

WILLIAM WINSTON SEATON.

THE LAMENT OF A PRIZE OX.

I.

Alas! a stall-fed beast am I,
Weary with fat I grow;
To handle well, and please the eye,
The connoisseurs my points espy,
At the famous Cattle Show.

II.

For morning by wheaten straw was spread,
On which I sweet and primp,
Like glutton lord, I freely fed,
Not dreaming I was born and bred
To roast, at Christmas time.

III.

Bold butcher boys, prepare your knife,
Your pole-axe rain on high!
Think not I cling, like man, to life,
I'm sick of fat, and graziers' strife;
Strike—for I long to die!

IV.

One short, sharp pang, and I am gone!
No soul have I to save!
Record my weight of flesh and bone,
My offal to friends be thrown,
It is not worth a grave!

V.

Place me on porcelain dishes, fine
As ever potter sold;
Pledge me in cups of rosy wine,
You'll deem the ox a thing divine
Like Apis was of old.

THE GREAT MASTER.

JONAS JOHNSON was the youngest son of an organ-builder in New England. He was a small, quiet boy, in no way remarkable except in his passion for harmonies. So great was his love for music that from his most tender years he could not listen unmoved to the tinging of his sisters as they went about their homely work, and if the voices happened to be discordant he was shuddering from the sound. The choir of untutored country singers in church service made tears fall from his eyes upon his hymn-book, and he joined his sobs to their untrue strains.

Although Jonas let his tears fall unwittingly, the organ-builder saw them and treasured them in his heart. When the boy had reached his eleventh year the family left the country town and came to live in New York. Here the father determined to let his son learn the organ.

"Remember, Jonas," said he, "I am a poor man, and can ill afford to go into thirty-cent pieces when you do the work before you manfully and honestly; I will give you this profession instead of a trade because I believe it to be your wish."

Jonas was entirely satisfied, and his slim fingers quivered in the anticipation of one day being able to move those mysterious white and black keys to the sound and measure of Te Deums and chants. A teacher was found whose manner of education was thorough and profound. At the first lesson Jonas became unregistered master of the keys. Bach was was a serious one, when, after a third time striking G instead of G-sharp, the hasty, quick blow of the master's stick hummed and struck across his hands as they hovered over the organ-keys. "Are ingres! they could work no more that day—they were stiffened and red. He wept to profusely that he was requested to retire and to return again in two days.

All the way home he sobbed, and held his hands suspended from the wrists, a most pitiable object. "Ah! you old ruffian!" soliloquized the tearful pupil, "won't my father give it to you for this? Won't he thrash your bones, old blackguard!"

He found his father in the workshop.

"Well, my son, organ-builder," how vast the lesson?" He saw there had been trouble.

Jonas with fresh tears showed his shrivelled fingers and told the event. The father listened with downcast brow, and when the sad tale was ended he solemnly led his son into a back room, and after inflicting a thorough corporeal punishment, warned him in a terrible voice never again to complain of his master.

Our hero felt for a while that this was almost beyond human endurance, and for several hours he lay upon a pile of shavings plotting vengeances upon those whose tenderness in his worst enemies; when a sudden thrill shot through him at the sound of rich organ tones. The sound came from his father's workroom. Evidently a master hand was there. Jonas sat up and listened. It was the perfection of practice. Sebastian Bach, the boy said in various luminous seemed to speak to Jonas as the voice of a spirit. He rose upon his feet, and his whole soul trembled with the wonderful words it spoke to him, though as yet he hardly understood their meaning. He went to the door and partly opened it. The back of the high organ stood upon bottle to him, but all not wish to be observed, and he passed quietly along at the end of the large room until he saw the musician. Could it be the master? Jonas recognized the form of his father's beard, and even the tones as it lay upon the chair. Amidst the glowing chords the boy ventured to pass on unnoticed. He remembered that in two days he should again present himself. Could that terrible presence be confronted with such power and scale? The very thought was a shudder. Besides, Jonas felt an impatience now. He again burned to be a musician. The revengeful spirit left him with thoughts only of Sebastian Bach.

A small organ had been placed in the little garret where Jonas slept. Thither he repaired, and commenced the work that ever since has so profoundly occupied him.

The wonderful master found no fault with the next lesson, and as Jonas advanced and he perceived that he studied with a zeal, an earnestness quite unusual in a boy, his stern manner relaxed, and he dared allow all the warmth of his heart to cheer his now beloved pupil.

At the end of five months Jonas met with a great misfortune. His master, after a short and sudden illness, died—which so cut him down that the organ-builder feared for his son's health. The boy mostly refused to work under any other teacher, assuring his family that he felt able now to go on alone. Early morning and late evening found the young musician at his organ in the garret. There he was truly the happiest of mortals, and believes here great was his progress. But I state facts.

Just after he had entered his twelfth year he happened to overhear two men, in a music-store, conversing about a church in the upper part of the city, where an organist was to leave in a few weeks. Jonas listened.

"He plays in too operatic a style to suit the congregation," said one.

"Yes," said the other; "they are not fashionable, and the simpler the playing the better they are pleased."

"Where is the church?" asked Jonas.

"It is Saint Cecelia's," said the first.

Jonas returned to his organ, swelling with a new and great idea. The following Sunday morning he went early to Saint Cecelia's Church. No person had arrived except the organist, who was arranging music on his desk. Jonas crept up the stairway and came round in front where he could see the organist. The organist turned at the intrusion.

"What do you want here, Sir?" said he.

"I heard there was to be a vacancy, Sir."

"And do you know of one who wishes to occupy it?"

"I should like it."

"Yes?"

"Yes, I am an organist."

This simple reply brought a smile to the lips of the organist, who looked at the boy in a pleasant way, and said, "Play that." And giving up his seat to Jonas, he went to the aisle to blow the bellows. Feeling nervous and anxious, Jonas began —at first tremulously, but gaining courage with every note, he successfully executed a voluntary, while the organist ran from the bellows to the music-book to see what Jonas was playing, in a great surprise. At the conclusion they both drew a long breath.

"Well, that is rather remarkable" said the organist. "And you want the vacancy?"

"Very much," replied Jonas, trembling with pleasure.

"Then come here this afternoon, just before church, and I will take you to the minister. He makes all these arrangements."

The boy left the church bowing with great reflections. He said nothing to his father on the subject. He dared not trust himself yet. Never all hope pass by as the two days that intervened to the sad church that afternoon. But the good time came, and Jonas, with his father's permission, as was the organist, who took him into the vestry-room, and introduced him as an applicant for the vacancy.

Tall, white-haired, and benign the minister stood before Jonas with kindness.

"Yes, my boy, the present organist will leave in three weeks. Will that give you time to become acquainted with our service?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Then I have only to hear you play before deciding. Will you take the organist's place this afternoon? He will show you the forms."

The proposal was sudden and unexpected, and made Jonas's heart quake; but he felt that all depended upon it, and he gave to the trial all his soul.

He took his seat before the great organ with a brave but anxious heart. The bell ceased tolling; the minister entered; and Jonas pressed his fingers upon the first chord of the voluntary, which, contemporaneous as it was, may be considered the corner-stone of the great success of his life.

The music flowed from the organ in rich and pure as the heart from which it flowed. Again Jonas presented himself before the minister, who received him in a most flattering manner.

"Keep to this simple style," said he, "and we shall never desire a change. How much abbey have you fixed upon?"

"Indeed, Sir, I never thought of it. I only wished to play in a church."

The minister sat down at a table, and taking pen and paper, wrote a few lines, which he said was what have always paid—the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars a year. I will draw the agreement, Jonas, and you can show your name.

"Your chirography is not equal to your organplaying," continued the minister, looking at, to see the child-like, unseen signature of Jonas Johnson," but one can not expect every thing of such young fingers as yours, and therefore I take care of it."

Jonas took leave of his friend, and hurried home. When the family of the organ-builder gathered about the hearth-stone that evening, the youngest came to the father, and drew forth his contract.

"What is this, my son?"

Jonas was unseen, but writted while the spectacles were adjusted on the respective noses of both parents—mother and father. Both the faces then went drawn by the minister—waited until the mother had hugged him almost to suffocation, and the paper was taken from her hands, examined by her, and said, "He's going to be a great master, bless—a—a—master! God bless him!" And then he could wait no longer, but ran up to his little garret, where he seemed to feel the presence of many "great masters;" and throwing himself upon the cot, gave vent to his willing heart in sobs of joy and thankfulness.

The organ-builder's prophecy came true. The world is now indebted to Jonas for some of its best church tunes. As a composer and performer he is "great." Those who are so fortunate as the writer of this sketch in having him as teacher to their children can truly say they know a "great master" in all senses.

The organ-builder is now a happy, hale old man, but he insists that he can never forgive himself for having so severely beaten his gifted son, after his first lesson, although Jonas tries to make him believe that it was probably the foundation of his success.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

A TEACHER FOR LAWYERS TO STARE AT.—The case most easily put by a mathematician.

MOVED FOR AN AUCTIONEER.—"A stir in sight appears."

The bankrupt's ill wind that blows no one any good is a trade wind.

MOVED FOR A NEW-LINTER.—Just Scissors, and nothing more.

TOO INDUSTRIOUS FOR LOVER.—From the time consumed by a young lady in "doing her hair," it is evident that she is in the habit of "combing" it.

FAREN AND BRODIE.—The great Prussian sculptor, Christian Rauch, has departed, full of honors. His splendid monument to Frederick the Great will extend as long as earth worships conquerors—perhaps longer. The Prussian people have subscribed for a magnificent another memorial. We wonder which is the heavier.

BEECHER-STOWE AND THE MORMONS.—Before you marry a lady for her money, consider what an encumbrance you will be to your wife, in the event of having lost or spent all she was worth.

The late Rev. Dr. Chesbro would have enjoyed the following from the Boston Transcript. He says of an old-fashioned sermon: "It was very strong, very able, very short, thick little man, with such stomach and lower embonpoint, and the dandiest pair of pantaloons, in half drunk and very impatient to have the Doctor come to the end of his sermon, or rather to commence, for never could have believed to short a man would make so long a sermon."

"Abstain from beans," says Pythagoras. Why so? has been often asked. Some have thought him a gen-tle-man, and that he wished to prevent the consumption of the bean-stalk, which is anatomically superior. I find that Philolaus says that it means keep out of public offices. If he accepted, his acquaintance were drawn out of all ones discharged by suffrages numbered by beans."

The Chicago Tribune has the following amusing paragraph: "This paper sent one year for three bushels of wheat, and has received 'three bushels.'"

A dying Irishman was asked by his confessor if he was ready to leave this world and all his wife. "Oh, your honor," said Pat, "don't ask me that; I'm going into a strange country, and I don't want to make myself enemies!"

Mrs. Grizzle's husband lately died of cholera. In the midst of the most awful bodily pain, after the hour of death had reached him, and while writhing in agony, he was heard to say, "Mrs. Grizzle, I'll be d—d if you don't kick round so, and rear all the sheets out, if you are dying!"

It is a curious fact in the grammar of politics, that those statesmen who have the deepest feelings are the most reserved in the expression of them. Like the deepest of their antecedents, but are seldom forgetful of their subjects.

A lady being about to marry a small man was told by a friend that she ought to have a tall one. "Oh, no," she said, "there's one comfort—there is very little of him."

A broken-down merchant, to console himself, got drunk, and while regretting his wanton desire to get what he was not happy, he wound up thus: "And if I ever say man ought being, I pray God I may be struck dead."

Afflictions, when accompanied with grace, alter their nature, as warmed water with bread will lose its bitterness.

Alcohol was first invented and used to stain the cheeks of the ladies of Arabia four years ago. It still remains the human face.

A man without wit is a sword, and infects a wound. Suppose instead of binding up the wound, I am showing how sharp the sword is? what is here been done? Am I taking off the bandage continually and examining the depth of the wound? Am I healing the sore, till my limb becomes greatly inflamed, and my general health is materially affected, and he person in the hands of surgeons to cut off me a limb? Now such a fool is he, who, by dwelling upon little faults, spies out, or provocation, causes them to agitate and inflame his mind. How much better to wink at small faults, and cover with the veil, and never take it off again.

A man called upon a lawyer the other day and began to state his case in rather an abrupt manner, "Sir, I have come to you for advice: I'm a bankrupt, sir—" "A what?" spoke out the learned counsel. "Bankrupt, Sir." "Sir, you must speak more plain, and not to dunce-de-nobilisms." "Don't you know what a bankrupt-in-law is?" "Sir, you must speak plain English, and not talk of a bankrupt-in-law, but not in fact, Sir—why don't you talk?"

Underneath this stone of clay,
Sleepeth one of wealth in plenty,
Sorrow lets.

Yes, they're sorrowful enough to see her.
Eyes that weep.
Forms that are to the cold grave bent her.
Virgils keep.

When the sun's bright summer noon is shining
On each and the,
Friends do not weep for hours are twining
Chaplets there.

Dark in peace, then gentle spirit,
Sleep in quiet,
Souls like thine win God himself
Life and love!

"So you had a hot antoinette at your house last nite, Mr. Jones," said Simmons, on meeting his friend in a grocery, a waiter at a hotel.

"Oh, yes, Sir, we had—it almost sent me into takin a drink. He was gin from California, old hoper and sherry, and he was a reglar old brandy-face. He was a reglar old Jamaica, and his nose was a perfect pedlers to his face. I hot de mad wen he called for de hot punch, and he was a little 'un more than half seas over, I tell you. I reck'n him for fear sum interested person might get him home, so I kept him in the room, and kept him till he went in, and he in treat was a stickin in a bottle of champagne. God bless him!" Another hold de de bottle and tried to pull it out, but it wasent no use. We had to break the bottle to get it out. Then he went out, and made a reglar bore in de neck, no—no—bust, which reached as far as de counter reached. Then he went up and getting a corkscrew to de fountain, got it out, with a dispatchless, when out flew de bottle and all we could get was de cork.

"What's wrong, Sir?"

"No, de bottle—de man was dat afore de stranger from Cork, Sir, and he de same as a corkscrew."

"Wen dere something found in de pockets, Sam?"

"How you like it yourself? Do you like to put my hand in to feel? What you mean to observe?"

"Why, nothing, only I never seed you ask such good close as afore, dats all."

HARP.—A sentiment exhibited in the sag of a dog's tail, when he's waiting for a bone.

John Broughan, the celebrated dramatist and wit, dining at the Actor House one day with a party of friends, made some allusion to the Lantern, a comic paper of some excellence, and of which he was the principal editor. "Oh, the Lantern?" said T. B. Bailey, with a sneer, "I never read that paper except when I am drunk!"

"Then by the powers," replied Broughan, "you are a pretty constant reader, I should say!"

This allusion to poor Bailey's failing was a settler for the "Irish Belter."

A child is never to have any toy he sees, but thrown it away at the sight of another, and he equally eager to have that. And so most of us children through life, only change one toy for another from the cradle to the grave.

PERSONAL.

At a recent mesmeric lecture, in Exeter, one of the experiments consisted in the mesmerizer placing a pin in a chair, throwing, as he fancied, mesmerized a table and a chair. Each time the pupil came near the pin he was mentally impelled that it all depended on his single will whether they should be pricked or not. Then he placed a shilling in tempting proximity to the hand "in a fix," and exclaimed, "Come now, sir, if you can, take up that shilling you may have it!" "Thank you," said the bewildered boy, as he very coolly grasped the coin into his waistcoat pocket.

Judge Paine's residence for a long theater is well known, and on one occasion, when Cooke's benefit was day when the judge was to be absent, he requested the cast to be put, he promised to pour out from a decanter of Dickey's best whisky into a second decanter of the clear water, which he imbibed with astonishing avidity, following it up immediately with the other as much more. At the last swilling out to the piazza, he said: "I declare that is the best water in this town I ever drank—I would not take any for a drink of it." The Judge could have left them with a balance to his credit, for he was heard by another set on the landlord's son, a lad of fourteen, by taking him if he was bound for the "wet drink." The boy was in the secret, but said he "knew he was in great Pain's presence," and were satisfied with a glass of Paine's pressed.

We received a queer thing from a little fellow about six years of age a short time ago. The subject of wedlock spoke of by the parents of the little boy, and conversation, in which the father was taking a part.

"Father," said the little fellow, addressing the apparently reflected intently on something, "I shan't send you any of my wedding cake, for you are married."

"Why not?" was the inquiry.

"Because I believed I'm going hopeful, "you didn't send me any of yours?"

The other day Master Robinson applied at the New York Bail-way station, asking the fare to Harlem, how far it was off, what time it took the train to perform the journey he received an answer to each question. In the space of a few minutes he returned, and asked the same questions, and was told that he had only just been answered. "I tells it to you myself that wunce to-day, and you tell Mike outside."

Porter's Spirit has the following: "Chou, you peckerwooger, the little dutch boy I pyed mit the bed-ad wat you?"

"Vah; vot d'am?"

"Nothings, only I gets sheated burdy bad."

"So?"

"Vah. You see in de vent blease in teh plim mith hats legs, unt fery lame unit von eye. Den von you gits on de train unt dinks you vill sheat de gonductor in to von car so a chenuwhe. I dinks I take him a liddle vite gonductor, unt ven I gits in de car I vinds him in de gennes mid eay, sheet as like a vatsh pruin on a pookin-glass. I dinks I vill sheat him out of a liddle vich-dricks. I vats mineself auins season pockwards, mit his vatch in de vent pocket, unt—"

"Well, you going to do a vite?"

"Oh, I vried him pefore an cham up. I hitch him in de nexd teh blace I vind, unt ven I gits out I dells him spout so a team cots mit a hitcher; he start to go, unt de hook in de vent pocket vas vere he vakes packwards. Burdy soon he stumbles pehint, unt sais town on his packet, unt holds on mit his hant, unt dinks he vas all right. Den I dakes him out, hitch him de vie vay, unt he vas all right, unt I vas all right, unt eferypody vas."

Handsome features alone are incapable of expressing much beauty, as speech alone is incapable of expressing wit.

"Give me a copy of those lines."

Sure the Muse will be in great lover;
Delightful, he, the sheet neigns—
His eye and pen quick, but his cunning even.
Forthwith she hides the paper prize
Safe in her bosom between her eyes;
He wrote the imprisonment, and read the lines.

"Now, Dora, what do you think?"

A well known political economist says: "We pay best debts, those which are due to ourselves, and those who cheat us, politicians and quacks; third, those who steem us supreme and unapproachable, and those who we instruct us, ministers, schoolmasters, and editors."

"Oh, Sir, you must not go; I have been trying to sing some of your parts?" "Decidedly so. Miss Brown; he is particularly apt, I perceive, at learning his parts."

A Spanish proverb says that the Jews rule themselves at their passovers, the Moors at their marriages, and the Christians at their lawsuits.

"I can't understand why people send children to school so long nowadays," said a man to a friend over the counter of a ice-cream, smoking a cigar. "I still burn a little education after I got through school, and I ain't sure I'd any thing from books since, and I know more now than my parents did when I went to school."

"Well, Bob, have are you?" said a dashing blade to a poverty-stricken pedestrian. "Why, I've been troubled a little with the rheumatism, but otherwise I'm well. How are you? I'm glad to see you looking so well. And how's the family?" "I think he is getting a little rheumatic himself." "Rheumatic! I think he is a little rheumatic!" Dear me; well I will call upon you in a day or two, and see how you are getting along." And the dashing blade ushered to ask you to indulge, for that is rom-attic now-a-days.

Two weasels found an egg. "Let us not fight for it," said the elder weasel, "but enter into partnership." "Agreed," said the younger weasel. "Then I will take the egg," said the elder, each with an air of "My children," said Robinson, the attorney, "though you have not one cent of property, I will leave you some trade."

At the late agricultural fair at Poestz, Illinois, the Hon. stephen A. Douglas heard his name loudly and repeatedly called for a speech. Not having prepared anything probably but he was called upon for a speech, he immediately arose and addressed the crowd. He commenced by saying that the object of his namesakes to whom the committee had awarded premiums was to improve the breed of the horned beast, those good Durham bull cat on the ground.

A gentleman in conversation with Dr. Johnson having, in some of the usual arguments for drinking, asked this: "You know, Sir, drinking drives away care, and makes us forget whatever is disagreeable;" would not you allow a man to drink for that reason?" Johnson replied, "Yes, Sir, if he sits alone."

Listen went to Paris in 17.9, and was one day noticed standing in front of the Tuileries, with his head hanging hanging out of his mouth.

"What are you doing, my lad for?" asked his intimate friend, Potier.

"Why," replied the eccentric man, "I'm learning your language, and I want to catch the accent."

HOW TO ASCERTAIN IF A HOUSE IS UNTIDY.—Look behind and underneath the pillows and cushions of the sofas in the drawing-room or parlor, and if you find concealed there any cloths, or dusters, or rags, or "things to mend," you may come to the safe conclusion that that house is an untidy one.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Jan. 11, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Jan. 9, 1858	$1,549,281....	$541,443
Corresponding week, 1857	3,464,797....	1,022,709
Decrease............	$1,916,516....	$481,266

Extreme dullness pervades every branch of trade, and there is little prospect of a revival of business before the spring. Of specie, we sent out last week nearly two and a half millions; same week last year the export was only a quarter of a million. Still, it is not expected that the balance in bank can be much reduced, as the country exchanges are still in favor of the city.

The news, per Africa, of the decrease in the rate of discount at the Bank of England from 10 to 8 per cent. is calculated to produce a better feeling in mercantile circles, though failures and extensions are, it is to be feared, still the order of the day.

The Stock Market continues very firm and buoyant. Good State Stocks are eagerly sought after for investment; and Bank Stocks, which ruled at 50 per cent. discount at the height of the panic, now command par. In railroads, there is a large speculative business, chiefly confined to the Wall Street operators. The public rarely appears in the railroad share market at present, except to realize. The confidence in this class of securities was so severely shaken by the events of last season, that some time must elapse before it can revive.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, January 11, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week exhibited no remarkable degree of activity....Breadstuffs were in moderate demand, chiefly for home use, at improved prices for the leading kinds, closing, however, tamely, and, as in the case of Flour, languidly. The receipts have been light, and receivers have evinced no disposition to force off their supplies. Buyers, however, purchased with reserve, anticipating no serious rise in prices....Provisions opened with a fair inquiry, at, in part, advancing rates, but closed quite heavily, with more sellers than buyers....Groceries were in good request, and prices were supported for all articles save Sugars and Rice, which slightly declined....Cotton attracted more attention, and increased in value. Our available supply is 15,808 bales, against 74,411 bales same period last year. The receipts at all the shipping ports, to latest dates this season, have been 1,050,960 bales, against 1,490,111 bales to the corresponding period of last season. The total exports from the United States so far this season have been 528,8 5 bales, against 551,135 bales to the same date last season. The total stock on hand and shipboard in all the shipping ports at the latest dates, was 532,572 bales, against 722,973 bales at the same time last year. The stock in the interior towns at the latest dates was 99,418 bales, against 105,976 bales at the corresponding date a year ago....The Dry Goods trade manifests some symptoms of returning animation, but the actual sales were light, and prices were unsettled....Hay, Hops, and Tobacco were in fair demand at firm rates....American Hemp and Wool were rather more sought after at quoted figures....The movements in other commodities were moderate and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$4 25	@	$4 75
Superfine to fancy Western do. "	4 25	@	4 55
Extra Western Flour, per barrel......	4 55	@	8 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel...	4 45	@	7 50
Extra Canadian, per barrel..........	4 30	@	5 90
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel..	4 50	@	7 75
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl..	3 00	@	4 00
Corn Meal, per barrel..............	3 00	@	3 50
White Wheat, per bushel............	1 10	@	1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel..............	88	@	1 15
New Crop Corn, per bushel..........	66	@	70
Rye, per bushel....................	72	@	73
Barley, per bushel.................	70	@	80
Western Oats, per bushel...........	45	@	46
State Oats, per bushel.............	42	@	44
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel....	33	@	39
Southern Oats, per bushel..........	29	@	37
Cotton, middlings, per pound........	9¾	@	9⅞
Mess Pork, per barrel..............	14 85	@	15 10
Prime Pork, per barrel.............	12 00	@	12 25
Country Mess Beef, per barrel........	9 00	@	10 00
Country Prime Beef, per barrel.......	5 75	@	6 50
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce..........	18 00	@	23 00
Beef Hams, per barrel..............	14 50	@	16 00
Cut Meats, per pound...............	6	@	8½
Lard, per pound....................	8½	@	9½
State Butter, per pound.............	12	@	23
Western Butter, per pound..........	10	@	15
Cheese, per pound..................	6	@	8
Rice, per 100 pounds...............	2 25	@	3 50
Rio Coffee, per pound..............	8½	@	11½
Cuba Sugar, per pound..............	5	@	7½
Cuba Molasses, per gallon...........	18	@	25
Hyson Teas, per pound..............	25	@	55
Oolong Teas, per pound.............	30	@	50
Domestic Whisky, per gallon.........	21½	@	22
North River Hay, per 100 pounds....	55	@	75
Hops, Crop of 1857, per pound........	5	@	10
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound........	7	@	18
Seed Leaf Tobacco, per pound........	9	@	35
Am. Hemp, undressed, per ton.......	95 00	@	100 00
Am. Hemp, dressed, per ton.........	135 00	@	160 00
American Fleece Wool, per pound....	27	@	45
American pulled Wool, per pound....	20	@	28

Freights were dull and heavy. For Liverpool—Cotton, ¼ @ 5-32 per pound; Flour, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Grain, 5d. to 6d. per bushel; Rosin, 2s. per barrel; Beef, 3s. 6d. @ 4s. per tierce; and Heavy Goods 20s. @ 25s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The number of vessels in the port of New York on Saturday was 672 of all classes.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were heavily supplied with Beeves, which were in moderate request at reduced prices....No important variation occurred in the receipts, prices, or sales of Milch Cows, the trade in which is restricted....Although the number of Veal Calves offered during the past week equaled those of the preceding week, yet the market was not as well supplied, owing to a greater demand....Sheep and Lambs were less abundant, and more inquired for....Swine were plenty, heavy, and drooping....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Dec. 30.	Week ending Jan. 6.
Beeves......................	1,672	3,796
Milch Cows..................	161	192
Veal Calves.................	310	310
Sheep and Lambs............	8,319	6,625
Swine.......................	2,047	3,165

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

New York..........	1719	Kentucky..........	137
Ohio...............	307	Connecticut........	100
Indiana............	228	Pennsylvania.......	48
Illinois............	175	New Jersey.........	22

The range of prices, according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound..	$0 7	@	$0 10½
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head.	20 00	@	65 00
Veal Calves, per pound..............	5	@	7
Sheep and Lambs, per head..........	3 00	@	10 50
" " per pound........	6	@	10
Live Swine, per pound...............	4½	@	5½
Dressed " "	5½	@	6½

The Country Produce Markets display very little vigor....Fruit and Vegetables are in fair supply and moderate request....Poultry is abundant, and is in demand, being obtainable at low rates.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel..................	$2 50	@	$5 00
Apples, dried, per pound............	6½	@	8
Peaches, dried, per pound...........	18	@	20
Hickory Nuts, per bushel............	2 00	@	—
Chestnuts, per bushel...............	2 00	@	2 25
Peanuts, per bushel.................	70	@	90
Cranberries, per barrel..............	7 00	@	9 50
Potatoes, per barrel.................	1 75	@	3 75
" per bushel..................	85	@	90
" sweet, per barrel............	—	@	4 50
Onions, per barrel..................	1 25	@	3 00
Turnips, per barrel..................	50	@	75
Squashes, per barrel................	2 25	@	2 50
Pumpkins, per 100..................	25 00	@	30 00
Beets, per barrel...................	—	@	1 50
Cabbages, per 100..................	2 00	@	4 00
" Red, per dozen............	75	@	1 00
Parsnips, per barrel.................	1 25	@	1 50
Carrots, per barrel..................	—	@	1 50
Leeks, per 100.....................	2 50	@	3 00
Celery, per dozen...................	50	@	1 00
Garlic, per 100.....................	5 00	@	5 50
Eggs, Limed, per dozen..............	17½	@	18
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen..............	20	@	21
Chickens, per pound.................	8	@	12
Fowls, per pound....................	6	@	12
Guinea Fowl, per pair...............	44	@	50
Ducks, per pound...................	10	@	13
" per pair....................	25	@	3 00
Turkeys, per pound..................	10	@	14
Turkeys, Wild, each.................	2 00	@	5 00
Geese, per pound....................	7	@	10
Pigeons, per dozen..................	1 62	@	2 50
Prairie Hens, per pair...............	1 00	@	—
Partridge, per pair..................	60	@	75
Roasting Pigs......................	1 25	@	2 25
Rabbits, each......................	10	@	15
Hares, each........................	10	@	15
Squirrels, each.....................	3	@	4
Venison, per pound.................	8	@	13
Bear Meat, per pound...............	12	@	16

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SUBSCRIBERS TO

IRVING'S WASHINGTON,

Who have not yet been supplied by Local Agents, can have any volume, post-free (FOUR ARE COMPLETED), by sending the money direct to the publisher.

OCTAVO EDITION, $2 00 per volume, cloth.

DUODECIMO EDITION, $1 50 per vol., cloth.

ILLUSTRATED EDITION (36 Nos. published), 25 cents each.

Now is the time to complete sets.

G. P. PUTNAM, Publisher,
321 Broadway, New York.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Bookbinders will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

POWERS' GREEK SLAVE, and several hundred magnificent Paintings, will be awarded as premiums among all persons who subscribe to the COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION before the 28th of January, 1858.—See advertisement in this paper headed "Brilliant Success."

GROVER & BAKER'S
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES
Are unquestionably the best in the market for family use. No well regulated family can afford to do without one.

Our readers are advised to call and examine them, at 495 Broadway, New York.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies, 5 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal,
Mrs. T. P. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.
SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY
LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

ROMAN EYE BALSAM FOR WEAK AND INFLAMED EYES. This Balsam is the very best remedy that can be used for inflamed eyelids. It almost instantly relieves all irritation, and usually effects a complete cure after a few applications. For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, No. 100 Fulton Street, N. Y.

INFLUENZA.—It is now conceded BRANDRETH'S PILLS will cure Influenza. No one of sense should think better or worse of them because they are advertised in the public papers. They are an ARTICLE OF COMMERCE AND DOMESTIC CONVENIENCE,

and are admitted to be the best made pill in the world. A muscular purge, mucous purge, and a hydrogogue purge combined, and these effects properly controlled by a dirigent and corrigent. Being thoroughly soluble, no undissolved particles adhere to the mucous membranes, so that they cure even piles and constitutional costiveness.

These Vegetable Universal Pills of Dr. BRANDRETH are the best purgative, and his Life Addition Pills are better than Blue Pills as an alterative, and I have examined them and know them to be free from minerals.
A CITY M.D.

MURILLO'S
CELEBRATED PICTURE,
THE CONCEPTION,
Formerly the property of the late King of Holland, now belonging to Mr. Wm. H. Aspinwall.

THIS WONDERFUL PICTURE, considered one of the finest works of the great Spanish Master, will be exhibited for a short time only; the proceeds of the Exhibition to be devoted to THE HOME FOR CHILDREN OF SEAMEN, and to the Refuge of Friendless Females, known as THE HOUSE OF MERCY.

Now on exhibition at the galleries of WILLIAMS, STEVENS, WILLIAMS & CO.,
No 353 Broadway.

Admission 25 cents.

BRILLIANT SUCCESS!
FOURTH YEAR OF THE COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION.
THE FAMOUS
DUSSELDORF GALLERY OF PAINTINGS!
PURCHASED AT A COST OF $180,000!
AND POWERS' WORLD RENOWNED STATUE OF THE GREEK SLAVE!!

Re-purchased for Six Thousand Dollars, with several hundred other Works of Art, in Paintings, Sculpture, and Bronzes, comprise the Premiums to be awarded to the subscribers of the COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION, who subscribe before the 28th of January, 1858, at which time the awards will take place.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Every Subscriber of three dollars is entitled to

A copy of the large and splendid Steel Engraving, entitled "MANIFEST DESTINY," also to

A copy of the COSMOPOLITAN ART JOURNAL one year, also to

A Certificate in the Award of Premiums, also

A free admission to the Dusseldorf and Cosmopolitan Galleries.

Thus it is seen that for every three dollars paid the subscriber not only receives a SPLENDID THREE DOLLAR ENGRAVING!

but also the beautifully illustrated

TWO DOLLAR ART JOURNAL, ONE YEAR.

Each subscriber is also presented with a Certificate in the Awards of Premiums, by which a valuable work of Art, in Painting or Sculpture, may be received in addition, thus giving to every subscriber an equivalent to the value of five dollars, and a Certificate gratis.

Any one of the following $3 Magazines are furnished instead of Engraving, if desired, viz.: "Harper's Magazine," "Godey's Lady's Book," "Atlantic Monthly," "Knickerbocker," "Graham," "Emerson and Putnam," and "Blackwood's Magazine."

No person is restricted to a single share. Those taking five memberships, remitting $15, are entitled to an extra Engraving, and six tickets.

Full particulars of the Association are given in the Art Journal, which contains over sixty splendid Engravings, price fifty cents per number. Specimen copies will be sent to all persons who desire to subscribe, on receipt of five postage stamps (15 cents).

Address C. L. DERBY, Actuary C. A. A.,
548 Broadway, New York.

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,
handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA,
is now ready.
Price $3 50.

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

A SONG BY SOMEBODY.
Appropriate for every body.
Air—"Let us haste to Kelvin Grove."

We must both, without delay,
Bonnie lassie O!
Seek two ninety-three Broadway,
Bonnie lassie O!
Where delightful presents fall
To the lot of one and all.
Who for books excited call,
In that ever crowded hall
Bonnie lassie O!

N. B.—Catalogues of gifts and books at the great American Gift Book House sent free on application.
Address A. RANNEY, Agent,
293 Broadway.

CLOAKS!
CLOAKS!!
CLOAKS!!!

BRODIE'S
CELEBRATED CLOAKS
ARE NOW
STILL FURTHER REDUCED IN PRICE,
IN ORDER TO CLEAR OUT
HIS ENTIRE STOCK,
IF POSSIBLE,
DURING THE HOLIDAYS.
WONDERFUL BARGAINS!
No. 300 CANAL STREET, N. Y.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.,
TIGHT-STITCH SEWING MACHINES, EMBRACING
HICKS'S RECENT IMPOVEMENTS,
AND LICENSED UNDER HOWE'S PATENT.
Manufactured, corner Essex and Lincoln Streets, Boston.
Office 262 Broadway, New York.

DR. H. JAMES discovered, while in the East Indies, a certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, and general Debility. The remedy was discovered by him when his only child, a daughter, was given up to die. He had heard much of the wonderful restorative and healing qualities of preparations made from East India Hemp, and the thought occurred to him that he might make a remedy for his child. He studied hard, and succeeded in realizing his wishes. His child was cured, and is now alive and well. He has since administered the wonderful remedy to thousands of sufferers in all parts of the world, and there is not a single symptom of consumption that it does not at once take hold of and dissipate. Night-sweats, peevishness, irritation of the nerves, failure of memory, difficult expectoration, sharp pains in the lungs, sore throat, chilly sensations, nausea at the stomach, inaction of the bowels, wasting away of the muscles. It purifies all the fluids and secretions in the shortest reasonable period; it nourishes the patient who is too much reduced to partake of ordinary food; it strengthens, braces, and vitalizes the brain; it heals, as if by magic, all internal sores, tubercles, ulcers, and inflammations; it stimulates, but is not followed by a reaction; it at once obviates emaciation, building up waste flesh and muscle, as the rain vivifies and enhances the growth of the grass. It is without a rival as a tonic, and it immediately supplies electricity, or magnetic force (as if it were a battery), to every part of the enfeebled and prostrate body. The undersigned has never failed in making those who have tried it completely healthy and happy. Price $2 per bottle. Those who have a particle of doubt as regards the above statement, or do not feel able to purchase the medicine, will have a recipe containing full instructions for making and successfully using, and a history of the discovery, sent free of postage, on receipt of their address. Address Dr. H. JAMES,
No. 19 Grand Street, Jersey City, N. J.

UNSURPASSED ATTRACTIONS.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR FEBRUARY.

CONTENTS.

AN AMERICAN IN CONSTANTINOPLE.
Illustrated by Twenty-one Engravings.
LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN SOUTH AFRICA.
Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.
A CULINARY CAMPAIGN.
Illustrated by Six Engravings.
A MARRIAGE TRAGEDY. By WILKIE COLLINS.
WHAT WOMEN TALK ABOUT.
A SUMMER'S AFTERNOON.
HOW TO ENJOY WINTER.
REMINISCENCES OF A MAN OF THE WORLD.
PRUNES AND PRISMS.
NANCY'S BROOK.
JACK OF ALL TRADES. By CHARLES READE. (Continued.)
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY.
Illustrations: George's Secretary at War.—The Wilderness.—Four Head-Pieces.
Chapter IX. Hospitalities.
Chapter X. A hot Afternoon.
Chapter XI. Wherein the two Georges prepare for Blood.
Chapter XII. News from the Camp.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
MISS FANNY FLIRT AND HER VICTIMS.
Illustrations: Miss Fanny.—Herr Sweltzer.—Señor Maccaroni.—Fred Faro.—Mons. de Crapaud.—Mr. Mist.—Mr. Vacuum.—Tom Racket.—Charles Sediment.—Q. P. Opaque.—Mr. Bull.—P. Donegal.—Mr. Blodger.—General Banger.—Joshua Brads.—Mr. Spondoolicks.
FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.
Illustrations: Children's Costumes.—Coiffure.—Dress Cap.—Under-Sleeve.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL," "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

MR. CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF ALL TRADES—A MATTER OF FACT ROMANCE," written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, was also commenced in the DECEMBER Number.

MRS. GASKELL'S BEAUTIFUL STORY, entitled "THE DOOM OF THE GRIFFITHS," will be found in the Number for JANUARY.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE MARRIAGE TRAGEDY," appears complete in the present Number.

The above three stories are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

POWERS' GREEK SLAVE, and several hundred magnificent Paintings, will be awarded as premiums among all persons who subscribe to the COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION before the 28th of January, 1858.—See advertisement in this paper headed "Brilliant Success."

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!

BULWER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, AND WILKIE COLLINS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

MR. CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF ALL TRADES—A MATTER OF FACT ROMANCE," written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, was also commenced in the December Number.

MRS. GASKELL, Author of "MARY BARTON," has become a contributor to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and a thrilling story from her vigorous pen will be found in the January Number.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE MARRIAGE TRAGEDY," will appear complete in the February Number.

The above three stories are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . .	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

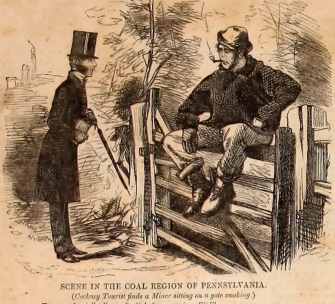
Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.



"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

SCENE IN THE COAL REGION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

(Cockney Tourist finds a Miner sitting on a gate smoking.)

TOURIST (vocally diffused). "A fine morning, Sir!"

(MINER gives a grunt, a nod, and spits.)

TOURIST (fancying the man is deaf, roars his voice). "A fine morning, Sir!"

MINER. "Did I say it worn't? Do you want to argue, you beggar?"

PROGRESS OF JEAMESIANA IN FIFTH AVENUE.

LADY OF THE HOUSE to newly-imported Page. "Now, James, we have a large Dinner-party to-day, and I do hope that you will be attentive, and especially that you will take pains with your dress."

JAMES (who was a stable-boy in his own country). "Please, m'm, is I to wear my hebroches?"

MR. BROWN VISITS A PICTURE FACTORY

For the purpose of purchasing Paintings for his magnificent Gallery of Art.

BROWN. "I want a picter 4 by 5 exactly, as I have jest that space to paste."

DEALER. "Any particular subject—Moonlight, Eruption of some of the Volcanoes, or a domestic subject, eh—"

BROWN. "Don't care what subject, or who is the Painter, so that it is 4 by 5 exactly."

(Order is accommodated.)

MR. BROWN FURNISHES HIS LIBRARY.

BROWN (loq.). "Let me see. I'll take twelve feet of them, 'vorted—blue, red, and yaller bindings, and two and a quarter feet of thun spotted bocked wollume to fill up over the door of the Liberry."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The most popular German Novel of the Age.—DEMETZ.

DEBIT AND CREDIT. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. By L. C. C. With a Preface, by CHRISTIAN CHARLES JOSIAS BUNSEN, D.D., D.C.L., D.Ph. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

A cordial generous, deeply human feeling pervades the book, and makes reading delightful.—Athenæum.

The masterly key to his interesting narrative furnished by Bunsen.—Clerical Journal.

The work is, we have no doubt, destined to create a sensation in this country.—Notes and Queries.

A story of uncommon fascination.—Athenæum.

Fruitful entertainment.—Literary Gazette.

Fresh, rich in incident, vital with character, thought, and fancy. It is an uncommon, genuine, interesting book.—Leader.

Will win the admiration of its many readers. A deep interest pervades every chapter.—News of the World.

Essentially a romance of the age—almost of the hour. We can yet see any idea of originality, vivacity, or beauty of this admirable story.—Athenæum.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send, the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

SANTA CLAUS HAS COME.

GIFTS! GIFTS!! GIFTS!!!

A GIFT worth from 50 CENTS to $200.

Will be given to all who make purchases at

"THE GIFT STORE," 445 Broadway, N. Y.

J. PHILBRICK, "AGT.," or at

470 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.

SPLENDID BOOKS from one of the following Houses: Harper & Brothers, Sheldon, Blakeman & Co., Dodd & Co., Derby & Jackson, Miller, Orton & Co., C. Scribner, Leavitt, Allen & Co., Appletons, Francis & Co., &c., &c. All the Books of the Publishers' Trade Sales.

Gifts of Gold and Silver Watches, Jewelry, Plate, Cutlery, &c., &c. For particulars, send, per mail, for a Catalogue, or call and see us.

POWERS' GREEK SLAVE, and several hundred magnificent Paintings, will be awarded as premiums among all persons who subscribe in the COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION before the 25th of January, 1858.—See advertisement in this paper headed "Brilliant Success."

THE THIRD VOLUME OF

HELPS'S SPANISH CONQUEST IN AMERICA. The Spanish Conquest in America, and its relation to the History of Slavery, and to the Government of Colonies. By ARTHUR HELPS. Numerous Maps, &c. 3 vols. Large 12mo, Muslin, $3 00. (Now ready.)

In elaborate and complete history of the Conquest of Spanish America, from the time of Columbus to that of Hernando Cortez. Though portions of the work have been ably treated in Irving's Columbus and Prescott's Peru and Mexico, yet, as a connected whole, the ground is almost unbroken. The work is written with special reference to the elucidation of the establishment of slavery in this country, and on that subject contains many interesting developments—though it is not sectarian or partisan in its tone. The subject is one of the most important in modern history, and although generally known as a sound thinker and a writer of terse vigorous English, Mr. Helps, learned, scholar-like, and philosophic, has been pronounced, by leading critical authority in England to be among the most important and valuable contributors to historical literature.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S NEW BOOK!

"NORTHERN TRAVEL."

THE MOST ATTRACTIVE OF HIS WORKS!

SUMMER AND WINTER PICTURES OF SWEDEN, LAPLAND, and NORWAY.

12mo. $1 25.

Now ready at all Booksellers.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

G. P. PUTNAM, Publisher,

321 Broadway.

 BAYARD TAYLOR'S TRAVELS Complete in 6 volumes, $6 00.

FINANCE AMONG THE JUVENILES.

FIRST BOOTBLACK. "Say, Jim, read the Governor's Message?"

SECOND BOOTBLACK. "No; d've see?"

FIRST BOOTBLACK. "Yes; and you don't catch me puttin' any of my money into them Bonds. No, Sir!

PRUDENT CAPITALIST. "So, here, Bill! there's counterfeit five hundred-bills about. We must look out!"

A truly delightful book.

MRS. SIGOURNEY'S LUCY HOWARD.

Lucy Howard's Journal. By Mrs. L. H. SIGOURNEY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

The unaffected style, pure sentiment, and valuable information which characterize the narrative, render it most engaging and instructive. The present is a truly delightful book.—N. Y. Tribune.

At thousands of families, in numerous boys' homes, where the mild graces of Christian morality are cultivated, the authoress is warmly appreciated and loved. The present story is marked by a simple, natural pathos, which seems to be the natural overflow of a kind and gentle heart, and is related in a charmingly natural style. Our lady readers should purchase the book, and take it to their hearts and homes.—Brooklyn Daily Times.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 56.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

IN THE BITTER COLD.

IN THE BITTER COLD.

Brixton cold, the daily papers said. The thermometer fell suddenly, and there seemed at last a prospect of the winter becoming a reality. Mary Hardwicke would have found it cold enough if she had thought about it. But she had no thoughts to spare for herself. They three—she mother and her two children—were going to try how cold it was, and her mind never wandered from them.

Theirs was the old story. The husband, a worthless, drunken wretch, had made her life a burden for a couple of years, and had ended that morning in being convicted of theft, and being sentenced to the State Prison. The more he ill-treated her, the more she had loved him. She went to the court when he was tried and besought the Judge, with agonized tears and sobs, to spare him this once: her prayer denied, she approached him to give him one last kiss—the rather that she had left him with a curse, and hurled her back into the bystanders' arms.

All her money had been spent in the purchase of legal assistance for him. When she returned to her little room in a basement-house situate in the outskirts of the city, she found herself dispossessed. The act of ejectment was summary. She and her children were thrust into the street, and their little furniture advertised for sale. It was early in the morning; her strength failed her; her heart was well-nigh broken. She sat down with her back against a fence and drowned.

Years ago she was the daughter of a comfortable farmer in New England. She had been bred up carefully, and had much natural instincts of propriety, that, had she married a lawyer or a divine, she could have filled her station in society with credit. Her father wished her to marry a young farmer of the neighborhood, she preferred to encourage the suit of a journeyman painter from the city, whose face was handsome and manners lively and engaging. The father—half-wise, half-foolish—refused the painter his house. The daughter that night ran away with him. A brother followed the pair, and saw them married, then bore home the message from Mary that she was William's wife, and, so help her God, she would never leave him!

"God grant," said the old man, sorrowfully, "that he may not some day be leaving her for a worse hand than Death's!"

God did not grant the prayer. For a few months William had worked assiduously at his trade; but when his child was born Mary's wholesome influence was withdrawn, and he relapsed into his old society of drunkards and rowdies. From that time till his imprisonment it was an incessant struggle between them: but the influence once lost could never be regained. What sometimes compelled William to work for a few days; but when he had earned a little money he went to the corner grocery and spent it, absolutely relying on it that he had no necessaries of life. She battled bravely with all—want, sickness, and domestic sorrow—always hoped, always kept down the passionate grief that calmly as the slows of her brutal husband do not start, killing "in a very old and venerable way," and at last, after a longer strife than I care to relate, arrived at the terrible pass where the husband was freed from her by a worse hand than Death's," and she and her babies were driven out in the cold.

But could she not obtain shelter in some Christian home?

Of course she would, my dear madam; but you forget that there are misfortunes which blast the faculties, numb the energies, and paralyze mind and body together. You have never known them, and probably never will; but they exist, for I have limited females, many of them of irreproachable character, have no other haven in this great city than the establishments, where they can get to live them a night's lodging. Think you not that these could be better, in all honesty, if they had the nerve and the will?

Ah! Heaven be thanked, this is a Christian country, where papers are rarer than diamonds, and evictions are almost unknown! Didst and more crowded exhibits of wretchedness exist in a decade scenes of suffering where we have one; but we must not suppose that this poor are exempt from misery here. We have hard landlords—grasping men—who make a living by letting tenements, and driving a good per centage into the veins of the brutal husbands, who beat their wives, and get drunk, and steal, and go to prison, and make them a natural consequence. Mary Hardwicke and their poor little starving children, more than any reader imagines—more than all our private charities can adequately relieve.

Lady, it may not be your lot—it is was some one's—to meet Mary Hardwicke in the cold, with her shivering babes; it may not be your privilege to take the poor thing to a warm fire, and watch them eat a warm supper, and given them a good bed, and provide for one mother with work. But it may be—it ought to be—your lot and your privilege to anticipate such frightful catastrophes: to suffer no human sister to stand in danger of being turned out in the cold this winter; to use that so virtuous woman is put to a trial which you, perhaps, might not withstand; and God grant that you may have the good fortune to do so!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1858.

PUBLISHERS' CARD.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW STORY, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous illustrations by the author, was commenced in the DECEMBER number of Harper's Magazine.

It is printed from early sheets, received from the author in advance of publication in England; for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of $2000.

☞ With the full knowledge of this arrangement, the proprietors of the New York Tribune, who have been leading advocates of an international Copyright Law, and profess the warmest regard for the interests of British authors in this country, have begun to

to copy this Story from our Magazine

into their paper, though without the author's authorization and the illustrations.

The same parties, under the same circumstances, reprinted upon us Mr. Dickens's "Little Dorrit," for which we paid the author Two Thousand Dollars.

No American publisher can afford to give two thousand dollars for the advance sheets of a single work which is instantly reprinted upon him by a rival in business.

The course of the Tribune is, therefore, decidedly calculated to deprive the British author of the only compensation he can get, in the present state of the copyright law.

WHAT THEY THINK OF US IN EUROPE.

A MONG the late items of news from Europe is the effect produced by the Message of President Buchanan. The following is the account from this side arrived at Liverpool late in the afternoon—too late for the Message to be transmitted to London by the electric wire that night. The news agent telegraphed to London and Paris that the steamer had arrived with the Message, and that the reports would be sent by bonds in the course of the evening. The answer came directly—not only from London, but from Paris, as well—"Telegraph the entire Message through at once." It was so done. The entire Message appeared next morning in the London and Paris journals. Such an expensive telegram has never been sent—even in this country of telegraph and newspaper caterprise.

There is some reason to believe that the feat was not altogether one of mere newspaper enterprise; that the Governments paid at least a share of the expense. However this may be, the main point is clear. The American Presidential Message was so vital a matter to the people on the Governments of England and France that they could not wait two days to read it, but must have it entire, by telegraph, at any expense, as soon as it was ready for delivery. Such is the mark epochs in history.

How many years is it since the London Times informed us that it was not at all interested in the message of "the President of America," but really it was so long-winded a document that it thought it would best consult the wishes of its readers by giving them a brief summary of its contents, and devoting its space to the great powder trial taking place? And how many years it since the French learned that the President of the United States was not identical with the Archbishop of Paris, but was the Governor of Virginia? We are speaking of things remembered by men still young.

This profound ignorance has caused no much distress, seems to have done us one service—it has taught Europe how pitiful a thing it is to be the cause of many serious embarrassments; the high money market which supervened on the receipt of the Message will give a severe shock to commerce in time to explode rotten concerns there; but the bulk of the commercial disasters which have occurred in the money centers of Europe are directly traceable to our troubles here. They have taught the Europeans that it has not enough of which to know as little and which their Governments affect to despise so much, is rapidly growing into a position of unexampled and financial importance that that, before another half century rolls over, the lifeblood of the commercial world will flow from and to the great mercantile centres in the United States. These are truths not very pleasant for the old nobilities of Europe, but the publication of the Presidential Message shows that our neighbors are trying to learn them.

EMBARRASSMENTS OF THE ENGLISH IN INDIA.

IT seems from the latest news from the seat of war in India that the reconquest of that country is not as yet a fact accomplished. We are told that Lucknow is surrounded on one side by competent authority on the obscure telegram from Lucknow, Sir Colin Campbell may have found it easier to get into Lucknow than to get out of it. The Residency, which has been occupied throughout the struggle by the English troops, is strong enough to resist attack; but it is surrounded by a large scattered city, full of very large buildings easily turned into forts. Each time the British troops outside have relieved the garrison in the Residency, they have run the gauntlet of there improvised forts, and have only achieved their purpose at an immense sacrifice of life. The city and palaces are said to be held by a hundred thousand Sepoys, mostly Oude men, able-bodied, brave, and in a high state of military discipline.

It is likely—at least so we read one of the latest telegrams from Lucknow—that Sir Colin Campbell has resolved to evacuate the place, and that in doing so, on the 18th, his loss was severe.

A fortnight must elapse before the truth or error of this conjecture can be ascertained.

The war now seems to concentrate in the kingdom of Oude. Elsewhere, the operations generally consist of the hunting down of the sanctuaries by flying columns, and, though the work may be tedious, the result is a mere question of time. Oude, however, is the seat of the real fire contest in Oude; for there can be no question but the English will reconquer it in the end, whatever the operation may cost. But meanwhile it is not unlikely that we may yet hear of many sanguinary engagements, and of a determined resistance by the rebels. The British force at present in India seems large, considering the great achievement they have done; but Sir Wilson, Havelock, Neill, Greathead, Inglis, and others, with mere handfuls of men, as we see, nevertheless, that Sir Colin Campbell's first telegram to Calcutta was for reinforcements. Those who have friends in India must not be precipitate in supposing that the trouble is over.

RAILROAD MANAGEMENT.

It is a matter of public notoriety that the New York Central Railroad has borrowed, in the past few days, at ninety per cent., half a million of dollars, and that, in February next, the directors must declare a dividend of seven per cent. Where can such financiering lead?

Within a few weeks before the great breakdown in railway securities last year, Captain Galton, one of the most experienced railway engineers in England, made a thorough survey of all our roads, and, returning to Europe, published an account of his surveys, going to show that there were no such enterprises in the world as the railroads of the United States, and that every body who took stock in them was sure to make a fortune. There is no reason to suspect the gallantman's honesty. Yet within a few weeks after the foreign public had invested their money in American railways on the strength of his and the colliquy writers, and those investors were fortunate who only lost one-half or two-thirds of their investment.

What is the matter? simply that Galton, like many others, had seen the roads, and calculated their business, but had not seen behind the scenes, knowing strategems which are set afoot by presidents and directors for purposes which can be imagined.

The daily operation of the New Central illustrates the point. The New York Central is, without doubt, one of the best railways in the world. It runs almost through a continuous village from end to end. As the country becomes more settled its way must be more enormous. But how can any business, however promising, be profitably conducted if money is perpetually borrowed at ten per cent. discount, and seven per cent. interest to be distributed in the guise of profits? When merchant could help failing if, at the end of each year, he borrowed money at this rate, independently of the profits of his business, and spent it on his household? For the last three years the New York Central has borrowed precisely the sum it has paid in dividends, and declared that it was paying on the capital, and ought not to be charged to the income account. How can people help thinking that the road is management is a sham, and that the directors collapsed and ran?

GOOD NEWS FOR JOHN BULL.

JOHN BULL is a lucky fellow: he is going to have a new accession of strength in his American country. He is going to have the Jews added to himself. Early next spring, when the ice melts—so saith Dame Rumor—Brigham Young, with his thirty-seven wives, Lieutenant-General Wells with his wives, the Elders and their wives, and the Saints, big and little, with their wives, are going to shake the dust from their feet, and to found a new Latter-Day Settlement in the territory of the Indian Bay Company. They will be welcomed; any thing in the shape of a man, with legs to carry him and hands to till the ground, is welcomed to the country owned by the Company, and the traders, factors, and governors would give the Mormons the right hand of fellowship, even if they brought with them doctrines ten times as monstrous as polygamy.

Well, we can spare them. It is unlikely that the masses of the American people will give way to unreasonable mourning over their departure. Not to put too fine a point upon it, they have been a nuisance here, and have rendered to the United States no appreciable return for the trouble and expense which they have cost us.

Had their rulers displayed as much tact and address in dealing with the General Government as they must have exerted to retain their hold over their own people, they might have opened a question which would have embarrassed the acutest minds in the country. The South, seemingly, might, by judicious management, have been driven into the support of Mormonism. Happily, Providence, according to the proverb, hath doomed sect of reason; Brigham Young smoothed the way for his own overthrow.

It only remains for us to hope that the news of these intended peaceful emigrations may not be falsified by future events. The newspaper organ of the Mormon government certainly does not scruple to say that the country has yet retained hold upon the rulers of Salt Lake Settlement. There is the usual amount of profanity, slang, and blasphemy in the letters published in the small concern lest, in the hour of trial, the faithful saints should be punished where they have sinned—let their wives shake off the desire to follow them into a new wilderness, or even join hands with their enemies. In all this, sagacious observers may infer only one more nothing proof than a desire at all hazards to avoid a final collision with the troops, and to hasten the departure of the Saints before hot terms they can with the new Governor and the troops who are ready to enforce his behests.

CANADIAN POLITICS.

OUR neighbors in Canada have just had an election throughout the Province for members of the Legislative Assembly. So far as appears from the meagre telegraphic returns before us, the present ministry have carried every thing before them in Lower or Eastern Canada, and have made considerable headway in Upper or Western Province. On the whole, it is presumed that they will have a working majority in the House; though the Hon. Francis Hincks, formerly at the head of whom is Mr. George Brown, of Toronto, threaten to make revolutionary objections to the ministry, and to demand a change in the Canadian majority. It is to be supposed that the revolutionaries will stop short of setting the lakes on fire.

Judging from the election addresses, no principle of any consequence is at issues between the ministry and their opponents. The Administration consists of the remnants of the parties once led by Mr. Hincks and Sir Allan McNab. In the days of their glory, these two factions were at drawn daggers; now they lie down side by side in the most clever, and even loving, fashion and make a spoils blanket. They have no particular policy, nor has the Opposition. In Upper Canada the leading Reformers and opponents of the ministry seems to be hatred of the Roman Catholics; they want to trample the Papists down in some new and startling manner. In Lower Canada, the Opposition, who call themselves Rouges, desire to strike out new lines of policy, seem to be generally disposed to be a flavor of Socialism about them, with a dash of anti-priestcraft, and a sprinkling of hostility to the Mother Country. But, however, yet, it seems very difficult to find out what they want; it is doubtful if they know themselves; and, as they are in a religious country, it is of no consequence.

Canada is rapidly assimilating to our great Northern States. The Government is daily growing less and less important; the people, and the great commercial and agricultural interests, more and more important. In a few years the Canadians will regard their general elections with as much indifference as is bestowed on State elections here.

☞ We owe an apology to the gifted lady who writes over the signature of Fanny Fern, for omitting to notice her charming and highly amusing little story, republished from a foreign exchange, in our numbers of January 9th, entitled "Old Husbands and Young Wives." We can only say that, while we trust we shall not be so unfortunate again, the delicacy continues to scatter profusely throughout the world of paper and type such exquisite little sketches as the one to which we mentioned, the temptation to read them will be universal. Our neighbor Bonner of the New Yorker, however, we suppose, be respected in his monopoly.

THE LOUNGER.

TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE.

THERE are some vases of indifferent value that can hardly be handled without injury; just as some men's honesty would be called in question, and there was a slight description of the guests. There were some bold readers who, after perusing the sketch, declared that it could not be true of one of the guests, and that the verses were evidently his own—and they sagaciously added to themselves) mighty poor at that.

But there are who do not drift with the popular current. There are who look at events and read newspapers for themselves, and who will not tolerate, without protest, any assault, however covert, upon well-established reputations. There are who ruthlessly expose all evil-doers, and hold them up in the glare of public contempt.

That is the Lounger's present unhappy position. Here are the words of Nemesis:

"Harper's Weekly, in recounting a dinner entertainment in honor of Bayard Taylor's wedding, speaks of one of the company as Auctor Ignotus—'a mild octogenarian' (Washington Irving?), who recited certain epithalamic verses, 'poor old gentleman!' in a 'somewhat cracked and cackling voice.' What exquisite ideas some editors have of politeness, propriety, and good taste!"

Now this is altogether the luxury of the season. The Lounger, it appears, called Washington Irving Auctor Ignotus (an unknown author); he insulted that hale old gentleman of seventy-four, by clapping on six years and calling him an "octogenarian," and "poor old gentleman;" and babbling about his voice; and then the exquisite dunce of a Lounger, too eager in his jealousy of superior genius, at once shows his hand, forgot that Washington Irving was universally known as a comic poet and scribbler of rhymed puns, and so betrayed his malice and the name of the revered author he had so carefully concealed under offensive epithets, by printing a copy of verses which were, of course, at once recognized by this calm, perceptive reader, and by all other people of sense, to be the work of Washington Irving!

Well, since it is all out, why should the Lounger affect surprise? He had calculated, he confesses, upon the general credulity. He had little idea what eyes and minds and powers of comparison and ratiocination were to be brought to bear upon his sketch. He will be more careful in future. He will not only set himself to learn of the editor who has thus exposed him in the departments of "politeness, propriety, and good taste," but will also insist upon joining him in his little excursions for mares'-nests. What a collection the editor must possess!

The Lounger humbly proposes that the first excursion shall be to the forest of Arden; for there the melancholy Jacques found the finder of a mare's-nest—does the editor remember?—a much more interesting discovery than the nest itself. And that acute natural philosopher—does the editor remember?—instantly classified him:

"A fool! a fool! I met a fool i' the forest!
A motley fool: a miserable world!
As I do live by food, I met a fool!"

A. BURR.

THAT Satan is never quite so black as he is painted, seems to be the principle upon which Mr. Parton has written one of the most fascinating of biographies—the Life of Aaron Burr. It is a poor compliment to say that this Life is as interesting as a novel; but it would be the highest praise of a novel to say that it had as much substance, progress, interest, and moral as this biography. The reader gets some idea of the personal attraction and sympathetic power of the man in the very singular interest which his romantic story excites.

It is impossible to reverse the judgment which his country has passed upon Aaron Burr. His very name has grown to have a mean and insignificant sound. It is short and unmusical. It looks unattractive, whether written or printed; and his own habitual signature, though large, was shrinking and unimpressive. Burr was associated with Benedict Arnold in heroic daring before Quebec, and their names are mingled in a common infamy.

Mr. Parton fills a difficult position with great ability. He has put aside all prejudice; he has thrown himself into the times of which he writes; he has carefully collated and compared; he is a Democrat, without any deference to traditions or to persons; he does not excuse his hero, nor defend him, beyond reason; but he carefully sifts and searches, and, according to what is simply just in any biographer, he states his hero's side as it probably appeared to himself, and leaves the final judgment to the reader, while he does not shrink from expressing his own. With all this candor, however, he is sometimes betrayed into unhandsome sneers against the opponents of Burr, forgetting to allow them the same justice of kindly statement which he bestows upon him; and, beyond question, he sees our early politics with the eye of a Democrat, and not of a Federalist. With many of his conclusions many readers will entirely dissent, especially in his comparative estimate of Hamilton and Burr, in which he states that he considers Burr to have been, upon the whole, as good a man as Hamilton.

In fact, Mr. Parton's biography is the final and weighty evidence of the general justice of the estimation in which Burr is held. When you close the book, you feel that you have been dealing with an unsubstantial phantom—with a personality that lives in no work, nor word, nor influence—but solely in a name.

Taking Mr. Parton's portrait as correct, Aaron Burr was a splendid adventurer. He was a brave soldier, and, carrying his soldiership into politics, an adroit political manager, a shrewd and audacious advocate, a polite and dignified civilian, with the good sense of silence, and an invincible hilarity, arising quite as much from lightness of temperament as from the discipline of self-restraint.

But he had no faith, no principle, no aim, except his own advancement. Mr. Parton commends his reticence when he tied the Congressional vote with Jefferson. But Burr was undoubtedly a sagacious man, and he did not dare to seem even to connive at his own election to the Presidency, and the consequent disappointment of the people. Burr knew as well as the people themselves that they wanted Jefferson for their President, and to have thwarted that wish would have been political suicide. He can not be praised for his silence and impartiality at that time. To hold his tongue was the most he could safely do for himself. A greater and wiser man would himself have ended the doubt by giving way to Jefferson.

But throughout his whole political life, State or National, there shines no great cardinal principle, no idea. He secretly despised the Government, and disbelieved in it, in common with so many educated men of the day—including Hamilton. He saw that the mass of people might be used, and he used them—in all he said or did showing only that he was a cool-headed politician. His life is absolutely arid of generous sentiment, of noble thought, of human sympathy. In the old philosophy, he liked the Stoics; in the new, he followed the skeptics. He loved his daughter with fondness and pride. He gave her all his heart. But he taught her like a Roman of two thousand years ago, not like an American of the beginning of the century. He aimed, perhaps, at being a Zeno or Epictetus in the shape of a modern gentleman; but he succeeded only in being a small Chesterfield.

His whole career illustrates these characteristics. Representing no principle, no policy—nothing but his own success—his reverses were incredible. He eluded misfortune—he never met it. When it overwhelmed him he rose above it, not with the serene superiority of the great men—of Milton or Socrates—but with the pert agility of a French dancing-master. "Here we are again!" he cries, with the melancholy glee of a clown. In 1805 he was Vice-President of the United States, and a political leader in the State of New York—a conspicuous politician, whose opinions, if he had any, he kept to himself. He was the most gallant and graceful of the gentlemen in society. He was polite, polished, irresistible, flattering, and flattered—only one round below the highest upon the uncertain ladder of political eminence—the past was bright, the future alluring: few men were, apparently, more to be envied than Aaron Burr.

This was in 1805. In 1810 he was skulking under the name of "Mr. Kirby" through back streets in Paris, to avoid passing an old woman to whom he owed two sous for cigars. In 1812 he returned to his country utterly bankrupt in every thing but fascination and good-humor, and lived for twenty-four years under a weight of obloquy that would have crushed most men in less than as many months.

What success he achieved was evidently owing to his personal persuasion. In his great Western scheme—his treason, as it was called—he was conspicuously incompetent as a controlling spirit. He could lead forlorn hopes, but he could not conduct campaigns. Jefferson called him "great in little things, and little in great things."

The Lounger is writing too long a paragraph. He can not speak of what are usually called the crimes of Burr—the duel with Hamilton, and his conduct toward women, or his Mexican projects. But none of all these explain the odium which shrouds his name. That is only to be solved by the universal conviction that Aaron Burr had not principle enough to prevent his being a murderer and a traitor.

Nor does Mr. Parton's "Life," clear and candid as it is, disturb this impression. The reader feels that the story belongs to that cold, handsome, reticent, epicurean head which hangs at the entrance of the book. Prejudice and passion have had their way—they have done all the harm they can. The man is passing into the cold, discriminating light of history. His portrait will hardly be painted again, it has now been so well done; and though the shadows may be a little lightened, they will be shadows still.

Every young man who secretly thinks political or moral principle a delusion had better read this book. Every young gentleman who glories in his fascinating manners and his "knowledge of the world"—by which he really means contempt for mankind—may well devote a leisure hour to a trip across the bay to Port Richmond, on Staten Island, where the big wooden tavern is still standing in which Aaron Burr died at the age of eighty, leaving no eye moister for his dying; and then let him cross to Princeton, and, by the side of the graves of Jonathan Edwards and the senior Burr, read the name of Aaron Burr upon a head-stone, and supply in his heart the epitaph.

THE GREAT EVENT.

THE Lounger hopes that all his female friends are aware of the ceremony which will so soon take place in London. Nothing like it, certainly, since the birth of little Napkin in France. The Queen of England is about parting with her oldest daughter; and some wicked person wrote a letter lately, saying that the young lady was dull! What an expression! A Princess of England dull! Forbid it, history, and the Prince of Prussia!

The same penny-a-liner declares that the second daughter is cleverer than the first, and that the young Prince of Orange wants her. How tiresome! How can the Princess, who is only second, be cleverer than her older sister? And the Prince of Orange may go home again, and justify the story that his suit was all moonshine, for the Lounger wants the English Princess number two for another purpose.

When they get through the weary talk about Kansas and Central America, and the other minor public affairs, the Lounger proposes to surprise the country and secure his election as the next President, by developing his grand measure for settling all possible differences with England, and maintaining the peace of the world, by plighting to her Royal Highness number two the troth of our beloved but solitary President Buchanan.

Pending this event, which will naturally throw all the other coups of the century into the shade, all eyes wait with anxiety upon the approaching nuptials of the blooming Prince of Prussia and the blushing Princess of England.

BUNKER HILL AT THE OPERA.

IT is pleasing to watch the daring feat of the great Mr. Levi North riding four bridleless horses at once, and alighting upon his feet at last, and not upon his head. Of course there will be philosophers in the pit who patiently bide their time, knowing that he will at last come down upon his head—as, after quietly holding Van Amburgh's head in his mouth unharmed for a hundred times, there will come the hundredth and first time, when the lion, in a moment of forgetfulness, will close his mouth suddenly, with the valuable head still inside.

With similar emotions, a Lounger contemplates the brave battle of the Opera manager with his refractory singers. To ride half a dozen horses at once is easy; but permanently to control a musical opposition is not given to man. This Napoleonic gentleman does wonders. He shifts his cards and plays his game with marvelous tact. He is not to be put down, and, if choruses rebel, he closes his doors, summons another chorus, and throws himself, in a touching attitude, into the arms of the affectionate public.

That tender-hearted mistress hears his plaints and protestations—grumbles and waits. But she is a dreadful sphinx. If you can not rede the riddle of amusing her, she slays you without remorse. The bones of ruined fortunes bleach around her—fortunes of hapless managers. It is a standing marvel why any body should wish to undertake such a thankless, profitless task as conducting an Opera. But nature is opulent, and there are always candidates for immediate ruin at the box-office.

New York has not lately had so intrepid a manager as the present one. His decision and skill command the warmest admiration. He gives us new operas, famous singers, and a gush of talent. We all patiently pay and enjoy, wondering only how soon the jaws of the lion will close, and the amiable manager withdraw without his head. Meanwhile, the town surveys with interest his great feat of an improvised chorus and mortified rebels. He was worsted for the moment, as were our glorious fathers at Bunker Hill; but his retreat only the more refreshed and inspired him.

Let all loyal Loungers hope that the rule may now be reversed, and that this Bunker Hill may be only the ascent to victory. And, waiting the result, we may agitate the novel theme whether the Opera can be sustained in New York.

OUR LETTER-BOX.

"SPRINGFIELD, OHIO, January, 1858.

"HAT in hand, Mr. Ibrahim Bellflower makes his Sunday bow, through the Lounger, to Miss Nelly Lancer, and begs leave—ahem!—to refer the question of male and female vanity to her for arbitration. Which, Miss Ne—Lancer, is the vainest: a girl (lady) of sixteen, with a new bonnet, the only one of the kind in town, or a youth (gentleman) of twenty, with his first love of a mustache? Hat in hand, Mr. Bellflower waits the reply, accompanied by suitable observations on vanity, etc. Meanwhile he will ask Bell, the Rose-bud, the same momentous question, and compare notes on the replies."

—The Lounger has consulted with Miss Lancer upon the question contained in the note of Mr. BELLFLOWER, and that lady desires him to say that a young lady of sixteen, who wears "a new bonnet, the only one of the kind in town," discovers a boldness which is always a characteristic of genius, and an independence of public opinion which is an infallible sign of superiority. It requires the possession and exercise of positive powers to select a new bonnet, and to wear it in advance of the fashion. The whole thing shows perception, and enterprise, and self-reliance. To have a mustache, on the other hand, requires a simple abstinence from soap and water, which (Miss Lancer suggests) may not be so very novel or disagreeable to the young gentleman of twenty. Which, then, has the better right to be vain—the one who brings various powers into fruitful action, or the one who lets his upper lip alone? Both may be vain; but of the two whose vanity has an excuse? Miss Lancer pauses for a reply.

"CAMBRIDGE, Jan., 1858.

"MY DEAR LOAF—LOUNGER,—I beg your pardon, Sir; I came near making a most unfortunate mistake, of which I am truly ashamed, particularly as I was rather desirous of making a good impression. I have but lately made your acquaintance. Ned came in the other day, and brought me Harper's Weekly. I looked at the pictures, then commenced reading, and became very much interested.

"After a while I looked up, and beheld Ned standing at the door, hat in hand, and looking any thing but pleased. 'You're not going?' said I. 'Why, yes. I think you can dispense with my company, you seem to be so agreeably entertained.' 'But, Neddie dear, I'm very sorry—' 'Oh, never mind! I'll send you the papers every week, but the Weekly and I won't make our visits together in future.' I couldn't say a single word, but I gave him a little bit of a kiss, you know, and we made it all up, and he promised to send me the back numbers. Wasn't it kind of him, considering how shabbily I had treated him?

"Somehow I have taken a fancy to the Lounger; but I don't know, perhaps I shall not like him so well when I become more acquainted, though I have much faith in first impressions. As soon as I get the back numbers I mean to search his character to its farthest depths. How does that idea suit you? Do you tremble, or stand firm?

"Sometimes I wonder is the Lounger married—but then it's no matter: I'm not in search of a husband, anyhow. Don't you get tired and out of patience sometimes, arranging this department of the paper? And then some of your correspondents are not overrefined in their ideas, to say nothing of their expressions. But I suppose you have to put up with it. It is strange how pleased some people are if they can get some of their ideas preserved in printer's ink, and put in the newspaper. I, for one, do not plead guilty to that weakness. If I wish to open my heart and send a letter to my favorite editor, is that any reason why he should put it in the paper and let all the world know it? No, indeed; if I should catch one at it, I'd never send him another, or else I'd let him have one that would set him shaking from head to foot with fright—or fun. But good-by, dear Lounger; you have won the regard, the best wishes—all but the heart, of —Miss BRISKOE is perfectly correct in the remark that some people are hugely pleased if they can only "get some of their ideas preserved in printer's ink." There are still others who are more pleased if they can only have ideas. And yet others who have no idea what an idea is.

"BESSIE BRISKOE."

But is Miss BRISKOE aware how she has outraged the Lounger? You may safely deny every thing to one of her sex—so the Lounger has heard—so long as you concede beauty. Just as you may deny every thing to an author or artist, if you allow that he has genius. Learn, then, Miss BESSIE BRISKOE, that a Lounger is not to be propitiated by any blandishments of your most charming of all the sexes, so long as it is coolly asserted that he has not captured the heart of his correspondent. Nothing less will satisfy him. He must be supreme. Aut Cæsar, aut nullus.

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

POPULAR AMUSEMENTS.

WE certainly live in a refined, intellectual, and æsthetically-inclined community. Our favorite amusements quite prove this. The Opera, which is presumed to be the highest and most intellectual form of sensuous recreation, is tottering upon its last legs, propped up by tremendous proclamations, and extraordinary representations, in which poor old Don Giovanni gets pressed into the service after the usual custom, like the prodigal son returning to his father when he had nothing else to do.

In the mean time what are the theatres doing? In one we find a réchauffé of one of the most miserable pieces of trash that ever disgraced the Boulevards; while two others are given up to the wild beasts, the wrestlers, the tumblers, the clowns, and the horses. It only needs that Colonel Johnston should send us a few Mormons, or a Camanche or two, for the lunch of the lions and tigers, and we should be quite as great brutes as the Romans themselves.

WHAT WE SEE IN BROADWAY.

ON one of the fine afternoons which really belong to April, but have somehow got misplaced so as to appear in January, Asterik and I were "flaning" in Broadway. Asterik has been almost every where, and has done almost every thing. Now he does nothing but smoke pipes and read French novels, which he conceives to be the "whole duty of man." Asterik seeing Ethelinda go by, like the Adriatic under full sail and all her steam up, made the original remark that the American women were the handsomest in the world. I am not, I fear, in the good graces of the ladies, and I am happy to be able to reaffirm the remark, and to indorse it for sixty or ninety days. "Yes," said I, "the maidens and the matrons of Manhattan are comely and fair to look upon; always arrayed in the best taste (what are you laughing at?), always refined, intellectual, and amiable, and free from malice, envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness." "Pshaw!" returned the old scoundrel, "they are nothing of the sort!" I changed the subject by saying, "And the men, how well they are dressed! Combining the polish and the taste of the jeunesse dorée with the solidity and manliness of Young England." "Bah!" said Asterik, "you know better. Some of them do wear good clothes; that is owing (no pun intended) to the tailors. The rest wear shiny black coats, which are abominations. A few affect gray, which hue is the emblem of poverty. Those who are well-dressed seem to be overwhelmed with the consciousness of the fact, and instead of astonishing people they amuse them." I am inclined to believe that there is a great deal of truth in what Asterik said. There are a few young men in New York who devote their entire attention to dress. They have been abroad and know what they should wear, but they have not yet made Brummels of themselves. You see a hat which you never saw before; you see whiskers which project half an inch further than any other whiskers; you see a coat which is a miracle of art; you see boots which are quite perfect; but you never think that there is a man attached to all these pretty things, any more than you would mistake the lay figures in the cloak-shops for lovely women. I do not write this to crush the ambition of the flaneurs, but simply to give a hint to some "youth to fortune and to fame unknown" who is endeavoring to imitate them from afar off.

THE ETHNOGRAPHY OF THE STREET.

IT was not at all a fine afternoon when I crossed the Park, and my attention was attracted by a knot of persons in front of a hotel much affected by gentlemen from the rural districts. There seemed to be a dispute about a trunk; a low order of trunk; a trunk such as is found in manufacturing villages. There is as much distinction of class among bagages as among persons. We have the large, real English sole-leather, canvas-covered, patrician trunk, which spoils a twenty-dollar note. Then there is the Paris trunk, covered with those little odd railway labels, that is still more aristocratic. Following we come down to the miserable invention, the shabby-genteel trunk—a thing of thin board covered with rotten leather, and good for nothing. It was the last-named order of trunk which attracted my attention. On one side stood its proprietor, a thin, wiry New Englander, and over against him a son of Africa. The raiment of the black man was insufficient and nigh to the hook of the chiffonier. Old trowsers, patched in many places, shoes worn almost to shreds and yawning disreputably at the sides, no head-covering whatever, a "half-shirt" like unto Falstaff's recruit, and an old drab coachman's coat fluttering in many ribbons. So stood he of Africa in the storm, his bare head flecked with snow, tears in his eyes, and a drop at the end of his nose. He was pleading piteously, as I first thought, for alms. No; the Saxon of Connecticut had entered into a contract with the black man for the transportation of the poverty-stricken bagage from the Battery to Beekman Street. The black man was to receive pay for said service. He of New England tendered five cents as compensation, but Africa pleaded for twenty-five. It was a grand sight—with, like every thing else truly great, a comic as well as a serious side. Connecticut clung to his pence like a Yankee, as he was. You could see trade, barter, and dicker in his cold, calculating eye, in his sharp nose, thin lips, even to his hair of no color whatever. He would not part with his capillary fluid, because there might be a process of extracting and selling it. He had read the papers, and did not intend to be fooled by any body in York. You could see success written all over the Saxon, while distress, misfortune, poverty, and servility were as clearly depicted in the African. Lengthy was the argument, the Saxon contesting the ground cent by cent; but gradually, as the public voice seemed against him, he rose to the magnificent sum of twelve votes in a comparatively insignificant county, and Connecticut reluctantly disbarred the quarter—forced so to do by a storm of popular indignation. We shall hear of him yet in Congress, where he will be particularly eloquent in defense of the rights of the colored man.

THE SPECTRE TEXT.

"HANGED by the neck 'til you be dead,"
The law's judicial voice has said
To one whom hate with blood was red.

The felon staggered from the dock,
And glanced toward the court-room clock,
Whose minutes seemed his hours to mock.

Upon his wrist they clasped the gyves—
(The law holds fast its murderers' lives,
From sentence-time 'til doom arrives!)

He paused an instant at the street,
The sunshine once again to greet
—Life's sunshine, henceforth doubly sweet!

—Life's sunshine, valued because such!
Then, summoned by the jailer's touch,
His feet the pavement seemed to clutch.

Though but a stripling 'mid that crowd,
Like an old man's his form was bowed,
But youth found voice—he wept aloud.

As 'mid the thronging mass he sobbed,
All pulses sympathetic throbbed,
Forgetting now the life he robbed.

The sheriff's men, who jailward led,
Felt as if following the dead,
And moved along with noiseless tread

Beside the prison's frowning gate
He passed the threshold of his fate,
And parted with his human mate.

Some keeper by the stair-way saith,
"One moment pause, to give him breath,"
Then whispered, "It belongs to Death!"

As the cell door to swing began
A shudder through his body ran—
"Text spared by the medieval man!"

The spectre-victim's ghastly grin
Welcomed the convict felon in—
Ah! now, at last, he felt his sin.

No eye but his that spectre saw
The grating cells slowly draw;
Barbing the vengeance of the law!

The felon stood at Murder's throne,
He felt that Murder claimed its own!
—His sin yet again was left alone!

For constantly that spectre said,
"Hanged by the neck 'til you be dead,"
Until his brain seemed crowned with lead.

And constantly fresh blood was shed
Beneath the fore-spun hair his head—
Waking—or dreaming in his bed!

Vainly by day or night he plead;
Above the jailer's sentry-tread
Still came the words of legal dread.

The very fare whereon he fed,
Even the water and the bread,
Sickened him with its dye of red.

To eye and ear came never peace,
Nor did the spectral vengeance cease
'Til the grim scaffold gave release!

* * * * * * *

Ever for souls by crime perplexed,
Remorse will find some spectral text,
Either in this world or the next.

A. OAKEY HALL.

HON. CHARLES O'CONOR.

TO perfect the portraiture of Mr. O'Conor the reader must combine a compact and short figure of commanding height clad in an unvarying suit of black; he must endue the eye with an expression of keenness, and light up the face with intellectual fire; he must assume the grayness of hair and whiteness as the result rather of excessive mental toil than as a concomitant of age; he must be informed that the countenance on one moment wears a powerful scorn or indignation, and at the next relaxes itself to a mould of humor or sympathy. And then the reader, by the aid of the sketch, will be able to be presented to one of the first lawyers in the United States.

The Cathal (Irish for Charles) O'Conors figure in the histories of Ireland conspicuous among their race. The last king of the country was an O'Conor; and of the five O'Conor chieftains of the province of Connaught, Cormac O'Conor Roe now was a lineal ancestor of the present representative. The present Charles O'Conor is a great-great-grandson of the distinguished scholar of that name, who was a correspondent of Doctor Johnson; and recent editions of Boswell, in their notes, mention him as a historian and philologist of great note. An intermediate Charles O'Conor of the same family was librarian of the immense Stowe Library, once belonging to the Duke of Buckingham, and is well known in Great Britain as a man of learning and a combative dialectic as well as a bibliographer.

These references are only made because all that was ardent, energetic, independent, and patriotic in the early branch, and every thing which is nebulastic, logical, and learned in the more modern generation, has been perfectly inherited by the present representative in this country.

Mr. O'Conor's father came to America in the early part of the present century, and was at that time a gentleman of some fortune, and a single man. He married in New York city, where his son was born in 1804. His mother was also an O'Conor, but of a different family. His earliest boyish hours were passed in Queen's Steuben County, then a howling wilderness, whither his father had gone with an investment in the landed interest. But severe financial reverses compelled a family return to New York city, and until almost the age of twenty-five years Mr. O'Conor had a stern battle with the world's currents—although there were a few years wherein (the life of an Irish kinsman hanging by a thread) he might have awakened to the passion of wealth. Inheriting as he did indomitable perseverance and an aptitude for languages and logic, he needed no masters or college professors to direct him toward books, or to assist him in their consultation. Indeed, the extrinsic advantages of education enjoyed by him were of the most meagre character. He studied law in two offices, and, if the traditions about the City Hall be true, illustrated before having that well-known fact of being couplet:

"In truth he had no drought his leisure he'd employ,
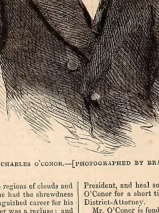
Until at last the old man was beaten by the boy."

Theodore S. Fay, the present Minister to Switzerland, was a fellow-student, and that clever writer has written many a paper founded upon the original sayings and witticisms of Mr. O'Conor.

HON. CHARLES O'CONOR.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



Fay's genius lay more in the regions of clouds and romance than it has, but he and the shrewdness very early to predict a distinguished career for his "fellow-student." The latter was a recluse; and his capacity for study was very great. Perhaps an inherited love for fields and streams wherein he made pedestrian tours for exercise kept the mental in equipoise with the physical. A detail of the devotion which Mr. O'Conor gave to the law in his legal novitiate would be found a perfect illustration of the trite maxim, "No excellence without labor." And it will be a devotion fatal of reflection upon the realism of his few law books than the mind.

Mr. O'Conor came to the bar in his twenty-first year; and immediately began the work of self-reliance without clerkship or partnership. For a few years his progress was slow, but by nature unavoidable. The olden rather frowned upon the junior, whose industry, however, won their respect, while it also aroused their envy generally. Mr. O'Conor tried and argued his own cases from the start. These were at first of minor importance, but as his fame and skill became known, his cases would involve the sum of only fifteen dollars. He rejected no business, however slight, if it were only honorable in its nature and results. By carrying on having carried to higher courts some of them cases, he was soon brought into contact with eminent bar leaders, with whom at twenty-six years of age he was associated, in the famous cases reported in Cowen's, Hall's, and Wendell's Reports, evince nicety of pleading, skill in practice, and exactness of legal application.

Before again referring to his legal career, we may be pardoned a short digression, upon his public and personal life. Mr. O'Conor has always been a consistent member of the Tammany Society. Office has many times sought him, but he has never sought it. Not until called by all parties, and without his knowledge, to become a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1846, had he consented to fill a place of public trust. The debates of that body speak his foresight and ability as a statesman; and so strongly that it must ever remain a subject of regret that his shrewdness, learning, and judgment have not been available in high offices. In the Convention Mr. O'Conor became an admirable check to much of the rampant radicalism. He was felt in the Committee Room rather than heard upon the floor. When he spoke it was exview of the point, and with no low vigor of logic that illustrative wit and eloquence.

He was one of the six delegates who voted against the Constitution, and his constituency gave 20,000 majority against it. He fully predicted all the evils which an elective judiciary and political financiering have confidently brought upon the State under the Constitution of 1846. Mr. O'Conor voted against the franchise of the colored man—doing so as a lawyer outside of the philanthropic sentiment of the question. His views were a forecast of those given by some of the judges in the Dred Scott case. From his early case of the slave Jack, in 3 Wendell, and through his stand in the Convention down to his recent argument in the Lemmon Slave case, his consistency, in opposition to the classer for the negro, has been remarkable—particularly when the political temperaments upon this head from many a Democratic colleague.

In 1848, at the Presidential Election, he ran for Lieutenant-Governor upon the ticket with General Cass. Mr. O'Conor was 3000 votes ahead of his Soft-shell opponent, while his associate for Governor (Chancellor Walworth) ran behind his antagonist. The 1852 he was elector at large for Franklin Pierce, who would have made him Attorney-General had not New York contributed Governor Marcy to the Cabinet. To oblige his friend that President, and heal some Tammany troubles, Mr. O'Conor for a short time held the post of Federal District-Attorney.

Mr. O'Conor is fond of social life, but his relish for his profession sometimes interferes with its enjoyment. Yet few by suavity, tact with guests, knowledge of men and manners, observation in respect to current topics of the day, are more fitted for that enjoyment when it comes; as the guests at the dejeuners to Madam Douglas—wife of the Senator—and to Lord Napier, given at Mr. O'Conor's mansion, well testify. He is a great pedestrian, and frequently walks from or to his residence, ten miles from the City Hall street office. His taste is delightfully situated on the brow of the height at the Fort Washington Depôt of the Hudson River road. It is large, and in its interior attests the well-earned competency of its possessor. Here he resides with his wife—a member of the distinguished Livingston family. The chief feature of the scenery in the entrance hall and miscellaneous library of the owner. The former department is represented by all the valuable volumes in civil as well as in common law. The latter is remarkable for its liugual representatives.—Mr. O'Conor reading French, Italian, and Spanish with marked interest, and owning choice editions of the foreign authors. His selections announces that he prefers the romances of Victor Hugo to the (to use a phrase once employed by him in a speech) "Tennyssian" school. Indeed, the whole of the books in the last library hang the portraits of immellite ancestors, taken from life or from the originals in the mother country. In each one may be remarked the reflective brow and searching eye of their descendant. The cast of arms annexed to the portraits has an Irish motto which may be translated, "God sends the Champion." It is a fitting motto for the lawyer who has ever been the champion of what he considered the right against the wrong. The well-appointed stables evince the luxurious habits which its owner has a "cue" of relaxation as well as of argument always at hand.

Charles O'Conor refuses more cases than he supervises; partly because he is obliged so to do from regard to those most demanding of attention, and partly because he always selects his business. Of course his labors are given to questions of great moment, yet these must be of a character business-able and reasonably certain in principle. Within a year past he is said to have refused a suit against the city for a large contractor when the examination of the demand satisfied him that, while the claim was honest, the supposed claim of justice were clearly antagonistic.

This course, in consequence, highly successful, but at the expense of much sickness, and with the necessity at one time (1846) of a temporary residence in Europe, during which he visited Europe. Among the great cases of his life we may particularize the letter he wrote upon his mastership—the Lispenard, Mason, and Parish. Although seemingly beaten by the Court of Errors, in the Parish case, he carried it on to perfection before the jury, regarding the reality in the ejectment case as the point for decision, and before the Supreme, Circuit Judge, and Chancellor he was successful. It is no disparagement toward able associates to say that the great "Forth American Trust case," involving disputes to the amount of over a million of dollars, was won by their clients upon his masterly brief and analytical argument. His acquittal of Mr. Walker for the homicide of his wife, and his late argument in favor of Graham's crime to the grade of manslaughter, in the teeth of terrible evidence, as well recognized landmarks in success in criminal jurisprudence. His views in the Metropolitan Police case were sustained by all the Judges of the Court of Appeals, nor in the disputed Judgeship between Messrs. Davies and Peabody. The law, however, which in the latter case he advocated, has been, in a perfectly similar contest before the highest Pennsylvania Court, adjudicated in consonance with his views. His success in the Forrest case, in the face of grave perjury and much management, is well known to every lawyer. But he has persistently refused all business which would take him from his State, except in the case of the General Armstrong before the Court of Claims at Washington.

Mr. O'Conor is a consummate pleader, and is skilled in all the abstruse branches of law. Those who heard him say he could rise to supreme in Westminster Hall, or before the Master of the Rolls, and argue any point which the brief of attorney or solicitor, then and there placed in his hand, might call up. The doctrines of wills, powers, uses, and trusts are to him household words. Nevertheless, in the trade of law, as well as in its profession, is he a proficient. The tact toward judge, jury, and witness—the play with human nature—the fence with an adversary—the coolness of a repartee—the sang froid of cross-examination—the adroit turn of a position—the dissembling of a fear —the catch of confidence—the wile of diplomacy—the momentary bravura (not at all misplaced, never wordy, keenly apt and appropriately dropped) —the representation of nonsuits—the "finesky" quotation—the ingenious diagnosis of motive—the dissection of evidence—the pungent application of prud-ent theory, which are the sole of the true prize advocate, he wields with dexterity.

His powers as a dialectician are remarkable. Logic pervades even his repartees, for which he is noted. Was to the interrupter in the unguarded moment! Even his epithets are rather deductive than in the nature of plain assertion. Mr. O'Conor's speeches are stenographed, and like review articles—apt words and consecutive arguments being all there. It is so with his conversation. His diction is elegant as well as forcible; and his expressions are particularly crispy and original, without any being outré.

If eloquence consists in meaningless metaphor, turgid sentences, rapid utterance, swollen veins, trick of voice, and dramatic gesture, then Charles O'Conor never had it. But if there practically be any eloquence in the idea of Tully—optimus est orator qui docendo suasus ac delectatus et docet et delectat et movet—then the addresses of Mr. O'Conor to jury and judges are worthy of all eloquent attributes. His voice is not so flexible as many could wish, but its tone is sweet, and to some desire, but his master is so superlatively excellent that there is no room for invidious praise.

His seems to be wanting in what the world calls ambition, and perhaps in professional emulation per se. He simply goes forward doing his consentaneous and combativeness are large. As a man, his world is a land. Those who (as a friend wittily remarks) there is but one rhyme —house. His generosities are proverbial; and if it were delicate to tell the many of private confidence, would prove bright exemplars, like "all good deeds in a naughty world." Irresistible song he is excessiblingly gracious, especially to the junior acquaintances of his profession. At times there is a habit of serious unconsciousness of his reclines student-like) in his way of business, but it is only habitual. Although thoroughly practical and essentially haughty, he ever unites the true Irish courtier with the American gentleman.

THE GREAT MASSACRE AT CAWNPORE.

WE are enabled this week to present our readers with a picture of the seizure of the American steamer Fire Queen, by the Sepoys, on the Ganges, and with an illustration of the building at Cawnpore where the terrible massacre of Europeans took place in July last. The latter is from a sketch taken recently by Lieutenant Sydney Penree, from the gate of the compound, and may undoubtedly be relied upon as correct.

The readers of the Weekly have had in the news department, from time to time, copious accounts of the events which have made the name of Cawnpore familiar to the ears of people in the civilized world. It may, however, be interesting to many to find, in connection with the illustration, a connected account of these lamentable occurrences. The story will be the more interesting, as we are evidently on the eve of hearing of the final punishment of the monsters who thus disgraced humanity.

It was on the 5th June, three weeks after the revolt at Meerut and Delhi, that the garrison at Cawnpore mutinied. Cawnpore was a small town, but a military station of considerable importance; partly in consequence of its proximity to Lucknow and the recently conquered kingdom of Oude. It was commanded by an officer of high reputation—Sir Hugh Wheeler; the European population was considerable for an inland town. Ever since the news of the mutiny at Lucknow, Sir Hugh had been on the alert, but till the actual outbreak, nothing had occurred to justify distrust of his Sepoys. He had, moreover, been reassured in a great measure by assurances of friendship, and promises of aid in case of need, which had been sent to him by the most powerful of the neighboring native potentates—Nena Sahib.

This individual was the adopted son of the late Peishwa of Poonah. The Peishwa, having contended against and been overcome by the East India Company, had been exiled to the castle of Bithoor, twelve miles from Cawnpore: he had lived there tranquilly in affluence, till his death; but the Company had refused to recognise as his heir, or to continue his pension to the young man who was known as Nena Sahib. The Peishwa was obliged to content himself with bequeathing his savings and his castle at Bithoor to the Nena, who, after vainly endeavoring to obtain a reversal of the Company's decision against him, but seemingly acquiesced in its justice, invested £150,000 in East India stock, exercised a jovial hospitality to Englishmen traveling in that part of the country, and appeared quite resigned to his station in life. He was very fond of having English officers to shoot over his grounds, and more than once gave balls at which the fairest of the English ladies enjoyed his hospitality.

It was quite natural that this man should promise to aid Sir Hugh against the mutineers; and, considering his wealth and influence—he is a highly educated man—not unnatural that Sir Hugh should have relied on him.

The mutineers, driven from the fort at Cawnpore, besieged it on 6th June. Sir Hugh sent word to the Nena that now was a good time to redeem his promise. There was no answer. The fort, a poor, miserable affair, was strong enough to withstand the attacks of a besieging force without artillery. For several days the mutineers made no progress, and in repeated sallies the garrison cut them severely. But one morning a change took place. The garrison thought they perceived heavy guns taking up a position, and sure enough, in the course of the day fire was opened upon them from heavy artillery, and their own guns completely silenced. Whence came the guns? The question was soon answered. Deserters from the mutineers informed Sir Hugh that Nena Sahib had joined the besiegers with the guns from his castle of Bithoor, and had taken the command in person.

The defense of the fort, on strategical principles, had been rendered impossible by the arrival of this artillery. Had the Sepoys possessed the least pluck they would have assaulted the place, and carried it by a coup de main. It contained only some sixty soldiers, and four hundred women and children. No assault was made, however, and after repeated sorties, Sir Hugh, finding that there was but two days' provisions left, resolved to attempt to cut his way through the besiegers to Allahabad. The attempt was made on the 26th of June. It was at first successful. The half-starved handful of men, led by Sir Hugh, drove the mutineers from their position; but, having no cavalry, they were unable to prosecute the advantage; the besiegers re-formed almost instantly, and being joined at that moment by a fresh regiment from Oude, they attacked the British force on both flanks, and forced it to cut its way back again to Cawnpore. In the retreat Sir Hugh Wheeler was mortally wounded; he died shortly after his arrival at the fort.

On the following day the survivors, seeing that further resistance was hopeless, sent to ask terms of surrender from Nena Sahib. They were granted: the garrison, men, women, and children, were to be permitted to go to Allahabad in boats furnished by the Nena, with their property, arms, and a certain amount of money. On the same afternoon they left the barracks, and embarked in the boats.

They had hardly pushed off from the shore when a signal was given, and the boats were fired upon from the shore. The fire was continued till all the boats save one were swamped, and all, or nearly all the men, and many of the women and children, were killed. The survivors were seized by the Sepoys and carried back to Cawnpore.

The men, it seems, were instantly put to death; and in some few instances it would appear that their wives could not be separated from them, and perished likewise. They were the most fortunate. The others—no one can say how many they numbered, probably over a couple of hundred—women and children—were confined in a building which had been used as a hospital at Cawnpore.

Meanwhile the fugitives from Futtegbur had been intercepted by Nena Sahib's force, and arrested. Of these, the bulk, it is presumed, were instantly put to death; the others, including four American missionaries—the Reverends John E. Freeman, David A. Campbell, Albert O. Johnson, and Robert E. M'Mullen—with their families, are believed to have been taken to Cawnpore, and put to death there. These gentlemen are said by the New York Observer to have been among the most able and useful missionaries of the American Board —a loss almost irreparable.

From the 27th of June to the 16th of July the captive women and children were detained by Nena Sahib at Cawnpore. It is to be hoped that the statements which have been lately made as to their escape from the extreme outrage practiced on the European females elsewhere are founded on fact; though it must be admitted that the circumstances of the case, and certain memorials which have been discovered, are adverse to so comforting a theory. Mr. Shepherd, the sole European witness of what took place at Cawnpore during that terrible fortnight, states that the females were spared for a worse fate than death; and the native on whose narrative the consoling theory rests confesses that a daughter of Sir Hugh Wheeler, having been appropriated by a cavalry trooper, arose in the night, and, like another Judith, killed her captor with his own sword, then threw herself into a well, where in the morning, in the language of the native, "was found Miss Bang, drink and swollen." We know that a few handfuls of grain was all the poor creatures got to eat; that they were crowded together in a narrow dwelling, scarcely more wholesome at that season than the Black Hole of Calcutta; and that, like their sisters at Delhi, they were robbed of their clothing.

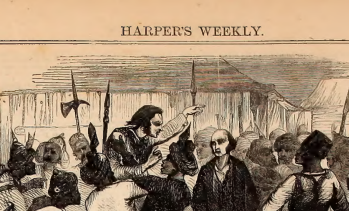
Meanwhile, General Havelock, who had hurried up from Calcutta, and had taken the command of a flying column, consisting chiefly of Scotch Highlanders, had fought eight actions in the course of a fortnight, and was hastening by forced marches on Cawnpore. The enemy, about four to one, met him at Bithoor, and after a sharp fight were defeated. Havelock pursued them toward Cawnpore.

Nena Sahib was there with his prisoners. It seems he had calculated on the repulse of Havelock from Bithoor. It was not till the afternoon of the 17th July that the guns of the British and the rejoicings approach of the Highlanders warned him that he must evacuate Cawnpore. He acted with promptitude. He gave orders for the massacre of all the women and children held in captivity.

It would appear—his accounts are very confused —that he offered, through the medium of an old woman, to spare the lives of some of the youngest of the English girls, on condition of their entering his harem. This they indignantly refused, preferring a thousand deaths. Sepoys were then sent into the room where they were—a room in the building representing Asher—and were directed to put them all to death. Of the actual death-scene we have of course no accounts from eye-witnesses. Some of the poor, wretched victims would seem to have escaped into the yard, and to have been killed there. But most of them perished in their prison-house.

No account could be more touching than the silent memorials of the massacre which were found on the reoccupation of Cawnpore. One man saw in the room "all sorts of articles of women and children's clothing—ladies' hair evidently cut off with a sword, combs, and parts of religious books. The floor was covered with blood like a butcher's slaughter-house." Another described the walls as being marked and scarred with sword-cuts and bayonet-thrusts, some of them with hair glued into the cuts. These marks were not at the height of several feet from the ground, as would have been the case had men fought there, but were within twenty inches of the floor—showing that the blows had been aimed at crouching women and children. A lock of paper was found in the blood; on it was written, in a girl's handwriting:

Memorandum of Deaths.
Mamma died July 13. During the captivity.
Alfred died July 8.
George died June 27. Date of the surrender.
Cawnpy left June 9.
Papa died June 6.
Uncle Willy died June 18.
Aunt Lilly June 11. During the siege.
Left Barracks June 27.
While prisoners as soon as we were at the river.



When the massacre was over the bodies were stripped, in many cases dismembered, then thrown into a well—the famous Well of Horrors—which it is now proposed to build a church. Strong soldiers, who had fought in a score of battles, and were accustomed to death in every shape, fainted on looking into that well.

There were but four of the wretched captives who were not there. One girl found her way to Nena Sahib, and boldly upbraided him with the butchery. "No religion," said she, "orders you to kill innocent women and children. Be well assured that by this slaughter the English will not become less; wherever may remain will have an eye upon you." The ruffian laughed sardonically at this address, and actually ordered that the girl should be distinguished from the rest by being put to death by an explosion of powder in her body.

Such were the events of July, 1857, at Cawnpore, and such the enormities which Nena Sahib has yet to expiate.

LITERARY.

As admirers of our readers, and, to a certain extent, caterers to their literary supply, we shall do them a favor in calling their attention especially to DEMAR AND CRANEY, Freytag's novel, which has created no little excitement in England, as well from its intrinsic excellence as from the two rival translations which appeared simultaneously. Messrs. Harper & Brothers publish the edition which has a preface by Chevalier Bunsen. The novel is the most successful attempt at the romance of commercial life which has hitherto been made. As such it is perfect, and should be read by every old and every young man in business. The hero, a young German, is an honest, intelligent, capable, and efficient merchant's clerk. His duties lead him into many exciting scenes. He fights in local battles, is thrown into contact with all kinds and classes of society, preserves his integrity under all circumstances, and in the end is rewarded as he deserves. Starting with him in life is a young man, who, devoid of principle and desirous only of achieving success, pursues and nobly amasses wealth, but at the sacrifice of honor and honesty, and in the end is properly served for. A charming girl, with her wife and child, nobly distinguishes herself among the rank of commercial men, are the centre around which the chief plot of the novel turns, the one young man being devoted to the ruin of the noble, the other being equally devoted to saving him from ruin. Lenore, the daughter, is an exquisite a beauty, and as bright, brave, hearty, and daring a girl as Di Vernon herself; while Sabine, the merchant's sister and the other heroine, is as delicate and lovable a creature as the pen of an author ever outlined. Finally, in summing up the characters who are cited in the play of incident, is Fisk, a young German, educated in New York, and decidedly a fast young New Yorker, who is a capital fellow withal, and who proves in the end to be altogether the hero of the romance. These are the actors. The scene is in Germany, ranging from time to time into Poland. The period is that of the last rebellions and revolutions.

THE ARREST OF THE MISSIONARIES BY THE SEPOYS.

THE HOUSE IN WHICH THE WOMEN AND CHILDREN WERE SLAUGHTERED AT CAWNPORE.

The object of the book was and is to teach the true position of commerce in the world. The romance of examples has found in the author a fitting relater. Yet it is by no means his only forte. There is a rare skill in describing all phases of character, and when he descends to the low and the vile he does it with a refined moderation and delicacy, without dulling his fingers. His men are fair and sinful men. He makes no saints out of his women. Rosalie, Mr. Kemble's daughter, is a fault found on which Sabine and Lessore are brought out in a exquisite contrast; but Rosalie, beautiful as Undine, tempts the frank, good-natured Fisk, and Fisk is not such a good fellow as to be proof against the seductions of Mr. Jewess.

Debit and Credit may be safely pronounced one of the best novels extant. Its politics are not the popular sort, but its incidents are thrilling and well sketched. Its love is rather German, but it is warm love, delicately told; and the author throws herself into the arms of her lover, she does it with such a grace and grace that one can but fall wishing one's self either the lover or Sabine. No one can fail to be deeply interested in the story. The plot is not complex, but the workmanship is interesting, and the scenes change and events succeed each other with a naturalness that is charming. We commend the book heartily to our readers, with the assurance that no one who reads will fail to be delighted with it.

Mrs. (Mowatt) Ritchie publishes (Tickner & Fields) a new volume entitled Fern Hill, which is a graceful and touching history of two sisters, actresses. The plot is not new, being old as it and never uninteresting story which Mrs. Barratt has made eternally beautiful in "Bertha in the Lane"—the self-nature of a rather low-born girl. The object of the book is to show—what no one who knows Mrs. Ritchie herself could question—that the profession of an actress is not inconsistent with the noblest and purest life.

The book as published has been a great favorite. Tickner & Fields add to it Mrs. Jameson's Sketches or Art, Literature, and Character—a series of rare deliciousness as well to stayers at home as to travelers among European collections. Next to a winter in Europe, in person, is the pleasure of a talk with Mr. Jameson over the galleries, sweet, pale, luminous pictures of Italian painters, and artists of every name and land.

Francis & Co., of this city, also publish, in blue and gold, Mrs. Browning's Poems, from the last London edition, corrected by the author. There are three small volumes contained in all that the series, from "The Drama of Exile" to "Aurora Leigh." The popularity of Mrs. Browning's poems is almost great, since it authorizes the publication of so many editions by Francis & Co. The style of the present is admirably adapted to the table or desk, and gives as a drawing-room ornament, while it is a convenient pocket traveling companion.

One of the most noticeable features of the publishing business in America is the extent to which the publication of albums is carried on by private houses. Jasper Harding & Co., in Philadelphia, carry on a large business in this article, which they print, bind, and publish in every form and variety of simplicity and elegance. The American Bible Society has long been the rival of the publishing houses, and being sustained by donations, and able to sell at cost, it has, of course, been considered impossible to undersell, or even to equal them in prices. It is pleasing to know that the Society are only gratified at the increased circulation of the Sacred Scriptures which private houses are able to publish at low prices, which are to be themselves attempts any illustrated editions, leaving that wholly to private enterprise.

Madam Pfeiffer was a short time since reported to be in high favor at Madagascar, where her performances on the piano had elicited substantial commendations from the Queen in the shape of sundry presents of gold and silver. Alas for the fickleness of royalty! A communication states that four weeks later the Queen ordered every European to be summarily decapitated, but was prevailed on to commute that they might leave the island. We have no intelligence which has befallen the enthusiastic lady-traveler.

The German papers publish a newly discovered poem by Goethe, found on the leaf of a book belonging to one of his fellow-students. As it is very short we give it entire:

DER REICHE.

Ja, ich bin wirklich reich, ich habe
Der göttlichen Gedanken die,
Mit Wenigen vergnügt zu sein.
Ein Mädchen will mich an Klassen,
Der Freunde viel, ein gut Gewissen,
Und täglich Brod zum Essen.

GOETHE.

LIFE OF DR. KANE by Dr. Elder has just been published by Childs and Peterson of Philadelphia, uniform with the works of the late lamented Arctic explorer. It is a neat and well written little biography, and is embellished with a handsome portrait of Dr. Kane. It would be difficult to find a modern hero whose character affords a nobler subject for the biographer than Dr. Kane's; in him were united all the higher virtues which ennoble humanity, and his adventurous disposition filled his career with episodes of the most thrilling order. Dr. Elder has done justice to his theme. We could hope he exceed for remarking that many persons will feel surprise that so much space should have been allotted to the funeral ceremonies and eulogies of the subject of the memoir, while by far the most eloquent performance on his career and death is the poem on that subject published in an early number of this paper—is omitted.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 11th Jan., the Vice-President laid before the Senate reports of the surveys on the lakes and rivers in New York, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, and presented a petition for an ocean mail route between New York and Galveston on the Gulf. Senator Wilson proposed, and the Senate adopted a resolution calling for the facts as to the sale, forfeiture, collection, and disposition of the revenue in each collection district for the past five years. Senator Bayard offered resolutions to apply the provisions of the recent Navy Act to the officers commanding the Home Squadron. Mr. Hunter's resolution was passed authorizing the President to restore to the Army officers who resigned to join the Confederate States Army. Senator Bayard's resolution to apply the Navy Retiring Board, by joint resolution the President was authorized to appoint a Board of Navy officers to examine into the passages of the Arctic. The House was not in session. Tuesday, 12th Jan. The Senate were not in session. Wednesday, 13th. The House were not in session. Thursday, 14th.

On Friday, 15th the Senate not being in Session, Mr. Bocock asked the House to take up the Senate Resolution in relation to the Harper's Ferry Arms, which was objected. A resolution was adopted to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty on coffee, to charge a tax of pensions and papers in reference to the charges of Mr. Buchanan's Message. Mr. Stanton introduced a bill to establish a Court for the United States to sit in the Middlest Mills gold district. Mr. Bocock introduced a bill to provide for the payment of the Virginia militia, ordered by the President, providing for the reimbursement of the State for the money which the State powers was passed. Mr. Hardin gave notice that he would on Monday, 18th, introduce a bill to prevent the expulsion from the House. The House then adjourned to Monday.

CONFIRMATIONS BY THE SENATE.

Many of Mr. Buchanan's appointments have been confirmed by the Senate during the week. Among others are the following: Jeremiah S. Black, to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in the room of Judge Curtis, resigned; John Appleton, of Maine, to be Minister Resident to Brazil, of Pennsylvania, as Minister to China, by twenty-five to twenty-three votes. Mr. Appleton was born in Bath, in Chili; R. F. Angel, of New York, as Minister to Peru; Robert Tyler, of Virginia, Register of the Treasury; Benjamin Stanton, of Ohio, Second Auditor; Thomas G. Pratt, of Maryland, Commissioner to Russia; Beverly Tucker, of Virginia, Consul in Liverpool; Thomas Corwin, of Ohio, Minister to Mexico; John Southampton; John Ritchie, of Pennsylvania, Consul to Havana; Charles Mason, of Iowa, Commissioner of Patents; Charles W. Glenn, of Pennsylvania, Consul in Berlin; William Trotter, of Kentucky, Minister Resident to Bolivia; Consul at Brussels; Wyman B. S. Moor, Consul at Rio Janeiro; Thomas Hart Benton, Surveyor; Edward Yalger, of Virginia, Consul for Barcelona; Henry W. Hilliard, of Alabama, Minister to Belgium; Wm. H. Wilson, Consul at Cadiz; Consul for Oporto; and Judge Borden, of Indiana, Consul for Lyons. Mr. Buchanan's nominations for Secretary of War, Secretary of the Interior, of State; John Digler, of California, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Austria; and Mr. Murphy, of New York, Minister Resident to the Netherlands, have not been acted upon. Mr. Buchanan's nomination at Constantinople; William B. Calhoun, of South Carolina, Secretary of Legation at Madrid.

THE NEW INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

The Committee of Investigation appointed on Wednesday by the House resolution to appoint an Investigating Committee, consisting of seven members, was duly drawn by Lawrence, Stone, and Company for an amendment of the Senate's Committee. The following are the names of the Committee: Among others, Stanton of Ohio, and Winslow of North Carolina, Democrats, and Howard of Texas, to be anticipated that Mr. Stanton will undoubtedly be elected.

THE MINNESOTA CONSTITUTION.

A fight is forming in the Territory of Minnesota. Some Southern men desire to delay it, in order that Minnesota may remain with Oregon and Kansas; and it is said that the Governor and authorities of Minnesota, who are Democrats, will not call an election. The bill introduced in the Senate for the admission of the Territory for the present. On the other hand, the Republicans of the Territory are determined to have the State admitted. Minnesota, Senator Douglas is believed to concur with them.

THE PARDONING AND WALKER INTRODUCTIO.

Governor Walker has arrived at Topeka, and has addressed a letter to the people in which he announces his acceptance of the office. He says that he will not be removed from his principles. That during the time of the pardon in the Territory by Lecompton authority the armed men under his command had full possession of the Territory, and that the Governor had no power to do who what they pleased, besides imprisoning free to liquor, and carrying away clothing and other private property of the petitioner.

The petition concludes with a request that the Governor will pay for the public indemnity.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Complete returns of the Kansas election of the 4th have not come to hand, but it is generally conjectured that with the State which elected is Democratic, the Free-State party have elected a majority of the Legislature, and will control the State Government against the Lecompton Constitution. Gross Frauds are said to have been used. The Territorial Legislature passed a Lecompton act in toto, and received Governor Denver's approval. The Governor has also issued proclamations existing in the Territory more to personal hostility than to political opposition. Governor Denver's proclamation of the Register of Deeds as worthy of confidence by the people of Kansas; draws attention to the second section of the Act of Congress of 1854, organizing the Territory, the avoidance of Legislation until the action of Congress relative to the Territory of Kansas be admitted under the Constitution at their sole will be nullified; recommends the Legislature to take no action in relation to the building of a prison; alludes to the rumor of the existence of an organization similar to the Justice of Lynch Law; advises action in reference thereto. Other suggestions of a similar character are made. The Legislature have had protracting the session into the Legislature then adjourned to meet at Lecompton.

The Free-State Convention met at Topeka, on the 5th, after receiving a message from Governor Robinson, advising them not to convene. Many members are also members of the Territorial Legislature.

Governor Denver has gone to Missouri, and was expected to proceed from thence to Washington.

THE MORMON WAR.

The whole of the troops sent out upon this expedition are now in communication with Utah, and we are in the receipt of accounts in winter-quarters on Black's Fork, about a mile and a half from Fort Bridger. The force is under the command of Colonel Cooke's command of Kingsbury, who went guide to Fort Bridger and Harney's Fork, where they found no sons must supply of grass for the horses. Five companies of the troops were left at Fort Bridger, where they and were engaged in rebuilding the works, for the purpose of making a permanent post. Colonel Alexander, with the remainder, went forward to the Utah Valley, the whole of the works, it was anticipated, would be completed by the 1st of May, when the troops will march for this object. There is an abundance of wood for fuel, but the troops were all immediately provided themselves in tents, with stoves, and the weather had been, lately, very severe, the thermometer having frequently stood at seven below or fifteen hundred—in addition to which a foot of snow. The troops were also without a thousand stoves and other stuffers of an army.

Governor Young has issued a proclamation to the Mormons and to Governor Brigham Young, threatening to burn Salt Lake City, and to lay waste the country, if the troops attempt to march into it; a court by the Governor Young had sent males with salt to Colonel Cooke, but the latter refused to receive any thing the sent messenger who came on a similar errand.

LEGISLATURES.

Nothing of any consequence has been done in the State Legislatures during the past week. The Ohio Legislature has not organized, the Americans refusing to vote for either a Republican or a Democratic Senator for any office. Resolutions directing the Virginia Delegation in Congress to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution have passed the House of Delegates and the Senate. A contrary character has been reported in the New Jersey and other Northern Legislatures. The Indiana and Illinois Legislatures have been visited by branches of the Legislature. The Legislature of Alabama has requested the Governor to call a convention to meet in Congress refuse to admit Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution.

PERSONAL.

A writer in the Washington Union thus sketches the first reception of the season at the President's:

"The first reception of the season at the President's took place yesterday. The ladies and gentlemen presented with great cordiality. Mrs. Buchanan, who is a lady of fine appearance, and who has been accustomed to the duties of performing a picture more beautiful, although not so gaudy, than that which was presented by the ladies who had gone to become Mrs. Albert Gaugh.

"A fair lady, an acquaintance, Mrs. C——, was decidedly the 'observed of all observers,' and carried the honors of the day. Mrs. C—— is a native of Kentucky, and Mrs. Buchanan was escorted by a gallant son of Illinois, and her inquiries concerning the many who passed were duly answered. Miss K——, of Baltimore (who wore a toilet of white tulle, with a wreath of the same flowers in her hair), was much admired. Miss L——, of Louisiana, is becoming extensively known for her beauty and accomplishments. Miss P——, of New York, is a magnificent brunette, with either indica whose charms seem to increase with time. Miss M—— is a graceful blonde.

"Among the dressed the very style of beauty was represented, and there was a great diversity of opinion as to the rival charms of the fair ones. The general verdict appeared to be that the ladies of Washington had a unaffected manners and stylish charms, set off by her accomplishments, which commanded admiration. Miss Miss M——, of this city, Miss J—— of Philadelphia, Miss C—— of Baltimore, Miss D—— of Virginia, and Miss Mc—— of Kentucky, were also present, whose flowing ringlets could not conceal her blushes at the compliments which she was the evident object of.

Mr. Fortune, who has returned to England and written a book thereon, has been appointed by Mr. Fish, the United States Government of the agency for the introduction and distribution of Chinese productions into the States.

Ex-President Fillmore, according to the New York Observer, says of his personal habits: "I owe my misfortune to my habits. I am a regular early riser, breakfast at eight, go to my office or farm, and to bib-ing habits of regularity and temperance. I have never used tobacco in any form. I attribute my health and the general habits of living to which I had previously been accustomed. I spend a couple of hours four to six, and am interrupted. The Sabbath I always kept as a day of rest. Business hours, no business days, no visiting or receiving. On commencing my Presidential career, I found that the Sabbath was frequently encroached upon by visits and private interviews with the President. I determined to break this up, and accordingly appointed my door-keeper to permit all Sunday visitors with an unfamiliarious refusal. I found this arrangement to work well, and I was enabled to keep the Sabbath as a day of religious rest. My callers were always courteous, and often expressed their approval of my course before they left the house.

The Christian Advocate says that the Rev. W. H. Milburn, who has been afflicted with total loss of sight, is now partially restored. He can read and write, and preach from his notes. He can also travel without a guide. The first lecture will be on "Epic Poetry: Dante and Milton." Subsequent lectures will be delivered on "Reformation;" the third, "Lyrics: Modern Hymn Writers;" the fourth, "Modern Poetry;" the fifth, "Shakspeare;" the sixth, "Modern Preachers." The Rev. Methodist Episcopal Church, corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-second street, will preside at the lectures, which will be delivered on Friday, January 21; and Monday, January 25.

A Washington letter to the Philadelphia Inquirer says of Mr. Schoolcraft:

"Mr. Schoolcraft is now nearly 65 years of age, though he does not look over 50. This is remarkable when we remember that for many years he resided on the frontiers, or was subjected to all the discomforts and hardships of Indian life. Commencing the Indian agency, he was gradually engaged in the service of all tourists, and consequently he has seen more of the Indian character than any other man living. He has been a writing exegetist; and instead of which I was introduced to Mr. Schoolcraft, I was vividly reminded of the fact that his literary and extract contribution he is greatly indebted to a naturally fine constitution, and to the extreme abstinence of his habits. He is a strict vegetarian. The Washington wag who would have destroyed a hundred ordinary men, and looks as fresh and healthy as a boy of 20, is a water-drinker by nature. A total believer in one side, caused by his early exposures, confines him habitually to his house; but he hardly regards this as an affliction, for his library is his home, and he is never so happy as when pursuing his literary labors, which, by the way, are literally labors of love.

Lord Napier proposes enlarging his establishment at Washington, in order to be able to effectively celebrate the birthday of the British Prince of England to Prince Frederick William, son of the Prince of Prussia, the present Queen of England.

Mr. Wright, the new Minister to Sweden, is a native of Vermont, and was formerly a member of Congress from Vermont. He is a lawyer by profession, and is a member of the Democratic party.

Mr. Wright, our new Envoy at Berlin, has distinguished himself in Congress by his opposition to the Know-Nothings, which he gave recently in honor of Alexander Hamilton. He studied law in Philadelphia, and died in Berlin were twisted, bounty and other preparations for the reception of the Prince of Prussia.

On Saturday, 9th inst., as Chief-Justice Dunn, of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, was walking from his house to his office, he was met by twenty-eight negroes in a body, all steps and fell with such violence upon his right side as to break his hip. He was conveyed immediately to the residence in a carriage, and a physician was called in, who pronounced the injury to be fracture, though not severe and not a compound one, whereby the process of knitting together will be rapid.

William Brown, Esq., brother of the Postmaster-General, died at his residence in Jersey city, on Saturday, 16th inst., in the 69th year of his age. He was born in Ireland, and he had just arrived from his bed. Mr. Buchanan is an extensive dealer in coal, and has considerable interest in it on this occasion by getting up to address these gentlemen, who were invited to suppose, were collections at that hour. He, however, naively remarked to them, in substance, that he thought it a little singular that they might be hoped they would retire to rest, and that to-morrow they would be better prepared to hear the address of their respective duties." Evidently, Mr. Buchanan, who is a practical man, thought that these gentlemen should have been in bed, and not attempting waggishness about their "going to rest and getting up refreshed" the next day.

The Ottoman Turk has ordered a screw ship-of-the-line to be constructed in the United States, but has charged Rear-Admiral Mehemed Pasha and Hussein Effendi, members of the Board of Admiralty, to superintend the construction of the vessel, and to study the system of naval tactics in vogue here.

Mr. Reuben Mellen, whose unaccountable disappearance from Boston some time since caused a great deal of search and speculation, returned the other day, having been in the State of Maine during the whole time. He has since been in Boston, and has left for the west-ward.

Mrs. Mellen, having no doubt of his death, had married a grocer.

The Hon. W. H. Seward, of New York, at the invitation of the Hon. Mr. Bigler, delivered a very judicious a visit a few days since, the object of which was to stir up a new party in the National Democratic party, condemning Mr. Buchanan being desirous that Seward, from what he said, would be the President that they always to Pollevoise, the nominees of his father-in-law, near Utica, for choice of art, and in the mean time has the dash took place.

The Indians now visiting Washington must either be very fond of a joke, or very much struck with the ventriloquial performances of Mr. Conway Kellogg. Among the Indians who called Executive their "grand father," but Old Book rejoice to the description of the Rat man's "Great Grandfather."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE MONEY MARKET.

At latest dates there was a continued growing ease in the English money market, but no reduction in the rate of interest by the Bank had taken place. The birthday of the Prince of Wales (9th November) was a holiday had been done for several days. The London market ceased to be active, and the Bank of England was in receipt of bullion to the amount of £1,000,000 sterling.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

The Court Journal contains the following account:

"The Queen, the Prince Consort, and all the Royal family will leave Osborne House to-day on the Isle of Jan-uary. The nuptials of the Princess Royal and Prince Frederick William will take place on the 25th, which is Monday week following. There will be three distinct ceremonies—the first in the presence of which the Queen as sovereign, that of the bride, and that of the royal bridegroom. The first will be performed by the archbishop and all present at the marriage ceremony, and the second by changed their bridal habiliments for traveling costumes, will leave town for Windsor Castle. On the Wednesday after the marriage her Majesty and the Prince Consort will give the newly-wedded Prince and Princess a congratulatory visit at Windsor Castle. The royal party, including the bride and bridegroom, will return to town on Friday, and a grand drawing-room will be held at St. James's Palace on Saturday, the 30th, of January, to enable the sovereign to pay their respects to the Prince and Princess. The Queen will not receive the visit of her Majesty's ambassadors and ministers to whom they will be presented on the occasion. The Queen will also receive the visit of the Princess Royal and Prince Frederick William, and a series of other entertainments will follow. The Empress is said to take especial interest in the marriage of the Princess Royal, and great talk is held concerning the wedding presents to be dispatched from the Tuileries on the occasion. We have heard of a certain vail to be worked by the religious ladies of Cambrai, which is said to be a marvel of taste and skill. The value of the piece is beyond calculation. Some idea may be formed of it when we mention that it was commenced more than five years ago, and has been on hand ever since. Two of Vernet's pictures, with Delacroix's master-piece, have already arrived at Berlin, as offerings to the youthful ménage on the part of the Emperor. The little statuette of the Empress kneeling on the day of her marriage at Nôtre Dame, executed in silver, is also on its way to ornament the boudoir of the young Princess at Berlin.

MR. THACKERAY ON SCHOOLS.

Mr. Thackeray lately addressed the Commercial Travelers School Society, and remarked, among other things: "Gentlemen, I wish on behalf of my own class of literary men, of which I own I am one, that we could boast of any thing so good as that of which I see the specimens in the gallery yonder. I wish we had an institution where our children could be educated, and well educated, at a moderate cost. At present our children are only educated at an awful cost; and here I am reminded of the respected, the highly respected, proprietor of 'Dotheboys Hall,' when he found from time to time the announcement that the advertiser proposed to take only a limited number of pupils. Now, I should say that he takes the limited number of pupils, not that he is in love with them, but because he desires to extract the largest amount of profit. He looks to, and thinks of the profits to be screwed out of, their unfortunate little bellies. Then why can not we, as men of letters, think whether we can not adopt such a system as this, and whether we, the men of the line, can not emulate the men of the road? Only a month ago I visited a friend of mine, who is making, perhaps, £1000 a year, and he showed me the amount for a half year for his two little boys at school. The one was born in the year 1852, the other was a year older, so that these little heroes were of the ages of six and seven years. They were certainly placed at an excellent school, and they came home with a bill amounting to £75 for the half year. Now, the poor 'Paterfamilias' has to pay his life assurance, his income-tax, and his house-tax, and no doubt, as in all such cases, he has poor relations—so perhaps has his wife, and she is obliged to supply them with millinery, and at present, of course, the enormous prices and size of ladies' dresses consume nearly one-tenth part of his income." The honorable gentleman then appealed to the gentlemen of the press, if any were present, begging them to get up a scheme which should benefit the literary classes. He need not allude to those educationary processes which distinguished this school, because they had been developed in terms of great praise last year. It appeared to him that in those schools they gave the best education which could be taught. It appeared that they taught the modern languages, mathematics, the fine arts, and music especially, of which he was sure they would soon have a specimen in the room. They prepared children for every occupation in life.

AN ATROCIOUS CASE.

People are much concerned about an atrocious case which lately came before the Exeter Assizes:

Jonathan Roose, a very young man, was tried for assaulting Jane Stone, with intent to murder her. Jane Stone is a girl of twenty. She had lived as servant with Mr. Mitchelmore, uncle of Roose, at Torquay; was seduced by Roose; and went into the service of another family. Roose wished her to father her child upon some other man—particularly his uncle, to whom the scoundrel was under great obligations. She refused. One night she was in the garden of her mistress's house with her seducer. Suddenly he threw her on the ground, beat her on the face and head with a large stone, and thrust his hand down her throat, either to stifle her cries or to suffocate her. The life of the poor creature was almost gone. She struggled as much as she could, and with a great and almost dying effort she uttered a slight scream—that little scream was heard, but not by human being except the villain. Her senses reeled, and she became unconscious.

HOW THE MURDER WAS DISCOVERED.

In her employer Mrs. Willes's house a pet dog was kept, and although human ear had not heard that faint scream, the little dog was roused. It commenced barking most violently, scratched at the drawing-room door, where the ladies were sitting, and could not be pacified. Mrs. Willes, and Mrs. Crawford, who was with her, became alarmed, and went into the garden. They called out, but received no answer; but they thought they heard the moans of some one in distress. They then went to the house of a neighbor named Hammersley, and he, with a candle, proceeded to the spot whence the moans came, and there he saw the body of a woman lying on the ground. She was making a low moaning sound. He looked at the face, but it was so beaten and bloody that he could not recognize the features. Surgeons thought that the mangled victim could not survive; but she did, and was able to confront her seducer in the court, but presenting in herself a spectacle shocking to humanity. Her head and face had the appearance of being completely bound together, or rather mashed with plasters. A surgeon who examined the poor girl when she was thought to be dying, stated: "I found her head, face, and chest covered with blood, and found eight lacerated wounds, and four fractures—two on the head, and two on the face. The bones of the nose and upper jaw were fractured; the teeth were loose—I removed them with my fingers. The lip was cut through; the ears were both lacerated. I removed a small piece of stone from the left temple, in which it was imbedded; it was of the same description as the large stone now produced."

THE TRIAL AND SENTENCE.

The case against the prisoner, so far as the assault itself was concerned, was quite clear. But his counsel urged for him that there was no murderous intent; he had acted in a sudden fit of passion; it would not have been murder even if the girl had died. The counsel finished with this astounding request: "He asked the jury to send the prisoner home to his family and to his mother, of whom he had hitherto been the pride and ornament, that, by a life of penitence and repentance, he might in some way atone for one moment of unhappy passion." Witnesses gave the accused a good character. Mr. Justice Willes instructed the jury on the law of the case, correcting the counsel. The jury convicted of "assaulting with intent to do grievous bodily harm." The Judge, after expressing his horror at the atrocity of the offender, sentenced him to penal servitude for life.

AMERICAN SYMPATHY WITH ENGLAND.

At a banquet given by the Mayor of Liverpool to the Siamese Embassadors, Mr. Beverly Tucker, the United States Consul in that town, was one of the speakers. He congratulated the assembly on the glorious news from India, and trusted that the triumph of English arms would be complete, because it was the triumph of civilization. He said he had no doubt whatever that there was an immense trade to be developed with Siam, and he felt assured that the "Star-spangled Banner" would, like the flag of Great Britain, dip in the water to the vessels of Siam approaching the great republic of America.

SURGICAL OPERATION ON AN ELEPHANT.

During the late visit to Hull of Wombwell's menagerie, the elephant "Chubby" underwent an operation which, from its novelty and success, deserves a place among surgical records. For twelve or fifteen months previously a tumor had been gathering on Chubby's off-side thigh. It grew, and grew, and grew, till at last men began to doubt whether the elephant was an appendage of the tumor, or the tumor an appendage of the elephant; for the larger grew the one the smaller grew the other. Chubby sickened, lost his appetite, pined away—his skin became "a world too wide." The sobriquet of Chubby, which his once fair proportions merited, grew to be a mockery, and it became evident that unless the tumor and Chubby dissolved partnership, the former would soon be the sole representative of the firm. Change of air was tried, but the tumor only derived advantage. Medical advice was called in; but, alas! it proved another nut which the faculty could not crack. Nine famous leeches, at nine various stations, tried their juleps and catholicons, but in vain; no one daring to have recourse to the knife with such a patient. Such was the state of matters when Chubby paid us his farewell visit, as it was supposed, last Hull fair. His friends as a last resource, applied to one of our townsmen, a veterinary surgeon, Mr. Tom B. H. Hyde, Jun. Mr. Hyde went, saw, and boldly resolved to use the lancet. The operation was performed a few days after the fair, and lasted two hours, Chubby undergoing it with such fortitude and good sense as could only be derived from a consciousness of its object. The tumor, when removed, weighed five pounds, and one of the fangs had to be searched out with the knife for a foot down the thigh. The operation proved eminently successful. Every fresh bulletin announced his improving health till the latter end of November, when Mr. Hyde pronounced his patient thoroughly restored, and capable of returning to business.

THE LOSS OF THE SARAH SANDS.

The steamer Sarah Sands, while conveying troops to India, took fire and burned for fifteen hours. All the after part of the ship was destroyed, and she put into Mauritius for repairs. The troops showed perfect discipline, and the preservation of all on board was extraordinary.

A letter from Captain Castle, commander of the Sarah Sands, is published, describing the partial destruction of the ship, and the escape of the troops and crew. The fire was discovered at 3.45 P.M. The precautions adopted have already been given. The flames burned through the upper deck, and at about 9 P.M. a fearful explosion took place in the port magazine. "By this time," says Captain Castle, "the ship was one body of flame from the stern to the main rigging; and thinking it scarcely possible to save her I called Major Brett, in command of the troops, forward, and told him my opinion, requesting him to keep order among the troops until the last, but at the same time to use every exertion to check the fire. No person can describe the manner in which the men worked to keep the fire back. One party were below keeping the bulkhead coal from burning, several of whom were dragged up senseless, when fresh volunteers took their places, but who soon in turn again had to be dragged up in the same state. At 11 P.M. the main-topsail yard took fire. Mr. Welsh, quarter-master, and four or five soldiers, went aft with wet blankets, and succeeded in extinguishing the flames there, but not until the yard and mast were nearly burned through. About midnight we appeared to have made some impression on the fire, and after that drove it back inch by inch until daylight, when it had been completely got under. The ship now appeared in a fearful plight, merely the shell remaining. The port quarter was blown out by the explosion, fifteen feet of water was in the hold, and the ship was rolling heavily and taking in large quantities of water aft."

FRANCE.

THE LOST STEAMSHIP PACIFIC.

Some time since the papers published an account of the discovery of a bottle, which had floated ashore on the coast of France, containing a paper purporting to have been written by a passenger on board the Collins steamship Pacific, just as she was going down. This story was supposed to be a hoax. The editor of the Norwalk (Connecticut) Gazette, believing that the paper was written by Legrand Smith, of Norwalk, a passenger on the steamer, wrote at once to a friend in Paris, Dr. Evans, to make inquiries about the affair, and especially the handwriting of the note found. By the Africa an answer was received, in which Dr. Evans says:

"I was on a professional visit to the Empress the other day; and in conversation mentioned the subject, in which she became most intensely interested. The Emperor entering at the time, the Empress said, 'My dear, Dr. Evans has been telling me of the possibility of ascertaining the fate of the Pacific;' then repeating what I had said regarding the receipt of your letter, etc. The Emperor, who is a man of noble heart, at once entered into the details of the subject. Upon my relating it to him he said it interested him exceedingly, and he would immediately send for the scrip of paper. He being a very prompt man, and full of kindly feeling, did so, and sent me, directed by himself and sealed with his own private stamp, the said paper, which I now have in my possession, and which is acknowledged by all who have seen it to be an American's handwriting. It is hastily written in pencil.

"Now I wish to obtain through you his own handwriting, to compare with what I have, as of course I can not send you the original, but will have a fac simile taken, if possible, to send you."

HE SAVED HIS GOLD.

Highway robberies are becoming nearly as frequent in the south of France as they are in Spain and Italy. The stage-coach which runs between Nice and Marseilles was stopped on Tuesday night last between Draguignan and Lorgues by four men armed with muskets. They first summoned the guard to deliver up two sacks of silver, which they knew were loaded on the top of the coach. One of the gang then approached the coach door, and in very polite terms assured the passengers that they need feel no alarm, as his comrades would be satisfied with carrying off the silver. The guard attempted to make resistance, but being overpowered, he yielded, and the robbers fled with the treasure, leaving the passengers, one of whom had 8000 francs in gold with him, delighted at their fortunate escape. Having arrived at Lorgues, the guard made a declaration of the facts to the commander of the gendarmerie in that place, who sent a detachment in pursuit of the robbers.

THE COUNTESS DE MORNY.

The Paris correspondent of the Court Journal says:

"The house was crowded to suffocation, the imperial box alone being unoccupied. The Count and Countess de Morny were present; and for the first time the Paris public were admitted to judgment on the charms which have been so much vaunted in the north and east of Europe. The result of the examination is not wholly in confirmation of the wide-spread fame which these charms have acquired. The Countess's beauty is decidedly of the petit genre—soft and not commanding—the great peculiarity of the style being the very dark eyes and very fair hair. This contrast gives a singularity to the countenance to which we 'men of the West' are totally unaccustomed. The youthful Countess was most simply attired, with no ornament whatever in her coiffeure, which consisted entirely of the plaits, torsades, and ringlets of her own magnificent hair. Great disappointment was experienced in consequence, as the contemplation of the splendid jewels, said to have been bestowed by the Emperor on her wedding, might be reckoned for a large share in the curiosity with which her presence was greeted. Much has been said of the dazzling whiteness of the lady's pearly teeth; but on the evening in question no opportunity was afforded for their display, as she did not once open her lips to utter a single word during the whole evening."

THE WEATHER IN FRANCE.

A Paris paper says: "The mildness of the season has caused some alarm among persons who imagine that a white Christmas is absolutely necessary for agricultural purposes. But up to the present time nothing can have been more favorable to the farmer than the weather which has taken place, as it has afforded all, even the most tardy, ample time to get through their out-of-door work. Several years are noted in chronicle for the lateness of their winter. In 1684 the frost did not set in until the end of January, but it became so severe that for several weeks carriages circulated on the Seine, and at last a fair was held there, with dancing, feasting, and all kinds of sports. In 1758 it did not begin to freeze at Antwerp until the 24th February, but in return, on the 15th March, foot-passengers and horsemen circulated over the whole surface of the Scheldt. In 1829 the cold did not commence until the month of January, but at the end of February carriages passed over the Seine at Bercy. The severity of the winter did not, however, in any way affect the next year's vintage, 1830 having been remarkable for the excellence of its wine."

RELIGIOUS CRINOLINE.

A new Journal des Modes is announced to be forthcoming in Paris, edited by the Abbé Magnat. This pious person is a professor of botany, and has an idea that piety and petticoats have an affinity. He thinks it wrong that the fashions should be abandoned to profane writers, and his new weekly Le Parterre des Dames et Demoiselles is quite a flowery announcement. Crochet work, embroidery, floral patterns, and all the remote paraphernalia of the sex this gallant Abbé undertakes to discuss learnedly and tastefully. But as he is supposed to ignore stays and the more recondite muslin of the fair, he has taken into partnership "la Vicomtesse B——," who is some adventurous milliner in disguise. It comes out under the patronage of some good Bishops and several "convents of the strictest propriety," according to the prospectus. A morning journal begs to suggest to Abbé Magnat the obvious improvement of calling his paper La Crinoline Religieuse. Our Quaker friends have now a precedent for starting their journal of the fashions, with appropriate colored prints in drab.

HAS A MEDICAL MAN A RIGHT TO REFUSE TO ATTEND A PATIENT?

The Court of Appeal of Paris has just decided a case which has excited much interest in the medical profession. Some time back a physician of Senlis, named Robouam, was condemned by the tribunal of that place to 1500 francs damages for having refused to attend by night a woman in her confinement, and who, it was alleged, had expired for want of medical aid. That decision produced so great an emotion in the medical world that a meeting of the members of the Faculty of Paris was held, Baron Dubois in the chair, and an opinion was adopted by the persons present in favor of Dr. Robouam. The Court of Appeal, after having perused the document so drawn up, and examined fully every circumstance of the case, has now given a decision contrary to that of the preceding judges, and has laid it down as law that a medical man has a right, on his own moral responsibility, to refuse his services. As to the special case brought before them, they have discharged Dr. Robouam from the payment of damages, nothing in the evidence, in their opinion, having proved that the patient had expired from want of medical assistance.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

The little Prince Imperial, who takes daily drives up the Champs Elysées and in the Bois de Boulogne, in a carriage, escorted by a posse of Lancers, excites great interest among his future subjects—especially among the fairer portion. He is excessively active, and is only just beginning to talk. He understands all that is said to him, whether in French or English. He is beginning to learn to ride on a donkey, and has already acquired something of a seat. His great favorites are a young English servant and a large Newfoundland dog.

AMERICAN THIEVES IN PARIS.

Two well-dressed men of gentlemanly manners went a few days since to the shop of M. Leroy, jeweler, in the Palais Royal, and after representing, through an interpreter, that they were Americans, proceeded to select various objects of considerable value, which they directed to be placed aside for them to the next day when they said they would come and pay for them. They then purchased a silver tooth-pick, and some other petty articles, for which they laid down the price and left. Leroy, on arranging the cases which the strangers had examined, perceived that several valuable articles had been abstracted. Before he had recovered from his astonishment, the interpreter came in, and claimed the allowance which Parisian tradesmen are accustomed to make to men of his calling who take them good customers, but Leroy, not doubting that the man, who is an Englishman, was an accomplice of the thieves, had him arrested and taken before the commissary of police. To the commissary, however, the Englishman proved that he was perfectly innocent; and, in fact, his going to claim his percentage showed him to be so, and he was released. On inquiry, it appeared that the two Americans had robbed several other jewelers, among them M. Bury, Boulevard des Italiens, of a very valuable diamond ring. Three or four days after the robbery of Leroy the police read in a London newspaper an account of the arrest at Southampton of two suspected thieves, just arrived from France, and having in their possession a quantity of jewelry. The description given of a diamond ring found on them left little doubt that it was that which had been stolen from Bury. The police of Paris in consequence made a communication to the English police, and the latter had the two men sent to Paris.

RUSSIA.

OFFICIAL CORRUPTION.

The following anecdote gives some idea of the corruption which not long since prevailed, and probably still prevails, in the official world of Warsaw: "About twelve years ago M. Rosengold, a Jewish tradesman, made known to the higher authorities that the State was systematically robbed by certain employés. In order that the matter might not become public Rosengold was seized and thrown into prison, where he remained until the amnesty was granted at the coronation of the present Emperor. On his liberation the unfortunate man lost no time in laying his case before the new authorities, and they soon satisfied themselves that he had been infamously treated. By a special ukase the Emperor Alexander has made public the man's innocence, and given orders that certain civic distinctions shall be conferred upon him.

ITALY.

A ROMAN SCHUYLER.

A letter in the Independente of Turin affords a glimpse of the magnificence of the Marquis Campana, recently arrested at Rome on a charge of embezzling the funds of the Monte de Pietà:

"He possesses, in the street of the Corso, an elegant palace, where he has got together a gallery of the most magnificent pictures; and in his villa near the Lateran he established a museum—inferior, perhaps, only to that of the Vatican, so rich is it in statues, bas-reliefs, inscriptions, Etruscan vases, and other most precious things. He has, moreover, a rare collection of stones, minerals, coins, etc. He owns lands, palaces, and country houses in great number, both in Rome and abroad. He has established, at immense expense, a manufactory of marbles, or rather of a substance similar to marble, with which are made statues, columns, cups, and pavement of all kinds. In this manufactory nearly three hundred workmen were employed. Finally, he maintained, at his expense, a house of education for poor children. His fortune was increased by his marriage with an extremely rich English lady—Miss Rowoles [Bowles], daughter of the lady who received in her carriage the fugitive from the fortress of Ham and conveyed him into Belgium. Napoleon did not forget the service—he did not lose sight of the family, but protected it greatly, and the Marchioness Campana became Lady of Honor to the Empress of the French. It is said that she is preparing to set out for France to state her griefs to the Emperor and ask his protection for her husband. The Marquis is Chevalier of numerous orders and Chamberlain of many Courts."

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

The following is a summary of the latest news: The news of the relief of Lucknow is confirmed. The enemy fought desperately. The rebels had not evacuated Lucknow. Sir Colin Campbell asks for a reinforcement, although his force is computed at 12,000, in fine order. The women and children and the sick were conveyed safely to Cawnpore. The fighting before Lucknow was very severe. On the 16th the enemy suffered enormously. The fight on that day was one of the severest ever witnessed. On the 19th the enemy were flying in great numbers from Lucknow, and the firing had nearly ceased. After the fight the bodies of 150 Sepoys were counted in one place. The latest accounts are not very intelligible. Two telegraph clerks had been murdered near Alumbagh, the news being thereby stopped. When Sir Colin Campbell left Cawnpore, on the 11th, he rode forty miles at a stretch. In his engagement he relied upon the artillery as much as possible, thereby avoiding an unnecessary loss of men. Nena Sahib, with all his men and baggage, had joined the rebels. The Gwalior contingent was at Callipee—divided counsels, it was stated, being the cause of their inaction. It was reported that the King of Delhi's son and two nephews, after being tried by military commissioners, had been shot. The London Daily News says that the rebels of Oude have placed a boy upon the throne, and keep him in state at Fyzabad, a city of 100,000 inhabitants, which is defended by a large fort, with a wall, and ditch, and round towers, and new intrenchments.

THE GREAT FIGHT AT LUCKNOW.

The Bombay correspondent of the London Times writes:

"Joining the main body (which had been collecting opposite Lucknow for some days), Sir Colin Campbell moved on toward the Alumbagh on Thursday the 12th. A little skirmishing took place, and a fort called Jellalabad, lying off the road, a short distance to the right, was taken and blown up. The Alumbagh attained, communications were opened with Sir J. Outram and Sir H. Havelock, at the Residency. Of the operations that ensued it is not easy to give an account that will be intelligible without the aid of a plan of the city. To reach the Residency by the direct road from Cawnpore the whole breadth of the city has to be traversed. It was desirable, therefore, to approach it, if possible, by a circuitous route, turning the city either on the right or the left. To the right, or east side, such a proceeding appeared practicable. There, between the suburb and the River Goomtee (on which the north side of the city rests) was a comparatively open space, between which and the Residency were no continuous streets or lines of buildings, but only some mosques, palaces, and other edifices and inclosures, capable, indeed, of being strongly held, but offering still less danger to an attacking force than the deep, narrow lanes of the centre of the city. Accordingly it was by this quarter that the Commander-in-Chief determined to advance upon the Residency.

THREE DAYS' WORK.

"On Sunday, the 15th, on leaving the main road at the Alumbagh, he marched across the country to his right till he came to the house and park of Dilkhoosha (Heart's Delight), abutting upon the canal, which forms the southern, as the Goomtee does the northern, boundary of the city. This inclosure, with that of the neighboring Martiniere College (founded by the eccentric old French adventurer, General Claude Martin), was carried by Sir Colin after a running fight of two hours. Later in the day the enemy, whom this flank movement may have taken by surprise, came across the canal and attacked us in force. After a struggle of an hour they were severely repulsed, and fell back over the canal. The open space of which I have spoken now lay just in front of our troops, with only the canal between it and them. An advanced picket at once cleared and occupied a position on the farther side of this barrier, and the operations of the day, during which the English loss in officers had been Lieutenants Mayne, of the Quartermaster-General's Department, and Wheatcroft, of the Carabineers, came to an end. On the following morning the Commander-in-chief took his whole force across the canal, and marched across the open space in his front straight upon Secunderbagh, the first in order of the inclosures to which I have alluded as covering the Residency in this quarter, and which was occupied in force. After a desperate struggle, in which the enemy 'suffered enormously,' this position was carried. Then a heavy cannonade was kept up for three hours on what the telegram, as printed, calls the 'Samuch,' and which I take to be either the barracks or one of the buildings lying directly, by the plan, between Secunderbagh and the mess-house; perhaps one of the Mahals, or palaces. 'It was carried at dusk, after one of the severest fights ever witnessed.' Next morning, the 17th, the mess-house, which is described as a very strong position, became the object of a heavy cannonade, which continued for several hours, till, at three in the afternoon, it was taken at the point of the bayonet. Thence the troops pushed on rapidly, till, before nightfall, they had occupied the Motee Mahal, a palace of the former reigning family, situated—like the Residency—on the river, and only a little way lower down. Here the Commander-in-chief was met by Outram and Havelock, who came out of their intrenchments to greet him, and the primary object of his expedition was attained. During these two days his loss in officers was six killed and thirteen wounded.

THE RESIDENCY ABANDONED?

"What was the loss of men we do not yet know. Nor have we as yet any accounts of what took place on the 18th and 19th, saving that on the latter day the enemy were flying from the city in great numbers, and that the firing had nearly ceased. On the 20th the women and the wounded were sent to the rear, and, if I interpret the telegram aright, which says, 'the garrison removed,' the Residency was abandoned. The same telegram then proceeds thus, 'On the 21st (loss?) severe. Two electric telegraph assistants were murdered near Alumbagh, further news thus being stopped.' The first of these two clauses I do not understand. The latter probably relates an atrocity of the rebels flying from the city. It is our latest news at present."

HOW THE PRINCES OF DELHI ARE TREATED.

A charge brought against Colonel Hogge, with reference to his public appearance in Delhi with the son of the King of Delhi, has produced the following letter from him, addressed to the Lahore Chronicle:

"Although I do not notice statements made by anonymous correspondents in newspapers, yet, as you have given my name in one of the editorials of your paper of the 14th November, as one of the officers who had been seen riding with one of the sons of the King on an elephant through the streets of Delhi, I send you for publication the following statement of the facts, leaving the truth of your charge of 'lacqueying the King's son about the streets of Delhi' to the judgment of your readers, especially of those who know me. Having been asked to accompany the commissioner on a visit to the King, I went, along with several officers, one of them holding high official rank in the army, to the house where he was confined. Before leaving, Jumma Bukt, a son of the King, apparently a lad of fifteen or sixteen years of age, asked the commissioner if he might be permitted to go out occasionally for an airing along with any gentleman who would take him, and as I was in the habit of going out every evening on an elephant, the commissioner asked if I should mind occasionally calling for him. I replied that if there were no other objections, I would do so, and as both the commissioner and the officers before alluded to appeared to think there could be none, I consented to call for him, and, accordingly, on two occasions, I took Jumma Bukt out; the first time, having nothing but a pad on the elephant, and being rather afraid that he might try and escape, I put him in front to prevent him slipping off; the second time, having a 'charjamab,' I sat in front, though I must say I considered it a matter of very little moment which seat I occupied. As to parading through the streets of the city, the first time I went out through the Cashmere gate to Ludlow Castle, and home when it was quite dusk through the Lahore gate and Chandnee Chowk; the second time I passed up the Chandnee Chowk, and returned by the Lall Khoa street, having been induced to go there by Jumma Bukt expressing a wish to show me the house he lived in. Without entering into the question of his guilt or innocence, but presuming that, if guilty, he would never have been allowed to accompany a British officer in public, I can only say that I found him a very intelligent lad. He gave me a good deal of information about the mutineers, their leaders, and their plans; and had I remained longer at Delhi I should probably have taken him out oftener; but having returned to Meerut on the 26th of October, I had no further opportunity."

ANECDOTE OF GENERAL HAVELOCK.

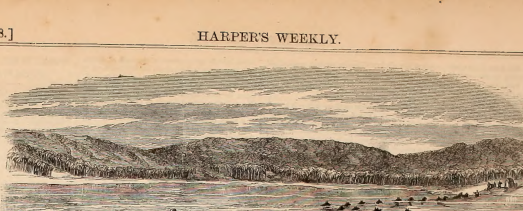
At the annual meeting of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, the Chairman told an anecdote connected with the loss of one of their ships. The Erin was lost in the Chinese seas. On board that ship—a passenger in private clothes—was Colonel (now General) Havelock. When the vessel struck, between twelve and one o'clock in the morning, half a gale of wind was blowing. Colonel Havelock sprung upon the deck, and seeing some confusion, said, in that sharp military tone that always arrests attention, "Men, be steady, and all may be saved; but if we have confusion, all may be lost. Obey your orders, and think of nothing else." They did so, and behaved in the most excellent manner. Next day all the lives on board were saved, together with the specie and the mails. On the shore, immediately afterward, Colonel Havelock mustered the men, and said, "Now, my men, let us return thanks to Almighty God for the great mercy He has vouchsafed to us." They all knelt down; he uttered a short prayer of thanksgiving; and as his (the Chairman's) informant, who was one of the officers of the ship, told him, the Colonel then rose up and walked away as coolly as if nothing had happened.

LIEUTENANT GIBBON'S EXPLORATIONS OF THE VALLEY OF THE AMAZON.

INDIANS FISHING ON THE CHAPARE.

On the 5th of July, 1851, in the small Peruvian town of Tarma, situated between the Andes range of mountains on the east and the lofty Cordillera chain on the west, two gallant officers of the American navy bade each other adieu. They had traveled together from Lima across the Cordillera, and now separated—the one, the late lamented Lieutenant Herndon, to explore the head-waters and main trunk of the Amazon; the other, Lieutenant Gibbon, to explore the Bolivian tributaries of the same mighty stream. As we have already given a brief outline of Lieutenant Herndon's narrative, we propose, in the present sketch, to follow the fortunes and personal adventure of Lieutenant Gibbon, in his travels through Southern Peru and Bolivia to the sources of the Madeira, and thence, along the course of that tributary, to where it pours its waters into the parent Amazon.

The southeasterly route selected by Lieutenant Gibbon leads him, at the outset, through a valley thickly populated with Quinchua Indians, past Jauja, to the town of Huancavelica, and the famous mountain of Cinnebar.



The mountain of Cinnebar, which rises almost from the midst of Huancavelica, contains the celebrated quicksilver mine of Santa Barbara. Lieutenant Gibbon gives an interesting account of his visit to this mine. "Climbing up the mountain," he says, "we arrive at a door-way, fifteen feet high and twelve wide, carved in sandstone. The entrance on the southwest side of the peak is like a railroad tunnel. Eternal glaciers guard this door-way. Icicles hang overhead, and sheets of ice are spread under our feet. Sooty-faced, rough-looking Indians trundle wheel-barrows loaded with quicksilver ore. We entered this dark hole about 600 feet below the top of the mountain. I presently heard a dreadful crash, which, I was informed, was the upper part of the mine falling in. A hollow sound was followed by a splash in the deep waters somewhere below; then came, suddenly, a strong smell of sulphuret of arsenic. A little further on I saw a pair of eyes through the darkness; they belonged to a little Indian boy standing on the side of the mine with a load of ore on his back. He had entered through a narrow passage, called 'Take off your horse,' on his hands and knees, and had raised a choking dust. After refreshing ourselves at a spring of water of 50° temperature, we passed into a plaza, where the market women sell to those men who seldom leave the mines. On one side of this plaza, by holding the torches over our heads we see a beautiful bridge, and, beyond it, a stairway, leading into utter darkness; on the other side a lake—the opposite shore not in sight, though the sound of a hammer floats over its smooth water. As we move along, among red, brick-colored columns, which support the great weight of the head, we see a dim torch by the side of a workman, seated with his hammer and chisel, cutting away and honeycombing the Andes. We were now about half-way through. Our guide here announced that we had taken the wrong road, and must go back some distance. After jumping our heads, and walking doubled up in a most tiresome position, with great want of fresh air, we finally stood up in the San Rosario Church, which is rotunda-shaped, with a height of 100 feet to the ceiling. The laboring Indian, who seldom leaves these dark regions, attends when the church-bell calls, and offers up prayer for protection from the dangers of the mine. After a walk of two hours we come into the fresh air on the north side of the mountain."

DESCENDING THE RAPIDS OF THE MAMORÉ.

The Cimentar is so narrowly separated by layers of sandstone that the peak of this hill may almost be called a solid mass of quicksilver ore. There are usually about one hundred and twenty Indian yer mines of Peru. The mine here is owned by the Government, and leased to a company, who keep secret its annual yield.

FORDING A RIVER IN BOLIVIA.

From Huancevelica to Huanta, a town of some two thousand inhabitants, and situated in a rich and fertile valley, due east; then to Ayacucho, and thence across the Apurimac to Cuzco, which towns were fully described in Nos. 8 and 9 of Harper's Weekly; thence to Puno, Lake Titicaca, and La Paz, the commercial metropolis of the republic.

The departments of Oruro and Potosi, lying to the southeast of La Paz, long since famed for their mineral wealth, have lost their reputation, from a failure to supply the great demands upon their resources. The city of Oruro, that once contained a population of 38,000, exclusive of Indians, but now only a total of 5687. Near the town there are twelve hundred and fifteen abandoned silver mines, and not less than two hundred gold mines, most of which contain water. Potosi, which lies between Oruro and the Argentine Confederation, once excited this envy of the world. In the Cerro de Potosi the silver ore was found rising from the top of the peak, and the vein was then followed below the water-line, at which point it was given up and a new one sought. Now the people are burrowing at the base of the peak, striving to strike the vein where it was left in its richness. But this is an expensive business, and some have abandoned the plan with heavy losses, after an unsuccessful entrance into the very core of the mountain. In the Cerro de Potosi and neighborhood there are men, women, and boys employed in extracting the metal. These who cut out the ore work very much as they please—that is, they cut without compass —which makes it dangerous for people inside when the proper supports are then destroyed by the ignorant Indian. The ore is carried out at both sides of the peak in bags of raw hide, slung over the backs of boys. It is then wheeled to the furnaces, where men break it up into bits, and women make small cakes of the dust. These cakes are laid in the bottom of a large iron grate, sufficiently open to allow heat to pass, and over them the ore is piled to the depth of three feet. A fire of coarse mountain grass is made underneath, and a strong draught carries the vapor from the heated cinder through a retort of earthen pipes, slipped one into the other, to a distance of five or six feet, where it condenses, and the quicksilver lodges in the floor. As soon as the ore becomes well heated, which generally occupies eight or ten hours, the doors of the furnace are closed, and for three or four hours the distillation continues. After this the quicksilver is swept into pots, washed in water, and dried, when it is ready for the market, and is sold at Huancevelica for one dollar the pound. It is sent off in all directions to the eli-

INDIANS OF THE MADEIRA.

DESCENDING THE MADEIRA.

twenty-six silver mines worked and eighteen hundred standing idle. Besides these, the Government accounts show that in the Provinces of Porco, Chayanta, Chicas, and Lepiz, there exist three thousand and eighty-nine silver mines which have been abandoned, and only sixty-five that are actually worked. There is a mint at Potosi, where the miner finds a ready market for silver and gold. It received and coined, in the year 1849, one million six hundred and twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars in silver, and eleven thousand nine hundred and eighty-four dollars in gold.

To the east of La Paz lies the department of Cochabamba, the capital of which bears the same name and contains a population of 30,396 souls. The city has a fine appearance—the houses being well built and neatly painted. As in La Paz, the chief article of trade here is the Cinchona bark. The streets of Cochabamba are laid out at right angles, and are always thronged with a busy people. On the south side of the main plaza stands a large cathedral, and opposite to it the palace occupies the whole side of the block. It is a remarkably handsome building, and much superior to the palace in Lima. In the centre of the plaza stands a fountain, fed by water from a snow peak on the ridge in sight. One would judge, from the appearance of the houses and stores, that, for an inland town, there was considerable wealth in Cochabamba. Its climate is genial and pleasant, but there are sudden changes in the weather which render it necessary to be careful in dress.

A BRAZILIAN DECREE.

The truly tropical climate of Bolivia—hot and moist—is only to be found in the department of Santa Cruz, to the southeast of Cochabamba. Here cotton, rice, sugar, vanilla, and indigo are produced. It must not, however, be supposed that a very extensive trade is carried on with the department of Santa Cruz, though a most decree population is found on its western border. When we look at the list of productions in that region of the country, we are struck with the independence of its inhabitants upon all external trade. A breakfast-table in Santa Cruz, constructed of beautiful cedar wood, is described as covered with white cotton cloth, silver plates and dishes, with silver cups, forks, and spoons; coffee, sugar, cream, butter, corn, and wheat bread, mutton, eggs, and oranges—all produced in the province. Beef is found on the pampas, game in the woods, and fish in the rivers. Potatoes and all the garden vegetables are raised upon the plantations. The arm-chair of the Creole is made of the ornamental cedra or mahogany tree. His eight guests may be seated, each one in a different species of mahogany. His Indian servants gather grapes, make wine, collect the tropical fruits and tobacco. The climate is such that horses roam about all the year, and there is no expense for stabling the animals. No barns are necessary for the protection of the master's harvests during a hard winter. His house may be as open as a shed. What little thin clothing and bedding his family requires are supplied by the soil, and are worked into fine cloth by the hands of Indians, who spin, weave, and sew. Silver he cares little about, except for table use, and gold ounces are melted into crosses and ear-rings for the Indian girls. The inhabitants of Santa Cruz are hence the most indolent people in the world; for within its hospitable climate few men exert themselves beyond what is absolutely necessary.

A sketch of the daily life of a family in Santa Cruz will further illustrate the genial independence of the people. Very early in the morning the Creole, getting out of bed, throws himself into a hammock with stretches herself upon a bunch near by, while the children are seated, with their legs under them, on the chairs—all in their night-dresses. The Indian servant girl now enters with a cup of chocolate for each member of the family. After that, she brings some coals of fire on a silver dish, and the wife lights a cigar for her husband, and then one for herself. Some time is spent in reclining, chatting, and regaling, after which the men slowly pull on their white cotton trowsers, woolen coat, and leather shoes, and walks to some near neighbors with whom he again drinks chocolate and smokes a cigar. At mid-day a small, low table is set in the middle of the room and the family go to breakfast. The wife sits next her husband, the children next her, and the slaves in a ring behind. Chupe and potatoes, with large pieces of meat, compose the first dish. The man helps himself, and throws his bones straight across the table to the dogs—the children dodging to give them a free passage. Following the general example, the children throw their bones, and the mother delights to avoid a concussion. The dogs are now fighting in the midst of which the second dish appears with small pieces of beef without bones. Next comes a dish with finely chopped beef; then beef soup, vegetables, and fruits; finally, coffee or chocolate. After breakfast the men pull off their trowsers and coat and lie down in the hammock. His wife lights him a cigar, and, having lit her own, finds her way back to bed. The dogs jump upon the chairs, for the fleas bite them on the ground, and the Indian girl, closing both doors and windows, takes the children out to play, while the rest of the family sleep. At 2 o'clock P.M. the churchbell rings to inform the world that the priests are at prayer. The man rises, yawns and gapes; the dogs get down, and, whimingly, stretch themselves; the wife shouts for "fire," with which to light a cigar for her husband and another for herself. At dinner, which takes place between 3 and 4 o'clock, the same food appears on the table as at breakfast, and the same interesting ceremonies are performed. After this meal, a siesta is brought into the house by an Indian servant. The master puts on a large pair of silver spurs, and commences the round of his daily duties. Halting there, he takes off his hat and calls out, "Buenas noches, señora!" The little negress at the door—they are generally beautiful—smile invitingly, and, while one lights a cigar for the gentleman, another mixes him a glass of lemonade. He touches his hat and rides off to another establishment, where the same scene is repeated. After spending the afternoon in this way he returns home, gives his horse to his Indian servant, throws off his clothes, and throws himself into his hammock. Chocolate and cigars are repeated, and the evening are sometimes spent in dancing and merriment. The people are extremely hospitable, and immediately after a human and social act of charity the stranger who chances to enter their home.

A traveler is enjoying the hospitality of a family; no alteration is made in the mode of living, except perhaps, that the dogs and horses are kept out of the house, and there is less dodging of fleas.

The produce of these rich Bolivian provinces are now exported to the Pacific coast, and thence to the four quarters of the world; but in a few years —possibly in a shorter time—this course of trade will be altogether changed. Steam navigations have proved that, by tributaries of the Paraguay and the La Plata, the heart of Bolivia can be reached from the Atlantic Ocean; and the results of Lieutenant Gibbon's expedition point out another communication with the sea through the rich territories of the Madeira and the Amazon.

Lieutenant Gibbon has now returned his overland journey. He has traveled from Lima, on the same route, a distance of nearly two thousand miles; and, starting from the rainfall beast, he pays a just tribute to the valuable qualities of the animal in these Andean regions. The horse may be driven into danger by the rider—with spur he may be made to break his neck—but, in ascending mountain bridle-path, he runs still not cross a dangerous place. You may whip him, but in vain; he will even turn round and kick you, if you have a higher order of intelligence than the horse. The mule is the only animal valuable as a beast of burden in these mountainous countries. The horse would fall, or be worried to death, where the mule passes with ease.

Vinchuta would be the eastern commercial emporium of Bolivia if foreign merchandise were not of being carried over the mountains, came up the rivers from the Atlantic. After the cotton goods, glass-ware, and cutlery of Europe and North America are disembarked at Cobija, on the Pacific, they are brought over the Cordillera, through the desert of Atacama, the barren plains of Oruro, and then over the Andes. After traversing these regions, which for more than eight hundred miles, all that part of the cargo not ruined by such a journey as the inland traffic arrives at the city of La Paz—an important commercial port this country, geocenes. There is very little trading going on here, because the outlet, at this one point, is such as described, and because the people seem to be ignorant of the advantages offered in them of a communication with the Atlantic direct.

Not far from Vinchuta is Coni Creek, where Lieutenant Gibbon and his company of Indians embarked. The current of Coni Creek is rapid, and in some places navigation is dangerous; but the canoes soon emerges into the broad waters of the Chapari, one of the largest affluents of the Mamore and the Madeira. At this point the lofty Andes are left behind, and have become almost indistinguishable in the distance.

Small-pox is very prevalent in this region, and remains frightful ravages among the Indians. The disease was brought hither by the Indians of the low country, who in turn had it from Brazil, and finally have it up the mountain to the city of Cochabamba. The unfortunate victim who is seized with this disease, if one of a superior race, is generally left by his comrades to die on the beach. Gibbon, while descending the Chapari, found there a man who had been thus deserted. The poor creatures had been lying exposed for seventeen days with the small-pox, and were quite recovered. A few canoes shaded them from the heat of the sun, and a man beat in upon them with a few bananas on beds of green leaves, with no one to attend to them. A knife was their only protection against the savage tiger. A family, too, was seen abandoned, and, one night, during the delirium of fever, rushed into the river. Its corpse was seen for a splash, but they never saw the sufferer more. On another occasion Lieutenant Gibbon passed an Indian stage in a hammock, but recognized the face stuck in a mud bank. The crew called to him, and took no humanan move, which was a certain sign that the wretched victim was alive. He had been left there with the small-pox to die, and was sending the Indian's epitaph. The flooded river had reached the under part of the hammock, and the hot sun was shining over it. Gibbon, with a feeling of pathos, Lieutenant Gibbon wanted to see what could be done for the man, the Indians shook their heads, and pulled rapidly by. The first symptoms of this loathsome disease are fever, with pain in the back, which lasts three days; then the breathing becomes anxious, with inflamed lips. At the end of six days the disease has attained its height, and then the can of life or death is decided. After six days more the patient begins to bathe, if he is well enough. This is the course the destroyer takes when the sufferer lies out in the woods, without medical aid or shelter from the weather. The Indians are at a loss for a remedy to the small-pox. They generally accept it in the light of a punishment, and wait patiently till it passes away.

An Indian boat's crew on these waters is a curiosity in its way. The men elect their own captain, and the most active, energetic, and powerful man is generally chosen. Should he prove incapable or misbehave, he is deposed, and another is in the seat of the gubbonan selected over him. Every man obeys his orders, and is particular in his attention to the captain's wishes. Should he rather a second captain, helps to steer the canoe, and encourages the men to keep good time with their paddles by stamping his foot. The captain only stamps his foot on particular occasions, when the crew work unusually well or they are passing their whole strength when he speaks to them. These captains obtain the name of patrones, and attend to the want of the person who employs them. Every man does his duty according to the usages of the service. They all have their turn at steering or baling out the boat; and while one or two secure the canoe, a number of others run to look for wood, bring fuel for a fire, and cut cane for a house. After their patron is properly attended to the Indian cooker round the fire, over which a pot of water is properly hung. They then skin the monkeys, and divide the small pieces, yield most in the pot, with morsels of salted meat. After this they lie down, and, with their feet to the hot coals, bear themselves to exercise their talk, a nap. One, as cook, stays awake to attend to the boiling pot. The meal over, they all rise to start up, and each man partakes of the repast by forming his fingers into the shape of a spoon, and dipping into the dish. Having breakfasted, they talk, joke, and sing in the most lively manner. At noon they are extremely merry, and will not scarcely be taken by surprise. At daylight they begin at their paddles, and work best in the morning and evening.

The Chapori widens as it approaches the Mamore. Alligators are seen there in great numbers, and are sometimes insured by the Indians, as the following incident goes to show: A man in the canoe of Lieutenant Gibbon's party, in a mud beach, with his head on the surface of the water. And at once the monster darted forward, took a hide rope, and after making a noose, hung it on the end of a pole, and waited for the animal to put its head in so that he could grasp both pole and rope in one hand. He now lowered himself into the river, in which he remained with his chin just out of water. The noose was carried by the pole near the animal's head, and suddenly, with the quickness of the alligator, who seemed to be aware that doubtful of results. After a while, the beast floated down, and the noose was drawn tight. It was evident that he was swimming away. Presently the alligator's head appeared above water, and he made a spring in the same place. The Indian, still nearly in the water, with the noose, did nearly in the same manner, and, with a dexterous stroke, killed the animal by the back. The animal in question was not of a large size, for the noose was improperly fastened, he succeeded in getting it between his teeth, severing the rope with a single bite. The natives of this region are very much terrified by the alligators, and never use the back-bone—are eaten by the Indians, who also make buttons, beads, fancy knicks, etc., of the teeth.

After a couple of days' travel from the junction of the Chapari with the Mamore, the banks of the latter are approached. On either bank of the river are stretched extensive pampas, which have the appearance of cleared land, but are in fact the work of forest trees. The Indians of this district are known as Canichanas. The river at this point is wide, and is many feet deep, and it may be that out of this fact grew the legend of an Amazonian race of women. Lieutenant Gibbon saw no such people, nor even heard of them. Even these weapons are seldom carried except on long voyages. Nothing of the kind was seen. The Mojos Indians are civil, quiet, and peaceable, and seldom quarrel among themselves. They are skilful hunters, and excellent fishers, and fish masters.

The region of which we are now speaking is an inviting one to the zoologist. The different habits of the bird kind, from the ostrich to the most delicately-winged humming bird, are here seen with the greatest interest. The ostrich lays its eggs in the thick grass on the banks of the river, eggs will fill a man's hat, and weigh as much as a couple of pounds each. The ostrich lays a great number, perhaps as many as fifty or one in a space that it is very certain one bird can not cover with all its efforts. The heat of the sun is relied on for the hatching is over and the young have left the nest. The ostrich is so wild that it is difficult to get at, and some well acquainted with its habits. When going at full speed across the plain, his head is held erect like the snake-bird of the river Nile, and his neck resembles the boiler, and beautiful rich feathers, which stand out straight, flutter behind. The great speed with which he passes through the level country, and his general appearance, remind one very much of a distant locomotive with its flags and many train attached. The Indians never hunt them down, but only shoot them when they come within their originally worshiped them. It is estimated that in this region there are over a thousand varieties of the singing birds, which are remarkable for their beauty, and insects.

Tigers abound in great numbers, and attack the wild cattle of the pampas. The animal crouches in the grass awaiting his prey, and when a herd of bulls chance to pass, he will leap upon one, and, catching him by the ear, fasten his fore-claws accurately in the eyes, and his teeth deep in the neck or shoulder. His head is then just behind the horns of the bull, and his tail hangs down by the side of the fore-leg. In this position the tigery commences to cut into the great vessels of the neck, while the bull runs through the pampa, his head high up in the air, bellowing with pain. Unless the herd, who follow to help, gather round and attack the tiger, he soon brings the prey upon his knees. The suffering animal bleeds to death surrounded by his kind, while the panting tiger prowls about in a short distance, knowing that when the bull dies the cattle will disperse, and he can then enjoy his feast. These tigers sometimes attack a man when he is alone, but seldom when in company. Few persons escape when engaged in the deadly struggle with him. The Indians usually go in a body, with spears, who attract the animal's attention and prevent him seeking an engagement with the man.

The tapir, or lizard elk, is found on these plains, among the banks of the river. It is called gran bestia by the Spaniards. Its color is iron gray, with a short coat of coarse hair. The flesh of this animal in some respects is curious. The hoof is divided as the horse's, but not like his. In the middle of the fore-foot there is a fourth toe; and the hinder-foot is divided as the joint like those of the llama and elephant. The strength of the tapir is very great. He is sometimes lassoed by the wood, but not easily, however, he have the rein of the lasso fastened to the saddle, for the animal will manage them or four horsemen with ease. It can only be successfully taken by ball or arrow. Though the tapir is harmless, the Indians are exceedingly careful in their treatment of him as an animal's strength.

The trade of Vinchuta is extremely limited from the fact that, instead of seeking communication with the Atlantic by the Madeira River, the people of the plains have been accustomed to look into immense cost and trouble, and export their produce by the same circuitous route. The time will soon arrive when the productions of Bolivia will be carried in the Amazon and Madeira. Lieutenant Gibbon's expedition has proved that the navigation of a Brazilian trader who, with his vessel and complement of men, was about to return to the Amazon. In one of these he secured a passage, and once more floated on the Mamore.

After passing Exaltation and the Brazilian Fort of Conception, at the mouth of the Itenez River, the Indians tributary is approached. The difficulty of navigation from cascades and rapids is here increased, and the river, which becomes narrower, is obstructed by a portage. The first falls encountered—the Ghaçabetre—are composed of huge rocks and irregular boats; but they are no sooner cleared than the best of another and steeper rapid, called Guajara-mirim. Here the navigation of the Mamore is completely obstructed, and a boat must be hauled for three hundred yards over the land through the small channels, down an inclined shelf of about twelve feet fall. The main channel is on the Bolivian side, where a rock called upon feet high by the swiftness of the current. Next are the Isles de Pau D'Arco, about twenty feet, which takes its name from quantities of wild banana-trees formerly discovered in the vicinity. A Brazilian fortress on the Pau D'Arco islands, with a fall of fifteen feet in one hundred yards; and two miles below them are the Falls of Girao, two miles beyond which is the mouth of the Beni River; and at this point we arrive at the extreme northern corner of Bolivia, and the head of the Madeira tributary.

The succession of falls at the head of the Madeira River presents difficulties of that every kind. Lieutenant Gibbon passed them with much difficulty, and was frequently compelled to haul himself and crew. The most terrible are the Teotoro, where the fall is over fifteen feet, ten of which are in a perpendicular body of forty-five degrees. The boat here was placed upon rollers, transported four hundred and fifty over a hill, and then launched into the river below. After this, the last and most perilous of seventeen cataracts, the navigation is not interrupted for 200 miles. Here are, in a few months of San Antonio, five miles lower down; but they can be passed without disencumbering the baggage.

The Indians, who inhabit the Brazilian side of the river and those of the Madeira, are called Guarayus; but not much is known of their habits. Though not warlike, they are by no means easily civilized. The boys of some of the tribes in this region are remarkable for large bellies, and swell themselves up to a prodigious size. The Mundrucus, rarely heads of hard wood round their necks, and wear bracelets of the same material above the elbow, and round the ankles. All wear their hair long, and cut square all in front. In large houses in their own country they carry pieces of a stick of wood, and through a hole in the nose a quill is pushed, and the lively young fellow puffs out fierent-colored feathers, gives them a mustached appearance. These people are nearly all of the same height and figure, but differ much in the features of the face. Some have thick lips, flat noses, and long, straggling eyebrows, like the Chinese. The former are very ugly, but a few of the latter are tolerably good-looking.

The whole region, on either bank of the Madeira, from the Bolivian territory to the village of Borda, near the Amazon, is inhabited almost solely by savages. But the Brazilians are ascending the Madeira gradually, in their southernmost extremities, and the Spaniards are on their northwest descent to meet the Brazilians. The movement on both sides is rapid, and it is probable that before a close upon each flank of the savage, who now occupies but a narrow strip of land between the contending hosts from Santa and Portugal.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER V.

"Is there a heart that never loved
Nor felt woman's sigh?"

If there be such a heart, it is not in the breast of a Frenchman. Every true Man-eater is sensible of an amorous temperament: he can be indeed scarcely fond of a lady but he can be fond of the admiration of acquaintance of a widow. For further particulars inquire within.

The dignified serenity of Gloucester Place, Portman Square, is not to be long the intrusion of a new inhabitant. A house in that favored locality, which had for several months maintained the solemn stillness and the dread repose" which appertain to dwellings that are to be let or sold, was lighted up, and from the upper part into that exuberant and aggressive life which irritates the nerves of a London neighborhood. Blinds have been removed from the windows—the walls have been cleaned down and painted—the street-door repaired a lively green—servants have gone in and out. The observant ladies (single ones) in the house immediately next the new tant. Sometimes she comes alone; sometimes she is accompanied by a gentleman probably her son. Who can she be? what is she? what is her name? her history? has she a right to settle in Gloucester Place? Interesting questions. The detective police of London is not peculiarly vigilant; but its effects are exhausted on the voluntary efforts of unmarried ladies. The newcomer was a widow; her husband had been in the army; she was left with a small income; and she had been left in straitened circumstances with an only child. The husband was one that she had unexpectedly come into a fortune—on the strength of which she had removed from Pimlico into Gloucester Place. Ah, but—but—the preparations completed—one Monday afternoon the widow, accompanied by her son, came to settle. The next day a footman in genteel livery (brown and orange) appeared at the door. Then, for the first time, the ladies in front and butcher called regularly. On the following Sunday the lady and her son attended church.

No reader will be at a loss to discover in the new tenant of No.—Gloucester Place, the wife and family of Captain Darrell. Nevertheless, the letter for that lady which Darrell had intrusted to his young cousin, Lionel Haughton, on board a cruisal languor, claimed the right to provide for her comfortable and honorable subsistence; and Haughton, with the sanction of his wife, had wisely placed quarterly to her account at Mr. Darrell's banker's. The additional allowance of £1200 was already there deposited in her name, in order to enable her to furnish any residence in a manner suitable to her position. Haughton, Mrs. Haughton, therewith, had removed to Gloucester Place.

She is seated by the window in her front drawing-room—surveying with proud though dignified look the tasteful furniture that is there surrounded. A very winning countenance—lovely eyes, dark, remarkably soft, yet can be very quick and peculiar, but their expression is chastened by a gentle kindly mouth; and over the whole face that attitude, that sweetness the dress itself, is diffused the unmistakable simplicity of the manners, modesty, refinement. No doubt Mrs. Haughton has her tempers, and her vanities, and her little harmless feminine weaknesses, which could not be hidden from an her presence that you were with an affectionate, high-principled woman, good woman, who could not have the refinements of tone and manner which stamp the high-bred gentlewoman of conventional life. Mrs. Haughton had received from an imperfect third-rate education; but she was saved from the vulgarity by the natural unaffectable grace of person and music of voice—even when she said or did things that a well-bred people do not say or do; and there was an absence of intelligence in those quick hazel eyes that made you sure that she was honest, and that what she uttered what was silly.

Mrs. Haughton turned from the interior of the room to the open window. She is on the look-out for her son, who has gone to call on Captain Darrell's family, and who is long detained by this time. She begins to get a little fidgety—somewhat cross. While her husband, with very common wisdom—two hands, in yellow kid gloves, he must move under the laws of Mrs. Haughton suddenly blushes and draws in her head. Too late! the cabriolet has stopped—a gentleman and a young lady alight from the vehicle.

"O Dear, dear!" murmurs Mrs. Haughton, "I do think it is the most provoking thing people born to be tempted—my temptations have been immense! He is getting out—he knocks—I can't say, now, that I am not at home—very awkward! I wish Lionel were here! What does he mean—neglecting his own mother, and leaving her a prey to tempters?"

While the footman is responding to the summons, Mrs. Haughton has recovered herself. Mrs. Haughton had incurred that gentleman's acquaintance. In one of her visits to her new house while it was in the hands of the decorators, her mind being much absorbed in the consideration whether her drawing-room curtains should be chintz or damask—just as she was crossing the street, she was all but run over by a gentleman's cabriolet. The horse was hard-mouthed, going at full speed. The driver pulled up just in time; but the wheel grazed her dress, and though she ran back instinctively, yet, when she was safe on the pavement, the fright overpowered her nerves, and she clung to the street-post almost fainting. Two or three passers-by hurriedly gathered round her; and the driver, looking back, and muttering to himself—"Not the first thing—gently dressed—lady-like—French shawl—may have means—worth reaping"—quickly, coolly descended and hastened to offer apologies, with a respectful hope that she was not injured.

Mrs. Haughton answered somewhat tartly, but being one of those good-hearted women who, apt to be rude, are extremely sorry for it the moment afterward, she wished to repair any hurt to his feelings caused by her first impulse; and, when, renewing his excuses, he offered his arm over the crossing, she did not like to refuse. On gaining the side of the way on which her house was situated, she had recovered sufficiently to blush for having accepted such familiar assistance from a perfect stranger, and somewhat to falter in returning thanks for his politeness.

Our gentleman, whose estimate of his attractions was not humble, secured the slightest check and faltering voice to the natural effect produced by his appearance; and he himself admiring very much a handsome knocker on her wrist, which he deemed a favorable prognostic of "tin," he watched her to her door, and soon his groom in the course of the evening, to make discreet inquiries in the neighborhood. The result of the inquiries tended him to repair with more punctuality the acquaintance thus begun. He contrived to learn that the name which Mrs. Haughton usually visited the house, and to pass by Gloucester Place at the very nick of time. His bow was recognized, respectfully, acquiescence—a bow that asked "how much further?" But Mrs. Haughton's bow responded—seemed to declare "not at all!" The stranger did not adventure more that day; but a day or two afterward he came again into Gloucester Place on foot. On that occasion Mrs. Haughton was with her aunt, and the gentleman could not succeed to perceive her. The next day he returned, she was then alone, and just as she gained her door he advanced—"I beg you will pardon my freedom, madam; but if I am rightly informed, I have the honor to address Mrs. Charles Haughton!"

The lady bowed in surprise.

"Ah, madam, your unnamed husband was one of my most particular friends."

"You don't say so!" Mrs. Haughton, and looking more attentively at the stranger. There was in his dress and appearance something that she thought very stylish—"a particular friend of Charles Haughton's was sure to be stylish—he was a man of fashion." Besides she loved the poor Captain's memory—her heart warmed to any "particular friend of his."

"Yes," resumed the gentleman, seeing the advantage he had gained, "though I was considerably his junior, we were very intimate—excuse that familiar expression—in the Hussars together—"

"The Captain was not in the Hussars, Sir; he was in the Guards."

"Of course he was; but I was saying in the Hussars, together with the Guards, there were some very fine fellows—very fine—he was one of them. I could not succeed in paying my respects to the widowed lady of so fine a fellow. I know it is a liberty, ma'am, but you see, I am People who know me well—and I have a large acquaintance—are kind enough to excuse my way. And to think that without knowing where to find you, I bought out of Lord Bolton's stud—[200 guineas, ma'am, said—cheap—[which I actually take the life of Charles Haughton's lovely relict. If my body else had been driving that brute, I shudder to think what might have been the consequences; but I have a watch and chain strength in a vulgar qualification—you see that when it saves a lady from perishing, how can one be ashamed of it? But I am detaining you. Your own house, Mrs. Haughton?"

"Yes, Sir, I have just taken it, but the workmen have not finished. I am not yet settled here."

"Charming situation! My friend left a son, I believe? In the army himself?"

"No, Sir; but he wishes it very much."

"Mr. Darrell, I think, could get him a cadetship."

"What! you know Mr. Darrell, that most excellent, generous man!" All we have we owe to him."

The gentleman abruptly turned aside—wisely for his subsequent face as that praise might have startled Mrs. Haughton.

"Yes, I know him once. He has had many a fee out of my family. Excellent lawyer—excellent man—and rich as a Jew. I should like to see my old friend's son, ma'am, he must be a monstrous handsome with such parents!"

"Oh, Sir, very like his father. I shall be proud to present him to you."

"Ma'am, I thank you. I will have the honor to call—"

And thus is explained how Jasper Losely has knocked at Mrs. Haughton's door—has walked up her stairs—has seated himself in her drawing-room, and is now edging his chair somewhat nearer to her, and throwing into his voice and looks a degree of admiration, which has been sincerely kindled by the aspect of her elegant apartments.

Jessica Haughton was not one of those women, and such there be, who do not like a gentleman is making up to them. She knew perfectly well, that, with a very little encouragement, her visitor would declare himself a suitor. Nor, to speak truth, was she quite insensible to his handsome person, nor quite unmoved by his flatteries. She had her weak points, and vanity was one of them. She conceived she, poor lady, the slightest suspicion that Jasper Losely was not a personage whose attentions might flatter any woman. Though he had not even announced a name, but, pushing aside the footman, had announced in a loud voice himself as a friend, he had been a first cousin; though he had not uttered a syllable that could define his station, or his claim to acquaintance, he had the air, the fancy, still Mrs. Haughton implicitly believed that he was a man of the first fashion. And she, who had glittered round her Charlie in the earlier morning of his life, ere he had sold out of the Guards, and married her, she, who was not a lord, or an honorable at least, and was even (I blush to write it) a trifle over the age at which it might not be an excellent thing for her dear Lionel if she could prevail on herself to procure for him Colonel Morley's powerful and influential and brilliant father-in-law—rich, noble, civilized, fashionable, and childless—childless! but the temptation was growing more and more luxurious! when suddenly the door opened, and in sprang Lionel, crying out, "Mother! my own, Colonel has come with me on purpose to—"

He stopped short, seeing hard at Jasper Losely. That gentleman advanced a few steps, extending his hand, but came to an abrupt halt on perceiving Colonel Morley standing behind the door-way. Not that he feared recognition—the last time they had met, by night, in the street, owing to the properties of the object on which it shines. Strange to say, it was the mere sight of the real live colonel, and not of the mock, fine gentleman shrink and collapse. Though Jasper Losely was dressed in the height of the magnificent man—one of royal Nature's Life guardsmen—though confident this from no vulgar or plebeian mien could defy the criticism of the strictest martinet in polite costume, no sooner did this colonel, with his cocked hat, and clad in garments innocent of buckram, but guilty of wrinkles—appear on the threshold than Jasper Losely felt himself to be a cad, as if he had been suddenly reduced to five feet two, and had bought his coat out of an old cheberman's bag.

Without appearing even to see Mr. Losely, the Colonel, in his own, his stern, quiet way, shut toward Mrs. Haughton, had, with what is proverbially called "a look and a nod," taken the whole of that impostor's superb personnel into calm survey, had read him through and through, and decided on the spot, with conviction that the slightest hesitation—"a lady-killer and a sharper."

Quick as breathing had been the effect thus severally produced on Mrs. Haughton's visitors, which it has taken me so many words to describe, so quick that the Colonel, without any apparent pause of thinking, had entered the room, and, reference Lionel left uncompleted, and says, as he bows over Mrs. Haughton's hand, "Come on purpose to visit your mother, my boy! Mrs. Charles Darrell's widow, a young friend's mother."

Mrs. Haughton, as I am sorry, Colonel Morley, I am very much flattered. And you, too, knew the poor dear Captain; 'tis so pleasant to think that he had friends who remember him still. This gentleman, also, was a particular friend of Charles's."

The Colonel had somewhat small eyes, which moved with habitual slowness. He lifted those eyes, let them rest upon Jasper, and with stood in the middle of the room, with one hand still upon Lionel's shoulder, the other letting the eyes rest there while he spoke, repeated,

"Particular friend of Charles Haughton's—the only one in my family who ever thought so—never had the honor to see before."

Jasper bore, with consistency in other virtues, certainly did not lack courage, made a strong effort at self-possession, and without replying to the Colonel, turned toward Lionel, who been directly addressed to himself, said, in his most rollicking tone, "Lionel, Mrs. Haughton, Charles was my particular friend, but"—lifting up his eye-glass—"but this gentleman was," dropping the eye-glass and looking at Mrs. Haughton, as I suppose. Then advancing to Lionel, and giving his hand, with a condescending air, "Your image of your father, I declare! I was saying to Mrs. Haughton how much I should like to see my boy—you have not yet seen him, ma'am—and you should go to the play together. Oh, ma'am, you may trust me, I'll take care—I'll take care you should see LIFE." Here Jasper tipped Lionel one of those knowing winks with which he was accustomed to fascinate the youngsters of his friends of Mr. Poole, and hurried on: "But in the meanwhile you will, of course, permit and approve. We'll fix an evening for it, when I have the honor to call again. Good-morning, Mrs. Haughton. Good-morning, Colonel. [Aside, one]—Ah, we shall be great friends, I guess! You must let me take you out in my cab—teach you to handle the ribbons, eh? 'Gad my old friend Charles was a whip. Ha! ha! Good-day, good-day!"

Not a muscle had moved in the Colonel's face during this speech, during the whole time that Jasper had bowed himself out, Mrs. Haughton conveying and ringing the bell for the footman to open the street-door. But the next word (and, as man of the world, Colonel Morley was consummate) again raised those small, slow eyes —this time toward her face—and dropped the words—

"My old friend's particular friend is—not bad-looking, Mrs. Haughton!"

And to lively and pleasant," returned Mrs. Haughton, with a slight rise of color, but no other sign of embarrassment. "It may be a nice acquaintance for Lionel."

"Mother!" cried that ungrateful boy, "you are not quite seriously. I think he looks a fool odious. If he were not my father's friend, I should say he was."

"What, Lionel?" asked the Colonel, blandly "was what?"

"Snobbish, Sir."

"Lionel, how dare you!" exclaimed Mrs. Haughton, and, raise vulgar words boys do pick up at school, Colonel Morley!"

"We must be careful that they do not pick up worse than words at school, my dear madam. You will forgive me, but Mr. Darrell was so exceptionally—of course, with your permission—commended this young gentleman by responsible care and guidance—so openly confided to me his views and intentions, that perhaps you would do me the very great favor to let me, during Lionel's stay with his own wishes, the acquaintance—of that very good-looking person."

Mrs. Haughton pouted, but kept down her rising temper. The Colonel began to sew her.

"My dear," continued the man of the world, "may I inquire the name of my old friend's particular friend?"

"His name—upon my word I really don't know it. Perhaps he left his card—ring the bell, Lionel."

"You don't know his name, yet you know him, ma'am, and would allow your son to see him without—pardon me—but I beg you take such sandpiers; but even ladies the most cautious, mothers the most watchful, are exposed to—"

"Immense temptations—that is—to—I—I understand you perfectly, my dear Mr. Haughton."

The footman appeared. "Did that gentleman leave a card?"

"No, ma'am."

"Did not you ask his name when he entered?"

"Yes, ma'am, but he said he would announce himself."

When the footman had withdrawn, Mrs. Haughton exclaimed, pinesing, "I have been to blame, Colonel—I see it. But Lionel will tell you how it came to know the gentleman—the gentleman who nearly run over me, Lionel, and then spoke so kindly about your dear father."

"Oh, that is the person! I supposed so," said Lionel, kissing his mother, who was ecstened to burst into tears. "I can explain it all now, Colonel Morley. Any one who says a kind word about my father warms my mother's heart to him at once. Is it not so, mother dear?"

"And long be it so," said Colonel Morley, with graceful earnestness; "and may such be my passport to your favor, Mrs. Haughton. Charles was my old school-fellow—a little boy to him I and have been in the sixth form; and pardon me if I add that if that gentleman were over Charles Haughton's particular friend, he could scarcely have been a very wise one. For, unless his appearance greatly belie his years, he must have been a mere infant in boy when Charles Haughton left Lionel fatherless."

Here, in the delicacy of tact, seeing that Mrs. Haughton shrunk from all the subject, and seemed aware of her imprudence, the Colonel gave with a request—cheerfully granted— that Lionel might be allowed to come to breakfast with him the next morning.

THE REDDY BOX.

(concerning which more ons LATER HEREIN.

"WHEN Alice had listened to my account of the adventure of Fare Bill and his companion with the basket, she could not help but feel the opposition, the confessing that on several occasions, at intervals of a month, she had walked in her sleep, and wakened to find herself at a distance from the bed even in another room. She had concealed her knowledge of this habit as to avoid giving me needless anxiety.

"It over happened two weeks or more after our interview with Fare Bill when Mr. Wood went to me that the burglar had called upon him, and gave information that he had discovered the hiding-place of Black Jack; that the wallet taken from the latter was in possession of the latter; but would not be given up unless another thousand was added to the reward. I retired to bed that night well satisfied with my progress in my work.

"In the small hours of the night I was awakened by a sensation of voices in high altercation. It seemed to proceed from Mrs. Maxwell's, and I could distinguish the ranging and nasal voice of that woman, always the good old lady in a style that shocking, if applied to the widow of a clergyman. Supporting my head on my hand, and endeavoring to settle my disagreeable and annoyed me, I felt a violent desire to step into the house and administer a rebuke to the woman. But I resolved to wait for a fitting conduct. To be better satisfied in my opinion of him, and finding it impossible to sleep while the noise continued, I went up into the attic, or third story, where, as the houses were very small, all of the doors happened to be open in either house one could hear loud talking on the first floor. I had not been seated there more than a few minutes before I heard the footsteps of the servant girl, and the good lady, 'with your novels and your beer, smoking, drinking, and loading the whole day and half the night, when other men of your size are making fortunes at an honest business!'

"The reply was indistinct, but I approved the sentiments of the Rev. Mrs. Maxwell, and felt a violent indignation against John.

"'Where is the money you got for the Canby job? Look at him, I guess; none of it came to me. Or perhaps that shoemaker Mary Jane—I'll make a kinder mother for her if ever I get within reach. She might as well keep away from you, John.'

"Although the proposition to stick a knife into Mary Jane was silly, I had not the least doubt, was an idle conceit, was too severe, I pardoned it as a mother's indignation.

"She's better at that game than you are, Mother Bridy,' replied the son; 'and if you try it on she'll serve you as she did Bill Jones. You'll get enough from her; they didn't come out even, Bill and Jones, Reddy.'

"From the sounds which followed I was obliged to think that the good Mrs. Maxwell, exasperated by the language and behavior of her son, had flown at his throat. After a short struggle came a voice—

"There, mother, that will do.'

"Then followed a succession of sobs, groans, and 'Oh my's.' The old lady appeared to be in despair of bringing her obdurate son to a sense of his wickedness. But the latter recovered breath she changed her tone, and seemed to be quite cheerful. John had said something conciliatory which I did not hear.

"'Ah!' said the old lady, 'never call me by that endearing name again, as it appears that this fool, Liston, and his silly woman, are the debtors. I could have thought as much. But is Bill sure of the money? Is he sure it is not by a sharp, you know, for all he looks so proper and good?'

"'Bah! am I a fat? If it hadn't been for that lawyer, Mr. Darrell, Fare Bill would have got the whole of the gold. Lucky for me that he did not.'

"The language of Mrs. Maxwell and her son gradually declined, notwithstanding the proximity of Mrs. Maxwell and her son. I took it for granted that on the morrow the tattling old woman would betray her knowledge of me and my name, and that I was not disappointed. When I came home to dinner from my office on the following day Mrs. Maxwell had entertained her with a prolix account of my services in favor of her, who had made a fortune in the East Indies. That she had come to the rescue of him for several years; that she was afraid he might be dead; that she had been the benefactress, out of her revered husband, the Rev. Dr. Maxwell and had been the name of Livingston, signing himself Sam. S. Livingston, also thought was a disgrace to the family, as Maxwell was a most respectable respectable old Presbyterian.

"Not daring to let Alice into the knowledge of Mrs. Maxwell's real character, I told her to hear all that the old lady might have to say, and report it to me. The next day Mrs. Maxwell showed several letters, purporting to be written by my son in the first years of his sea life. These were signed 'S. S. Livingston.' Alice begged to have the letters to show me, as she thought they that this Livingston might be in fact the owner of the property. The letters were at Calcutta, at Batavia. The old lady would not trust them out of her sight. A day or two later, during my absence, on usual, she produced a letter, purporting to have been written at Amsterdam, in which her son, Livingston (the Amsterdam Jack Bundy) informs her that he is waiting for a vessel to come on to New York, but writes by the way of London; that as he shall shortly have money enough in gold 'and valuables'—the language of my professional friend—to make them all rich, he does brother John, and himself, quite comfortable for life.

"That evening I went to a number of stationers' shops in Brooklyn, and purchased single sheets of letter-paper of every variety. I told Mrs. Maxwell Alice, and called her attention to their quality, texture, and the watter's stamp. She immediately, having a quick memory of names, identified one of these sheets as the same in quality and make with the paper and the first pretended son. Alice was dreadfully shocked when it flashed across her mind that the letters were forged. I had much trouble to exact from her a promise that she would continue, for a time, to treat Mrs. Maxwell as a friend, and to visit her daily.

"A day or two after, as I expected, the old woman came in, while I was at breakfast, with a morning paper in her hand. The tears were streaming from her eyes. She burst into a paroxysm of grief, and, with floods of blubbered the heart of poor Alice, notwithstanding her knowledge of her friend. She at length recovered herself, and she showed us my standing advertisement, and begged me to write a letter for her to the person advertising. She said that she was afraid that which that person had found must be her son's; that she remembered, in one of his letters, to have had a very curious box of ebony which he had made to carry gold and 'other valuables' in, at Batavia: that she was afraid the letter might be lost, but she would look diligently for it.

"I congratulated the good lady on the hope that possibly she might recover the property. Day after day, for more than a week, she pretended to have searched for the letter, which, it is to be seen, it must be got up in unmistakable East Indian fashion. Hence the delay. At length, however, it was produced, and would have dafied the scrutiny of much abler detectives than Alice and myself. The date, post-marks, texture of the letter, written on India paper, stains of salt-water, and a remarkable appearance of age in the ink and the creases, were unexceptionable. I concluded that this document must be the work of Mr. Langdon, alias Fare Bill. It contained a good description of the cask, in which the owner intended to convey his fortune from Batavia to New York, and also contained a brief eulogy of one Smith, a shipmate and bosom friend, who was to return home with it.

"W——d agreed with me in believing that this complicated piece of forgery must have been invented and a crime out by the sui disant Langdon. That ingenious person had intimated to W——d that he thought it not at all unlikely that some clew might be found to the real ownership of the treasure, and he believed that Mrs. Maxwell could be persuaded to give up the papers which he took from the pocket of the sailor, they would be found to contain important information. Fare Bill admitted that he had seen two papers; that one of them was a parchment, and might have been sealed or a will; but that the other was certainly a letter. He had casually read the direction, but had forgotten it.

"Although it was unnecessary for the completion of the evidence, W——d, in order the more thoroughly to deceive the forger, suggested to him the propriety and convenience of a personal interview between ourselves and Black Jack. This was of course refused, as it would have identified him with John Smith. At this point the whole affair came to a dead lock; the forger and his chum afraid to move for fear of some mistake or accidental discovery, and we on our part waiting for the slow but sure operation of natural cupidity to bring the matter to a termination.

"I was quite willing to give the required two thousand dollars for the papers, because I was sure that they would lead to a solution of the problem.

"I was not so sanguine. Let us wait, was W——d's view and he was not yet finished the net in which, meaning to catch a fortune, they will be entangled.'

"In compliance with the wishes of the good Mrs. Maxwell, whose daily lamentations over the miserable fate of her dear son Livingston were becoming tiresome, I addressed a letter to the advertiser of the treasure, that is to myself.

"This letter the good lady signed with a trembling hand and many tears. It was a touching and pathetic epistle, setting forth the history of her dear son, supposed to have been killed; giving a good description of the casket, and ending with a long and touching obituary of the lamented Smith, 'the friend of my dear son.' I took pleasure in composing this letter, Alice looking out the while to see me engaged in so gross a piece of deception, and the mercenary Mrs. Maxwell panting for the moment when the beauty and innocence of her dear boy, at the time when he ran away from home, should be Recovered and adored, but too stern and unbending father.

"After the departure of the old woman with the letter, I explained to my wife the necessity of canceling from our neighbors the fact that I was myself the advertiser. It would have been necessary to let them know our position, in order to give opportunity of being on an injury. Alice was much troubled, and urged me to write a note which I sent to do so as soon as we could find a tenant who would take the house off our hands.

"This was not the only reason of my conduct, but it was sufficient for my wife, who feared nothing so much as an expose and scandal. Meanwhile, I saw that Mrs. Maxwell, knowing that I was the advertiser, would perceive that I suspected their relation from the fact of my having this letter to myself, and not making a frank avowal of the fact. This suspicion was not without effect. The next day Fare Bill made his appearance in W——d's private office, and declared that he was ready to deliver the papers left him from the sailor by Black Jack, on the payment of the promised nine hundred dollars. After a variety of negotiations to pay the second thousand as soon as the owners should come forward and establish their claim.

"W——d assented in my name to the proposition, but required a previous inspection. Fare Bill reminded him that on a former occasion he (W——d) had retained certain papers. W——d replied that if he was not satisfied with the genuineness of the documents he would immediately return them, but that the forger that as he was in our power. Meantime them at the time, he should come the next day and the money would be paid.

"W——d notified me that my presence would be necessary, and when the accomplice of Black Jack made his appearance, we were ready to receive him.

"Fare Bill came in, dressed elegantly in sporting costume; talked in an easy, off-hand style, and laid his documents on the table, carefully enveloped, with an air of confidence.

"W——d opened the conversation.

"'We wish, Mr. Langdon, that under no circumstances, even if these documents, like the others, should appear to be forged, that you would run away as you did on a former occasion, but have made a second effort to deceive us, and in fails, we are still under the necessity of dealing further with you, in the hope of securing the real documents. Promise that you will not run away, and I engage that you will not be arrested or otherwise annoyed.'

"The forger, though astonished and disturbed, laughed involuntarily at the suddenness of the attack. He agreed not to run, and seemed to be very confident.

"'And now, Mr. Linton,' continued W——d, 'before we open them papers, please tell us what they are?'

"'The parchment,' said I, slowly opening the envelope, 'is a will, purporting to have been made by S. P. Livingston, alias Maxwell, in favor of his mother, Mrs. Maxwell, of Brooklyn.'

"'The letter accompanying the will is from the same S. P. Livingston, alias Maxwell, to the same Mrs. M., written at Amsterdam. Of its contents I am not certain; but this much I may guess, that it alludes to the property which constitutes the consession by favor of our friend here, and to a certain John Smith who is declared to have it in his keeping for the benefit of said Mrs. M.'

"So saying, I unfolded the parchment and the letter. They were as I had described them. They were a part of the system.

"The forger's lip quivered, and his eyes became bloodshot with vexation and rage. He was caught baffled. But his presence of mind did not forsake him.

"'By what means you obtained this information, Mr. Linton,' said he, 'it is not necessary for me to inquire. The documents are valuable, and I am happy to know the parties to much the better. I have earned my two thousand dollars.'

"'Not so fast—not so fast,' said W——d. 'This Mrs. Maxwell is the famous Mother Bundy, whom I remember to have seen years ago as one of the witnesses in a celebrated criminal case; and the son, S. P. Livingston, is a convict in the state prison. In short, the failure of this second attempt will perhaps bring you to reason. It is useless to refer to your former statements. Here are your forged documents—take them back to your counsel and say from me that I will not prosecute, only the real papers for the money, or the Penitentiary for nothing.'

"The forger was more astonished than humbled by the exposure of his tricks, and hardly knew what answer to make.

"'Are you prepared,' said W——d, after giving the sober a little time for reflection, 'to say that the other documents are all you compel us to make war upon you? Here is a check for the sum agreed—twenty-one, though not needed, as I have paid you for this for the papers, and you will be certain to receive it if you bring them.'

"At length, after a great deal of reflection and a long silence, during which he looked constantly from the letter, Fare Bill drew it away, saying, that having that he would come and deliver us answer the next day.

"It was late in the afternoon when I left W——d's office, and, having business in the city, I did not reach home until late in the evening. Alice was waiting for me, greatly alarmed.

"Along the hall stood a small well-dressed man go into Mrs. Maxwell's. That after an hour or more a noise of rummaging and moving furniture commenced, and was followed by a loud cry. Fearful about an hour before my return John Maxwell came home intoxicated, and was quarreling with the poor old mother. Her voice of Mrs. Maxwell and her son quarreling. Then there was a third voice, and a violent altercation arising between the two men. Blows, and all was quiet. After this the new John Maxwell and his gentleman go out, taking with them a bundle which seemed to be heavy.

"Not doubting that the quarrel had been about a division of the money which was to be paid for the papers, I went immediately to the front door of Maxwell's house, and finding it open, entered the front room. The old woman, with her hair hanging wild, and a huge gash in her forehead, was in the act of rising from the flowing, rat up in the middle of the floor, as if she had just risen from a swoon. The room was in the greatest disorder, over and about, and there was every indication of a fight in which she had been a sufferer and the worst contributor. Her clothes were torn, exposing many parts of her person, which showed the vigor and proportions of a young man.

"'Well, Mrs. Maxwell,' said I, 'you have been having a little time with that son of yours and Fare Bill, I suppose?'

"'No son of mine, no son of mine,' said the old woman, wildly; 'but a cursed villain—a dog—a——'

"I do not care to repeat the language which followed; but never in my life had I conceived it possible for a woman to make such a terrible exhibition of passion and profanity. The fact that she had cursed herself somewhat by this tirade she laughed a little, and getting up with me a chair and quieted her nerves with a draught of gin; after which, covering her half-naked shoulders with the ragged shawl, she sat down for a dozen such boys."

"'You have an ugly cut over the brow, Mrs. Bundy.'

"'Bah! that is nothing. I have stabs and blows anow on this old body to have killed a dozen people. This one was given me by Livingston, as he said, baring one of her brawny shoulders; 'that scar is a bullet wound, and the ball is in my body—but it's nothing much.' She laughed long and heartily. 'To think,' said she, 'that I, with that mark on me, should have cared for a dozen such boys! to be frightened with a thrust and a blow! Fools, fools, both of 'em!'

"'What were you fighting about?'

"'Papers, man, papers; they want those papers that you took from the sailor. Simple as you are, I told them about them; why, man, the papers are mine. Didn't Black Jack tell me to me? Haven't I fed and clothed him for 'em? Don't I know the vally of 'em? Bah! You decent, quiet folks are all fools; you think because a feller is a thief he must know something.'

"Quite the contrary, Mrs. Bundy. Dishonesty is a proof of ignorance.'

"'So, it is! Well, I'd like to know! Then there's a plaguy big crowd o' rogues, for the most know nothing at all.'

"'I did not say that ignorance was a proof of dishonesty, but dishonesty of ignorance.'

"'It's all the same—only open the chances; fine talk for you, Mr. Linton—a gentleman; you're one of the missionaries, aren't you? No matter for that; you want the papers, and can pay for 'em; I've got 'em, and he 'paid for 'em; that's the point. Talk, man, talk!' cried the lady, holding out one hand in a balancing manner, as if there was a weight of coin to be dropped into the palm. Mrs. Bundy then took a Dutch pipe out of the closet, filled and lighted it at the candle, which burned dimly on the mantle-piece, and began smoking.

"'Where are the papers?' the old gentleman Jack and Bill did not carry them off?'

"She used the pipe in a disagreeable manner. 'I have them where Jack and Bill will never find them; nor you neither; nor all the p'lice of New York. I'll carry thoughut the papers where in the trunk they carried off with them. I let Jack see that two trunks were heavy; the trunk is full of trumpery and rags.' The old woman chuckled. 'The game is played out; I mean to be respectable. I'll live in New York Bundy again; it's more comfortable. Come, now, you shall give me half the treasure for the papers.' She looked, though you be a mechanic, and in a low way; you're going to be rich; you'll keep the treasure; you'll have to account for it to no; but I shall restore every dollar of it to the right owner, except what I have spent for the papers and for myself.'

"The old woman laughed and rocked herself to and fro.

"'That's a good 'un. You're a man, Linton; but soft—very soft. Come, now; give me the half and I'll show you the evidence.'

"'Mrs. Bundy, I hope you won't make me angry.'

"'You're bad when you're ugly, ain't you? said she, scanning me from head to foot. 'I told you boys a mistake. Do you really mean to give up the gold?'

"'I need not have waited so long if I had any other design.'

"'You daren't use the money till you see the evidence and it is in your own hand.'

"'You are hard to convince.'

"'It does one good to talk to a regular out-and-out fool, now and a while.' This remark was followed by a monstrous chuckle.

"I began to be impatient, and rose to go.

"'Sit down. Listen—sit down. I like you. Now, come, say a quarter.'

"I will give you two thousand dollars or nothing.'

"'Say five—that's a stick.'

"I was startled; this woman knew the value of the property.

"'You look queer, Mr. Linton, because I have let out a secret.'

"'I do not heed it.'

"'Who? Jack and Bill? They? Wouldn't I have got 'em where to let on to them? Bill and Jack know what I chose to tell 'em. Jack brought the papers to me the night they left the sea in a hack. Some of them has value and some don't seem them. I had my reasons. They wanted to go to Europe. I consented and left them to it. I thought I would peach. Fare Bill had been a lawyer's clerk; he wheedled and wheedled till I would help him to get up the letter from Lawrenque, or some such name.'

"'You then were the widow Dantou?'

"'Yes.' Another violent chuckle.

"'And Jack does not know the history of that affair?'

"A little of it. He come back to me and was sorry. Fear of punishment was going on, and I was willing to let the boys trap you if they could; but I held the papers, and knew the two owners had when at once by crying them up, I could trade with you over their necks.'

"You intimated as much to them, I suppose, to-night?'

"'Yes, more foul I for doing it. They must a mess, and, sich floored me with a chair.'

"Well, to conclude this matter, Mrs. Bundy, will you or will you not accept the terms I offer?'

"'Yes, yes,' she answered, good-humorously. 'I'll not be hard with you.'

"'Then you come to Mr. W——d's office to-morrow, at 9 o'clock, and exchange the papers for the money?'

"'Yes.'

"'Good-night, then, and pleasant dreams.'

"The old woman was punctual to her appointment. She was dressed like a beggar, and so thoroughly disguised that I should scarcely have till she spoke.

"She waited till the door was closed and locked, and then drew forth a greasy wallet, and held it in her lap.

"W——d laid a bundle of bank-notes on the table before her. She gave no heed to them, but directed all her attention to myself.

"'Isn't your name Simon Paul Linton?'

"'It is.'

"'Are you, Mr. Linton, any relatives, an uncle, a brother, or the like, that lived in India?'

"'I have a brother who is in India at present. No uncles by the father's side; the one brother or my mother is living in New York.'

"'Then, Mr. Linton, I've had of your own age, who left you long ago, when you were both boys?'

"'I recollect; there was such a friend, whom I had almost forgotten.

"'One Peter?'

"'The same; poor Sam Peter, a good-hearted lad; he was a follow-apprentice of mine, and we were friends every thing. Peter ran away, a bad, miserable boy, moping and pining. Our master, old Jackson, the wheel-wright, was very hard with him, and he ran away.'

"'You have never since heard from this Sam Potter?'

"'No.'

"Sam Potter went to sea. In this letter I said the old woman, looking at the papers, the first minute of the one which purported to have been written by Lawrenque, 'you will find something that will

"With a trembling hand I took the letter and found myself unable to see the writing through mental excitement. W——d snatched it from me, and after a hasty perusal, 'Now, Mrs. Bundy,' said he, 'the will; and you may take the money and go.'

"The old woman next handed me a will made by Sam Potter, who, dying at Amsterdam on his way home from Batavia, in October of last year, I showed him during his wretched apprenticeship, and confessed to me that he had left all he had in his secret and divided with him the money I had, made me his heir, with a small legacy to John Smith, who was to return it to the deceased on the beginning of his illness he gave a sketch of his life, which nearly resembled that of the fictitious Lawrenque. Then followed the letter of the verchant John Smith, with a schedule of the property, and at last the casket, with the keys, bills and documents, and the evidence was complete. While we were reading papers the old woman disappeared with her money.

"On reaching home that day I found had been there before me, and informing Alice of her good fortune, had left the premises, furniture, and all. Thus ended the strange story of Mother Bundy or the two burglars.

"By Alice's desire I bought this cottage. We have now a pony and a gig, and are becoming attached to the place.

"Are you at the old trade?'

"I have a shop, but of late I grew idle and aristocratic. Come, let us go in; the dew is falling."

A VISIT TO MANILLA.

[FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

MANILLA, October, 1857.

Our ship is still lying at Victoria, Hong Kong; but Bruce, Arthur, and I have made a short visit to Manilla, the great sea-port of the Philippines, and the another of these rare blessings, Manilla cheroots. We have been quite a lion and lioness for them in New York; but in this climate they are invaluable. I dare say that they will go down in the dicks of the market.

The way of it was this: Our shipmate, Arthur, who is a naturalist as a school-girl, fell in with a Spanish girl at a ball given by Sir John Bowring whose works entitled him to be known by her. Before the ball was over they were engaged; that is to say, he had given her his card, and written over his name in pencil. The next day and she, under his direction (he can't speak much Spanish) and the lioness sending word that he was in polyglot English, French, and Chinese), had inscribed on her tablets, "I will marry at Sefior Arturo," signed her name and given the card to Arthur. There is a lady near Boston, whose heart will perhaps go down with a thump at this announcement; but I shouldn't wonder—the sex are so fickle—if she had married a fat merchant long ere this. Don Arthur could not be left to be left to his plantation there? In our mess we had come to pity our poor messmate, whose spirits had fallen very low, at very singular after intercourse. Mrs. Bruce, who had been impelled by a spirit of adventure of by jealousy (which is very likely) to make her husband at Hong Kong, had gone to a mixed party at a merchant's house, where there were many ladies, and as her fortune permits—in true New York style. She seemed to wear a small fortune in jewels of various sort. After the party, according to her story, she went up stairs to dress to go home; in the dressing-room there was a young man, a Spaniard, who said he had come to look for some things his sister had forgotten; he fumbled about the room, and then went down and quietly took an agnant Mrs. Bruce; finally left, stating that the sister had not what she wanted. Mrs. Bruce dressed, went home, and discovered, on arrival, that a brooch of great value, a chatelaine, and a bracelet, which she wore at the ball, were missing. She estimated the value of the missing articles at ten thousand dollars.

Inquiry was instituted, but no trace of the lost property could be found. Bruce, on his wife's suggestion, inserted the following notice: "I proved to be a young man of good family, but vicious habits, he had left Manilla, whither he would go. He had an inveterate gambler; he had been in prison at Hong Kong for a night brawl; altogether his antecedents were such that Mrs. Bruce decidedly expected him of being the thief. Her suspicions were confirmed by the fact that the Spaniard had returned to Manilla a day or two after the ball.

Bruce solicited and obtained leave to go in chief of him. Arthur, who had never been there, had become, could not well be refused a like favor; and I, finding time heavy on my hands, asked and was allowed to join them.

So we started—one in search of a thief, another of a wife, and a third of excitement. On arriving Arthur instantly made a bee line for the house of his inamorata, whose name was well known at the hotel where we lodged. He was lost to us. Bruce and I, not feeling particularly safe in quenching of our own sympathies, and having no acquaintance, we sentries at every corner, communicated with the police, and received a telegraphic dispatch from Hong Kong, and that the lost property was that the thief was in Manilla. We were made to put this in writing, and to describe the property. Next day we received a letter three pages long, yet containing one sentence only, the purport of which was that there were no thieves in Manilla, and that the impression of the officers of Her Most Christian Majesty was that we were fools, impostors, and knaves.

MANILLA STREETS IN THE RAINY SEASON.

MARKET-WOMEN AT MANILLA.

Brace, on this, wanted to challenge the Governor. I called on him instead, and after some palaver I first gently hinted at the name of the supposed culprit. He started as if he had been shot.

"The son of Don ——, one of my oldest friends! Impossible!"

I related the circumstances, which were very peculiar, to say the least, and touched upon the young man's course of life.

The Governor confessed that the youth was a rake, and had given his family great trouble; that he gambled, especially at cock-fights, beyond his means; that he had more than once come into contact with the authorities; but steal! was such a thing possible? And the proud old Spaniard grew red in the face at the suggestion.

I obtained, at length, permission to institute a thorough search of the town, and promised to report progress.

Brace and I proceeded forthwith to examine the contents of all the jewelers' stores in Manilla. In two days we had been in every store where such articles as the missing property could by any chance find a market, without finding the least trace. We also instituted inquiry into the whereabouts of the supposed thief, whom I will call Manuel. We found that since he had arrived at Manilla he had gambled more profusely than ever; that he had been seen frequently in company with ladies, dressed in the extravagant fashions of that part of the world; that he was at war with his family, and was residing on a plantation.

Four or five days spent in these researches left us as wise as we were before, and I was constrained to admit to the Governor, when I waited upon him, that we had obtained no clew whatever. The old man was quite joyful.

"You Americans are too suspicious—too suspicious. The lady has lost her trinkets in dancing too much. Your ladies are very careless. Oh, Señor, they are indeed!" And he bowed me out.

We had seen very little of our friend Arthur. Occasionally in the morning he would drop in upon us, and talk half an hour at a time about the constancy, and the beauty, and the countless virtues of his fair one, and would press us to come and judge for ourselves. We were not in a humor for conviviality, however, and had declined his invitations. At last, after ten days' utterly fruitless inquiry, we resolved to return to Hong Kong; and on the eve of our departure we went, at Arthur's request, to the house of his fair friend's parents.

She was a lovely creature, with Spanish eyes and hair, and a sweet mouth; she was as perfect a lady as if she had been bred in Madrid. Arthur was undoubtedly a happy dog. Such were our first impressions. But how shall I describe my feelings when, scarcely five minutes after our introduction, Brace started up as if he had been stung by a serpent, drew me aside, and whispered convulsively in my ear, "By Jove, she's got my wife's bracelet on!"

"Are you sure?"

"Am I a fool?"

"Then sit down quietly and talk to somebody; leave the affair to me." He was so excited that he would have betrayed us at once.

I candidly confess that, remembering that the fair lady had been at the ball where the jewels were lost, and bearing in mind queer stories I had heard about the ungovernable rage of Manilla belles for jewelry, my first impression was not flattering to the lovely Carlita. And what a frightful disclosure for her lover if she were convicted! I sickened at the thought.

I entered into conversation with her on the first opportunity. Arthur, who usually clung to her side, left her en tête-à-tête with me, supposing, of course, that I wanted a better acquaintance with the future wife of a friend. In the course of a few minutes I observed, carelessly,

"What a pretty bracelet you wear!"

"Ah! yes," said she, blushing. "But let us talk about the horses. Have you tried our Manilla horses?"

"Hardly yet, I must say. But do let me see that bracelet; I am very curious in matters of jewelry!"

"No, no," said she, with a laugh, which seemed constrained; "men have no right to inquire into such things! Why have you never ridden on horseback?"

"I have been busy. I presume such beautiful bracelets as that one are very rare in Manilla?"

"Very likely."

"I do wish very much that you would let me see it."

"Señor, I am rather surprised that you should ask what I have twice declined. I refuse to show it you, and desire that you will ask no more questions about it! I have good reasons." And she drew her sleeve down so as to hide it.

As soon as possible I left her, and went oftside on the balcony. I found myself whistling, and feeling as though I would give worlds to be about a thousand miles from that spot, when Bruce came to me and inquired what I had done.

"Nothing yet."

"Well, I've had ample opportunities of locking at the bracelet. I'll swear it's my wife's, and I'm satisfied she stole it. Let us have her arrested right away; we owe it to Arthur not to let him go any further with a creature of that kind. He should be worried in time."

A COCK-FIGHT AT MANILLA.

"Will you wait till midnight?"

"I'd rather not."

"Then I leave you. Give me one chance more, and, if I fail, then I will agree to what you please."

He consented, and within a few minutes I took an opportunity of requesting Carita to step on the balcony with me.

"Mademoiselle," said I, very slowly, "I love you as apology; but I also owe it to you to tell you that I am aware of your inquiring about the bracelet was not mere curiosity; it was—a sufferer, a serious reason. And I now ask you, on honor, on morning you have very serious results hang on your answer, 'Where did you get that bracelet?'"

She had begun to tremble—I held her arm to help her arm—when I commenced; she shook in every limb as I ended.

"Señor, Señor," she muttered; "I dare not."

"Then the consequences be upon your own head!" And I turned to enter the room.

"Stop," she cried, "one moment. Is it really necessary—"

"If you value the reputation of your family, you will instantly tell me where you got that bracelet."

She rather gasped than said, "My cousin Manuel—he came last week."

The very man we had suspected all along. I could have jumped from the balcony in my delight. She couldn't understand why I kissed her hand, and let her into the room radiant. Bruce perceived at once that I was all right, and that Carita's hidious before I had. I assured our host that we should not leave Manilla for a day or two.

When we were in the open air—

"Now, you rascal," said I, in my ecstasy to Bruce, "I have the whole plot. That villain Manuel gave her the bracelet. He's her cousin—probably her lover; yet, but that's Arthur's affair, not ours. She's safe, and he's caught! Hurrah!"

At nine next morning we were at the Governor's, with our spy close and dried. The Governor's mum was sarcastic and incredulous, even after I had told my story; but as good luck would have it, Carita, feeling that her conduct, in refusing at first to explain the history of the bracelet, required to be accounted for, had written me a little note after the party, stating that she was not allowed by her father to speak to Manuel, and that she had discarded by his family; that on his return from Hong Kong she had disclosed the injunction, from her sole affection for him; that he had given her the bracelet on her acceptance at that interview; and that she had promised him faithfully to keep the visit a secret. The Governor knew Carita's family well, and the note removed his doubts. The poor old man burst into tears at the disgrace brought on his old friend's name; but he at once agreed to give us full authority to arrest Manuel.

While they were preparing for the journey to the plantation, where he was, Arthur came in, and we could not conceal from him what we had discovered. The poor fellow burst into a paroxysm of rage.

"A receiver of stolen goods, by Jove!" he groaned out. "Easy situation to blow!—I shall be a pretty figure in league with him. A thief for a cousin! Oh Lord! oh Lord!"

The poor fellow was so broken down that we spent an hour or two with him, and finally extorted a promise that he should not leave us—at least till we returned. It could easily be proved, we argued, whether she was an accomplice or merely a pickpocket in the thing young.

So we started with nine soldiers and a corporal. We had not been half an hour on the way when we heard from a Chinese, who had been a servant of ours, that the man we were in quest of was at that moment at a rock-pit in Manilla.

To turn about and hasten to the spot indicated was the work of an instant. Sure enough, there was the culprit, a very fine-looking young fellow, with a rakish air, but an open countenance. He was not in the least disturbed when the soldiers marched up and arrested him. Such coolness I had never witnessed in a thief before; it quite hardened than I suspected.

On coming out he saluted us, and asked, laughingly, if we knew which of his peccadilloes he was going to suffer for now?

"For theft," said I, bluntly.

His face grew red, then nearly black; with a furious oath he exclaimed,

"Theft! Who dares to accuse me of theft? What did I steal?"

"The bracelet you gave to your cousin," I answered.

Carita! Then she told my secret! Ah! cursed woman! Take me away. Theft, is it? Well, it's all one, theft or murder. Cursed woman!"

We saw him marched off, and proceeded in the direction of our domicile. On the way I said, as against Bruce, and, looking up in his face, screamed out, "Assassin!" and no alley, street, or lane—

"What's the matter?" said I, running after the woman to pick her up.

"Oh! master, forgive—robber, neither did such a thing afore. Oh! forgive—I serve you all my life. Oh! I've—no, no, no—"

"Jack," said I to Bruce, "I can't make head or tail of this girl. She wants me to forgive her. Suppose you try to make her out."

And I gave her up, greatly against her will, as she insisted on clinging to me.

"Why," cried Bruce, "it's Fanchon, our old nurse!"

"Oh, yes, master, It's poor Fanchon. She neber was so mistake. Oh, she so sorry she took missus' things; she give her life to have 'em back again—only don't send her to prison."

I rather think we stood in more need of physical support at that moment than Fanchon.

We very rapidly elicited from her the information that she had stolen the missing jewels in undressing her mistress on the evening of the ball; had sold them, on arriving at Manilla, to Chinese peddlers—from one of whom, obviously, Manuel had bought the ring—and, as soon as she found that she had actually presumed that we were acquainted with her proceedings.

We had better employment than punishing the poor creature. As luck would have it, our friend Manuel had been taken to the Governor's before going to prison; he was in the ante-chamber when I arrived. I could not wait, but took the flunky at the Governor's door by the throat, flung him aside, dashed in, and explained that we had been in error; that Don Manuel was evidently innocent; and that if a trifling penance of twenty years in the galleys would atone for our mistake, we were ready to submit to it.

A suspicious people. I told you, my friend, les Américains!" said the old Governor; "tous suspicieux!" And the old man chuckled at the discovery of his knowledge of Americans.

I need not add that of all the people who were rejoiced at this termination of the affair poor Arthur was the gladdest. He has made it his business to reconcile Manuel with whom he is great friends, with his family, and the wedding is to come off before New Year.

And so ends our romance at Manilla.

Miscellany.

ATTENTION TO DRESS.

APPEARANCE is a subject not to be slightly beneath the consideration of any man or woman. Nature does not disdain them. Nothing is omitted that can enhance its beauty. Every thing is grouped and arranged with the most consummate skill, and with the direct and constant object of pleasing the superior vision. Those persons, therefore, who play the philosopher on the strength of neglecting their attire, and who hope that the world will rest the superiority of their intellect in direct ratio with the inferiority of their dress, are egregiously deceived, because the truly wise man thinks of nature through himself.

WHY FOXES GET MARRIED.

A WRITER in Titan amusingly discusses this point: "The fox gets married, but he is not monogamous as husband. He is. The fox takes the same earth with his wife no longer than is necessary for the proper nutrition of the cubs. Then a reunion, which begins toward the close of winter, lasts till the month of August following. It is remarkable that the male parent exhibits, during every quiet in the early days of their married life, and do not mean themselves much trouble. The arrival of the family luxuriantly develops in the father and the mother the plundering and thieving instincts which the union has gifted them.

LOAD AND FIRE.

REV. THOMAS ALLEN was ordained as the first minister to Brimfield, Massachusetts, in the year 1765. Mr. Allen was a native of Northampton, and a graduate of Harvard in 1761. He was eminent for his zeal in the cause of his country previous to the Revolution. He was chaplain to the American army under Washington, and died at Pittsfield in 1776, again in the summer of 1777 at Ticonderoga, again at Bennington, and again when he marched with a company composed partly of his Pittsfield parishioners. From his lips went up the fervent prayer, in the presence of the whole American army, on the morning of the action, and from his own wood fell the first shot of the living fusillade in the battle. His brother Joseph stood by his side in the action, to whom the parson said, "You load, and I will fire." Mr. Allen remained in the army with his original patriot till February 11, 1810, when he died, after a ministry of forty-four years. In addition to his published sermons, Mr. Allen left a manuscript sermon in shorthand, which no one as yet has been able to decipher.

REVERENCE THE OLD MAN.

Bow low the head, hey; do reverence to the old man, for he has lived long. Reverence him, for he has shivered the hair, and changed the round meridian of his head to shining hollow. Bow low the heart lest with aspirations coequal to any that you have felt; aspirations crushed by disappointment, as you are perhaps destined to be, he may cast form stalked proudly through the gay scenes of pleasure, the gay circles of fashion, the highways of Time, that withers the flower of yesterday, has warped that figure and destroyed the noble carriage. Once, in your age, he was young, and the thoughts that pass through your brain—now nothing to despondingly deeds equal to a book in time, soon imagining life a dream that the scourer he woke from the better. But he has lived the world over many times through. He has been in every near at hand; yet his eye never kindles at old deeds of daring. He sees not the romantic beauty of the staff. How the head, boy, as you would in your old age be reverenced.

THE SWELL MOB OF THE LONDON OMNIBUS.

AN American gentleman having seated himself in a London omnibus, saw and heard what a little weazel blear, a man, whose peculiar quackery of authority, looked in at the door, took a professional view of the passengers, and called out to the driver, without any pretense at modest concealment of his thoughts, "You can't go on, there's two or three swells in here." The driver, with all an eagle, a parry, well-known old man rose and stepped out, paused as he did so, "I've no small money to ride with pickpockets." In a moment more a sprace young person said as he descended, "I'll follow that old gentleman's lead." "Go on now," said the detective policeman, "the swells have got out, and all's right."

THE HASTE TO BE RICH.

THE poison of covetousness—the all-consuming eagerness to obtain wealth without industry, and without having to wait patiently for the reward of professional excellence—appears to be rapidly pervading every relation in social life. Oh! for the repentance of the rich and men among us who would practically teach us that men were not born to worship money, and to devote wealth to personal and household adornment, and the gratification of every luxurious and sensual appetite! The purple and fine linen, and sumptuous fare and pomp and reality and religion of Christendom, have failed in the production of such a social system as will enable us longer to rely upon the stability of the virtues of the educated and refined middle classes. There is a radical defect somewhere.

ENGLISH INDIVIDUALITY AND AMERICAN ASSIMILATION.

THE English are to be distinguished from the Americans by greater independence of personal action. All have their own institutions, their peculiar condition of our own country, has a tendency to reduce us all to the same level of ranges. The steamboats, the railroads, the cars, the speculation, character of the enterprises, and the consequent opposition to any thing like individuality, all show a tendency of the system in bringing about such a result. In England a man dines by himself, in a room filled with other hermits; he eats at his leisure; drinks his wine in silence; reads the paper by the hour; and in all things encourages individuality, and insists on his particular humors. The American is compelled to submit to a common rule; he eats when others eat; sleeps when others sleep; and he is lucky indeed if he can read a paper in a tavern without having a stranger looking over each shoulder.

SLAMS IN CHURCHES.

A WRITER in one of the Boston papers complains of the "elaborate disfigurement" produced by the alterations in a church at Roxbury. It has been in the country, and, of course, old-fashioned, with regular proportions substituted for the old one, which every body thought was ridiculously small. To build the pulpit is a falsehood—in a church, where every thing should be as it pretends to be—an attempt at grandeur, and the door communicates through this perspective of rows of columns: so that "when the preacher enters the congregation spectator sees the base and part of the shaft of sunday majestic columns turn upon hinges, leaving the square square and the remainder of the shaft to be suspended until the door is closed, and the pleasant illusion restored. In the evening, when there is a scene at the theatre in the daytime, though there the doors are usually in correct position, and the same deception is not practised as in the church, the crowding tendency to sham decorations of a similar kind is clearly seen readily built, or in the process of improvement. The thing is well enough in a theatre, where people go expecting to be humbugged. The children of the living temple, which is the pillar and ground of the truth, every thing like an attempt at deception ought to be avoided.

BIRDS IN JAPAN.

BIRDS are treated very kindly there. They are never killed for sport, and little troughs are scooped out in the windows of the houses, which are filled every morning with fresh water for their drink. During the stay of Commodore Perry's ships a number of officers started one day to go gunning. As soon as the Japanese saw the crust master of their train with his gun, they began to protest. Take care of the birds. That is what the farmers say you are to do, they explained, and as the grain is ripe to fruit, for the insects will get the upper hand of every thing. If you kill the birds live, and they will not only cheer us by their beauty and their songs, but destroy the insects and preserve our fruit.

INDUSTRY.

INDUSTRY, if it be only a habit, is at least an excellent habit. If you ask me which is the most destructive vice of human nature, do you imagine I should answer drunkenness? Not drunkenness. I should say indolence—and he who conquers indolence conquers all the rest.

WHITE LIES.

"To show you," said a Scotch clergyman to a friend, "how little feeling many persons, even of respectable character, have for the sanctity of truth, a memorial in a falsehood told in the way of business. I will tell you what occurred to myself when I was a young minister. Like every minister with an extensive parish, I wanted a horse. I mentioned my wish to a highly respectable farmer, and he told me that by great good luck he knew where I could be suited at once. At a farm a few miles off there was a very fine animal as a mare. I waited. He said that I should lose no time in going over to see it, for, to his question, 'Why?' he replied, 'Sir friend, with a look of remarkable shrewdness; 'no, no, that will never do. If you were to gang over yourself you wantna the beast. The farmer wants to put an extra ten or fifteen pounds on his price. He'll be speaking to you first. To another forenoon I'll drive you over to the farm, and I'll say to the farmer, 'This is Mr. Gideon, our new minister; I was just giving him a bit drive to see the country.' And as we gaed by your house just by chance, I thought I would just ha'k a bit beast to sell, and although I dolera think it was suit him ava', yet I thought I was borne to look at it for a' that.' He wanna for comin' in, the minister, for he hadna time; but we have just come in for an minute, and if the beast's at home, we can let us see't; but if no it doesna matter a grain.' Noo, if I say she's to hire, he'll think we dolna heed about the beast, and he'll no raise the price o't.' I was quite surprised that a man of good character should propose to a clergyman to become his accomplice in a plan of trickery and falsehood; but when I expressed myself to that effect, my friend only thought of his proposal, and said I should want a horse forever rather than get one by telling a score of lies. But my friend was quite unabashed by my rebuke, and evidently thought I was a young man of Quixotic notions of honor, of which a little longer experience of life would happily rid me."

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

PERSONS OF SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.—"Oh, Mr. Grabbem! you don't mean to say that you should you like to have a family of young children about you, dear?" "Indeed, I should, Miss Simpkins, very much indeed; I'd rather have a lot of yellow boys in my pocket."

APHORISMS UPON TIGHT-LACING.

A narrow waist is a sign of valid health and sense of mind. When the ribs are contracted, it is a sure sign that the intellect is also.

Better to have good lungs and what, in the wisdom of Le Follet, is considered a fine figure, than by a rigid corset to get a better shape and a worse constitution.

Within a pair of corsets there is often a heart beating with happiness this out of the window.

Tight-lacing is a fashion which may be seen a large portion of the year in outline of a hogshead.

Beauty nipped in the waist is like a rose nipped in the bud. The flower may live, but it will not be a perfect one.

The more a woman's waist is shaped like an hour-glass, the more she resembles one in that she runs—fast!

The tight bend in the whalebone will eventually "come out" in the vitals of the doctor.

Give me the sparkling of a lady's eyes, and I care not who makes up her dresses.

Tight-lacing is a species of boa-constrictor, wrestling with corsages. When you next require their services send for a good physician.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A DUMB MAN AND A POLICEMAN.—One is never seen, the other never heard.

HOW TO DRESS.—Dress so as to have a handkerchief in your breast-pocket. If you do—you take a wiper to your dress.

THE POLICE.—An intelligent officer is alway remarkable for his quickness of apprehension.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A YOKEFELLOW.—A wife-awake.

A few days since three Irishmen, very ill, were ordered to be sent to the St. Louis City Hospital. The physician ordered that the first one should be washed together with a bottle of fourth proof brandy, the latter to be given to him as a drink, and the third to be rubbed. The first two were then put in charge of a Hibernian nurse, with the instructions that the directions be carried out to the letter. The nurse, understanding the Irish attendant reported that the first two were dead, and the third was very dead.

"Did you give the medicine as I told you?"

"Faith, sir, I did, sir."

"And the brandy?"

"Yes, sir, I did, I thought it a pity to waste so much good liquor on the men that were bound to die anyhow, so I drinked it myself."

Dr. March says the best cure for hysterics is to discharge the servant girl. In his opinion there is nothing like a good scolding to keep a woman's mind from dwelling unduly upon her own troubles.

There is a lawyer in Dearborn County, Indiana, known as "a lawyer for constructive fees." He is said to collect the anecdotes told of him. A man once went to him to be qualified to take an oath. He held the book in your hand; I'll swear you, but all creation couldn't make me."

Dr. Abernethy rarely sent his match; but as one enormously fat man was about to do so, he said to the fellow-keeper, who had had a quarrel with his wife, who had left him, "Here, take this man and bleed him, for one was bleeding, and much disfigured. Abernethy considered this to be an insult, and sent for the astonishing the offender, and said,

"Sir, though I am not ashamed of yourself, to treat your husband thus—the husband, who is the head of all your—"

"Well, Doctor," fiercely returned the virago, "and how do you know that I have no head?"

Lord Eldon, when formally advising or giving directions for the benefit of the patient, turned on his heel, and never found himself face to face.

An old epigram says:

"What smiles and welcomes would I give
Some friends to see!
And yet what treasures would I pay
To keep them away!

"The mind of a young creature," says Bishop Berkeley, "can not remain empty; if you do not put into it that which is good, it will receive that to mix with it which is bad."

At the time that the blacksmith of Gretna Green was in the full exercise of his vocation a couple presented themselves before him.

"It is five guineas, in advance," said he.

"Five guineas, he would be married," my friend Smuggins only paid you twenty shillings."

"True," said the blacksmith, "and Smuggins five times I made him a discount."

The most unpardonable for office was advised the other day to apply for the constable at the Lobos Islands, for the office was vacant. He had his letter written before he discovered the joke.

A lover knelt to beauties fair,
And vowed and swore he'd die;
But when the lass consented, then
They both began to sneeze!
"Why how's your head, dear?"
"Why how's your head, sir?"
"True; but as I love you best me thus,
Me—me, indeed, a mortar!"

Sydney Smith gives this good advice, but whether he followed it himself or not is quite another matter. He says in the morning, not only to avoid self-reproach, but to make sure of the day, do the most important, not only to men of business, but to people in general, and let slighter affairs be spread over mind and body for the whole of the day in which you have not time to feel.

Ben Pantopticon, in an Essay on Tobacco, says: "Tobacco was first introduced into England in the year 1560, and was called the Indian herb, or sometimes the divine shrub, objects being introduced to it, though King James wrote something not very complimentary to it. But not only to men was it introduced, but to several birds, and daughter of whom are to be seen there were in the time of Queen Elizabeth. Sir Walter Raleigh's suggestion for the weed was afterward inspired by having his head cracked. His memory has been puffed as a great benefactor to the human race that smokes."

MRS. BROWNING sings:

"Were you all to you thought of laughter?
Smile, as tears were coming after?
Flatter your pleasures to your woes,
And think life's green well worth its rose."

Great and rare heart-offerings are found almost exclusively among women; nearly all the happiness and most blessed moments in love are of their creating, and so also in friendship, especially when it follows love.

Some public-house patriot was repeating the old national boast that "an Englishman's house is his castle." "I am not so positive about that," said a critic of the Westminster Review; "but I am sure that an English woman's dress is her castle; for it is such an enormous size now that it is morally and physically impossible for any one, friend or enemy, to come near her!"

At Gibraltar there was a great scarcity of water. An officer said he was very easy about the matter, for he had nothing to do with water; if he only got his tea in the morning, and punch at night, it was all that he wanted!

Oh, the wild fever of this mad unrest,
When baffled man, amid his hopes and fears,
Smites in despair his overanxious breast,
Not knowing in the dark which way he steers;
With brokers on his lea, and subtle sands
That late seemed stones but now prove naught but stocks,
He wrings imploringly his trembling hands,
And, just like those in Scripture, prays the rocks
May fall upon him—but prefers the sort
From California; and, howe'er their power,
'Twould be to him, just now, delightful sport
To stand and weather the auriferous shower,
Begging propitious Fortune to let down
Boulders of any size—he'll risk his crown.

At the recent Donegal assizes, the following cross-examination occasioned much merriment: Mr. Doherty—"What business do you follow?" "I am a schoolmaster." "Did you turn off your scholars, or did they turn you off?" "I do not wish to answer irrelevant questions." [Laughter.] "Are you a great favorite with your pupils?" "Ay, troth am I, a much greater favorite than you are with the public." "Where were you, Sir, this night?" "This night!" said the witness: "there is a learned man—this night is not yet come; I suppose you mean that night." [Here the witness looked at the judge, and winked his eye as if in triumph.] "I presume the 'schoolmaster was abroad' that night doing nothing." "Define 'nothing,'" said the witness. Mr. Doherty did not comply. "Well," said the learned schoolmaster, "I will define it. It is a footless stocking without a leg." [Roars of laughter, in which his lordship joined.] "You may go down, Sir." "Faith, I believe you're tired enough of me; but it is my profession to enlighten the public, and if you have any more questions to ask I will answer them."

At a dinner lately, this question was put to the guests—"Which is the stronger, lie or truth?" After a moment's consideration, Mr. Joseph Proctor answered—"Truth, for you may re-ly on it."

An old maid speaking of marriage, says it's like any other disease, while there is life there is hope.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, January 18, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week have been very quiet for Breadstuffs. Flour has been in limited request chiefly for home use, and prices closed in favor of buyers. Wheat was less freely offered, and purchased, at, however, full rates. Corn was scarce and much needed in the early part of the week. Toward the close the receipts increased, and there was less inquiry for the various kinds. Rye, Barley, and Oats were lightly dealt in at about former quotations....Cotton was more sought after at an improvement of about 1 c. per pound since the date of our last review....Provisions have been moderately inquired for, but at irregular figures....Groceries have been more freely offered, especially Sugars, Molasses, and Rice, which have tended downward. The demand for all kinds has been restricted. The total receipts of Coffee in the United States (exclusive of California and Oregon) for the year ending December 31, 1857, were 1,505,038 packages, weighing 217,871,839 pounds, against receipts in 1856 of 1,678,903 packages, or 230,943,150 pounds, while the consumption in 1857 172,565,934 pounds; against a consumption in 1856 of 218,228,450 pounds, being a decrease of nearly 21 per cent.....The Dry Goods trade is reviving very tardily in private channels; but greatly increased activity is discernible in the auction rooms. Four large public sales of Foreign and Domestic Goods have occurred this week. The competition at each was vigorous, yet prices ruled in favor of purchasers, especially for other than choice standard fabrics. These sales were very numerously attended, and by many of the most respectable local dealers, as well as by several of the leading country buyers, who are thus enabled to secure supplies of seasonable fabrics at very low prices. The week's import of Dry Goods amounted to $1,073,969 against $2,872,727 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since January 1 have been $1,575,408 against $5,063,736 same time in 1857....The movements in other commodities were moderate and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$4 25	@	$4 65
Superfine to fancy Western do. "	4 25	@	4 50
Extra Western Flour, per barrel......	4 50	@	8 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel...	4 35	@	7 00
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel ..	4 25	@	6 00
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel ..	4 25	@	8 00
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl..	3 00	@	4 00
Corn Meal, per barrel...............	3 00	@	3 50
White Wheat, per bushel...........	1 10	@	1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 02	@	1 17
New Crop Corn, per bushel	71	@	73
Rye, per bushel	72	@	73
Barley, per bushel..................	70	@	80
Western Oats, per bushel	45	@	46
State Oats, per bushel..............	42	@	44
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel....	33	@	39
Southern Oats, per bushel...........	29	@	37
Cotton, middlings, per pound.........	10¼	@	10½
Mess Pork, per barrel...............	14 75	@	14 90
Prime Pork, per barrel..............	11 50	@	12 00
Country Mess Beef, per barrel........	9 00	@	10 00
Country Prime Beef, per barrel.......	5 75	@	6 50
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce..........	17 00	@	23 00
Beef Hams, per barrel	14 50	@	16 50
Cut Meats, per pound...............	6	@	8½
Lard, per pound....................	8½	@	9¼
State Butter, per pound..............	12	@	22
Western Butter, per pound	10	@	15
Cheese, per pound..................	6	@	8
Rice, per 100 pounds................	2 25	@	3 50
Rio Coffee, per pound...............	8½	@	11
Cuba Sugar, per pound	4½	@	6½
Cuba Molasses, per gallon...........	16	@	24
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	5	@	7
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	28	@	30
Hyson Teas, per pound..............	25	@	55
Oolong Teas, per pound..............	30	@	50
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	—	@	21
North River Hay, per 100 pounds	65	@	75
Hops, Crop of 1857, per pound........	5	@	10
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound.........	7	@	18
Seed Leaf Tobacco, per pound........	9	@	35
Am. Hemp, undressed, per ton.......	100 00	@	110 00
Am. Hemp, dressed, per ton	140 00	@	165 00
American Fleece Wool, per pound....	27	@	45
American pulled Wool, per pound ...	20	@	28
Pot Ashes, per 100 pounds...........	5 25	@	—
Pearl Ashes, per 100 pounds	5 50	@	5 62½

Freights were inactive, though shippers had any existing advantages. For Liverpool—Cotton, 3-16d. per pound; Flour, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Grain, 4d. @ 5½d. per bushel; Rosin, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Beef, 3s. 6d. @ 4s. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 20s. @ 25s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The number of vessels in the port of New York on Saturday was 659 of all classes.

The Live Stock Market was even more heavily supplied last week with Beeves, which opened pretty uniformly, but closed ¼ c. per pound cheaper. The demand was restricted, owing, in part, to the poor quality of the stock offered....Milch Cows were plentier and less inquired for, prices favoring buyers....Veal Calves, especially good, were also more abundant and in fair request, at firmer rates....Sheep and Lambs arrived in larger numbers and better condition, but the demand was less vigorous, and prices tended downward....Swine were in fair supply and request at, however, a shade lower quotations....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Jan. 6.	Week ending Jan. 13.
Beeves..........................	3,796	3,774
Milch Cows	193	217
Veal Calves.....................	310	338
Sheep and Lambs	6,625	8,055
Swine..........................	3,165	2,598

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

New York..........1233		Kentucky............	74
Ohio...............1009		Illinois..............	72
Indiana............ 98

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound ..	$0 6	@	$0 10½
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head.	20 00	@	65 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5	@	7
Sheep and Lambs, per head..........	3 50	@	14 00
" " per pound.........	6	@	9
Live Swine, per pound...............	4½	@	5
Dressed " "	5½	@	6½

The Country Produce Markets are quite well stocked with the leading kinds of produce, which are obtainable at comparatively low prices; the demand, however, is not very brisk, as the fine weather favors the policy of consumers, who are purchasing only as they really need supplies.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel..................	$2 50	@	$5 00
Apples, dried, per pound............	5	@	7
Peaches, dried, per pound	15	@	18
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	1 87	@	2 00
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 00	@	3 25
Peanuts, per bushel	70	@	1 00
Cranberries, per barrel..............	6 50	@	10 00
Potatoes, per barrel.................	1 75	@	3 75
" per bushel...................	50	@	95
" sweet, per barrel.............	5 00	@	6 00
Onions, per barrel	1 50	@	3 00
Turnips, per barrel..................	50	@	75
Squashes, per barrel	2 50	@	2 75
Pumpkins, per 100	25 00	@	30 00
Beets, per barrel	1 12½	@	1 25
Cabbages, per 100	2 00	@	5 00
" Red, per dozen	75	@	1 12
Parsnips, per barrel	1 25	@	1 50
Carrots, per barrel..................	—	@	1 50
Leeks, per 100......................	2 50	@	3 00
Celery, per dozen	50	@	75
Garlic, per 100	5 50	@	6 00
Eggs, Limed, per dozen.............	16	@	17
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	18	@	20
Chickens, per pound................	8	@	12
Fowls, per pound...................	7	@	10
Guinea Fowl, per pair..............	44	@	50
Ducks, per pound	10	@	13
" per pair	62½	@	2 50
Turkeys, per pound.................	8	@	13
Turkeys, Wild, each	1 25	@	4 00
Geese, per pound...................	8	@	11
Pigeons, per dozen	1 75	@	2 50
Prairie Hens, per pair..............	75	@	1 00
Partridge, per pair	60	@	75
Roasting Pigs.......................	1 00	@	2 00
Rabbits, per pair	25	@	—
Hares, per pair	31	@	38
Squirrels, each	2	@	4
Venison, per pound	6	@	12
Bear Meat, per pound	12	@	16

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Jan. 18, 1858.

THERE are more slight signs of an attempt at revival in the foreign trade of the port. A comparison between the last week and the corresponding week of 1857 shows, however, the following figures:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Jan. 16, 1858	$3,195,403....	$649,559
Corresponding week, 1857	4,098,552....	1,680,294
Decrease	$1,903,149....	$1,031,735

It must be remembered that the increase in the foreign trade of the port which contributed so largely to smooth the path for the revulsion, began to develop itself just one year ago.

The specie movement was somewhat over a million, to Europe; but against this there was over a million and a half from California; so that, allowing very little for the domestic exchanges, the specie in bank at present can not fall far short of thirty millions.

Money continues to be abundant on first-class securities at 5 @ 7, and on the best paper at 7 @ 10. Exchange rules somewhat lower, the latest quotations being 109 @ 110. Stocks closed somewhat lower on Saturday than they had ruled during the week. The demand for State stocks and bonds, however, continues large; while the Wall Street operators monopolize the railroad share market.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.
SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY
LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

CLOAKS!
CLOAKS!!
CLOAKS!!!

BRODIE'S
CELEBRATED CLOAKS
ARE NOW
STILL FURTHER REDUCED IN PRICE,
IN ORDER TO CLEAR OUT
HIS ENTIRE STOCK,
IF POSSIBLE,
DURING THE HOLIDAYS.
WONDERFUL BARGAINS!
No. 300 CANAL STREET, N. Y.

A Wonderful Book, full of Novelty and full of Romance, as well as of valuable information.

THE NEW EDITION OF
DR. LIVINGSTONE'S JOURNAL
IS NOW READY.

MISSIONARY TRAVELS AND RESEARCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA; including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi, to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., D.C.L. Two Maps by ARROWSMITH, a Portrait on Steel, and numerous Illustrations. One Volume 8vo, $3 00.

NOTICE.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS take this opportunity of cautioning the Public against several spurious publications, which, by artful advertisements, are made to appear as though emanating from Dr. Livingstone. They are authorized to say that Dr. Livingstone repudiates them entirely, and wishes it to be generally known that the present work is the only authentic narrative of his Adventures and Travels in Africa.

A book which, before it has been ten days in the hands of the public, will have been perused by perhaps 50,000 readers; a book second only to Lord Macaulay's History of England in the inordinate extent of its circulation. No wonder—it addresses itself to large and numerous classes—the great religious world, the commercial world, the scientific.—Literary Gazette.

No book of travels has been anticipated with greater interest than this record of wonderful adventures and discoveries. The book is one of the most captivating description; in style simple, clear, and graphic, and in matter such as no other living traveler's experience could afford. From the beginning to the end of the volume, there is not a page that does not compel the attention, not a page that does not offer something novel. It is a wonder-book all through.—N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

This remarkable narrative, distinguished throughout by the modesty characteristic of true merit. Clear, concise, unaffected, and fluent, it charms the reader, and bears him along irresistibly, securing his attention from first to last.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

At once scientific, literary, and religious, it deserves to be read and studied by all classes.—Boston Post.

A new chapter in the history of the world.—Boston Leader.

Since the days of Mandeville, Marco Polo, and Captain Cook, no one person has traversed a more extended theatre of travel, or added more to the great discoveries of the world than Dr. Livingstone. The work combines the dignity of scientific research with thrilling narratives of personal adventure.—Richmond Enquirer.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Three Dollars.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINE
Is unquestionably the best in the market for family use, as the following disinterested letter gives evidence:

NEW YORK CITY, Sept. 26, 1857.

Messrs. GROVER & BAKER,

Having used one of your Family Sewing Machines for the last year, I can cheerfully give my testimony in favor thereof. For dress-making, quilting, and, in short, for all kinds of family sewing, it has proved to me invaluable. Truly, as you say, no well regulated family can afford to do without one. The cost is but a trifle compared with the amount accomplished in a single month. You are at liberty to make such use of this as shall please you.

Yours respectfully,
MRS. SAMUEL C. BARBER,
No. 758 Greenwich Street.

Our readers are advised to call and examine them at 495 Broadway, New York; 18 Summer Street, Boston; or 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHER'S PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for Distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in postage stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

SUDDEN DEATH.
Those who use stimulants to excess daily must beware. Their arterial blood approaches in color venous blood; that is, it attains a darker color than in the natural state. Finally, sickness and a peculiar debility arise from this condition, and sudden death may be expected unless a medicine like Brandreth's pills is promptly used, which at once disinfects, as it were, the blood of the poison with which it was charged. The life and the health will be thus saved, and a strength of mind often imparted whereby the evil habit is stayed. Legislators should erect asylums for the habitual drunkard, where the Brandreth pills alone would effect more reforms in a single year than all the temperance societies have yet done.

The chemical qualities of the blood have been found much the same in typhus, yellow, and putrid fevers, in sea-scurvy, in ague and fever of long standing, in scrofulous cases, in the plague, and in confirmed dram drinkers. There is no doubt in my mind that the cause is imbibed from the air, from food, from water, from infection, or otherwise.

EXCESS OF HYDROGEN,

Now sulphuretted hydrogen gas is exceedingly subtile in its nature, and being generated in the bowels in great quantities from undigested diet or sickness, must pass off naturally or death will take place immediately, because it will press upward and go through the skin of the intestines, through the diaphragm, and into the lungs, from which it will exclude atmospheric air, and the patient dies of suffocation.

This sudden sickness, ashy paleness, gasping for breath, pain just below the pit of the stomach, and almost instant death, proceed not from disease of the heart, but from internal suffocation as narrated above. To save life and restore health, give at once four, or six, or more Brandreth pills, and some warm tea, China, boneset, or catnip. After the attack is over, use Brandreth's pills so as to purge freely for three or four days; then use them more moderately, so that a full purgation is obtained once in two or three days until the disease is conquered and the health fully restored.

The above directions are applicable in small-pox, scarlet fever, measles, hooping cough, and influenza, which latter is cured in three or four days certain. These pills should be in every house, for they are, in truth, the safety-valve of disease.

Principal office 43 Brandreth Building, Canal Street. Sold also at 266 Bowery, at 52 Division Street, and at 175 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, at 25 cents a box, with full directions.

UNSURPASSED ATTRACTIONS.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR FEBRUARY.

CONTENTS.
AN AMERICAN IN CONSTANTINOPLE.
Illustrated by Twenty-one Engravings.
LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN SOUTH AFRICA.
Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.
A CULINARY CAMPAIGN.
Illustrated by Six Engravings.
A MARRIAGE TRAGEDY. By WILKIE COLLINS.
WHAT WOMEN TALK ABOUT.
A SUMMER'S AFTERNOON.
HOW TO ENJOY WINTER.
REMINISCENCES OF A MAN OF THE WORLD.
PRUNES AND PRISMS.
NANCY'S BROOK.
JACK OF ALL TRADES. By CHARLES READE. (Continued.)
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY.
Illustrations: George's Secretary at War.—The Wilderness.—Four Head-Pieces.
Chapter IX. Hospitalities.
Chapter X. A hot Afternoon.
Chapter XI. Wherein the two Georges prepare for Blood.
Chapter XII. News from the Camp.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
MISS FANNY FLIRT AND HER VICTIMS.
Illustrations: Miss Fanny.—Herr Sweitzer.—Señor Maccaroni.—Fred Faro.—Mons. de Crapaud.—Mr. Mist.—Mr. Vacuum.—Tom Racket.—Charles Sediment.—Q. P. Opaque.—Mr. Bull.—P. Donegal.—Mr. Blodger.—General Banger.—Joshua Brads.—Mr. Spondoolicks.
FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.
Illustrations: Children's Costumes.—Coiffure.—Dress Cap.—Under-Sleeve.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

MR. CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF ALL TRADES—A MATTER OF FACT ROMANCE," written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, was also commenced in the DECEMBER Number.

MRS. GASKELL'S BEAUTIFUL STORY, entitled "THE DOOM OF THE GRIFFITHS," will be found in the Number for JANUARY.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE MARRIAGE TRAGEDY," appears complete in the present Number.

The above three stories are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
The Original and Genuine Article—infinitely superior to all others—pleasant to the taste, composed of purely vegetable extracts, and may be taken at all seasons with perfect safety.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!

BULWER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, AND WILKIE COLLINS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

MR. CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF ALL TRADES—A MATTER OF FACT ROMANCE," written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, was also commenced in the December Number.

MRS. GASKELL, Author of "MARY BARTON," has become a contributor to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and a thrilling story from her vigorous pen will be found in the January Number.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE MARRIAGE TRAGEDY," appears complete in the February Number.

The above three stories are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 40 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

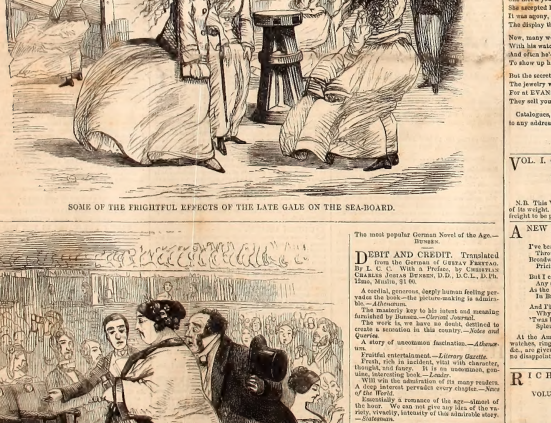
Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.



HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

"If you want a thing done, do it yourself." There can be no reason why the Girls shouldn't Dress themselves, so that the Maid may go to her Dancing Academy!

After the Cattle-show, old Hezekiah Brown has a quiet Dinner at a Saloon near by, drinks a few glasses of old Bourbon, and has a fearful Dream afterward.

SOME OF THE FRIGHTFUL EFFECTS OF THE LATE GALE ON THE SEA-BOARD.

AT THE OPERA.

"That, Madam, is your Se . . and there is yours, Sir."

THE THIRD VOLUME OF

HELPS'S SPANISH CONQUEST IN AMERICA. The Spanish Conquest in America, and its Relation to the History of Slavery, and to the Government of Colonies. By ARTHUR HELPS. Numerous Maps, &c. 3 vols. Large 12mo, Muslin, $2 00. (Just ready.)

An elaborate and complete history of the Conquest of Spanish America, from the time of Columbus to that of Hernando Cortes. Mr. Helps has made a thorough collection of books relating to the subject, and has visited Mexico, Peru, and Mexico, yet, as a connected whole, the ground is almost unbroken. The work is written with special reference to the distribution of the establishment of slavery in this country, and on that subject contains many interesting developments—though it is not sectarian or partisan in its tone. The subject is one of the most important in modern history—the author is favorably known as a sound thinker and a scholar of rare accomplishments; readers of his "Friends in Council" and "Companions" have been pronounced, by the highest critical authority in England to be among the most important and valuable contributions to historical literature.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

A truly delightful Book.

MRS. SIGOURNEY'S LUCY HOWARD.

LUCY HOWARD'S JOURNAL. By Mrs. L. H. SIGOURNEY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

The unaffected style, pure sentiment, and varied information which characterize the narrative, render it most engaging and instructive. We pronounce it a truly delightful book.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WALKS ABOUT TOWN

Air—"Villikens and his Dinah."

As sweet Clementina was walking Broadway,
All dressed in the neatest of gorgeous array,
Her bosom upheaving a rich diamond pin,
While her osmeo eardrops hung down to her chin.

Her neck was encircled with a rich golden chain,
The rings on her fingers they sparkled again;
While just peeping from out of the run of her pocket,
You could see the bright edge of a beautiful locket.

She met a young man, who then smiling bowed,
She accepted his arm and they edged through the crowd.
It was agony, awful and painful to see,
The display that they made of their gold jewelry.

Now, many would think they had plenty of tin,
With his watch and chain, and her osmeo pin;
And often he'd raise up his hand to his head,
To show up his sleeve buttons, and all such as that.

But the secret I'll tell you, 'twas books that they bought,
The jewelry were presents and cost them nought,
For at EVANS & CO'S, 677 Broadway,
They sell you books cheap, and give jewelry away.

Catalogues, with inducements to Agents, mailed free to any address upon application to

EVANS & CO.,
677 Broadway,
New York.

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA, is now ready. Price $3 50.

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

A NEW BALLAD.

Air—"I've been roaming."

I've been strolling, I've been strolling,
Through the bookstores far and near,
Broadway up and down patrolling,
Pricing volumes cheap and dear.

But I could not, but I could not,
Any so inviting see,
As the Books I bought—who would not—
In Broadway, two seventy-three.

And I'll tell you, and I'll tell you,
Why 'twas there I chose to buy;
'Twas because when books they sell you
Splendid presents they supply.

At the American Gift Book House, 293 Broadway, watches, clocks, brooches, bracelets, parlor-games, &c., &c., are given away with the volumes sold. No blanks, but a discount of twenty per cent. to all buyers.

A. BANNEY, Agent, No. 293 Broadway.

RICH CLOTH COVERS FOR VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY ARE NOW READY. PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Booklinders will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

GEO. W. THORNE, AGENT, BOOKBINDER.

Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY. All descriptions of binding done in the best style and at the lowest rates.

No. 321 PEARL STREET,
Three Doors below Harper's Building.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies, 5 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal,

Mrs. T. P. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

This most popular German Novel of the Age.—BUNSEN.

DEBIT AND CREDIT. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. By L. C. C. With a Preface, by CHEVALIER CHARLES JOSIAS BUNSEN, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

A cordial, generous, deeply human feeling pervades the book—the picture-making is admirable.—Athenæum.

The masterly key to his intent and meaning furnished by Bunsen.—Circuit Journal.

The work is, we have no doubt, destined to create a sensation in this country.—Notes and Queries.

A story of uncommon fascination.—Athenæum.

Fruitful entertainment.—Literary Gazette.

Fresh, rich in incident, vital with character, thought, and fancy. It is so uncommon, genuine, interesting book.—Leader.

Will win the admiration of its many readers. A deep interest pervades every chapter.—News of the World.

Essentially a romance of the age—almost of the hour. We can not give any idea of the variety, ingenuity, and scholarship of this admirable story.—Spectator.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

LIFE STUDIES; or, How to Live. Illustrated in the Biographies of Bunyan, Tennyson, Montgomery, Burns, Cowper, and Mrs. Winslow. By the Rev. JOHN BAILLIE, Author of "Memoirs of Hewlings." "Admirable."—Christian Intelligencer. 16mo, 309 pages, Muslin, 60 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—NO. 57.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

PUBLISHERS' CARD.

MR. THACKERAY'S new Story, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous illustrations by the author, was commenced in the DECEMBER number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets, received from the author in advance of publication in England; for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of $2000.

☞ With the full knowledge of this arrangement, the proprietors of the New York Tribune, who have been leading advocates of an international Copyright Law, and profess the warmest regard for the interests of British authors in this country, have begun

☞ AND CONTINUED ☜

TO COPY THIS STORY FROM OUR MAGAZINE into their paper, though without the author's admirable illustrations. The same parties, under the same circumstances, reprinted upon us Mr. Dickens' "Little Dorrit," for which we paid the author TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS.

No American publisher can afford to give two thousand dollars for early sheets of a foreign work which is instantly reprinted upon him by a rival in business.

The course of the Tribune is, therefore, decidedly calculated to deprive the British author of the only compensation he can get, in the present state of the law.

STEPHEN H. TYNG, D.D.

DR. TYNG was born in Newburyport, Massachusetts, March 1, 1800, and, consequently, at the present time is fifty-eight years of age. But although verging to threescore years, he manifests all the vigorous activity of early manhood. Notwithstanding his long and arduous labors for more than thirty-five years—he labors paralleled by the records of few other ministries—his age seems to sit lightly upon him.

His father was the Hon. Dudley Atkins Tyng, who attained distinction in the legal profession. His mother was a daughter of the Hon. Stephen Higginson, whose name he bears.

His college course was pursued at Harvard, where he graduated in 1817. He was engaged in mercantile pursuits until 1819, when he commenced the study of theology. We believe that a part of his theological studies was pursued at Andover, but he subsequently studied with Bishop Griswold, at Bristol, Rhode Island.

Commencing his ministry under such auspices, Dr. Tyng has manifested through the period of his public career his fidelity to the impulses and convictions of those early years. He was ordained a deacon of the Protestant Episcopal Church on the 4th of March, 1821. He was first settled as a pastor at Georgetown, District of Columbia, in 1823. After remaining there two years, he accepted an invitation to a wider field which was opened to him in Queen Anne Parish, Prince George's County, Maryland.

In the year 1829 he was invited to become the rector of St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia. Here he soon became highly popular as a preacher, while his success as a pastor was very marked. No church in the city had ever before exhibited such thronged audiences as pressed to listen to the words of the eloquent and still youthful pastor. In 1832 he had the degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred on him by Jefferson College, and in 1833 he became rector of the Church of Epiphany in Philadelphia. Up to the spring of 1845 Philadelphia continued to be the home of his labors. In that year he removed to New York, to occupy the pulpit of the lamented Milnor, as rector of the Church of St. George. The location of the church in the lower part of the city was unfavorable to its extended growth or usefulness, and, mainly through the influence of Dr. Tyng, measures were taken for the erection of the present large and elegant edifice occupied by the congregation on Stuyvesant Square. This enterprise has been crowned by the most complete success. An edifice has been erected whose entire cost is not far from $225,000, the most, if not the whole, of which has been paid, leaving still a fund, derived from property originally given to the Parish of Trinity, amounting to $100,000. The income from the pew rents is nearly $11,000, and from the endowment nearly $6000, thus making the yearly proceeds available for the use of the church over $16,000.

Dr. Tyng's congregation is large, intelligent, and respectable. Drawn together as it has been by his individual attraction, its members are strongly attached to their pastor. Not a few are warmly enthusiastic in his favor, and a large number, from other denominations, might be called Tyngites rather than Episcopalians. Dr. Tyng is avowedly "Low Church," proclaiming at times, in an almost vaunting style, his independence of the rituals of his Church as a necessity in preaching the Gospel with power and effect to the salvation of souls, while expressing also his admiration and love for its excellent Liturgy. The Bible, and not the Prayer-book, is his guide and his rule of faith and doctrine. He cheerfully cooperates with other Christian denominations in supporting the great catholic and Christian institutions of the Church. It is rarely that any Anniversary season passes which does not witness his public advocacy of some one of them. Indeed, as regularly as their return we look for his appearance on the platform, not merely as a patron, but an advocate. In the latter character few men show themselves more capable, or are more sure of a welcome greeting. Possessed of a voice whose clear and ringing tones may be distinctly heard to the remotest corner of the largest building, he utters his words with a clearness and precision truly characteristic. If his thought is not profound it is sensible, and always vivid or striking. As you hear him, the last suggestion in regard to his connection or antecedents that would meet your sanction would be that of the man of gown and bands. One would imagine that he was almost converted to Methodism; that his spirit, overflowing with a genial appreciation of all Christian excellence, might readily be won over by the arguments of some opportune Wesley. And yet nothing could be farther from the truth. The rector of St. George leaning over—till it seems next to impossible for him to stand at all—to catch the hand of some good Congregationalist or Dutch Reformed brother, is the rector of St. George's still, and, like the leaning tower of Pisa, with all his inclination, is not in the remotest danger of losing his poise.

REV. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D.D.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

It has been our good fortune to hear him on a variety of occasions—in his pulpit, on the platform, and as a participant in discussions of public interest. But every where he retained his perfect individuality without the chance of a mistake. We have heard him eulogize Whitfield, and Wesley, and Jesse Lee Gurney; in his own pulpit; repudiate all sympathy with Papacy on the platform; and discuss matters of religious policy with leaders proud of the title of Independents. But throughout the whole, we could not escape the conviction that Dr. Tyng was the speaker; and when we considered his arguments as distinctly impressed upon the memory, we saw them stamped with the individuality of their source. "If," said he, on one occasion, "if I am to acknowledge any authority in Christianity, it shall be the man that dwells in here"—pointing with emphatic gesture to his own heart. We felt quite confident that if called upon to cast his vote for a Pontiff, it would be for Stephen I. rather than Stephen X.

Dr. Tyng is possessed of a wonderful command of language. We have heard him on occasions where his words were evidently unpremeditated, and yet each of them took its fitting place, and as paragraph after paragraph rolled on, its movements were as precise, if not as ponderous, as the measured, stately tread of marshaled ranks. There was no faltering, no sign of hesitation, no doubtful utterance. You might perhaps question whether, in a perfectly cool moment, he would make affidavit to all the positions taken on the spur of the occasion, but as to the positions themselves there could be no mistake. They were not wrapped up in fogs and vapors. They were not evolved from implications and allusions. They stood forth in the clear outline of distinct and emphatic utterance.

Dr. Tyng is devoted to his flock as a faithful pastor. The only luxury that he seems fond of indulging in, outside of parochial duty, is the platform luxury, and that is perfectly excusable as a somewhat professional one. The impulse of his energy is felt through every department of the interests of his congregation. His Sabbath School numbers over 1400 pupils, and such mission labor is performed in connection with the church. Few clergymen in this metropolis perform so much laborious service, and few exert themselves to so much effect as Dr. Tyng. His published writings, we believe, have been mostly the fruits of preparation for the pulpit. Among them are the following: "The Israel of God," "Lectures on the Law and Gospel," "Christ is All," "The Rich Kinsman"—a work republished in England—"Life of Dr. Bedell," and "Recollections of England." He is, moreover, a somewhat liberal contributor to the pages of the Protestant Churchman, while many occasional pamphlets have proceeded from his pen. The cause of moral reform generally possesses few more earnest advocates, and no man is more ready to give utterance to his convictions in its favor.

In every sphere which he is called to occupy Dr. Tyng is a man of energetic purpose. He knows precisely the point to be gained, and the means necessary to attain it. The moment of action follows that of conviction without an appreciable interval—Nothing in his case is ever lost by indecision. He may be, indeed, sometimes too impulsive. He may say things that sound rash and altogether too severe. But he means

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1858.

OUR ARMY IN UTAH.

SENATOR DAVIS, of Mississippi, has reported a bill to the Senate, in accordance with the suggestion of the Secretary of War, for the increase of the army. However plausible the grounds are on which this addition to the military force of the country is proposed, it is not likely that it can be carried into effect without a severe struggle.

The sense of the people of the United States is decidedly adverse to any measure which tends toward or looks like the establishment of a standing army. People regard the idea of a force of a thousand men now enrolled—the available force is considerably less than this—as a sort of civil police to be employed in the south or on the Texan frontier; and therefore no one takes umbrage at them. But many persons in and out of Congress are likely to consider this force large enough for their specific purpose, and to oppose any increase to the army as a mischievous precedent.

Army proper, in the sense the word is used in Europe, we evidently have none; and it has always been the policy of our Government that we have none. What wars this country may have the misfortune to engage in are not to be waged by our regular army. Our twelve or fourteen thousand men are barely sufficient to garrison a single important point. If we go to war hereafter with foreign nations, the fighting must be done—as it was in our former wars—by volunteers, levened with a due admixture of regulars.

There is a strong feeling, both in and out of Washington, in favor of placing the Utah affair—so far as the military question is concerned—as precisely the same footing as a foreign war, and conducting the contest by the aid of volunteers. It is estimated that, with the reinforcements now under orders for Utah, the force under Colonel Johnston at the present summer will not be much over 3200 effective men. This force is considerably less than that which the Mormons can muster, even though there is no reason to suppose that the rabble under the orders of Brigham Young could contend successfully for any length of time against three thousand United States troops, properly disciplined and judiciously commanded; all will be well be a grievous error on the part of the War Department to tempt the Mormons to resist by sending to them a force sufficient to control them at once. Now there is no doubt that three or four thousand effective volunteers would be raised in a few days on the Missouri and in California. From the latter State alone it is understood that the Department has received offers of five thousand men on the shortest notice. Less than this number—added to the regulars—would amply suffice, provided the volunteers were allowed by now or by and by and say one half of them mounted. Part might be raised on the Mississippi, and proceed with the first of the spring across the plains; the balance setting out, at the same time, from California.

It is likely that some such plan as this will commend itself to the favor of Congress, rather than the proposed addition to the standing strength of the army. Volunteers can be sent home when the fighting is over, and they can resume their occupations as citizens; but wealth but regular soldiers are not easily disbanded, nor the Treasury easily relieved of the cost of maintaining them.

THE NEW INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

SPEAKER ORR has appointed the following gentlemen members of an investigating committee to inquire into the alleged bribery of Congress by MESSRS. LAWRENCE, STONE, & CO., of BOSTON:—MESSRS. STANTON of Ohio, HOUSTON of Alabama, PURVIANCE of Pennsylvania, WRIGHT of Georgia, and RUSSELL of New York. Pretty general satisfaction is felt with the appointment of this committee; all the members are working men, and some of them are known to be able and conscientious.

The fact which they have before them is very simple. The report of the manufacturing company of which LAWRENCE, STONE, & Co. were agents, debits the Company with an item of $87,000 for expenses attending the passage of an act to modify the tariff in the interest of the Company. Is this entry in the Company's books correct? If so, who got the money?

The general impression, based upon the results of the Congressional corruption of last session, and upon general rumor with regard to the character of the rank and file of Congress, is in favor of the accuracy of the entry in the books of the Middlesex Company. It is generally believed that many members of Congress may be swayed by corrupt considerations. It is not believed that the three members who, last session, were convicted of having taken bribes and were most justly punished by expulsion, were the only black sheep in that large and motley flock. On the contrary, an idea is prevalent that they were scape-goats for a multitude of sinners; and that another session among the members may result in a further purification of the House, and more expulsions of knaves. Now these notions are either just or unjust. If they are just, it behooves the Committee to proceed with its work with rigor and dispatch, lest the honest aground should see that the labors of this session; if they are unjust, the duty of vindicating Congress from ungrounded aspersions is equally pressing. Whichever side of the question be the true one, the function of the Committee is equally important, and should be discharged in the same sincerity.

One word in reference to the witnesses of this alleged corruption. We refer not to the late paper-controversy allusions to Lawrence, Stone, & Co., and graceful eulogiums upon the high character of at least one member of the firm. Such strikes unbiased observers as odd, to say the least. According to their own confession—delivered in the Senate—Mr. LAWRENCE the character of Congress, and corrupted the members of the national legislature, in order to advance the pecuniary interests of the corporation with which they were connected. This appears, at first blush, to be no very high but a high-minded or honorable proceeding. The unscrupulous character of the members of the firm may have been any thing their friends please; but if they are the stand well in the Senate-chamber, they must prove that they were not parties to an act as disgraceful to the tempter as to those who succumbed to the temptation.

BURR AND HAMILTON.

THESE heroes of the early days of the Republic have once more loomed into prominence within the past few days. Lives of both have lately been written; and in each case the latest biography has attracted most attention from the critics and the newspapers.

The Life of Hamilton, of which one volume only has appeared, is written by one of his sons, Mr. John C. Hamilton; and the object of the task is simply to show that Alexander Hamilton was an honest, dull, simple-minded man, who, throughout the Revolutionary contest and the Presidential career, was nothing more than a puppet in the hands of Alexander Hamilton; that Hamilton not only wrote his own and speeches, but those of Washington as well; that Washington's only function, in fact, in public affairs, was to sign "G. Washington" to the papers which were given him to sign. Hamilton chose to compose, and to give his assistant and authority to whatever measure he thought best. Hamilton is no longer a measure of universal respect, that the claim which has now been set up for him has not yet been knocked down. Let us see how well understand the feelings which have induced his eldest and best-known son, Mr. James A. Hamilton, to publicly express his disgust, and regret at, the views propounded, and the theory set forth by his brother in this biography.

The biography to which we refer is that of Burr has given rise turns upon a very different matter. Mr. Parton, with a feeling very natural in a biographer, has done his best to vindicate Colonel Burr from the well-known charge of having violated decency and allegiance by stealing and surreptitiously docketing all the letters he had received from the numerous ladies who had loved him, not wisely, but too well. Upon this ground, on this point, diametrically opposite to that occupied by his former biographer, the late Matthew L. Davis, Mr. Parton rests his vindication of his hero has brought several new witnesses upon the stage, and their united testimony goes to overthrow the theory of the late and to confirm that of the first biographer. The confession of the Evening Journal, of Albany, is the most important of these witnesses. Another, being intimate with Matthew L. Davis, he obtained a perusal of those letters of Burr's, and from the proof-sheets was allowed to make a transcript of the man who could preserve such memorials of the sin and shame of the poor erring women he had led astray. It seems difficult to conceive what answer Mr. Parton can make to this.

The controversy may possibly damage his hero, or rather neutralize the effect which his biography might otherwise have had in elevating his fame. It has at least given a useful purpose—it may teach some poor, weak woman, trembling on the verge of ruin, that the consequences of a single false step may last for generations—that children yet unborn may live to shudder last, in their day, some one should possess a knowledge of their mother's shame, and the power to blast her memory and their legitimacy.

THE TRIBULATIONS OF THE TRIBUNE.

WE notice that the Athenæum, the London Publishers' Circular, and some other English papers are indignant at the liberty which the New York Tribune is doing to British authors, by systematically reprinting their works upon the publishers' sheets. These foreign journals naturally inquire whether this can be the same Tribune whose articles in favor of British authors have been so carefully forwarded to Great Britain, and whose editors are reported to be so anxious for the acquaintance of foreign literary men? It is surmised in certain quarters that Mr. CHARLEY who was over in England during the Crystal Palace excitement must be dead, and that his inheritance must have fallen among thieves.

The story of the Tribune's late attempt upon the person of Mr. Thackeray, and untoward detection in the act, is quite droll enough to be worth repeating. As soon as the publishers of Harper's Monthly announced that the memoirs of "The Virginians," the Tribune announced that it would reprint the work in sheets from Harper's Magazine, but from "an early English copy." Immense stress was laid upon the fact that the work was to be reprinted from such a copy, and that no use was to be made by our virtuous contemporary of the copy for which the Messrs. Harper had paid several thousand dollars. The first monthly part was no doubt reprinted, not from an English copy, but from Harper's Magazine; of course, however, with no direct evidence.

But when the proof-sheets of Part II. arrived, measures were taken to ascertain whence the English copy was obtained. Three verbal alterations were made in Thackeray's first text—as will be likely to escape even the author's notice, yet sufficient for the purpose required.

The Magazine was published on 17th December. On 18th December the second part of "The Virginians" appeared in the Semi-Weekly Tribune, with the following editorial notice:

"The monthly parts of the 'Virginians,' carefully reprinted from a London copy, will be found in the Weekly and Semi-Weekly Tribune," etc.

On reference to the Semi-Weekly and Weekly Tribune, the passages altered were found printed in those sheets precisely as they appeared in Harper's Magazine, with the alterations noted above. But it was thus evident that the monthly part, instead of being "carefully reprinted from a London copy," had been set carefully and correctly from Harper's Magazine. It was the old story; the thief in the act with the key that fitted the lock. The key and was detected alike in the theft and in the falsehood.

The following were the passages which served to convict our unhappy contemporary:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE:

THE LONDON COPY:

No. 1.—"George suddenly took it to the window, and a strange smile passed over his pale face." Chapter V., near the middle.

No. 2.—"He [George] had seen ever pointed out his perfidious heart to her sons," etc. Chapter VII., line 21.

No. 3.—"The negro servants, bearing the dishes for the approaching feast, were passing perpetually as they talked." Chapter VIII., line 16.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE:

No. 1.—"George suddenly took it to the window, and a strange smile passed over his pale face."

No. 2.—"He [George] had seen ever pointed out his perfidious heart to her sons."

No. 3.—"The negro servants, bearing the dishes for the approaching feast, were passing [illegible] continually as they talked."

THE TRIBUNE VERSION, "CAREFULLY REPRINTED FROM A LONDON COPY":

No. 1.—"George suddenly took it to the window, and a strange smile passed over his pale face."

No. 2.—"He [George] had seen ever pointed out his perfidious heart to her sons."

No. 3.—"The negro servants, bearing the dishes for the approaching feast, were passing continually as they talked."

Well, shortly after the appearance of the February Magazine, containing Part III. of "The Virginians," the Tribune of 19th January contained the following notice:

"THE GERMAN'S VIRGINIANS: Part III. of this interesting novel is given complete in the Semi-Weekly Tribune of this evening, reprinted from a London copy which arrived last night by the west of the America. 'The Virginians' will be found in this day's evening edition of the Daily Tribune as well," etc.

On reference to the evening edition of the Daily Tribune of January 19, we find that the passage about the liveries is printed as given in the Magazine, and not as the London copy has it; and that another passage, altered by the publishers of the Magazine to catch the Tribune, is given as altered. The following comparison exhibits the unfortunate Tribune in a very ridiculous light:

THE LONDON COPY:

No. 1.—"We have we here, with the two negro boys in livery!" Chapter IX., near the beginning.

No. 2.—"And in a mysterious gentleman's house, considering the opportunities he has had," etc. Chapter IX., a few lines further on.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE:

No. 1.—"Who have we here, with the two negro boys in their livery!"

No. 2.—"And in an extremely genteel young man, considering the opportunities he has had," etc.

THE TRIBUNE VERSION, "REPRINTED FROM A LONDON COPY RECEIVED BY THE MAIL OF THE 7 ARRIVED."

No. 1.—"Who have we here, with the two negro boys in livery?"

No. 2.—"And in a [illegible] genteel young man, considering the opportunities he has had," etc.

The Five Points pickpocket, who was caught the other day with a gentleman's watch in his hand, and who insisted, and swore positively, in presence of the owner, that the watch had been given him by a very dear friend, is not to be more hot in a pot without successful imitators. But if the pickpocket, after his detection, had abused the owner of the watch for having his initials engraved on it, and accused him, with volcanic vituperation, of destroying the whole work of art by his clumsy fashion of his case and that of the proprietors of the Tribune would be perfect.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NUBILLO.

THE beautiful picture at Williams and Stevens's gallery, in which the Marshal Soult's wife sits for it. An engraving of the Conception of the Louvre may be seen at the gallery, and the difference between the fine figures of the Aujawall pictures, and the spasmodic lines and pulses which they held. Both are as much in the Louvre as Rembrandt.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Transcript says that the picture is grossly misrepresented by the engraving, and that the correspondent certainly forgets.

The dogma of the Conception was peculiar to Seville. Ford, in his capital "Hand-Book for Spain," tells us that in 1615 the Dominican monks of Seville asserted that the Virgin was born free from the pains and penalties of original sin. The rivals of the Dominicans, the Franciscans, refused to give a form of salutation peculiar to Seville; and the painters, whose trade it was to carve dry-goods' figure translations and theories, soon began to illustrate it upon canvas. The Inquisition decreed that the sinless Virgin should be represented in a certain manner—that she should stand upon a crescent moon, lean on a cloud, be crowned with twelve stars, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars," and that she should be draped in blue and white.

Murillo, who was born in 1616—only three years after the dogma was announced—was the most unusual all artists as the painter of "the Conception", or, more properly speaking, of the Virgin of Immaculate Conception, as they are of sinless mothers.

The Assumption, of which subject Titian and Correggio have left us the celebrated pictures, is a very different thing. It represents the ascent of the Virgin into heaven, and the air of rapid upward movement is the chief merit of the conception of Titian's great picture. But in the Conception the Virgin stands on a rapt Seraphic carpet. It is not an event, but an idea.

It is, therefore, with perfect propriety called the Conception, because it is painted in commemoration of that dogma. The conception lies in confounding with it the idea of the ascent of the soul. This picture is in honor of the Madonna, without reference to the Son. It is the form set given to the theory that she was conceived in sin. And this important point, upon which the learned Dominicans and Franciscans differed, was recently finally settled by the Pope.

A REQUISITION UPON GOVERNOR KING.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER.—On behalf of several ladies, I call on you to remonstrate further in favor of the next to make some explanation to the public of the reasons for the appointment to which have pointed to first man convicted of the greatest crime against a woman ever committed. Is there not a fitness in the selection of men for Governor King; but many among them, and I for one, would like to know if it be respect enough for us to explain this action, which, as matters now stand, becomes incredible? Respectfully yours, MARY JENKINS."

—The Lounger certainly agrees with MRS. MARY JENKINS, that when convicts are pardoned it is desirable to have some statement made to satisfy the natural curiosity of the public. But, meanwhile, Mrs. Jenkins ought to remember that the Governor is an officer who is very closely watched and severely criticised; that he is known to be supposed to have an interest in causing the laws to be obeyed; and, as a man of sense, is not very likely to put forth certain pardon-papers for nothing.

So, even if the reasons are not given, the Lounger er hopes that Mrs. Jenkins and her friends will not successfully inflict that our chief magistrate commits at crime.

AN ECHO.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—That touching Valediction to the Old Year, in a late number of the Weekly, smote a very different chord in my lyre.

"How can those hold it 'good speed' to whom it has borne sorrow and misfortune, rather than 'hailing on its wings?'

"Scarcely hoping that this will prove worthy of insertion, it may, nevertheless, present another view of the same subject, and mirror more hearts than that loving 'Farewell:'

"Ne joyous chimes, from merry bells,
Exultant ring victorious peals,
As veteran Time his car propels
Toward the year's goal, on tingid wheels.

"More sternly now he guides the steeds,
Than when the caress was strewn with flowers;
And swifter past each moment speeds
Since noon has searched the fleeting hours.

"His deathless scythe unheeded trails
O'er piles of love and fields of joy;
Time hears no prayers, regards no wails,
Though ancient lads the edge destroy.

"Then why should throbbing hearts or bells
Hail the grim victor with glad peals?
Sons of sweet hopes that fade
Can stay those flying chariot-wheels!"

ELLA.

WHAT WILL YOU DO WITH HER?

Is the little neighboring town of Orange, Mrs. Lucy Sloan, a woman of intelligence, sense, and spirit, declines to pay her taxes.

Why?

Because, she says, there should be no taxes without representation.

That was a good doctrine on Bunker Hill and in Boston Harbor some eighty-four or five years ago. It remains to see how it will work in Orange.

She is entirely correct—woman—and the tax-gatherer can hardly push that argument very far—for she is also a peaceable, useful citizen; and it must be a very stupid tax-gatherer indeed who would persuade sensible people in Orange that so good a citizen ought to be taxed without representation.

It is, in fact, a brave little cosy d'état in favor of "Woman's Rights;" and its success would hardly peril the prosperity of any country: for even if the Lords of Creation should graciously allow their female slaves to vote, they are very few of them who would take the trouble to exercise the right.

EARLY SPRING STYLES.

IF the painter of a picture or the singer of a song is properly called a public benefactor, what shall be said of the man who creates a new fashion? The Lounger is sure of his welcome, for this week at least, by reason of the page in Mrs. Sloan's book which is sure to be echoed before many weeks in the most instructive toilets upon Broadway—toilets so capacious that even he who writes may recognize one of the old FASHION RESTORED.

CRINOLINE are but revivals of the past,
Says Solomon, who, experienced flirt,
And all that shall be done while Time shall last
Is but what was done in the great old days
In Tyches and Nineveh, and Babylon.
They lived the lives we live, we smile or groan,
And the old folks at home in Zabulon,
Were, now their children's wages-by, our own.
'Tis very true—nothing at all is new,
And what the Romans did we may do.
We take and steep again, we work and rest,
Marry and bull, eat dinners and digest,
And like the small that crawled five feet by day,
To fall back four by night, are they.
Is what is called the "progress of society"
A treadmill round that people think variety.
And all we name invention and discovery
Is of our issues merely a recovery.

If you will read the Bible you will find Yourself and friends as Demas, Og, and Pharaoh,
And man, the creature of the mighty mind,
Hope back and forth the same by rank-and-sparrow:
In dress this truth is most of all conspicuous,
Ter dant we see our ancestors ter uno
Lete their grandmothers, make themselves ridiculous
Another year their hoops will roll and swell
To make room for some other new-old notion.
Perhaps ere long the mob will wear our sleeves
When Fashion's Emperor, from beyond the ocean,
Into our streets brings deadened leopard-skin.
Our popeje trousers are but old trunk hose,
Made to disguise our lack of manly grace—
Don't barely words, it is as I suppose—
And female dress is but a mimic war
Of facts! Amie antique our locks we perfume o'er,
To please with sweet-pig and Macassar oil,
And now the ago demande but one thing more—
The real old luxury of PAPILLATURE!

With what sweet confidence we'd trust a man
Who were around his wife awake a test,
Or who about his shaving store-slips put
The words of Scripture, by no common vexed:
Confession-ages, indeed, we all would be
(At least) were we to do as Solomon did!
And on the pave white forehead of a belle,
With Wisdom's kisses we would leave our quarrel,
For when we have perused her features well
The only thing left is this rosy record:
And if there's nothing in that pretty head
Nobody, we should have nothing to read.
Perhaps some holy text inscribed on high
Would win the lovely maid to duty;
Upon the borders of your garments wide,
Fair ladies, a whole chapter might be placed!
A Psalm upon the bosom would be nice,
Bordered in gentle, or on white satin traced.
Knowing the Scriptures would suit the fashion
In boudoirs where they lately read Tom Moore,
And new Polytheisms the last new passion—
A good excuse to vote hard times a bore!
What nothing then to theorize for "new styles!"
What tearing woollen and embroidering suits!
What tossing up and down the shops all day!
What working 6am, chenille, and Berlin wools!

On the broad brow of widows' vails we'd see
Some texts from "Lamentations" or "Job" say,
And "brow of handkerchief" and sleeves would be Instructive to the sweet every day.

A lady's glove or her manchette would teach
A holy lesson to her hand at once,
And her Balmoral petticoat would preach
Whole sermons, on the way that she should go.
To edify her brain there would be room
Upon her bonnet brim, however small,
And gentle promptings to her heart might come
From her mantilla, or her Cashmere shawl.
The High Church bells black letter then would seek,
Lete Proclytenses appear all better for
Cadeur de rose for beauty, youth, and glee.
And green, perhaps, shall for you and me!

The great new phrase will be "Evangelical."
Will soon be far more useful than Phraseology
To teach us how to reach victorious peals,
And how to find out truth and honesty.
For surely no man would deceive his brother,
Or by cozening do his home a fee
Hypocrisy is rarely out of date
In the year one thousand fifty-eight!

Thus have I told you, in these idle rhymes,
Of an old fashion suited to the times:
Which is all one can do in prose or verse
To all our Rabbis, of whatever persuasion,
To all the rich, the learned, and the wise,
To all who feel, or love self-upgoodwritten,
And useful matter of all in politicians,
And Pharisees, whatever their conditions,
Who love to scrape acquaintance with the stars.
Greetings in church, in market, or "the street,"
And bow to kings of rats at their receipts!
For merits they would speak of with reserve,
Their secret prudence might not be revealed,
But blazoned forth to all, a glorious show,
Would be their modesty, their virtue proved,
And virtue triumph, even in old ole!

O. LAW RAY, Neighboring House.

NEITHER HANDY NOR MANNERLY.

HOW to advance the name, and raise his name he spelled like ordinary sown or with a more aristocratic go. It seems that a very flourishing branch of the Knickerbocker family, which we have had occasion to follow in a worthy comparison of the communities of Mrs. Mellicent Johnson, has existed for three weeks in a tin sign nailed against one side of the best the architecture of the Sanding proverbial Pine street in Rest? also, over the door leading to the cabin on the left of the Bowery.

"NOT Hoggs's favorite amusement to while away the time, and the Lounger is not sure that what was once a lounge gradually over from the other side, and finally became a favorite resort for the crowd of gentlemen and gentlemen on the side sacred from tobacco fumes. Whether this was the reason that the name appeared in the crowd, but ingeniously pieces himself to windward of it think that is the term—of us, and emphatically pulls his vile cigar-smoke into the face of those who are thought to gain, by standing outside, a taste of fresh and unadulterated air. Shall we allow this thing? Will Hogge gets betwixt us and the free air of heaven?

"DEAR LOUNGER,—I am a New-Yorker, and belong to every body, but Hogge that it is neither manly nor masterly to smoke in the face of a lady, and especially for sport for ladies—and gentlemen? Won't you tell your Brooklyn friends all that, that we are not always smoking on the wrong side of the boat, that's Hogge?

"WHAT will the ferryman to mind his own business? YOURS,

A NEW-YORKER who sleeps in Brooklyn.

OUR LETTER-BOX.

Wednesday Morning, January, 1858.

"PERSIANT LOUNGER,—I put my pen to the paper for the first time to wish you a happy New Year. And I wish you may enjoy all blessings happiness.

"I have just finished reading your short greed by your pen, and I am more than ever convinced that Harper's Weekly is the best paper in the country for the volume. No. 2.

"I feel by candies that I can not do without it and its mother the Magazine. I have been told I read nothing else than Harper's, and I am proud of the compliment.

"Pahlada has two newly-fledged Musical Doctors. I don't know whether it will give them their names B.—D.—, H. D., or how they will call them. I don't know?

"I don't know that I have flattered you enough in this to secure admission, but I am determined to do so before you may hear from me again, or this is my "FIRST ATTEMPT ought to be aware that he has not flattered enough to secure a satisfactory or ample answer. If he had not, he would have been chasted by the grace and illumanated by the art of the incomparable Lounger. We are sorry to perceive by hope that some reply to his foolish questions might be vouchsafed through the columns of the widely-circulated and highly-intelligent journal with which he is, happily for the public, connected,* why, then the Lounger is not sure that he is not under bonds to him to satisfy the inquiring FIRST ATTEMPT. It would extinguish the dignity and independence of the Press (for the Lounger is not sure that the papers) to yield to so slight an importunity. The Lounger has a dignity to keep which is dear to his fellow-editors which he can not forget except upon condition of a more liberal flattery.

* Tribune, January, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—I am very glad to hear that for twenty months we are to be sure of the great monthly entertainment of a new novel by Thackeray. I think the new one begins better than any before. It is such a pretty picture of old colonial life in Virginia, and he makes such a hero of Washington. He describes him just as I fancy him to have been, a very young man, grave and serious, but full of sensitive honor and manliness. Then how natural the passage is in which he tells you how you make for I suppose you are named Harper, too; I understand that Thackeray is fond of his nephews and nephews, a great point, to give the original illustrations. I heartily agree with what you say in your number for December 26th about the value of the cuts, and the pretty manner he puts into them. But do you see how tender and sweet he is getting to be? There are a great many people who have never read Thackeray's books before, because they think he is a sort of snarling satirist and skeptic. But I think he is coming out in a new style now. Go on, dear Lounger, prosper and print away. You have thousands of friends and loyal I am one of them.

"YOURS most sincerely, STEPHEN W. B.

—The Lounger entirely agrees with his friend Stephen, that there is an exquisite mellowness of tone in the new novel. Which is happier for it to say previous work of Thackeray's except the Newcomes. It is quite the perfection of strong, sweet, ability. The Lounger is fearfully having alliteration the Lounger gives way to another correspondent.

OUR COLLEGE SECRET SOCIETIES.

"MR. LOUNGER,—As one who has not been a member of one of our colleges can have an idea to what extent secret societies exist in them, I will endeavor briefly to lessen over the students. They are conducted somewhat on the plan of the Masonic societies—possessing chapters throughout the country, having their grip, secret passwords, and "The United States contains about 130 colleges, and there exist in these colleges at least 50 distinct secret societies, spreading chapters for and wide. There is but one entirely honorable secret society in the country, and that is Phi Beta Kappa (Φ B K), which has many chapters, and takes only the best eight or ten men of each graduating class. I once was the Skull & Bones, a Senior society. That of Yale is the only chapter which they have in the Northern States, and they will take no one. Their initiation fee is said to be $100, and they built themselves a very handsome house in New Haven. The hall has no windows in it, but is lighted by a sky-light from above.

"A curious anecdote is related of one of the members of the faculty of Yale College who was a member of this fraternity. Their hall, it seems, took fire some time ago, and, with characteristic secrecy, they endeavored to put it out; but the venerable professor stood at the entrance of the hall, and, with his cane, knocked down all the first man who attempted to enter. The fire was at length quenched by the members of the fraternity.

"Another true Senior society is that of Scroll and Key. The oldest of the local societies in the United States is Sigma Phi (Σ Φ), founded in 1817 at Union. Its badges now consider itself foremost that gets a chapter at Harvard. Next in age is Delta Kappa (Δ K), founded at Cornets Psi Upsilon (Ψ Υ), whose parent chapter is at Union, and which numbers about 35 chapters, among which are Yale, Columbia, University of New York, etc. Delta Phi (Δ Φ) is the next oldest, and also exists in Delta Kappa Epsilon, founded at Yale, 1844. This numbers about 30 chapters, among which are Brown University, Free Academy, University of Virginia, etc. Alpha Delta Phi (Α Δ Φ) was founded at Hamilton in 1832, was once a very good society. It numbers 18 chapters, some of which are very good, and others very poor. Among them are the Williams Free Academy, etc. Phi Kappa Sigma, whose chapters are at Jefferson, Penn., and Pennsylvania, numbers some 12 chapters. Delta Phi has some seven chapters, and is a very good society. There are now a few small societies left, such as Delta Psi, Chi Psi, Zeta Psi, Theta Delta Chi.

"I am writing this article I might say a few words about a fine Freshman society founded at Yale in 1849, called the Psi Upsilon, which has 15 chapters. Its badge is a Greek Psi, and its motto, Evangelical Religion. Some of the badges are plain enough to be worn in public, but I will not describe them. Some of Delta Kappa Epsilon, Psi Upsilon, Sigma Phi, and Delta Phi are very fine. The latter has the shape of a diamond, and the latter is square; there are many other very fine societies, but I will not take up time in mentioning them. In summing up the advantages of these societies, I will say that they are a bond of union and friendship which they promote between members. In fact, they become as brothers to each other.

"COLLEGIAN."

—COLLEGIAN is a bold fellow. The Lounger has a dim recollection of personal manner, and some of his comparisons and epithets. Why should a young man, just starting in life, draw the whole Greek alphabet about his ears, like a swarm of bees? Is he aware that Alpha Delta Phi's and Delta Phi's are not always on the most amicable? Does he know that no college grounds are large enough to hold in peace two youths, one of whom has taken the Phi Kappa Sigma, and the other Delta Kappa Epsilon, and both in a virulent form?

And will COLLEGIAN explain how it is that all the Greek characters, when applied to college societies, however they may be arranged, always spell pa-pa-ish?

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

A PUFF FOR THE POLICE.

"THAT BOHEMIAN Dublin Law was not such a bad thing after all," said Asterik across the dinner-table, to me, the other day. "To be sure the Commissioners were better than they deserved. They discover no burglaries; they break up no gambling-houses; they are not to be seen in the street-bullies with the greatest respect; they enforce none of the ordinances against the plundering of the unwilling at oysters and strangers with wine our gates; in fact, they do nothing that they ought to do; but, for all that, pretty uniform is the look No. 3 the other day for Captain Paixhan, 37th Regiment, U.S.A.); see what a lot of fat places they have given to fellows who can't find anything else to do; read the wise resolutions they make, and pass over them in the general orders of the Superintendent. Why, they have printed a book wherein is expressed what the men ought to do and ought to look; but, gracious and talk; how they ought to keep their boots and faces clean; how they ought to look particularly after you and I and every body else, and see that we walk in the straight and narrow path of virtue, temperance, and gallantry. They are to be the keepers of our consciences and our morals, and if they see a thief they are to tell him afraid if he be willing, otherwise they are to let him go in peace and look out for a young man.

Just then Asterik and I were crossing the Park toward Beekman Street, through the alley which is in most thickly-settled parts of the residential circumstances, who, to hide their clumsy many demands upon the passers-by under cover of some industrial services rendered, always have a wretched broom. It is a curious thing, by-the-way, that no one ever saw a crossing-sweeper with a new broom, or an omnibus-driver with a new hat. Asterik scattered a few pennies among the young ladies, when forth from the City Hall came a platoon of police, who changed upon the enemy in good order. Notwithstanding the imminent danger, the force was firm. The orders of the officer in command were delivered in a firm and steady tone of voice, and the men behaved in the best manner. The crossing-sweepers, reinforced by some young gentlemen in the boiled-shirt line, made a skillful retreat toward Centre Street, leaving two brooms and a blacking-box each upon the field of battle. The force then marched back in the same order, were relieved from duty, and allowed to play dominoes for the rest of the day.

I have not as yet seen any special official notice of this gallant achievement; but I am confident that it will be applauded by resolution in the Board, and recommended as a special order. Why not? If there are no policemen when an independent citizen takes a fancy to kill another independent citizen in the public street, or when men are beaten or robbed, let us at least do something, and annihilate the loafing-sweepers and lamb-blacks. It is a safe exercise, and keeps the men from becoming rusty.

EFFLUENDA AT THE OPERA.

"SO," remarks the brightest and best, "the Opera is over? The dear child was taken to the 'intelligent and fashionable' audience that assisted at the last night of Madame Bosio's benefit? Think," she said, "much of Mozart, and as for La Cruvelli, did you ever hear such a shaky voice? why, it 'subsided' about just as much as the Old Year. And I see what poor Don Giovanni wasted with three such Leporellos as Formes, Amodio, and Beneventano. I don't see how the poor fellow ought to have been punished at all. Why can't we have a pretty prima donna?" "Why," I suggested, modestly, "I have yet to hear one who could have excluded that another woman was pretty." "Now, how can you say so?" she cried. "Why, Madame Bosio's voice her beauty was acknowledged, but you finished her by turning up that dear nose—the prettiest in the world—and looking at her sadly." "And Mademoiselle Labocetta was good-looking, and pitied him for being obliged to be dragged about by that great coarse through the whole Opera, and doing nothing at all. With Formes she was much delighted, but thought it strange that he could sing with his mouth full of macaroni. Certainly, as she says, Carl Formes is one of the greatest singers that ever lived, and one of the greatest that has ever visited us. He has the nicest way of making himself on good terms with the audience; and he has a voice which has no audible familiarity. He is a perfectly satisfactory artists in every regard of view. Ellsworth's success is also rapidly increasing democratic tendencies of the Opera audiences. "The ladies," she says, "go in their best dresses, and bonnets, which they have to take off, while the men appear in business coats, and common gloves. Now, I think, the gentlemen might be done about this matter, and suggest an indignation meeting of well-dressed people to take the matter into serious consideration."

Meantime the Opera is gone, and the Bohemian has lost their favorite lounge. But there is a ray of light in the distance. Maretzek has succeeded in getting nearly all the doubloons that Max Maretzek can spare, and the Academy should here early next month, when we may hope to hear Rosina Vestri. As a matter of course, the Italian musically-inclined and tenor-admiring young ladies I may say that their favorite, Brignoli, is somewhat fatter, and somewhat shorter than formerly. And I am utterly disgusted with the Havanese journals, which have applied the actual accusation to him.

A PUNDIT! A MOONSHEE!

MR. ASPINWALL is exhibiting his Murillo in the print shop of Williams & Stevens, for the benefit of the public, for a short time only, before he sets it. It is called "The Immaculate Conception," by which of the original. There is no doubt as to its genuineness, and if any one desires to read a criticism upon it, he may find about five hundred in different papers in the shape of reviews. The pundit, however, has been writing to one of the daily papers such comments as these:

"With all due deference to Messrs. Williams & Stevens, permit me to inquire in what Gallery in Europe can be found a picture of Murillo entitled 'The Immaculate Conception?'

"The Conception of note may be found one or more paintings representing the Virgin Mother ascending to heaven, with the cherubs and seraphs in attendance accompanying her there. In some of these pictures the Virgin is represented as gazing up to the sky in ecstasy, or looking from her lofty throne upon the earth, but I have never seen one in which she was the subject of the Virgin.'

—The picture is in Seville in 1635. The present Pope, during the last three years, promulgated the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, and Murillo's picture is the work—his master-piece—in his 'Assumption of the Virgin'—doubtless this very picture now on exhibition in this city. Mr. Aspinwall has made a very fortunate purchase, at the enormous price he paid for the gem, and we hope he will exhibit it. Yet another and exact copy of this work now exists in the Louvre. The real picture was painted by Murillo for the Church of Capuchins by the King of Holland? and in it now owned by Mr. Aspinwall.

The number of blunders that a man can make in a few lines is remarkably well developed in the pundit's criticism. The picture is entitled "The Immaculate Conception." The dogma was held by many of the Popes—the Immaculate Conception being before Murillo's time. The first picture by this artist upon the same subject is in the Murillo Gallery at Seville, and is called as above in the Official Catalogue. The picture in the Louvre (see Catalogue), "The Immaculate Conception," was purchased by the nation, in 1852, for six hundred thousand francs. It was the queen picture of every one of the Murillo keepsakes published by Marshall Soult. I believe this to have been the picture which Murillo painted for the church of the Capuchins at Seville where he was baptized, as Rubens painted his finest work, "The Crucifixion of Saint Peter," for St. Peter's Church at Cologne. And let me tell you not to miss seeing it if you ever happen to be in the nasty place. Mr. Aspinwall's picture is a copy by the master's own hand; and there are four or five more, for the subject was a favorite one with Murillo. Mr. Aspinwall's picture is not so fine, in some important respects, as that in the Louvre, and its best points are spoiled by being exhibited by gaslight. As for the question of originality, it would be difficult to say which of the Conceptions was first painted, but the burden of proof is in favor of the small picture in the Gallery at Seville.

LIFE IN HONG KONG.

NEWSPAPER correspondents in Hong Kong are sketching for you pen some of the salient manifestations of Celestial character. First come a numerous class, half horse half stevedore, who load and unload ships, man the sedan-chairs wherein prudent men perambulate the streets, transport packages, and have the carrying trade generally in their hands—or on their shoulders. They form the largest half of the population of Hong Kong, and are a miserable, brutish, knavish set as can well be imagined. Many of them are athletic and well-made, a few are slightly good-looking, but the majority are half-starved, cadaverous customers, clothed in rags and half-putrid sores, and giving one the idea that a close examination would discover them to be fly-blown. They are found in crowds, sitting under trees or beneath verandas, by the road-side, cracking obscene jokes and waiting for a job. (N.B. A Chinese joke or vulgarity is something so indecent that the veriest ragamuffin of the Five Points would hide his face in shame at its recital.) Their only clothing is a pair of short, baggy drawers, loosely covering the loins, and a bamboo hat, which latter serves not only for head-gear, umbrella, and parasol, but also as a place of deposit for a long-stemmed opium-pipe, or a stack whereon to suspend fish, which swing from the edge of the broad brim and dry in the sun to their Coolie owner and wearer ambles along. They are mostly addicted to opium, and worse the chief part of their subsistence—that is to say, their earnings and pilferings—upon the drug. Their average earnings are about 100 cash (or 20 cents) per day, 80 of which, or 16 cents, many of them devote to their opium-pipes. They have a very poor reputation for honesty—in fact, have no character to speak of—and are not nearly so highly valued as the boats whose labor they in part perform. They die generally of starvation, if they are not carried off by some loathsome disease, the consequence of opium-smoking and other evil habits.

THE COOLIES,

A CHINESE VIRGIN.

It is strange that in most semi-civilized and barbarous countries there should be prescribed by custom a difference in dress between the girl and the married woman. In Queen Elizabeth's time, it was the custom in England for young women to proclaim their maidenhood by wearing the bosom bare—a species of allurement toward matrimony of which some fashionable New York dowagers might take advantage with profit to their fair charges. On the Gold Coast of Africa you may know a maiden by the peculiar shape of her upper garment. In parts of Australasia the unmarried female is distinguished by a face and neck unmasked by the fashion of the tattooer, the woman, on marriage, having her husband's peculiar mark immediately tattooed upon her—a sort of "John + Kanaka, his mark," I suppose. In Japan girls are, on marriage, obliged to blacken their teeth; and a white-toothed fair one is sure to be "disengaged." Well, in China the single female is known by the manner in which she wears her hair. Before marriage she plaits it in a long tail, just as the men do. When she gets married it is turned up behind in a vast, sharp, rudder-like knot, ingeniously fastened up by pins, and decorated with flowers, and looking as though it would violently jerk back the head of the wearer and dislocate her neck. A head dressed in this way would make an excellent vane; but I am sure one of these ladies would find it difficult to make headway in the street with the wind abeam. In addition to this decoration the Celestial married female indulges freely in paint. The lower lip, in particular, is dyed the brightest of scarlet.

Your small-footed woman is generally a wife, and has several splay-footed concubines to do her house-work for her. The children of these concubines (by her lord and master) are her slaves, to do with as she pleases. This is a necessary regulation for the protection of the small-footed one, who are mostly cripples, and unable to walk without support. The six or seven stages of lunging and doubling-up which their feet undergo, cause the sinews of the calf to waste entirely away, leaving the leg no larger than a common walking-stick, shriveling what should have been the feet, and forcing the sufferer to walk upon the point of the great toe and the remnant of the heel-ball—two extremities which are joined solidly in one.

"THE ONE PIECIE BARBER-MAN."

Virgins, although they wear tails like their fathers and brothers, do not shave the front part of the head, as these do. Part of the hair is cut tolerably short, and combed down over the forehead, giving the wearer a most ill-favored countenance. The moslish young ladies have pig-tails frequently extending to within a few inches of the ground; and a stranger can scarcely help admiring the long black hair of a young Celestial. Unfortunately for myself, a rather close inspection of the tail of one of these Celestial beauties revealed to me, some years ago, the fact that the greater part of it was ingeniously formed of silk, colored to resemble her own raven tresses, and twisted in in such manner that only a very close inspection would reveal the cheat. The men, in like manner, extend their tail —or, rather, have it done for them; and the individual who performs this and other tonsorial operations on the usale Celestial is the street barber, known, in the barbarous lingua franca prevailing on Canton River, as the "One piecie barber-man." Him you may see plying his razor, scissors, etc., from early morning till dusk, generally under some convenient tree by the road-side. The Celestial head-piece is first carefully shaven, after which the Celestial pig-tail is carefully unplaited, cleansed of the accumulated dust of several weeks, and then replaited, with, if necessary, additional silk, to give it that great length which is considered the correct thing in the Celestial fashion of pig-tails.

CONTEMPLATING SMALL FEET.

The mass of Chinese in Hong Kong are working people, and among these, necessarily, the luxury of small feet is comparatively unknown. Nevertheless small feet are to be seen, and proud enough of them are their bobbledehoys of owners, limping along in the most ridiculously superfluous way. There are, however, those who have risen from the ranks, and whose fast, full-grown ere their owners attained the requisite wealth and position, refuse now to be cramped. Such resort to artificial means to produce the desired effect upon beholders. There is my tailor's wife, for instance, who wore shoes, the thick soles of which are sharpened off before and behind, so that she actually hobbles along upon two stumps not more than an inch and a half in diameter. The trick is very ingeniously done, and I should have not seen through it but for the treachery of an envious neighbor of hers, who exposed to me this mystery also of the Celestial toilet.

DRESS OF A CHINESE LADY.

And now for some idea of the dress of a Chinese lady of the better class. She wears mostly a sort of jacket of blue silk and very loose petticoat trowsers—also of blue or black silk. In place of a hat, she wears a three-cornered handkerchief tied under the chin; a delicate French umbrella protects her from the sun when she walks out; and a wrinkled duenna in like manner protects her (or tries to) from the too ardent glances of any stray Jack Tar. However, from these there is but little danger. I defy any but the most exhaltic of women-worshipers to admire the women of Southern China. The only genuinely beautiful Celestial I ever saw was at the Mauritius, and she had been imported by her old Turk of a husband from one of the northern provinces, where, I understand, beauty is plentiest. The taste for the bahoom-like faces of Hong Kong women is, I fancy, like that for mangoes, an acquired one. I have learned to like mangoes; but my tailor's wife still excites in me only unmitigated disgust.

CELESTIAL LADIES.

A ONE PIECIE BARBER-MAN.

CHINESE COOLIES.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXVI.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Antioch.—The old Cemetery.—History of the City and Historical Associations.—Barnabas and Paul.—Commencement of Paul's Ministry.—Roman Empire.—The Crusades and the great Battle of Antioch.—Mohammed Dey again.—A Present to Miss Grandison.—Last days in the East.—An American Clergyman.

WERE I to write you half that in any one hour I think, here in the old Christian city, you would not find space in volumes to print it. For thought has infinite speed here, and moments are ages. One glance of the eye sweeps down the hill-side and down eighteen centuries at the same instant.

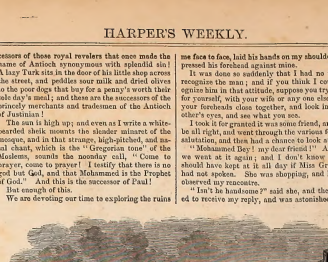
In the old cemetery on the bank of the Orontes I gather up a handful of dust, and in it I believe there are particles that have done duty for Christian martyrs, Roman soldiers, Persian invaders, pilgrims, monks, Moslem, and Pagan, of every age since the days of the Apostles.

If you will reflect one moment, you will understand the emotions one must necessarily feel in Antioch. First and foremost are the associations connected with the early history of the Church. Here the wanderers of Cyprus and Cyrene, who had heard the story of Christ in Jerusalem, preached it with such wonderful effect that Barnabas came from the Holy City to see the great work. And he, beholding the advances made by the new creed, went over to Tarsus and brought Paul, and the two preached here for a year.

This was the commencement of the ministry of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, and here his ministry was honored by the disciples being called first by the name of their Master—a name then indeed of reproach, but in a few years to be of honor and power, which Roman Emperors would delight to bear.

I need not call your attention to the prominent position Antioch occupies in the history of the Apostles. I have studied it over here with intense interest. I think there is little doubt that Luke was a physician here. It seems to me the narrative shows it clearly, and that Paul found him here when they commenced their journeys in company.

After these early years of the Christian Church Antioch began to take its place in the Eastern world as the chief city of Asia. This position it continued to hold until the twelfth century. All readers know of the splendor which rivaled that of Rome and Byzantium, in fact surpassed them both. Then came the Crusades, with their stories of romance. I know not in all battle-histories one which is more thrilling than that of the insane joy of the Crusaders shut up in Antioch over the supposed finding of the spear that had pierced the side of Christ, and the splendor of their sally, the rout of the enemy, and the grand victory of Godfrey and his noble friends.



Sad old city now. The sunshine mocks the decaying ruins of the once magnificent Antioch. The wind laughs at my story! Was this Antioch?

An old woman—the veritable successor of those old women you read of in the "Arabian Nights"—has been beckoning to me from a neighboring house-top the last hour, and inclining that there are dancing-girls there, who will be glad to show themselves in their vile postures for a consideration; and these miserable wretches are the successors of those royal revelers that once made the name of Antioch synonymous with splendid sin! A lazy Turk sits in the door of his little shop across the street, and peddles sour milk and dried olives to the poor dogs that buy for a penny's worth their sole day's meal; and these are the successors of the princely merchants and tradesmen of the Antioch of Justinian!

The sun is high up; and even as I write a white-bearded sheik mounts the slender minaret of the mosque, and in that strange, high-pitched, and nasal chant, which is the "Gregorian tone" of the Moslems, sounds the noonday call, "Come to prayer; come to prayer! I testify that there is no god but God, and that Mohammed is the Prophet of God." And this is the successor of Paul!

But enough of this.

We are devoting our time to exploring the ruins

ON THE HOUSE-TOP.

which abound. They are chiefly of the time of the Crusades. Few are older. The walls, which are the chief subjects of interest, are magnificent relics. It would be worth your while to stand for half an hour in one of these old towers and hear the ring of the old steel on armor. Mayhap your ears would not be as sharp as mine to hear it, after the lapse of eight hundred years, but you might imagine it. Stout blows have been struck all along this line of wall, and yonder, where the castle once towered in the pride of its strength, men have done deeds for the cross of Christ that will live in song and story so long as they shall be said or sung.

Do you remember my friend Mohammed Bey, whom I met in Jerusalem, and about whom I told you a Fourth of July story?

Yesterday I was walking quietly along the principal street of Antioch, with Miss Kate Grandison on my left, and John Stenebarger and the old gentleman a little way in the rear, when some one met me face to face, laid his hands on my shoulders, and kissed his forehead against mine.

It was done so suddenly that I had no time to recognize the man; and if you think I could recognize him in that attitude, suppose you try it once for yourself, with your wife or any one else. Put your foreheads close together, and look into each other's eyes, and see what you see.

I took it for granted it was some friend, and must be all right, and went through the various forms of salutation, and then had a chance to look at him.

"Mohammed Dey! my dear friend!" And then we went at it again; and I don't know but we should have kept at it all day if Miss Grandison had not spoken. She was shopping, and had not observed my rencontre.

"Isn't he handsome?" said she, and then turned to receive my reply, and was astonished to see me face to face, laid his hands on my shoulders, and kissed his forehead against mine.

"Ishallah! where it pleases Him. But are you well, and are these your friends?"

I presented him. Miss Kate was admiring a little negro boy, who was part of his suite. He was a very handsome little Nubian, and his dress was exquisite. That evening he presented himself to Miss Kate as her property. Mohammed saw her admiration, and sent him as a token of his own regard for my friends. If I was puzzled about my smiles and text, you may imagine the bother of my English friends about the slave. But we shall devise a way to take care of him, and he has already become a general favorite.

We lodge in or on a house of modern Antioch, and pass most of our evenings and nights on the house-top. This is, in point of fact, an upper terrace, from which rooms open in various directions. It is the roof of the rooms on the ground floor. It looks down into the court, which is partly roofed over with reeds and mats. Was it not such a roof that was broken up to let the sick man down into the presence of the Healer?

I could write on for hours, and tell you of the daily memorials we have of old Antioch. But it is not enough to say just this: that we are in what was once the grandest of Eastern capitals, and what is now but a common Oriental city—the fac-simile of Aleppo that I have seen and described to you? Here, as elsewhere, old glories have faded, and the traveler, while he is overwhelmed with the contrast, yet finds nothing to write of or to describe. If you can imagine yourself in the midst of a desolate plain, where nothing—but, or house, or ruin—breaks the view in any direction, and some one telling you that you stand where once was the heart of a great city, the very forum of a rival of Rome, you may perhaps be able to understand what I am attempting to describe. Your feelings would be unutterable, and there would be nothing around you to describe. Silence is the perfection of eloquence then.

Antioch is indeed a desolate plain, but it is a modern Eastern town, and its inhabitants are as uninteresting as usual in such towns. It is, therefore, better that I lay down my pen than attempt to bring you here into my present position, or make you sharer of my reflections and emotions.

I met a man yesterday who came up from Iskanderoon the day previous. He had arrived there from Beyrout by steamer. He tells me of an American clergyman who was on the steamer, but of course he does not understand the differences among the Protestant denominations, and I can not guess who it is. I heard, after I left Jerusalem, that Rev. Dr. TYNG, of New York, had arrived there; and this may possibly have been that distinguished gentleman. If so, I can not too much regret that I missed seeing him. It is a source of pleasure you little know of to meet persons from America, especially those who know one's own friends.

REASONS FOR WEARING CRINOLINE.

(Extracted from a Lady in the Course of a Quadrille.)

"WELL, I'm sure! What next, I wonder! But it's like you sex. Inquisitive creatures! Talk of woman's curiosity! What is it to you, Sir, why I wear my crinoline? Getting up statistics, are you? Well—if you're really serious—now promise you won't laugh—I don't mind telling you my reasons why I wear it. It's by all means, if you like. Take your pencil out, and write down from my lips just as I tell you.

"I wear crinoline, Mr. Curious, because MADAME DE FLOUNCEY assures me it's the Thing. Who's MADAME DE FLOUNCEY? Oh, she's my French dressmaker, and her establishment's in Regent Street; and so, you see, she must know. Besides, she assures me it so much improves one's figure—especially when one's slim, as every genteel person should be. And then, as MADAME DE FLOUNCEY says, it gives me such an air (so, it's not, you wretch! it's not blown out with the bellows!), and looks so distinguished. Though, to be sure, now one's own servants, as you say, have taken to it, there's not so much distinction in the wearing, but there ought to be. Still, as MADAME DE FLOUNCEY says, it certainly does set one off; and as that dear, dear EMPRESS EUGÉNIE doesn't mind the maid-servants, I don't see why we need.

THE GREAT CEMETERY OF ANTIOCH.

"Besides, you know, every body wears it now, and one must do as every body else does; one looks so horridly affected else. And I'm sure you gentlemen admire it. Oh yes, you may vow you don't, but I'm positive you do. There now! And then, you know, it's the Fashion. Only look at the fashion-books, and see what lovely wide dresses are drawn for us to copy in the pictures of Le Follet. Folly? No, Mr. Ignoramus, not folly at all. Go and learn your French, Sir!

"'Hides clumsy feet?' How can you be so rude! Ladies do not always like to have their ankles stared at. Oh, I dare say you meant nothing personal. But I'm sure it's very disagreeable of you, asking one such questions; and I've a great good mind to stop my ears, and not speak to you again, you odious wretch you!—taking down one's words, and then taking one up so. Yes, you do. And I wish I hadn't said a word to you, you horrid man! Now, don't be so absurd, Sir—let me take your arm. There's that MISS JIGGLETON, I know, is quizzing us abominably. * * * Oh, how lovely cool it is! I do so love a conservatory; don't you? But I haven't told you my real reason yet. You'd like to hear it? Well, then, if you'll promise not to tell—I wear my crinoline, Mr. Inquisitive, because I choose, Sir! There now!"

LITERARY.

James Russell Lowell's POEMS, in blue and gold, from the press of Ticknor & Fields, form an admirable continuation of the series. The position of Mr. Lowell among American poets is not very exactly defined. His writings are not uniform either in their character or in their success. At times in his satire he is as keen as ever was Horace, at times he descends to as low commonplaces as the same variable old satirist. So in his higher works. Many of his poems are artistic in the highest degree, many possess exceeding beauty of thought and rhythm, while many were perhaps better never published. But this is the poet's license, which all poets have availed themselves of. Enough for the present that these two volumes are most welcome to the drawing-room table, and will make familiar in a great many houses some of those delicate touches of pathos which we have always regarded as the crowning excellence of Mr. Lowell's writings.

The "Biglow Papers," are for the first time acknowledged by Mr. Lowell in these volumes. By the way, could he have had any notion of writing against political clergymen, when he hit off this well-known verse?

"Parson Wilbur sez he never heerd in his life
Thet th' Apostles rigged out in their swaller-tail-coats,
An' marched round in front of a drum an' a fife,
To git some on 'em office, an' some on 'em votes;
But John P.
Robinson he
Sez they didn't know every thin' down in Judee."

The whole reading and studying world has long needed such a work as is now supplied by the publication of Arthur Helps's SPANISH CONQUEST IN AMERICA, by Harper & Brothers. This work is a clear, well-judged, and philosophical history of the advance of that dominion on this continent, with special reference to the history of slavery and to the government of colonies. Other isolated works have had great and just popularity, but we venture to say that no student of Prescott will regret the publication of Helps. On the contrary, he will find it a marvelous assistant to the right understanding of the eloquent American historian, and he will also find that which Prescott's limited field does not allow him to go into, a thorough history of the relations of each conquest to that which preceded and that which followed, or was contemporary with it.

A peculiarity which adds interest to the work of Mr. Helps as it advances is, that he does not attempt to discuss any questions with other modern writers, but distinctly avows that he has not read them; preferring to issue a work from original sources, and allow his results to be compared with those of other historians, his fellow-laborers. Few stories of veritable history are so thrilling as these. The Crusades and the Battles of the Cross alone rival them in romantic interest. It needs only a careful and polished relater to make the pages which record these stories luminous even to brilliancy. Mr. Helps's style is well suited to his subject. It is brief, terse, forcible, and not without ornament. He feels his work, and at times, when he relates an incident of peculiar interest, he writes with great eloquence and power.

As a book of reference, containing the condensation of history of early Spanish America, there is no substitute for these volumes, which must find their place in all libraries.

The Young Men's Christian Association of London had a series of LECTURES delivered before them in the winter of 1856 and 1857, which Carter & Brothers publish in one volume. The lecturers were learned and distinguished men, and their lectures are worth reading as they were worth hearing. From one, by Rev. Samuel Martin, on Gambling, we learn a few items that may repay a little consideration. The German watering-places, of course, have the most notorious gambling hells in the world. When the National Assembly, in 1849, resolved to close all public gaming banks, the great bath cities opposed it vehemently. Wiesbaden demanded compensation for the injury (!) done that city, in 4,272,728 florins, Homburg several millions, Baden Baden upward of 6,000,000. The ten licensed gambling-houses in Paris in 1848 drew in 325,000,000 francs per annum! The Baden Baden bank pays the Government annually 120,000 florins tax! From forty to fifty croupiers stand in the service of this one bank. The shareholders of the Homburg bank divided last year 75 per cent. on their capital! In Prussia the Government receives an annual tax from lotteries of 1,750,000 florins, and 3000 families live by the sale of tickets.

This is a terrible record. There are many more curious and fearful statistics in this volume which will repay perusal.

THE EPICURE'S RECEIPT-BOOK, published by Harper & Brothers, is the prince of cookery-books. Here is a simple, brief, and condensed summary of all the dishes that a plain country man ordinarily wants, or that Apicius ever dreamed of, with notes on the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of each of them, by a physician who loves good eating, but not too well to express his opinion candidly. The book will be found one of the most valuable and available extant; not overloaded with nonsensical mixtures that exist only in theory, and disgust the cook as well as the eater, but containing all that is necessary to a perfect, well-regulated, and elegant kitchen arrangement.

Apropos of health, we have a volume of the contributions to the American Medical Association, containing ESSAYS ON THE SECRETORY AND EXCITO-SECRETORY SYSTEM OF NERVES, by Dr. Henry F. Campbell, of Georgia, published by Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia, in which we doubt not the medical faculty throughout the country will be interested, inasmuch as Dr. Campbell claims, with reason, to be the discoverer of the Excito-Secretory System, in opposition to an eminent English surgeon.

The fine Boston edition of Waverley (Ticknor & Fields), to which we have frequently called the attention of our readers, has reached THE ABBOT. The illustrations are Queen Mary's Escape, and Roland Graeme at St. Cuthbert's cell. No one who does not possess a copy of Scott should omit this excellent opportunity to own a cheap and elegant edition.

ENGLISH HANDS AND ENGLISH HEARTS, by the author of the Memorials of Captain Headley Vicars (published by Carter & Brothers), is a curious book. The author had peculiar opportunities for acquaintance with the laboring classes, three thousand of whom were at work on the Crystal Palace and its grounds near her residence. She subsequently became closely associated with the corps sent out to the Crimea to work in the trenches and on the railway there. The book contains personal incidents in the lives of many of these laborers, showing the heart that is in a stout Englishman, and the good soul he has. Many of the scenes are touching, and not a little beautiful. The memorials of Captain Vicars has become a very popular work, and the author is well known from that book.

PARTHENIA is the title of a novel by Mrs. E. B. Lee, published by Ticknor & Fields, of which the heroine is a Christian lady in the time of Julian the Apostate, who is one of the dramatis personæ. There are some rather dubious theological points raised in the course of the book, but it is in the main remarkably faithful to history.

Not long since two ladies died in this city, whose names were well known to our citizens, and whose father was once well known throughout the country. These were the daughters of Mr. Jay, the first Chief Justice of the United States, Mrs. Banyer and Miss Jay. Rev. Dr. M'Vickar has prepared a MEMORIAL of these two most excellent sisters, whose benevolence was world-wide, and Stanford and Delisser of this city publish it in a small volume. The Memorial contains many personal recollections and extracts from the correspondence of the ladies, and forms a remarkable picture of earnest, faithful, woman-work for the good of the world in which they lived.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, January 18th, in the Senate, Mr. Seward presented a petition for the gradual extinction of slavery; laid on the table. A resolution was adopted, on motion of Senator Chandler, for information respecting the employment of the United States troops in Kansas. A bill was introduced by Senator Harlan, granting land to Iowa for railroad purposes. A bill was passed permitting the Arctic voyagers to accept the British medals. The special order on the affairs of Kansas having been taken up, the rest of the day was occupied by Senator Hale in a speech on the affairs of that Territory.——In the House a number of bills were introduced, namely: By Mr. Taylor, of New York, to promote the useful arts, and to regulate the granting of patents for inventions; by Mr. Kelly, a bill to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain; by Mr. Bennett, of New York, a bill to establish a railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific for postal and military purposes; by Mr. Florence, a bill for the ascertainment and settlement of claims of the French spoliations; by Mr. Morris, of Pennsylvania, a bill of international copyright; by Mr. Grow, a bill to prevent the future sale of public lands by proclamation of the President, until the same shall have been surveyed at least fifteen years; by Mr. Letcher, a bill establishing a branch mint in the city of New York—referred to the Committee on Ways and Means; by Mr. Dowdell, a bill to repeal the fishing bounties act; by Mr. Cobb, a bill granting to Alabama and other States having unsold lands therein, those which have been in the market thirty years and upward; by Mr. Quitman, a bill to repeal certain sections of the Neutrality law—referred to the Judiciary Committee. The Speaker appointed an Investigating Committee into the $87,000 affair. On motion of Mr. Keitt, the President was requested to communicate all correspondence between the United States and France in reference to privateering. Mr. Campbell offered a resolution requesting the President to negotiate for the annexation of Cuba, Canada, and the British possessions generally; objected to. Mr. Giddings offered a resolution censuring the Dred Scott decision; objected to. Mr. Humphrey Marshall offered a resolution providing that no foreigners should be electors save those admitted under the general naturalization laws; objected to. A resolution was adopted, on motion of Mr Zollicoffer, inquiring into the expediency of checking the import of foreign paupers and criminals. A resolution was adopted for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the accounts of the late Door-keeper.

On Tuesday, the Senate received the Convention between Denmark and the United States on the Sound Dues. Senator Gwin reported a bill authorizing the President to contract for the transportation of troops and baggage by rail from the Missouri to San Francisco. The Committee of Commerce reported back the bill repealing the fishing bounties. Senator Wilson introduced a bill amending the Half-pay Act. Senator Seward moved, and the Senate adopted, a resolution inquiring into the revival of the slave-trade on the coast of Africa. Senator Houston announced the death of Senator Rusk, and the remainder of the day was devoted to eulogies on his memory, by Senators Houston, Collamer, Gwin, and Seward.——In the House, Mr. Cochrane presented a petition for the appropriation of the public lands to actual settlers. The Speaker appointed a committee to inquire into the late Door-keeper's accounts. A special committee was appointed to report upon a bill for the distribution of clerks and messengers at Washington among the States and Territories. Mr. Greenwood proposed a resolution to inquire into negro stealing in the Indian country; objected to. Eulogies on the late Senator Rusk were then pronounced by Messrs. Reagan, Keitt, Jackson, Quitman, and Clerk.

On Wednesday, in the Senate, Senator Iverson introduced a bill to retire disabled officers of the Army and Marine corps, and gave notice of a bill to alter the regulations of the Military Academy. The rest of the day was occupied by Senator Hale's speech on Kansas affairs.——In the House, the following among other bills were introduced: By Mr. Scott, to increase the safety of steam vessels; by Mr. M'Kibben, to grant alternate sections of land to California for railroad purposes; by Mr. Davis, the French spoliation bill. The House then debated that portion of the Message relating to the Pacific Railroad, which, after speeches by Messrs. Maynard, Greenwood, Bennett, Letcher, Harris, Washburn, Florence, Seward, Davis, and Leiter, was referred to a select committee.

On Thursday, in the Senate, Senator Yulee reported, and the Senate adopted, a resolution inquiring what was yet due to Florida volunteers. Senator Jones, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the Homestead bill. Senator Davis, from the Military Committee, reported back the bill to increase the army. Senator Bayard, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a resolution for taking evidence on the Bright and Fitch contested seat case; laid over. The motion to present Commodore Paulding with a medal was then taken up, and speeches were made by Senators Clay, Doolittle, Brown, and Pugh.——In the House, Mr. Kunkel was excused from serving on the Investigating Committee. Bills were reported, making various appropriations, from the Committee on Ways and Means, and from the Committee on Commerce, to refund duties paid on goods burned in New York in 1845, and to provide for a uniform code of marine signals. Various other reports from the Standing Committees were made.

On Friday, the Senate not being in session, the House refused to adopt a resolution of Mr. Zollicoffer's for information on the Utah question. A bill was introduced by Mr. Winter Davis for the improvement of the Patapsco. Some debate followed on the Pacific railroad: Messrs. Billinghurst and Warren were the speakers. Some appointments were made by the Speaker, and the House adjourned.

THE NEUTRALITY LAWS.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have agreed upon a report to be presented this week, sustaining generally the President's Central American Message, believing with him that Commodore Paulding went beyond his legitimate limits in arresting the filibusters on Nicaraguan soil, and recommending an amendment of the Neutrality laws, so as to hold as prisoners for trial all offenders captured in the prosecution of their hostile plans against nations with which we are at peace.

APPOINTMENTS AND CONFIRMATIONS.

William G. L. Smith, of Buffalo, has been appointed by the President Consul to Shanghai; Mr. Miller, of Utica, Consul to Rio Janeiro. Mr. Vail, of New Jersey, has received a first-class consulate. Stoke L. Roberts, of Pennsylvania, has been appointed Consul to Trinidad de Cuba. Mr. Sacrincote, of Pennsylvania, Consul to Venice. Mr. Wayman, of Kentucky, Consul to Vera Cruz. Mr. Fuller, Consul to Hamburg. John G. Barr, of Alabama, Consul to Melbourne, Australia.

Colonel Williams, of Tennessee, is understood to have accepted the mission to Constantinople. William Ritchie, the husband of Anna Cora Mowatt, is spoken of for the mission to Naples. Brooke D. Williams, of Georgetown, brother of Madame Bodisco, is to be appointed United States Consul at Revel, Russia.

The Senate has confirmed Mr. Lamar as Minister to Nicaragua, and General Denver as Governor of Kansas. The extradition treaty with the Netherlands has also been confirmed.

THE OLD QUARREL WITH NEW GRANADA.

Dispatches received by the last mail from New Granada state that there is no prospect of the ratification of the treaty recently negotiated between the United States and that republic. They seem determined to make no restitution for the losses of our citizens, and are equally opposed to letting the United States have the island in the Bay of Panama. Unless they come to a decision pretty shortly, our Government will send a naval force there which will bring them to terms. The Administration is determined to take prompt action in this matter, and dispatches to that effect will go out in next mail.

THE FEMALE LOBBY AT WASHINGTON.

The Washington correspondent says:

The female lobby is here in full strength. Many suppose that lobbying is particularly confined to broadcloth and cassimere; but the fact is, silk, crinoline, and other fixings operate largely in the lobby, and exert a more powerful influence upon particular legislation than is generally supposed. There is not a soirée, or hop, or social gathering that our fair lobbyists do not improve the opportunity to present some private claim in the most attractive light, and you may believe that a pouting lip and a languishing eye is more potent with members than the most artful scheming of the male bipeds. We have at this time a perfect army of beautiful and intelligent women in the federal capital, including literary celebrities, strong minded and bloomers. From my perch in the gallery I think I can notice a kind of anxiety on the part of sundry members as they look up at the female portion of the gallery. In fact, I believe more speeches are made to that quarter than to the Speaker's chair. The daily attendance of ladies is quite large, and much interest in the proceedings is exhibited by the fair occupants of the east gallery.

THE LATEST NEWS FROM THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

The dispatches received at the War Department from Colonel Johnston, dated November 30, confirm the previous reports of excessive suffering and great loss of draught animals by snow storms, cold, and starvation. A sufficient number of oxen, though poor, had been saved to supply part rations in six days of the week, and there was on hand enough bacon for one day of the same period for seven months; also flour and small rations. The storm dealt roughly with Colonel Cook's command. He lost half of his horses, besides a number of mules. Further advance toward Salt Lake City can not be made without a new supply of such animals, to procure which Captain Marcy had been dispatched to New Mexico, for their use early in spring, when the army, with a volunteer force 2000 strong, will assume its march as soon as supplied with horses and mules, and when the grass on the mountains is sufficient to sustain them. Two volunteer companies have been mustered into the service for nine months, and it is expected that in a few days two more will be mustered in. The troops have borne the dangers and privations of the march with patience and cheerfulness. They are in fine health, although some of the regiments are still suffering from frost bites. Another letter from an officer of the army says that "the Mormons are afraid of mounted men. They are a set of cowards, like all assassins and robbers;" and he fears that their leaders, and those who have no claim in the valley, will run away and require their deluded followers to destroy their property, lest it may benefit the army.

WHAT THE UTAH EXPEDITION WILL COST.

The War Department has asked Congress for an appropriation of $1,224,000, to pay for four millions eight hundred and eighty thousand rations, for the subsistence of the Utah expedition for twenty months from the 1st July next—that amount being required for 5306 soldiers, 200 women, 300 servants, and 1894 employés—aggregate, 8000.

THE ELECTIONS IN KANSAS.

On 13th January the returns of the Kansas elections of 21st December and 4th January were opened by General Calhoun, in presence of Governor Denver, the President of the Council, and the Speaker of the House. The results were as follows:

The votes on the 21st December for the Constitution "with Slavery," was 6063, and for the Constitution "without Slavery," 526. Of these votes, 3562 are said to have been polled in precincts containing not over a thousand inhabitants.

At the election on the 4th instant the majority against the Lecompton Constitution was 10,226.

For Governor the vote was: Smith (Free State), 6258; Marshall (Democrat), 6539. For Congress, Parrot (Free State) received 6623, and Carr (Democrat), 6568. To the Senate thirteen Free-State men and six Democrats are elected; and to the House, twenty-nine Free-State men, and fourteen Democrats.

The Territorial Legislature has appointed a committee to inquire into the alleged frauds. General Calhoun is hourly expected at Washington with the Lecompton Constitution, and Mr. Stanton with the remonstrances of the Legislature.

PERSONAL.

The greatest ball of the season at Washington was given last week by Senator Douglas. Over two thousand guests were present. The newspaper correspondents are eloquent upon the beauty and grace of Mrs. Douglas.

A Washington correspondent thus describes Lawrence M. Keitt, a very truculent filibuster indeed: "His action is like that of a gymnast on the stage. The birth of ideas was never before attended with such throes. He shakes his head laterally and vertically in the most alarming manner. It is bobbing around incessantly while he is speaking. His chin frequently threatens his breast, like Punch when engaged in conjugal but fierce debate. His frown is a denunciation, his voice a challenge. Notwithstanding all this extravagance of gesture and manner, he possesses genuine talents. He has the fire and fancy of an orator, though disguised in a melodramatic style. Though turgid, he is seldom trite, and his store of ideas, imagery, and language seems to be inexhaustible. He is a young man, of good size, and seemingly robust constitution."

Mr. Buchanan has been indisposed with a cold, and refused to receive visitors on Saturday in consequence.

It is understood in official circles that Captain Meigs, the Superintendent of the Capitol Extension, will certainly be removed, on account of extravagant expenditures and arbitrary conduct. It is not yet determined who is to take his place.

Monsieur Blondel, whose appointment as Belgian Minister to the United States is announced, is the gentleman who represented Belgium at the Court of the Sultan from the spring of 1849 to the summer of last year, when, owing to his alleged undue interference in the Danubian Principalities question, his recall was requested by the Turkish Government. King Leopold and his advisers having declined the request of the Porte, the latter sent the offending Minister his passports, and a partial rupture of diplomatic relations took place between the Courts of Brussels and Constantinople. Previous to Mr. Blondel's appointment as Minister in Turkey, he was many years Belgian Consul-General in Egypt. He is said to possess considerable diplomatic talent, is somewhat distinguished as a scholar, and is suspected of belonging to the clerical or ultramontane party in Belgium.

Hall's Journal of Health mentions what it calls an "instructive and alarming fact" in reference to the Wall Street forger, recently sent to the Penitentiary. It was proven on the trial that he was never seen down town without having a cigar in his mouth; that he was never well. On entering the prison smoking was absolutely and at once prohibited by an inflexible rule. In three months he gained fifteen pounds in flesh, and his general health was improved in proportion.

The last act of Governor Pollock, of Pennsylvania, was the pardoning of John Capie, who, six years since, was implicated with Emmons in killing a man in a street-brawl in Southwark.

Mr. Allibone, late President of the Bank of Pennsylvania, having returned to Philadelphia from Europe, publishes a card in his own defense against the assaults made upon him in his absence. He sets forth the reasons of his resignation of the Presidency and departure from the country; denounces the affidavit of the Directors against him as a cruel and unjust procedure; states that illness demanded his retirement from active business in the manner he did; and declares that he left unconscious of wrong-doing, and moreover adds that some of the Directors who swore to the affidavit which charges him with being an absconding debtor, accompanied him to the wharf and expressed warm friendship for him. Mr. Allibone avers his complete innocence of any of the frauds charged to him, and states that, had the Directors apprised him of their intention to proceed against him, he would have returned to the country immediately. The card is manly and straightforward, and puts the case in a new aspect.

General William Walker arrived at Petersburg, Virginia, on the 15th inst., and was greeted by a considerable number of citizens. He remained during the day at the Bollingbrook Hotel. Efforts were made to induce him to prolong his visit, but he disregarded the solicitations, saying that it was essential that he should be in Mobile at an early period. He accordingly left for that destination in the evening.

The Vicksburg True Southerner notices the fact that Senator Douglas has disposed of his plantation in Mississippi. The negroes of the plantation will be transferred to Louisiana. A partnership has been formed with a gentleman of New Orleans to carry on the plantation business in Louisiana. The partner is now in the Northern part of the State, looking after a place to locate the force—which is numbered at a hundred hands.

John B. Roberston, the Rochester banker, accused of conspiring to compass the death of his wife by poison, has been acquitted by the Jury after four hours' deliberation. This verdict created much excitement in Rochester.

The Journal of Commerce announces that Mr. Arthur Tappan, one of the founders of that paper, "will act as agent for the American Reform Tract and Book Society, and for the American Missionary Society. The former is located at Cincinnati, the latter at New York. Both are strongly anti-slavery."

Rev. William H. Milburn, well known as "the blind preacher," has delivered two of a series of three lectures on "Christian Poetry," before respectable, though not very large audiences, in the new chapel of the M. E. Church, corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-second Street.

John B. Miller, editor of the Utica Observer, who has been offered the post of Consul at Hamburg, has not, says the Albany Argus, positively decided to accept. The nominal salary is $2000.

Mr. Paul Morphy, who won chess laurels at the New York Convention, has been chosen President of the Chess Club of New Orleans, and proposes to play two matches blindfolded, after the manner of Paulse.

A writer in the States says: "My fair readers will remember a terrible domestic muss in Boston last year, in which a young fellow named Sumner was so beaten that he died, giving rise to all sorts of suits for manslaughter, divorce, and other naughty matters. Well, a gentleman here just from Kansas, tells me that this same Mr. Frank Dalton and his wife have made friends, determined to live in peace, and are now quietly settled at Lawrence, where he is doing business."

The Albany Journal says: "The medal voted by the Legislature of New York to the late Dr. E. K. Kane is of pure gold, and weighs sixteen ounces Troy. The devices are in bold relief, not stamped, but sculptured. On one side are two figures in Arctic costume, looking out on a sparkling expanse of ocean, with a midnight sun in the horizon; on the other, the arms of the State of New York. The medal has been presented to Judge Kane of the United States Circuit Court, the father of the deceased. It was taken to Philadelphia by Henry I. Seaman, the private Secretary of Governor King, and transferred by him in the presence of a small company of the friends of Dr. Kane, assembled for the occasion.

The captain of a Mississippi steamer has started a morning paper on board his boat, called the Bulletin. He issues it regularly, serves it to customers at stopping places, and fills it with news and pleasant gossip. He is one of the veterans of river navigation, having followed that calling for twenty-seven years. It is proposed especially to make the paper the organ of the river boatmen. A newspaper with a floating place of publication is certainly a novelty.

A man named Ittal Curtiss has lately died in Bristol, Connecticut, who for the last forty years has slept and eaten his morning meal in barns in the neighborhood, declining all invitations, even in the coldest weather, to do otherwise. He has left a fair property.

The Commercial Advertiser says: "We understand that Governor Hunt has it in contemplation to write a continuation of the Political History of New York, commencing with the adoption of our present State Constitution. We shall look for a calm and enlightened exposition of the causes which produced the organic changes adopted by the people in 1846, and the practical bearing of the new Constitution upon our political, moral, and material progress. Although Governor Hunt has been an actor on the stage, bearing no unimportant part in some of the events which he will have occasion to record and elucidate, we feel persuaded that he will carry into the historical office a spirit of justice and impartiality, which will commend his work to intelligent men of all parties.

Thomas Washington Smith, who has just been acquitted on his trial for the murder of Richard Carter, the seducer of his wife, on the ground of insanity, has applied to the Legislature of Pennsylvania for a divorce.

A correspondent of the Evening Post says: "On Tuesday afternoon, a young lady in Brooklyn determined that she would no longer remain 'in maiden meditation fancy free,' and without the fear of parental authority, and without saying 'By your leave, Sir,' put on her bridal habiliments and walked into the P——e H——e, and said to her lover, 'We must be married this afternoon.' He, not to be outdone by his lady-love in the ardor of passion, accepted at once the proposal, and, crossing over to this city, found a clergyman 'who made them one' in the 'eye of the law.' They returned to the P——e H——e, when the bride of an hour sent a note to her 'dear papa,' saying, in the politest possible manner:

"'Dear Papa: I am no longer Miss ——, but Mrs. ——.'

"This last marriage in haste will be a subject of conversation on the 'Heights' until the next one comes off."

It is reported that Mr. Damrell, Representative in Congress from the third Massachusetts district, is about to resign, his disease having made such progress that he is scarcely able to write his name.

Governor King has commuted the sentence of young Cummings to imprisonment for life. Cummings has for some time been suffering with a wasting illness, induced by long confinement and agony of mind.

At a recent meeting of Spiritualists in Dodworth's Hall, a prominent professor of the faith opened by saying it was customary in religious assemblies to read a portion of divine truth; and that he would begin the exercises of the occasion by reading a portion of divine truth according to Theodore Parker. He accordingly read an extract from one of Mr. Parker's discourses.

The rural districts of Massachusetts send practical men to the Legislature. A Boston paper tells the following: "One of our merchants, while sitting in his counting-room cogitating upon the hard times, had his reveries disturbed by the entrance of a gentleman. 'Do you want any first-rate brooms?' 'No,' he replied, 'we have a full supply.' 'I've got some very cheap,' was the rejoinder. 'I made 'em myself, and I'm a member of the Legislater.'"

Vague rumors are current to the effect that a still more startling "case" than any that has yet transpired at Rochester is soon to be developed. It is said that a man of high standing "disposed" of his wife by sewing her up in a sheet and smothering her; and that she was subsequently laid out in the usual way and buried without exciting suspicion!

A course of lectures in aid of the aged and infirm, under the care of the Ladies' Union Aid Society, is now progressing at the Clinton Hall Lecture Room, Astor Place. The third of the series was delivered by Rev. J. P. Durbin, D.D., the subject being "Paul considered as a Man rather than as an Apostle."

The following story is told of Colonel Benton: Speaking of the Douglas defection, he remarked, "We hear much said about the people that Douglas will take off. He has not taken off the people—the people have taken off Douglas, Sir."

The Haverhill Gazette states that the wife of Mr. M. A. Tidd, of Georgetown, gave birth to four children one day last week, three of whom are still living. A year ago last June she gave birth to three at one time, all of whom are doing well.

Father Weldo, the venerable clergyman, late chaplain of the House of Representatives, who is rapidly approaching the hundredth year of his age, is dangerously ill near Syracuse.

The lecture of the season, in Brooklyn, was that of Mr. G. W. Curtis, on Sir Philip Sydney, delivered on Thursday evening, 20th instant, at the Brooklyn Institute, before a very large and delighted audience. We understand that Mr. Curtis will repeat his lecture, by special request, for the benefit of the new Mercantile Library Association of Brooklyn.

Signor Ronconi, agent of one of the Opera companies performing in Havana, drew the capital prize of $30,000, in the lottery of the 15th ultimo in that city. The number of his ticket was 11,794.

Rev. Mr. Lakeman, a clergyman, of Abington, Mass., was suddenly attacked by insanity last week. He scattered his clothes along the railroad track, and entered a friend's house, in Middleborough, by breaking through the windows, and was discovered inside in a raving condition and in a state of nudity. He was placed in confinement.

At a Cincinnati hotel, last week, two ladies retiring to rest were frightened by the discovery of a fellow concealed under the bed, who grasped the ankle of one of the ladies. There was a prodigious outcry in the house about that time, but in the confusion the culprit escaped.

Mr. Banks is the twentieth person who has filled the gubernatorial chair of Massachusetts during the seventy-seven years since the adoption of the State Constitution. Mr. Banks is the fifth Governor who did not receive a majority of the votes in Boston.

Saxe, the poet, delivered a poem on "The Press," in Yonkers, last week. It was full of sparkling hits and bon mots.

TUCKERMAN THE MAIL ROBBER.

A letter in the Hartford Times gives interesting particulars of the manner in which Tuckerman was first detected in dishonest practices:

"Tuckerman is a gentlemanly-looking man, thirty-seven years of age. He was formerly the Treasurer of the Eastern Railway Company, which runs from Boston to Maine, and the Directors had great confidence in him, as he was a mild, inoffensive, 'clever' fellow. They did not properly examine his accounts. The result was a defalcation of between one and two hundred thousand dollars. When this fact was discovered, the officers of the road did not feel inclined to prosecute such a 'fine, clever fellow.' But an old man, in a rural district, who owned one or two shares of stock, sent a letter to Tuckerman, represented that his interests had been injured by the defalcation, and that unless he (Tuckerman) would send him four or five hundred dollars, he would prosecute him. Tuckerman, under the advice of counsel, refused to comply with the request. The old man was as good as his word. He had legal proceedings instituted against Tuckerman, and he was put under bonds to the amount of $16,000. He procured these bonds, and then went to work at the United States mails to mend his fortunes.

"The amount of ready money obtained by him is not known. He was arrested about the time that a decision was to have been rendered upon some important point in his defalcation case. That case will hang over him till the mail robbery affair is settled, be the time longer or shorter."

THE LADY WITH THE RED PETTICOAT.

The Washington correspondent of The Pennsylvanian says of the red petticoat, recently introduced by the wife of the British Minister Ousely:

"There is an English literary lady now in this city, whose dress, known in London as the 'peasant costume,' has caused quite a stir among the fashionables. The dress consists of a red and black striped petticoat, descending within six inches of the feet, over which is worn a dress of the usual length, but hooped up to the height of the skirt. A 'dreadnought' overcoat, with gilt buttons, serves to keep out the cold and damp; while a straw hat screens the head, and real, genuine long-legged boots protect the feet. I do not think the dress is very neat or pretty, but it is novel, and that is something. It is considered an improvement on the Bloomer costume. In all the mud of a Washington winter it is a much better dress than the street-sweeping machines which have so long prevailed."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

LAUNCH OF THE "LEVIATHAN."

The arrangements in connection with the launch were proceeded with on Tuesday, 5th January, and the results were satisfactory. On Thursday, shortly after nine o'clock, Mr. Brunel took his usual stand upon his elevated platform, and a pressure was at once applied to the vessel of about twenty-five cwt. to the circular inch. The ship at once obeyed this power, and moved in starts of three, four, and five inches. A slight mischief occurred in consequence of the bow chain failing, and this caused a temporary check in the hauling power. An increased strain came upon one of the anchors on the Deptford shore, which brought away the piles. There was no cessation, however, in the hydraulic pressure, and the vessel continued her movements. At noon she had advanced four feet two inches at the bow, and five feet four inches at the stern. At this period the distance she had traversed to the extremity of the ways aft (low-water mark) was measured by a Thames police boat's crew, in charge of Mr. Inspector Borlase, and found to be 64 feet 6¼ inches. At two o'clock she was moved six feet two inches at the bow, and seven feet three inches at the stern. The launching was continued throughout the following day. The total result was an advance of twelve feet eight inches aft, and eleven feet forward. The vibration of the earth consequent upon each slip of the vessel was more violent and more continuous than has ever been experienced at the yard hitherto. The Leviathan has now only some 64 feet more to go.

HOW A DETECTIVE WAS CAUGHT.

There is a story afloat, which may be true, but which we should hardly have expected to hear of its hero—one of the 'cutest detectives of the North of England. The telegraph had heralded the arrival of a lady of nimble fingers, and Detective ——, as pre-eminently sharp, had been sent to the railway station. The train arrived; a lady, answering to the description, alighted; but, surely, she could be no pickpocket! Detective —— felt that he must be on his guard, or an action for false imprisonment might fall upon his shoulders. He made stealthy advances to our heroine—followed her as her shadow—introduced himself politely—was received graciously. They found themselves in the same hotel—drank wine together—and, thanks to the Demoiselle, Detective —— had a (drugged?) cigar. Never was more courteous dame—'twas incredible she should be light-fingered. Mr. Detective must be cautious in his conclusions. The wine—(could there be any thing somnific in the cup?)—overcame him—and he slept. He also dreamed; and, in fulfillment of his dream, the day was gone when he awoke: and his watch was gone, too! He was now thoroughly satisfied.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS.

The Emperor, although not seriously ill—for he drove himself in a phaeton about the streets of Paris a few days ago—has some temporary affection which prevents him walking easily. He has been seen in the reserved garden of the Tuileries, leaning on the arm of an attendant and limping very much.

The Napoleon dynasty is about to receive another guarantee of permanence. Information has been given to the newspaper correspondents that the Empress of France has, by the advice of her medical attendants, left off riding.

COURT FASHIONS.

A Paris letter in the Independance of Brussels, gives some details of the ladies' dresses at the reception at the French court on New-Year's Eve: "The Empress wore a crimson velvet mantle, embroidered with gold, and her Majesty was positively dazzling with diamonds. Contrary to the custom observed last year, her Majesty had no one to bear her train. Among the ladies present, the toilets were especially remarked of Mrs. Baring, sister of the Duke de Bassano, who had a dress and court mantle of moire antique of pale green; the Duchess d'Istrie, a dress shot with silver, edged with red, and a rose-colored mantle; Madame Poujade, niece of the Caimacan of Wallachia, a dress of blue satin, and a mantle of the same material ornamented with bouquets of flowers and cherries, which produced a charming effect, and Baroness de Brigode, a white satin dress and mantle of great elegance."

DEATH OF MADAME RACHEL.

Mademoiselle Rachel, the celebrated French actress, almost as well known in the United States of late as in her own country, has departed this life. She expired on Sunday, 3d January, at her estate in Cannes. During her recent professional visit to this country her constitution, never strong, received so severe a shock that she never recovered from it. In her peculiar walk in the drama, Mademoiselle Rachel had no superior in our time.

A SLEEPY BRIDE.

The Journal des Débats tells of a young couple who went to a church at Lyons to be married. During the time the ecclesiastic who presided at the ceremony was addressing them the bride fell into a most profound sleep, which lasted till the moment came at which the young husband was to put the nuptial ring on the finger of his drowsy partner, but, on perceiving her state of unconsciousness, he was, as may readily be believed, shocked and irritated at such a flagrant disregard of all decency. After the conclusion of the ceremony he informed his bride's friends that he would not live with her; and, giving them 2000 francs for her, as stipulated in the contract, left her.

THE NEW SLAVE-TRADE.

The Paris Constitutionnel boldly commends the system which the French Government has adopted of purchasing negroes on the coast of Africa, and carrying them to compulsory service in the French Antilles, and argues that in no other manner can prosperity be restored to them, and ridicules the opposition of English philanthropists. However, a dispatch from Paris says there is no doubt that the Emperor will not renew the contract for supplying the French colonies with negroes.

HOW THE PRESS IS KEPT UNDER.

The press has been "invited" to refrain from giving particulars about duels and duelists, with a view to arrest the rage for single combat, which seems on the increase, and which in some late instances has been attended with serious results. It is contemplated to "invite" the press also to eschew philosophical and religious discussions. This is a condescension to the clergy. The subjects which journalists will be allowed to treat on are narrowing their circle each day, until, "fine by degrees and beautifully less," they will soon reach the impalpable condition alluded to by the ingenuous Barber of Seville. The Estafette will probably not be long in the land of the living, as its quietus is said to be every moment expected by the editors.

PRUSSIA.

CONFIRMED IMBECILITY OF THE KING.

The public life of the King of Prussia is terminated. His intellect is gone, and he is a mere wreck. All hopes of his ultimate recovery have disappeared, and in this state of affairs the idea of a regency has been abandoned. Extraordinary powers, it is said, will be conferred on the Prince of Prussia during the time his relative exists, but the domestic and foreign relations of the country will continue as before. There is some talk of the elevation of Prince Frederick William to the throne.

AUSTRIA.

DEATH OF MARSHAL RADETZKY.

Marshal Radetzky, who has played so prominent a part in the history of the Austrian empire during the last seventy years, has recently expired at the advanced age of ninety-two. He was looked upon in his native country with respect allied to enthusiasm. In the wars against the first Napoleon his powers as a commander were brought out to great advantage, and when the Austrian empire was in the crisis of its fate, ten years ago, it was saved through the bravery and skill of the old soldier, then upward of eighty. A biographical sketch of this remarkable man embodies the history of Central Europe from the breaking out of the first French Revolution down to the time when Charles Albert attempted, unsuccessfully, to drive the Austrians out of Italy. To the last his vitality was almost unimpaired. Soldiers, who in early life are compelled to live by rule, generally attain a great age when they adhere to their early discipline.

GERMANY.

A ROBBER OF HAIR.

The Augsburg Gazette states that great consternation has been caused among the females in that city by the fact of some individual prowling about the streets and cutting off the hair of any young girl he meets alone. He accomplishes the mischief, it states, by first placing a bottle containing something which causes a feeling of stupefaction under the person's nose, and then adroitly depriving her of her tresses. A reward has been offered for his apprehension.

ITALY.

THE EARTHQUAKE AT NAPLES.

The Times' correspondent, writing on the 29th of December, says:

"The details which continue to arrive from the provinces of Basilicata and Principato Citeriore are of the most distressing character, and are much more explicit. Full as they are, however, they do not give us one-tenth part of the injury that has been inflicted, partly because the authorities will not make them known, and partly because they are not as yet informed of the greater portion of them. The official journal of Saturday night contains the names of 46 other townships, hitherto unnamed, which have suffered severely, and yet all are not mentioned. Of these it is said some are a mass of ruins; others leveled with the ground; others almost entirely destroyed, churches, dwelling-houses, and all. In some workmen are pulling down the houses, and in others large fissures are opened in the ground. Out of these 46 places 20 are reported to have lost some portion of their population. Of one it is said 100 corpses have been taken out; of another 70, and it is expected that 300 will be found; but of the amount of the disaster an alarming ignorance is professed by such terms as these—'Molto vittime, non tutte dissepolite,' 'Moltissimi periti—è ignoto il numero; grande ma ignoto il numero delle vittime' (many victims, not all unburied; vast numbers perished, the number not yet known; great, but unknown, the number of victims). It is my opinion, therefore, that what have been called the exaggerations of the public much more nearly approximate to the truth than the scanty and uncertain information communicated by the official journal. According to it, 3655 bodies have already been dug out—a fearful number to think of—to which, if are added the 'moltissimi periti,' the number of whom is as yet unknown, we shall not be very much startled at the medium statement given of about 13,000 or 14,000 victims."

WHAT NEAPOLITANS DO WHEN THEY ARE FRIGHTENED.

The same correspondent adds: "The proverb which says that 'it is an ill wind that blows nobody good,' was never more strongly exemplified than in the case of this earthquake. One might suppose it difficult that such a calamitous convulsion of nature should bring benefit to any class, but we learn that it has filled the pockets of the barbers of Naples. The Neapolitans are in the habit, when any thing occurs to shock or terrify them, of getting themselves bled. I am ignorant in what this curious custom originated—whether those who persevere in it can assign for it a plausible reason—but it is certain that after a violent emotion most Neapolitans would consider themselves in peril if they had not immediate recourse to phlebotomy. I know a Neapolitan gentleman who was once sought after by the police for political causes. He was well concealed, and ultimately escaped; but his father's house was searched, to the great alarm of the family, and the sbirri had hardly left it when the barber was called in to bleed every member of the household. Now it is difficult to imagine a severer shock to the system than that of an earthquake, and we can imagine the dire consternation that prevailed at Naples when, at ten at night, houses rocked, chandeliers swung to and fro, and furniture was overturned, as described in the letters of your correspondents and others; and, accordingly, we need not be surprised to learn that the barbers and their lancets were in immediate request, and, in fact, could not meet the demand for their services. It is estimated that 30,000 persons were bled."

INDIA.

DEATH OF GENERAL HAVELOCK.

General Havelock died on the 25th of November, from dysentery, brought on by exposure and anxiety.

FIGHTS WITH THE GWALIOR MUTINEERS.

On the 27th November an affair took place near Cawnpore between General Windham and his Division and the Gwalior Mutineers, in which the British troops retreated with the total loss of the tents of the 64th, 82d, and 88th Regiments, 300 in number, which were burned by the enemy. The 64th Regiment is reported as nearly cut up. A message received by the Governor-General from Sir Colin Campbell, of the 7th December, contains an account of an action fought by him with the Gwalior contingent, near Cawnpore, in which the latter were totally defeated, with the loss of 16 guns, 26 carriages of different sorts, an immense quantity of ammunition, stores, grain, bullocks, and the whole of the baggage of the force. The British loss was insignificant. One officer only killed—Lieut. Salmon. All the women and children, sick, etc., from Lucknow, have arrived safely in Allahabad.

THE FUTURE OF INDIA.

It is currently reported that a modified representative system is to be established, the representatives to form a Lower House and a Supreme Council. A Governor-general will be appointed as at present. The seat of government for the three presidencies to be at Calcutta, as at present. With respect to the reorganization of the Bengal army, it is understood that 60,000 Europeans will be the maximum allowed for the army of India. The remainder of the army is to be composed of Africans, Affghans, Sikhs, Goorkahs, and the natives of India proper. The armies of the three presidencies will be consolidated, and the troops, instead of being confined to one district, will be obliged, as is the case with the British army, to serve in all. Caste will every where be discouraged, and each regiment will contain an admixture of Hindoos. Enlisting for the new Indian cavalry brigade has begun.

HOW THE KING OF DELHI IS TREATED.

The Lahore Chronicle says: Accounts continue to describe that wretched old man of Delhi as being indulged in a way that is a disgrace to the authorities. He is said to be surrounded with the insignia of royalty, chobdars, a large retinue of servants, etc., and to give himself airs. Such things might have been tolerated in the munificently pensioned shadow of a prince, harmless and honest, but they are a gross insult to our butchered country people, when permitted in the head and prime mover of a rebellion that has led to such lamentable results. Unfortunately, the life of the villain can not be taken, but the present system pursued toward him induces the belief that something more than life has been "guaranteed;" and we should not be in the least surprised to learn next that he has been promised his pension, with a few lacs extra, to compensate him for the damage to his palace, and loss of property sustained in his vigorous efforts to overturn British rule in India!

HOW HE GOT POMMELED BY A SOLDIER.

An eye-witness, writing to Simla, declares that while there a soldier, who had vowed that he would kill the King during the storm at the palace if he could find him, rushed past the sentries, and began to belabor the unfortunate and guilty monarch with his fists, saying "Take that, and that, and that, you pig;" and was obliged to be dragged off by his comrades. The outrage on the wretched decrepit prisoner was a very sad one, and, to a reasonable man, utterly unjustifiable. But the men are scarcely reasonable just now, when they come across Sepoys and the authors of those frightful atrocities which have never till now been inflicted on their countrywomen, even in the darkest pages of our history.

THE ROYAL FAMILY OF DELHI.

A correspondent writes: "We have seen the captive King and royal family; they are in ruinous little rooms in one of the gates of the palace. The old King looks very frail, and has a blank, fixed eye, as one on whom life is closing. He certainly is too old to be responsible for any thing that has been done. With his sons much more guilt may lie; some have been shot, as you must have read, some are yet untaken. The youngest son we saw looking like fifteen—they say eighteen—bold and coarse to look at. He is the only child of the queen. With her some of our ladies have had a long interview; they found her seated on a common charpoy (bedstead), dressed in white cotton clothes, with few and very trifling ornaments, all her grand things having been taken from her. She is described as short and stout, above thirty years of age, with a round, animated face, not at all pretty, but having pretty little plump hands. She was cutting betel-nut to eat with her pawn. Some thirty females, relatives and menials, surrounded her. She professes the utmost horror of the 3d cavalry, to whom she traces all her misfortunes. She says that the King was helpless to control them, and that, when their arrival had placed Delhi in rebellion against us, they were as ready to rob her as any one else. She says the mutineers did rob the palace, and that all her jewels were only saved by being buried. She does not seem to blame us for their present captivity; she understands the necessity for inquiring into guilty or innocent parties, but she did not seem to assert the King's innocence as much as her own. She said she had been in the hands of bad people. There appeared to be frightful rivalries among the women. It is said she criminated the sons of the former wives, she being the last. Her sister is represented as much better looking than herself, and has a daughter of thirteen married to the King's youngest son, already mentioned, and reputed very beautiful. Our ladies describe her as having superb large eyes, and a most beautiful little mouth, but her face otherwise too flat and full. Some of the women told them they had had English women and children in the palace after the massacre, in hope of preserving them, but that the mutineers demanded them and could not be resisted. They say the Sepoys complained that the King was feeding Englishwomen daintily, while he only gave them gram for food. Heaven knows if the royal family be clean in heart and hand or not. I say nothing sentimental about them, but I pity them."

THE KING OF DELHI'S INSTRUMENT OF DEATH.

The following has been communicated to the Poona Observer: "It appears from a journal of a European traveler that a new and fearful mode of execution had been adopted by the King of Delhi. The instrument and process are thus described: A box, each side of which is fifteen feet square, is constructed of timber eighteen inches thick, dovetailed together, and braced with iron rods. The outside of the bottom of the box is covered with a plate of beaten iron, one inch in thickness. The interior is filled with perfect cubes of granite, weighing in the aggregate several thousand tons. A machine is erected after the manner of an ordinary pile-driver, but of course on an enormous scale, and of tremendous strength. The mass is raised by powerful machinery, cast in Birmingham for the express purpose, though it is to be presumed that the machinist by whom the work was furnished had no idea of the horrid purpose for which it was intended. The human victim is placed upon a block of granite, of a corresponding surface, buried in the earth immediately beneath the enormous mass, and covered with a plate of iron. At a signal given by the vicramadack, the executioner touches a spring, the mass falls, and the victim, crushed at once, is suddenly annihilated, and spread out like a sheet of pasteboard! The huge weight being again raised, the flattened body is withdrawn, and dried in the sun. When completely prepared, it is hung over the wall of a public building, there to serve as a warning to the multitude."

ONE OF THE SCENES AT CAWNPORE.

One of the survivors, in referring to the massacre at Cawnpore, relates the following: "A poor woman, of the name of White, was walking along the trenches with her husband, and nursing her children (twins) in her arms; some fiend fired at them, killed the man, and broke both the poor woman's arms. The children fell to the ground, one of them wounded. Then followed a scene which can only be imagined. Fancy the poor woman throwing herself down beside her children, and not being able to assist them on account of the wounds she had received. Another woman, who was in a wretched state bordering on starvation, was seen to go out of the protection of the trenches, with a child in each hand, and stand where the fire was the heaviest, hoping that some bullet might relieve her and her little ones from the troubles they were enduring. But she was brought back, poor thing! to die a more tedious death than she had intended for herself. Here you saw poor Mrs. W. hit by a ball in the face, just by the nostril, passing through the palate of the mouth, and making its exit by the jaw; and by her side you saw her daughter, who, although she was badly wounded in her shoulder, was doing all she could to alleviate the sufferings of her unfortunate mother. Poor creatures! they both died of their wounds. Then you saw an unfortunate native servant, who had remained faithful to her mistress, and was nursing her infant under the protection of the walls of the barrack, as she imagined; but all of a sudden you saw her knocked over, and the child hurled out of her arms, and, on examination, you found both her legs cut clean off by a round shot, but the child was picked up uninjured."

THE NAVAL BRIGADE IN INDIA.

The following is from a private letter from Cawnpore: "Peel's Jacks are roaming about camp in a remarkably free-and-easy manner. Queer fish these amphibious gentlemen are. One, Crusoe-like, has quite a menagerie in his 'cabin,' as he calls his pall. Rough and ready, rollicking boys they are, and present a striking contrast to the prim dragoons you now and then meet striding majestically along. I hear that the 'nagurs' have a horrible dread of them, having been told by some inventive individual that they were cannibals, and that it was their habit to eat their fill of the slain, and salt the remainder down for future use; and that accounted for each man carrying a clasp knife by his side."

THE FAMILY OF LIEUTENANT SALKELD.

The Rev. Sydney G. Osborne writes thus to the Times respecting the family of the gallant Lieutenant Salkeld, who led the forlorn hope at Delhi, and was killed at the gate:

"His father, a clergyman in Dorsetshire, by a reverse of fortune some years since, was, with a large family, reduced, I may say, to utter poverty. This, his soldier-son, supported out of his own professional income one of his brothers at school, helping a sister, obliged to earn her own bread as a governess, to put another brother to school. Just before his death he had saved a sum of £1000, which was in the bank at Delhi, and was therefore lost to him, and, more than this, it was lost to the honorable purpose to which, as a son and brother, he had devoted it. In his native county, as your advertising columns of last week will have informed you, it was determined to erect a monument to his memory by subscription. Cadetships have been given to two of his young brothers; it is now wisely resolved that, while the memorial which is to hand down his name to posterity in connection with his glorious death shall be all that is necessary for the purpose, every farthing collected beyond the sum necessary for this shall be expended as he would have desired—for the good of these young brothers.

"Punch—first in his particular line of fun, but ever ready to be among the foremost to point where modest want needs the aid it will never beg—has told of the calling of poor Salkeld's sister. She, I believe, would be the last of that valuable but tried sisterhood to which she belongs to dream of asking for aught she can not earn. Still, Sir, let the benevolent not for one moment doubt but that in helping those she with her poor brother spared not themselves to help, they will lighten many an hour of that life which, I fear, must for a long time yet be one the future of which will have its own clouds."

THE UTAH EXPEDITION.—[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

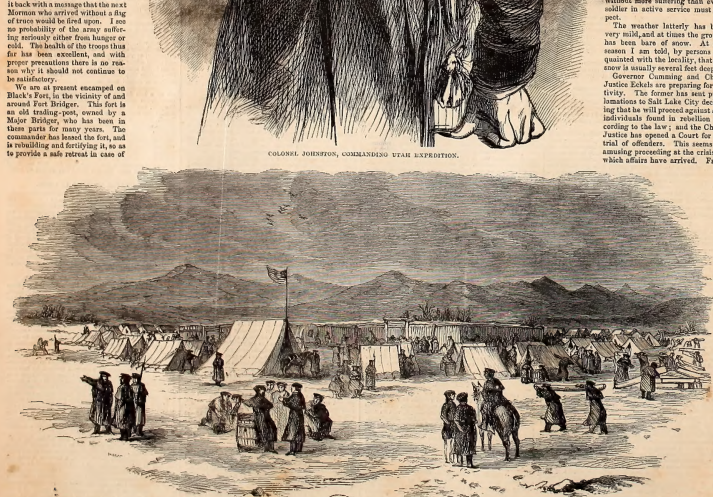
FORT BRIDGER, U. T.,
December 1, 1857.

OUR progress thus far has been very dull and uninteresting. The march from Fort Laramie to Fort Bridger has enabled us to realize the retreat from Moscow by the remains of the Great Army, forty-five years ago. The Mormons had destroyed all the grass: we could barely find willows and sage bushes in sufficient quantity to keep our fires going. Cold set in soon after we departed, and with it snow-storms. On the high land the thermometer frequently marked several degrees below zero; and in many places the snow was so deep as to interpose a very serious obstacle to locomotion. The cattle, of course, were the first to feel the inconveniences of the march. For the last four hundred miles of our journey the mortality among horses, mules, and horned cattle was very large. It was quite common of a morning to find a dead ox lying near the door of one's tent. The road to Fort Bridger, like the Isthmus of Panama in the early days of Californian enterprise, will be found next summer fenced in with bones. I am led to believe that the rear guard of the army under Colonel Cook were obliged to leave behind them much valuable property from want of cattle to transport it. Some have estimated the loss of cattle as high as one hundred head per day. Certain it seems that when the spring enables us to undertake active operations we shall have no transport or cavalry.

We were not molested either by Indians or by Mormons on the march. Three trains traveling without proper escort, and at a distance from the main body, have been captured and burned by the Mormons, and a quantity of valuable clothing, together with some provisions, and probably our whole store of salt destroyed. We have, however, provisions enough to last us, with ordinary economy, till the time arrives for an assault upon Salt Lake City. The colonel commanding has just issued an order cutting down the daily rations and depriving the officers of their extras. As to salt, of which articles we are lamentably deficient, it is understood that a supply is on the way from the East, and Captain Marcy has been sent off toward New Mexico to procure a supply. Brigham Young sent in a wagon-load as a present; but Colonel Johnston sent it back with a message that the next Mormon who arrived without a flag of truce would be fired upon. I see no probability of the army suffering seriously either from hunger or cold. The health of the troops thus far has been excellent, and with proper precautions there is no reason why it should not continue to be satisfactory.

We are at present encamped on Black's Fork, in the vicinity of and around Fort Bridger. This fort is an old trading-post, owned by a Major Bridger, who has been in these parts for many years. The commander has leased the fort, and is rebuilding and fortifying it, so as to provide a safe retreat in case of disaster. In a very short time it can be rendered impregnable. In many respects the locality is admirable as a basis of operations. There is round the fort plenty of wood for fuel, and the stream contains excellent water. As to distances, we are 113 miles from Salt Lake City, 90 miles from Ham's Fork, and 380 miles from Fort Laramie. Had we cattle, we could sweep the whole country between this and the cañons; as it is, the Mormons have the advantage of us; their cavalry arm is excellent, their horses strong and well fed, their guerillas indefatigable. They hover round us, trying to pick up stragglers, stampede cattle, and burn trains; and so long as they keep out of gun range they are safe.

There is a strong feeling in the army in favor of an immediate advance on Salt Lake City. I have no doubt—if the thing were proposed—that every man of the expedition would cheerfully agree to encounter Mormons, snow, and cold, in order to exchange our camp life for comfortable winter-quarters in the city. But this is not to be. Our commander has resolved—probably in accordance with orders from head-quarters—that we shall remain where we are for the present; the failure of the expedition—for such really seems to be the proper term—will at least have the advantage of giving us something to think about during the long, dreary winter. No doubt, on other and graver grounds, Colonel Johnston's decision is judicious. From the best accounts, it seems that the Mormon force encamped between us and the city amounts to full five thousand men of all arms. We have less than one-third this number; for of course the teamsters and army followers can not be relied upon for offensive operations.



We have resigned ourselves, therefore, to make the best of our position, and are trying to make ourselves comfortable. Some of the officers and the civil officials are building houses on the Aruendan plan, partly underground, with a wooden roof, which the snow will render air-tight. I have no doubt that these huts will be comfortable, warm, dry, and snug. Tents are, however, the order of the day among the army, and, with a due amount of blankets, and a corresponding supply of fuel for the stoves, we calculate to exist through the winter without more suffering than every soldier in active service must expect.

The weather latterly has been very mild, and at times the ground has been bare of snow. At this season I am told, by persons acquainted with the locality, that the snow is usually several feet deep.

Governor Cumming and Chief-Justice Eckels are preparing for activity. The former has sent proclamations to Salt Lake City declaring that he will proceed against any individuals found in rebellion according to the law; and the Chief-Justice has opened a Court for the trial of offenders. This seems an amusing proceeding at the crisis at which affairs have arrived. From all we can learn of Brigham Young's views, and the state of feeling at Salt Lake City, two courses of action are being debated—the first, to leave Utah in the spring, and seek a refuge in the British Territory in the north; the second, to submit to the entrance of the army, and make the best terms possible with the new Governor. As Governor Cumming has declared that he does not propose to interfere with the Mormon matrimonial arrangements, it is quite likely that a number of Mormons may prefer submitting to his authority to losing the improvements they have made on their land in Utah. On the other hand, Brigham Young's acts have been so glaringly defiant of the authority of the United States—the burning of the supply-trains amounts, I suppose, to an actual levying of war—that there is very little hope for him, should he fall into the hands of the army. He will, therefore, be quite likely to take an early opportunity of placing himself beyond Colonel Johnston's reach, by flying to the British country. Whether he will venture upon a preliminary brush with the army is, of course, a matter of conjecture. It is asserted by persons who pretend to know, that the rank and file of the Mormons are more governed by feeling than by reason, and that they will not yield without a struggle. They regard themselves as martyrs to their faith. It is supposed here that Colonel Johnston has made up his mind that there will be no fighting, though the arrangements for the winter are as careful as if we were in a foreign enemy's country. For my own part, I can not bring myself to believe that the Mormons will actually shed their blood in the cause.

COLONEL JOHNSTON, COMMANDING UTAH EXPEDITION.

PART OF THE CAMP AT FORT BRIDGER.

We have four ladies in camp, all of whom, I am happy to say, are well, and bear cheerfully the privations and discomforts of camp-life. We propose, when the work of preparing for the cold is over, to get up some amusements for the troops and ourselves. I should not be surprised if we gave balls which were as successful as any in your own Fifth Avenue. There is also some talk of theatricals. Whether we are to fight or not, we have made up our minds to be as merry for the present as the circumstances will admit.

A TRAIN ON THE PLAINS.

Of Colonel Johnston, the commanding officer of the Utah Expedition, we have the following memoir. The portrait is from a daguerreotype in the possession of an intimate friend; the memoir by that distinguished officer and citizen, Colonel Preston, of Kentucky.

Albert Sidney Johnston was born in Mason County, Kentucky, in 1803. His father was a physician of education and high character, from the vicinity of Salisbury, in Connecticut, who emigrated to Kentucky before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. His eldest son, Josiah Stoddard Johnston, was a statesman of signal ability, and was returned to the Senate of the United States from Louisiana. He was the confidential friend of Mr. Clay, and his second in his duel with Randolph. Sidney Johnston was sent by his father, at an early age, to the school of Dr. Lewis Marshall, a brother of Chief-Justice Marshall, one of the most learned and accomplished scholars of his day. Afterward he was placed at Transylvania University, where he had nearly completed a liberal education when his brother, discerning the peculiar bent of his mind, induced him to go to West Point. He graduated at the Military Academy, and received a commission in the 6th Regiment of Infantry. During his academic course he was highly distinguished for his attainments in mathematics and the severer studies of his profession, being almost at the head of his classes; but he displayed little aptitude for languages and the lighter branches of learning. He entered the army, and was ordered to the West, where he was selected as Adjutant-General during the Black Hawk war, by the commander, General Atkinson, and, though young, earned a high reputation for gallantry, energy, and judgment. After the cessation of hostilities he resigned his commission, with the intention of residing upon a plantation near St. Louis; but afterward, during the struggle between Mexico and Texas, he left the United States. He arrived in Texas not long after the battle of San Jacinto, and while the contest was in progress enrolled himself as a private soldier in the army, and rose rapidly to high command. At that time the forces of Texas, under the command of General Felix Huston, a Kentuckian of rash and impetuous courage, but of noble and generous impulses, was collected for the defense of the infant republic. Johnston was elected to supersede him in the command. When he arrived Huston chose to consider himself affronted upon an imaginary point of etiquette, and challenged him the day after he assumed the command. Johnston at once accepted the challenge, and a meeting ensued, in which he was wounded—as it was feared, mortally—by his antagonist, who was an admirable shot. The friend and second of Johnston, thinking he was dying, muttered that the matter should not rest, but would be avenged by him. Johnston turned to him, and said, "It is my request, in the event of my death, that you shall yield obedience to my second in command, General Huston; and I trust you will not, by such conduct, promote a spirit of insubordination." Huston afterward became the friend of Johnston, and always spoke of him with the highest consideration and respect.

General Johnston afterward was appointed Secretary of War in Texas, and organized the expedition under Burleson, in 1839, against the Cherokees. He was present in person at the decisive engagement, on the River Neuces, in which the Cherokees, seven hundred strong, were routed by the Texans. In his department he manifested not only skill as a soldier in every emergency, but ability and discretion as a civilian. He became an ardent advocate for the annexation of Texas to the United States, and used all the influence he possessed to secure its consummation. Subsequently, when war was declared against Mexico, and he was in private life, residing upon his plantation in Brazoria County, General Taylor wrote to him from Point Isabel, and requested him to join him immediately. Johnston at once volunteered as a private soldier, collected a few friends, appointed a rendezvous at Point Isabel, and, as there were no vessels, mounted his horse, and joined General Taylor. Two Texan regiments assembled, and Johnston was elected Colonel of one, and the celebrated partisan officer, Jack Hays, was elected Colonel of the other. Johnston's regiment was disbanded before the battle of Monterey, but he was unwilling to leave the scene of active operations, and went forward with the army. He was appointed Inspector-General, by Taylor, of General William O. Butler's division, and accepted the place. He was present at Monterey; and during a heavy fire upon Mitchell's Ohio regiment, of which the Colonel fell wounded, displayed the most conspicuous coolness, gallantry, and skill. His horse was three shot, but he escaped unwounded. He was thanked in his dispatches by General Butler for his conduct on that memorable occasion, and was urged by General Taylor for the post of Brigadier-General, in preference to numbers of brave and skillful officers under his command. The commission was subsequently bestowed upon Caleb Cushing.

A MOUNTAIN PILOT.

ADVANCED SENTRY.

After his service in Mexico Johnston again returned to his plantation. When he went to Texas he possessed a sufficient fortune, which, however, had become impaired from the necessary neglect of his private affairs. Naturally independent in character, and punctual in the fulfillment of his obligations, he set to work on his place, when General Taylor, then President, tendered him the appointment of Paymaster, with the rank of Major, as it was then the only appropriate place within his gift. Johnston held the commission for several years, until the new regiments were levied, when the Secretary of War, Jefferson Davis, who knew his skill as a soldier, and his high character for worth and ability, and who had known him at West Point, and had seen him in the field, appointed him Colonel of the 2d Cavalry. Since that time Johnston has been chiefly employed as commanding officer of the Southwestern Military Department.

INTERIOR OF AN OFFICER'S TENT.

When the recent troubles in Utah occurred Johnston was ordered to Washington, and the general opinion of the army, as well as the judgment of the President, indicated him as the proper officer to be charged with the Mormon affair. For he has pushed forward with extraordinary energy, notwithstanding the inclement season of the year, the march of the mountain, and the numberless impediments to the march of an army under such circumstances.

Colonel Johnston is now in the matured vigor of manhood. He is above six feet in height, strongly and powerfully formed, with a grave, dignified, and commanding presence. His features are strongly marked, showing his Scottish blood, and denote great resolution and composure of character. His complexion, apparently, is fair. His manners are courteous. His habits are abstemious and temperate, and no excess has acquired his powerful constitution. His mind is clear, strong, and well cultivated. His manner is courteous, but rather grave and silent. He has many warm friends, but they have been won and secured rather by the native dignity and nobility of his character than by his powers of address. He is a man of strong will and ardent temper, but his whole bearing testifies the self-control he has acquired. As a soldier he stands very high in the opinion of the army. As an instance of this it may be mentioned that, in a large assembly of officers and gentlemen, the gallant and impetuous Worth, when asked who was the best soldier he had ever seen, replied, "I consider Sidney Johnston the best soldier I ever knew."

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XI.

A man of the world, having accepted a troublesome charge, considers that he will do well to get it off his hands promptly decided, I says, first, that he could not well have done better; and, secondly, that none could be said to prove that he could not have done worse.

RESUMING his latent occupation of a somewhat detailed description of Colonel Morley, it sufficies for the present to say that he was a man of a very fine understanding, as applied to the special world in which he lived. Though no one had a more numerous circle of friends, though with many of those friends he was on the most fasting of familiar intimacy which Society will extend to any one, he was in fact a recluse of late, could not have established with any life desirous of that brilliant world in which Colonel Morley moved and had his being, yet to Alton Morley's heart (a heart unknown to reached) no friend was so dear as Guy Darrell. They had entered Eton on the same day (he left it the year after)—lodged with each other in the same house; and though of very different characters, formed one of those strong, permanent friendships which the Fates weave into the very woof of existence.

Darrell's recommendation would have secured to any young protégé Colonel Morley's gracious welcome and invaluable advice. But when Darrell's acknowledged kinsman and as Charles Haughton's son, Lionel called forth his kindliest sentiments, and obtained his most anxious deliberations. He had already seen the boy several times before writing the letter which, deeming it would please her to defer his visit until she could receive him in all the glories of Gloucester Place; and he had made up his mind high favor, and deemed him worthy of a conversation with the world. Having done well, in his letter to Colonel Morley, had emphatically distinguished the position of Lionel, as a kinsman, from that of a client, or dependent or even a probable heir, yet the rich man had also added—"But I will be to the lad quite as the representative to the Haughtons; and, whatever I may do with the bulk of my fortune, I shall leave to him a liberal competence. The completion of his education, the adequate allowance to him, the choice of a profession are matters in which I entrust you to set for yourself, as if you were his guardian. I am leaving Brighton—I may be absent for years." Colonel Morley, in accepting the responsibilities thus presented on his hands, brought to the discharge subtle discrimination as well as conscientious anxiety.

He saw that Lionel's heart was set upon the military profession, and that his power of application—both lukewarm and desultory—was not cheered and concentered by enthusiasm, and hopeful, therefore, that if once fairly started upon which had no immediate reference to the objects of his ambition. The Colonel accordingly dismissed the idea of sending the boy for three years to a University. Alton Morley summed up his theories on the collegiate system in the succinct aphorism: "Nothing so good as a University education, nor worse than a University without an education. Brought into youth at once into the wider sphere of a capital, provided with more income to spend than all the ordinary checks of good company, the restraints imposed by the presence of decorous women, and men of grave years and dignified reports, than confine him to the exclusive society of youths of his own age—the age of wild spirits and unreflecting imitation—unless he cling to the safeguard which is found in hard reading, less by the book-knowledge it bestows than by the serious and preoccupied mind which it absorbs from the coarser temptations."

But Lionel, younger in character than in years, was too boyish as yet to be safely consigned to those trials of tact and temper which await the neophyte who enters on life through the doors of a mess-room. His pride was too morbid—too much on the alert for offense; his frankness too crude, his spirit too untamed by the insensible discipline of every-day commerce.

Quoth the observant Man of the World: "There his honor at his own playing, and he will carry it about with him on full cock, to blow off a friend's head or his own, on the least touch of the hair-trigger. Decidedly huffy. And of all causes that disturb regiments, and make conversation impossible, commend me to a huffy lad! Pity! for that youngster has in him the right metal—spirit and pluck—and would look well in a first-rate soldier. It would be time well spent, that should join professional studies with that degree of social polish which gives dignity and cures huffiness. I must get him out of London, out of Brighton, out of the frigid old Fanbourg St. Germain, where manners are best bred, and household diets most repulsive. Fanbourg St. Germain is the place itself, I shall have him under my eye; and a few years spent in completing being into a man would bring him nearer to that marshal's baton which every recruit should have in his eye, than if I started him at once, a new ensign, into the hardcare of himself as an ensign, and unhited, even by mechanical routine, to side with the world, should he live to buy the grade of a colonel."

The plans thus promptly formed Alton Morley briefly explained to Lionel, when the boy came to breakfast in Carton Street, requesting him to obey them. Haughton's arrangement is that exercise of the discretionary powers with which he had been invested by Mr. Darrell. To the proposal that originally emanated from lively studies to which his tastes directed his mind, and the general bias indicated by his unconscious manhood among scenes bright to his fancy, because new to his experience, seemed, of course, perfection of wisdom.

Less readily pleased was poor Mrs. Haughton when her son returned to communicate the arrangement, backing a polite and well-worded letter from the Colonel with his own more artless eloquence. "Mamma, I am going to be a wing of her "little tempers." "What! her Colonel Morley from her—and to the end of the Continent, just when she was so respectably settled! What was the good of money if she was to be parted from her child? Why, Colonel Morley take the money back if he pleased—she would not touch a penny of it!" Such was Mrs. Haughton's feeling; and she was shocked to think Lionel was in such unnatural hands. Such was her peculiarity that he no longer appeared to her—a sergeant's tooth, etc., etc." But as soon as the storm was over the sky cleared, and Mrs. Haughton became penitent and sensible. Then her grief for Lionel's loss was soothed by the consoling mother and son spent together, though painful at the moment, it would be for their benefit in both hereafter to recall! Their hands clasped in each other—her head leaning on his young shoulder—her tears dropped upon his curling hair. And soft words of kindly, motherly counsel—of womanly experience—of fond affection—of thrice happy, as an after remembrance, be the final parting between hopeful son and fearful parent, at the foot of that path of life which first starts from the threshold of Home—lost in the distance of the fog-opposing shore—bridge over which goes the boy who will never return but as the man.

CHAPTER XII.

The Pocket-Candlestick hails his remote kin with love-tokens of a wider nature than those timidly toward it from under the waistcoat.

LIONEL'S career is beginning to be hard up! The infallible calculation at coup-sur-soir has deserted all that cupid population. It has emigrated bodily from the vestings of the young gentlemen whom Dolly Poole had contributed to his experience. The interval is here, and, as usual, pathetically observes "that he has lost three times in that time, and that he believes he owes to his legs are gone to enlarge his liver."

Jasper is compelled to put down his estimable dish-lining to his generous patronage of fashionable lodgings; and just when the prospectuses of a dinner begin to flutter from the himself of Arabella Crane, and remembers that she promised him £5, nay, £10, which are still not from her. He writes to her, and tells her his prodigal son. Nay, to his own surprise, he finds Mrs. Crane has become much more loving—the drawing-rooms are cleaned up; the nebelion of a few easy articles of furniture gives them quite a comfortable look. The cook has improved in costume—though her favorite color still remains blue. Mrs. Crane herself is dressed she fully expected him—that these preparations are in his honor—that she has engaged a very good cook—that she hopes he will stay when her better engaged; in short, let him feel himself at home in Fodder Place.

Jasper at first suspected a sinister design, under civilities that his experience told him were unascribed—a design to entrap him into that matrimonial alliance which he had so unqualifiedly declined; and Jasper was not troubled with an ignorance which man is not justified in feeling for any connubial partner loves preternaturally terrific than the Witch of Endor or the Bleeding Nun!

But Mrs. Crane quickly and candidly hastened to dispel his ungenerous apprehensions. "She had given up," she said, "all ideas so preposterous—love and wedlock were equally out of her mind. But ill as he had behaved to her, she could not but feel a sincere regard for him—a deep interest in his fate. He ought still to make a brilliant marriage—did that idea not occur to him? She might help him there with her woman's wit. In short," said Mrs. Crane, pinching her lips, "in short, Jasper, I feel for you as a mother. Look on me as such!"

The Dear Boy's gratuitous notion wonderfully tickled, and egregiously delighted Jasper himself. "Look on you as a mother! I will," said he, with a wink. "Best of creatures!" And though in his own mind he had not a doubt but what she still adored him, and, moreover, believed it was a disinterested, devoted admiration, such as the beautiful muse really had inspired more than once in his abominable life. Accordingly, he moved into the neighborhood of Fodder Place, something himself from the second-floor bedroom in a house recommended to him by Mrs. Crane, and taking his meals at his splendid lodgings with final gratitude. He expressed a desire to make Mr. Poole's acquaintance—and Mrs. Crane hoped to present him worthy. Mrs. Crane invited Samuel Dolly to dine one day, to say the next; she lent him £5 to redeem his dress-coat from pawn, and she gave him medicaments for the relief of his headache.

Samuel Dolly venerated her as a most superior woman—could Jasper such a "treasure" exist? Could Arabella Crane possess herself of the existence of Jasper Dolly. Lightly her deepest cover routine, to side with the fisherman over the captivated trout. And whatever her generosity, it was not carried to beneficence. Mrs. Crane just gave to Jasper enough to bring him within her power—she had no idea of ruining herself by inconsiderate liberality—she concealed from the extent of her income (which was in chief part derived from Jasper himself), the amount of her savings, even the name of her banker. And if he carried off to the vasque-et-nose tribe she coins he received from her, and even from more, Mrs. Crane put on the look of a mother incensed—and awful—and could not relent, till those sometimes can scold. Jasper Lonely began to be frightened at Mrs. Crane's scoldings. And she had not been over over her, when, Dolly avoided by a lover, is denied to an adopted son. His mind, without the slightest effort, reverted to the gambling-table—for which the resources was wanting—settled with redoubled force on the unlucky Mrs. Haughton. As he called at her house several times since the first day on which he had seen that sweet Charlie. Mrs. Haughton was never at home. And so, when the answer was given to him by the footman, he looked more than once, and scanned the street, seen herself through the window; it was clear that she was not visible to any visitor.

Jasper Lonely, by habit, was the reverse of a pertinacious and troublesome suitor—not, indeed, from modesty, but want of audacity, from excess of self-love. Where a lovelace so unkindly condemned to such a reverse, he would piss so tasteless as to decline them deserved and experienced his contempt. Besides, steadfast and prolonged pursuit of any object, however important and attractive, was alien to the lively and fickle nature of Jasper. But in this instance he had other motives than those on the surface for unusual perseverance.

A man like Jasper Lonely never reposes implicit confidence in any one. He is garrulous, indeed—very much that Indiscreet—but never to have advised him not to disclose; but he invariably has nooks and corners in his mind which he keeps to himself. Jasper did not tell Arabella his adopted mother his designs upon his intended bride. But he could not help thinking that the woman he was more frank; and when she saw him looking over her select and severe library at making therefore Polite Letters and Art of Love and the Elegant Extracts, Mrs. Crane divined at once that Jasper Lonely was meditating the offense of epistolary seduction upon the widow of Gloucester Place.

Jasper did not write a bad love-letter in the florid style. He had at his command, in especial, lively and pungent quotations, the effect of which repeated experience had assured him to be as potent upon the female bosom as the inhalation of the vapor of the nitrous sorcery. The following in particular:

"Love is the book for falsehood framed,
I never could injure you."

—Could generally to be applied when confessing that he was not in love, had been interestingly wild, and would, if pity were denied him, be pathetically timid:

"When he who adores thee has left but the name
Of his fault and his woes behind."

Armed with these quotations—many a sentence from the Polite Letter-Writer or the Elegant Extracts—and a quire of cream-colored paper, Lonely sat down to Oridian composition. But as he approached the close of Epistle the First, he became quite a stranger to the aid which address were necessary. The address not difficult. He could give Mrs. Haughton's name (common to that gentleman)—Poole had a lodging in Bury Street, St. James, a fashionable locality for single men. But the name required more consideration. There were insuperable objections against signing his own to any person who might be in communication with Mr. Darrell—a pity, for there was a good old family of the name of Lonely. A name of aristocratic sound might indeed be readily borrowed from any lordly proprietor in Debrett without leaving a fictitious trace. But this loan was exposed to danger. Mrs. Haughton might very naturally mention such name, as borne by her husband's friend, to Colonel Morley, and Colonel Morley would most probably make those inquiries and communications at which any peer so honored to say, "There is no such Greville, Cavendish, or Talbot." But Jasper Lonely was not without fertility of invention and readiness of resource. A grand idea, worthy of a master, and proving that, if the man had not been a rogue in grain, he could have been created into a very clever author, or, indeed, across him. He would sign himself "Sarum." School—and very there is no such Sarum; nobody could say that it was. He might use the most respectable, fashionable, highly connected name. There are Salisburys—there are Somersets—Smiths who are large-served squires—unsentimental barnacles—peers of England, pillars of the State—members even of the British Collect. Yes can no more question a man's right to be a Smith than his right to be a Browning and wide as the diversity of rank, lineage, virtue, and genius in Britons, is the diversity in Smiths. Jasper still a man so generous affects a decisive precursor. Jasper signed himself "J. Courtenay Smith, Esquire."

He called, and left Epistle the First with his own kid-gloved hand, inquiring first if Mrs. Haughton were at home, and, being alluded to in the negative, this time, he asked for her son. "Her son was gone down with Colonel Morley." Jasper, though sorry to lose present hold upon the boy, was glad of learning that the Colonel was off the ground. Presumption of success, he glanced up at the window, and, sure that Mrs. Haughton was not visible, made his bow her not, lifted his hat with as melancholy an expression of reproach as he could throw into his face.

The villain could not have found a moment Mrs. Haughton's absence at a more auspicious to his chance of success. In her lodging house at Hastings, her son and husband, she had necessarily occupied for that idle train of reverie in which, the poets assure us, that Cupid finds leisure to wing his shaft at the heart of his aim. Had Lionel still been by her side—had even Colonel Morley been in town—her affection for the one, her awe of the other, would have been her safeguards. But alone in that fine new house in Gloucester Place, so spacious and so—no dear visiting circle on which to expend the decree of talk she had to say, the innocent excitement that are natural to ladies of an active mind and a nervous temperament, the sudden obtrusion of matter so personally interesting to her as not to be denied that the temptation was immense!

And when that note, so neatly folded—so elegantly sealed—lay in her resolute hand, the widow could not but feel that she was still young, pretty; and that it was hard for a lady to the day when the linen-draper's fair daughter had been the property of the Haughtons of High Street—when young officers had managed to insult fro the pavement, looking in at her window—when echo and the dark eyes of the invisible Charles Haughton had first learned to laugh her pain away. And in her hand lies the letter of Charlie Haughton's particular friend. She breaks the seal. She reads—Salvation!

Five letters in five days did Jasper write. In the course of those letters he developed the processes for suspicion which Colonel Morley had no suspected suggested. He is no longer unscrupulous—he is a reformed character. He alludes incidentally to the precarious age in which he had incurred those "load of debt, that heritage of woe." This accounts for his friendship with a man so much his senior as the late Arabella. He also confesses that, in spite of dissipation, his hereditary estates have disappointed him. He has still a genuine affection for and with the women of his heart, etc., etc. He had never before known what real love was, etc. The lessons that he had received from Mrs. C. "had the heart—the heart been lonely still." He entreats her to open a personal interview, though to be rejected—scorned. Still, when "he who adored her had left but the name," etc., etc. And after all "Arabella Crane was not Arabella the Fifth, she hesitated; and the woman who hesitates is not a cad, is sure, at least—to write a civil answer.

Mrs. Haughton wrote but three lines—still they were civil—and accorded the hope forever to escape from maternal tutelage, braved her scoldings, and called for a coach at the door. He was sure that he should be in luck that night. She gave to him the sum and spared the scoldings. Paid as soon as he was glad to depart. Then, from the bravado of his manner, what had really occurred, Mrs. Crane put on her bonnet and went out.

CHAPTER XIII.

Unhappy is the man who puts his trust in—a woman.

LAYS like this are apt to be sung when valor is knocked at No.—Gloucester Place, and asked to see Mrs. Haughton on urgent business. She was admitted. She remained but five minutes.

The next day, when "gay as a bridegroom prancing to his bride," Jasper Lonely presented himself at the widow's door, the servant placed in his hand a packet, and informed him that by that Mrs. Haughton had gone out of town. Jasper with difficulty suppressed his rage, opened the packet, and found—a letter—nothing, with these words:—"Sir, your name is not Courtenay Smith. If you trouble me again I shall apply to the police." Never from female hand had Jasper Loseby's pride received such a slap in the face. He was literally stunned. Mechanically he hastened to Arabella Crane; and having no longer any object in concealment, but, on the contrary, a most urgent craving for sympathy, he poured forth his indignation and wrongs. The mother could be more consolatory than Mrs. Crane. She soothed, she flattered, she gave him an excellent dinner; after which she made him so comfortable—what with an easy-chair and complimentary converse, that, when Jasper at last took to his lodging, he said: "After all, if I had been ugly and stupid, and of a weakly constitution, I should have been of a very domestic turn of mind."

CHAPTER XIV.

No Author ever drew a character, consistent to human nature, but what he was forced to ascribe to it many inconsistencies.

WHETHER moved by that pathetic speech of Jasper's, or by some other impulse of the feminine, Arabella Crane seemed suddenly to conceive the laudable and arduous design of reforming that gentleman's stores. She had some distant relations in London, whom she very rarely troubled with a visit, and who, she had wanted any thing from them, would have shut their doors in her face; but as, on the contrary, she was well off, single, and willing to lay her money to whom she pleased, the distant relations were always warm in manner, and prodigal in their offers of service. The next day she enquired to one of these kinsfolk—a person in a large way of business—and received a letter with two great books in white sheepskin. And when Loseby looked in to dine, she said, in the sweetest manner in the world, as she noticed a new expression in his countenance—a look of determination, "Jasper, you have great abilities—at the gaming-table abilities are evidently displayed—your forte is calculation—you were always very quick at that. I have been fortunate enough to procure you a nice piece of tasksork, for which you will be liberally remunerated. A friend of mine wishes to submit these books to a single accountant; he suspects that a clerk has cheated him, but he can not tell how or where. You know accounts thoroughly—so set to work—and the pay will be ten guineas."

Jasper, though his early life had rendered familiar and facile to him the science of bookkeeping and double-entry, made a grimace at the revolting idea of any honest labor. He never light and well paid. But ten guineas were an immense temptation, and in the evening Mrs. Crane coaxed him into the task.

Neglecting no feminine art to make the hovless mound like a home under her roof, she had provided for his ease and comfort morocco slippers and a specially-constructed lamp, material-rich, in color becoming. Men, single or married, are accustomed to connect the idea of home with dressing-gown and slippers, and usually, if, after dinner, they apply (as Jasper Loseby now applied) to accounts, to unyielding figures, to active, the form in repose. What achievement, literary or scientific, was ever accomplished by a student arranged in dressing-gown and slippers, and "cabined, cribbed, confined," in a cost that his him like iron? As robed in that elegant garment which is consecrated to the sacred familiar Lares, the relaxing, handsome ruffian sate in the quiet room, bending his still powerful profile over the sheepskin books—the harmless pen in the white-shaped hand, like a feather, the wreathed him with a softening countenance. To bear him company, she had actively taken herself to work—the gold thimble dropped in the fair repose—working and humming, with nimble artistic fingers, new carpets for the parlor-sofa! Strange creature is Woman! Ungrateful and perfidious as she sleek tiger before her had often proved himself—though no man could less deserve one kindly sentiment in a female heart—how many a low chair has he made ready for her, still it was pleasing to know that he cared for nobody else—that he was sitting in the same room—and the gold thimble did the rest. Her insolence could continue she could forget the past, and look contented toward the future. Again I say, strange creature is Woman!—and, in this instance, creature more strange, because so grim! Such are her eyes softest, such her fingers work, and her mind revolves schemes for making that lawless wild beast an harmless, tame animal, who can help feeling for and with grim Arabella Crane?

Poor woman! And will not the experiment succeed? Three evenings does Jasper Loseby devote to his studies life and fortune depend upon. He completes his task—he receives the ten guineas. (How much of that fee came out of Mrs. Crane's privy purse?) He looks over three mistakes, which justify suspicion of the bookkeeper's honesty. He is clear in each mistake. He is praised for acuteness, and promised a still lighter employment, to be still better paid. He departs, declaring that he will come the next day, earlier than usual—he volunteers an assignment work in general—but Arabella Crane evenings so happy he has not spent for years; he leaves Mrs. Crane so much impressed by the hope of his improvement, that if a female clergyman had found her just at that moment, she might almost have been induced to pray. Bet—

"Hen quatre fièvre
Montaigne deux fortune"

Jasper Loseby returns not, neither to Podden Place nor to his lodging in the neighborhood. Days elapse; still he comes not; even Poole does not know where he has gone; even Poole has not seen him! But that latter worthy is now laid up with a serious rheumatic fever, confined to his room and water-gruel. And Jasper Loseby is not the man to intrude himself on the privacy of a sick chamber. Mrs. Crane, more bereavement, visits Poole—chews him up—gets him a nurse—writes to Uncle Sam. Poole dresses her. He hears that Uncle Sam, moved by the spectacle of his sick bed, will say, "Don't let your debts fret you—I will pay them!" Whatever her disappointment or resentment at Jasper's thankless and mysterious evasion, Arabella Crane is calmly confident of his return. To her servant, Bridgett Greggs, who was perhaps the sole person in the world who entertained affection for the lone, gaunt woman, and who held Jasper Loseby in profound detestation, she said, with unusual firmness, that work must be crossed my life, and darkened it. He passed away, and left Night behind him. He has dared to return. He shall see me no more again till the grave yawn for one of us."

"Ah, dear, dear you, miss, you would not put yourself in the power of such a black-hearted villing?"

"In his power! No, Bridgett; fear not, he must be in mine—sooner or later in mine—hand and foot. Patience!"

As she was thus speaking—a knock at the door—"It is he—I told you so—quick!"

But it was not Jasper Loseby. It was Mr. Rogge.

RESUMPTION.*

No money yet! no money yet!
Although 'tis months since it was due!
The merchant fumes, he storms, he frets,
Ye gods! ye gods! what are the limits about?

I.

The Banks remained, they told us, of other day,
With prompt resumption at exhaustion's fly.
What they "resumed" "twere difficult to say,
Save "notes of preparation."

II.

Thinks other "notes" are neither there nor here,
As all will find who ask accommodation;
And as for specie, that is still too dear
For poets' "resuscitation."

III.

Perchance they will resume their "shining" arks,
Taking good gold and giving doubtful paper;
With "rags" to cover our embarrassed parts,
And pay back-loan's "deficiency."

IV.

Perchance they'll blow their bubbles once again;
Transparent tissues, stained with cute de-vices!
Thinking to "raise the wind," when 'tis next plain
They'll only raise the prices.

V.

Two hundred million paper promises!
(Less promising of Actors than dis-asters!)
What wonder if credit shows a frown,
Just think of it, my masters!

VI.

What wonder such a fabric knocks up all prices;
Makes "bulls" to bully, "bears" grow put to shifts;
Brings people to the "rattle" for their "specs,"
Besides hard times and sweating.

VII.

What wonder our prosperity's all "flash!"
A million bubble, filled with gas and vanity,
Bound to explode, and leave the world in gloom!
Or times grow "tight" or panic'y!

VIII.

What wonder we buy "rags" of all creation;
But all mankind's cave ours machinery slanging;
That all our "paper" is but speculation,
To a general paper-banging!

IX.

"Paper suspension!"—That's the delirium phrase
Neath which this "Country" darkens every dwelling!
Brings misery—not riches—and poverty!
Puts e'en bank-notes' feeling.

X.

'Tis said King Midas, in long, by-gone years,
Turned all he touched to gold—the sea of Mammon!
Our paper plan's the reverse—turns gold to golden ars,
Turn all our wealth to gammon.

XI.

Our gait they send to parly John Bull;
Our paper, lying sent to every shore;
But Jonathan—the guiling green, bank tool!—
Jonathan takes bank paper.

XII.

Enchanted fool!—who said enchantment slit,
Which turned to "rubbish" Gold—the fairy erection;
Finds cash he counts as worse than counter-feits,
His trade but counter-action.

XIII.

Gold he might have and silver without stint,
Instead of paper notes, are "rags" and token;
But Jonathan hates all smell of "mint,"
Yet dotes on paper "tin."

XIV.

The "Golden Gate" is open to our hand;
Gold—our real treasure—is there in plenty;
Our sapient bankers take the bullion, and Issue "shin-plasters" galore.

XV.

Paper!—the "people's choice"—the banker's blist'ns!—
Dance to his "notes," you'll see a fine piper,
Who Fortune seeks in "rags" just when it wanes,
The while he "loses the slipper."

XVI.

Who doubles paper, doubles, to his cost,
Banks, brokers, skinners, interest, and bank beggars,
And gains—not riches only—but bread,
Counted in bigger figures.

XVII.

The man who finds out how two blades are grown
In place of one, makes the land a no-bel'on!
Who takes two "solids" to my true sense of one,
Is just "a Jonathan."

J. S. P.

THE LEGEND OF MY NATIVE TOWN.

THE little country-town in old England from which my ancestors came has a legend of its own which is well known to many persons there, although I believe it has never yet found print. I have often heard the story told by grey-headed old men who knew it by heart. Old Richard Hayes, took more delight in seeing his daughter—in hearing her speak, or in exchanging a few words with her—than ever old Baron dreamed of, or than ever any one else dreamed of—not excepting the daughter or the appreciative himself. What could Richard Hayes want? He had suspected it if he could have known. He would, probably, have thanked his superiors, and his old appreciation, when they were free from control, took to gambling, or profuse swearing, or drunkenness, with a hearty goodwill. He believed that his masters' eye was not constantly upon them, they would shirk from their work, or rob the till, or get out and do the mile. You might argue as you would!

Richard Hayes was a steady, honest, and industrious fellow; but about this time his mind was apt to wander from his work, so that some one else was accordingly done to the old saddler's materials.

"You are an idle villain," said the master, one morning early. "You eat and drink here and render no return."

Hayes made no answer, though deeply wounded. He was no great hero, and was still but a lad. He did consider that many other lads were often offended—he refused to eat that day. When meal-times came he said he would rather work on. Old Baines bore this in penitential with great cheerfulness. He quoted old proverbs about a proud stomach. Before the noon-day meal-time of dinner, that the savory steam might wander up the long shop, and tease his self-punished apprentice, Richard Hayes looked on; but sometimes, when the old man made a joke at his expense, he paused a while and listened. Did the joke hurt him, or join in the persecution? If she did, he would starve himself to death. But she did not; nor did he hear her speak a word.

That afternoon, when it was getting dusk and Richard Hayes was still at his work, while the master saddler was smoking in his little backroom—Margaret stole through into the shop so gently that the apprentice could not hear her, until she stood beside him. She laid her hand upon his arm.

"Come, Dick," she said; "come in for my sake. I know—you have not broken fast all day."

"I have broken my fast," he said, with an air of bread that I have not earned," said Dick.

"Never mind that," said the girl. "You are vexing me, and vexing my father, too. Do, pray, come in."

"No, Margaret," replied the apprentice. "I'm not without a guinea of my own. I'll buy my own bread. I'll not eat bread for which I earn no man's table."

"Have you a bad heart?" said the girl.

"I have a right feeling," replied Dick.

"Well; and if you have, Dick," replied the girl, "you've done nothing wrong. Why are you grieve me, too? Well, well, I can not make you come, so good-night."

Dick took her little trembling hand and held it for a while, and felt a strong desire to blubber and give in. But neither held out against any thing but her companion.

He stood there, still holding her hand for some minutes, and not a word; till, just at the moment that she turned away, he whispered to her, hurriedly, "Margaret, I care for nothing. You shan't grieve about me. I'll give in. They shall say or think what they like." With this he let his fair work and left the room where the master saddler was, and sat down in silence and ate his meal. He knew old Baines's jokes, and let him tell of how often he had known such stubborn folks brought round by hunger, and made at one or other of the trades. The saddler, when he had come out, sat there and little thought what power had swayed the apprentice. That night Margaret and her father's apprentice on the stairs and bade him good-night, and told him he was a kind-hearted good-night, and told him he was a kind-hearted fellow, and that he must remember that day.

From that time old Ransen had no more power to make his apprentice angry. He still worked hard and did his best, and if the old man complained he gave him no answer. He was not answering nor when his apprenticeship would end, and Dick thought of what he should do when master of his business. He planned out many schemes. But old Ransen grew every day more irritable. Dick's silence, when he spoke to him, looked like contempt. He was the time drawing near when he supposed that his apprentice would throw off the mask and set him at defiance. He was much soured him; and one day, when he had been eating his apprentice for some trifle, Dick, with thoughts of the old man's anger again to whistle at his work. The old man's anger was roused at this. He rushed at his apprentice and struck him. Dick had been used to a moment he would not have returned the blow; but he didn't pause to think a moment. He knocked him down. There could be no reconciliation after that. The old man declared solemnly that Dick should be taken before a magistrate the next day and sent to jail. Ransen, it is true, had struck the apprentice first; and magistrates had no sympathy with apprentices. The old man had bruises; Dick had none. There was nothing more certain than that Dick, in the case before a magistrate, would be sent to a prison to associate with thieves and rogues. Dick turned it over in his mind that night; but, look at it how he would, he saw no hope, except in running away—so he made up his mind at once. He tied in a bundle all he possessed, put on all his clothes, dropped out of the low window on to the yard, and so into the roadway, and walked away.

A runaway apprentice in these days was a far blacker villain than he is now. There was not a man or woman in the country round about where poor Dick had spent his days who would have helped him with a crust if they had known it. The angry news got to the ears of the masters, and lurked at all such unnatural rebels. Dick had a fellow-feeling. But he was not doubt of getting work when he had got far enough to be safe. Dick's plan was to make a fortune at once, and return and claim Margaret as his wife—to compel old Ransen to forgive him and forget the past. But, although this scheme was in his well defined and practical enough, he found difficulties. In many towns there was not a single soldier to be found. More than one magistrate he had left behind him came to a place where he learned at last that there was a soldier's shop. Dick entered, and hoped, and determined to go in and seek for work; but going across the road to clean his shoes and shake the dust from his clothes, he saw a recruiting-party which turned him in a moment from his purpose. Right facing him on the watch-tower, and there, for the first time, Dick caught sight of his own name upon a large hand-bill, evidently newly stuck upon the board beside the door. Dick could easily the description of himself, which made him at a down glance look like any one else, and was not flattering. It gave Dick a pang to think how his characters must have it all their own way now—how every little boy in the street would now be asked up and exaggerated, and how Margaret, hearing such things, all day, might come to believe, to lose her liking for him, and to think that they were right.

He would not help this story to tell all Dick's sufferings; or how his stock of money gradually went; or how his wits and bundle dwindled down at last to a stick and no bundle. In some places people told him at once that he was a runaway apprentice. Others, when they said, by their looks, that would not harbor him; in other places they wanted a character with him—could not believe what he was from, and who employed him last; and said that he looked young, and must be only just out of his time. Did the people of Dick give his good answer; and, therefore, in the end, went on his way. He was forced to learn how to look like a miserable tramp. He slept in barns and outhouses, where poor travelers took shelter with their horses. He was glad to eat of the swill of swine even of their cloes. The very loggers on the road addressed him as brutishly, without a doubt that he was one of them. But Dick would not lie. He would go and be a soldier first; and to this end, in fact, he had often thought of going before the fair.

It was on New-Year's Day, in the year seventeen hundred and eighty-five, that Dick Hayes found himself, hungry, and weary, and cold, in the town of Newcastle-on-Tyne. He wandered up and down the streets and looked at the shops, and shops, and saw two saddlers; but he was too beggarly at his appearance to go in and ask for the employment, like a decent workman. There was no help for him. Rebellion was rife in the North. Only that week the Scotch rebels had left Perth, and that called the King's Own, commanded by Colonel Wade, had marched there from Berwick. Dick found out a sergeant at a public house in a by-street, and there took service at once in the Old Buffs, and in the name of Philip Green.

When all the world conspires to treat an honest fellow as an abandoned scoundrel, it is to one that he begins to get nearer and nearer that character every day. Dick's trials had, in fact, not improved him. He did the meanest and vilest recruits, in which he found himself, tend to make him still more base. He envied his own dog, and cursed the people who had behaved harshly to him in his wanderings. He had a bitter feeling toward all the comfortable folks he met in the street—they by cheerful fires, and ate, and drank, and sang. He heard of plots and conspiracies in the north with a savage pleasure, and wished to be on the march to have a license to lay waste and kill. And this was the boy that called himself "Dick Hayes" still in reflection to that. The world and he had done with one another, and he knew it well.

In this mood he wandered up and down the streets of Newcastle, during the short time the regiment was there. One day, in a public-house, upon a little group of people in an open space in the town, in which a man was preaching, standing in the midst. The audience were poor colliers and sea-faring men, and some soldiers. They preached to the poor in fact then as they do now, and used to preach under roofs, save here and there in large towns. But this was a fine, open, fresh, wholesome-looking man, scarcely less poor in his appearance than his hearers. He stood in the blustering wind bareheaded, and his hair, as his hand, was worn and thumbed Bible, and preached from that in a rough, coarse way, which all these understood and felt. He told them he was a poor fellow like themselves, born still poorer than he started to describe what, if he had strength, should hear from him the words of truth and soberness, righteousness, and life in Christ. He spoke to the colliers and to his fellow-sailors, never liberating them their daily life. To the sailors he used some seaman's terms, saying he had taken to them himself. Richard Hayes listened to him with a curious interest; till, suddenly, the man's eye fell upon him, and he spoke some words which he knew well were meant for him alone. They were blunt, but not unkindly words. They pointed out to him his position with a truth that made him start. They guessed his past life as nearly what it was, and his present state, in so nearly what it was, and his present state, in so nearly what it was, endowed with something more than human power. When he stopped and took his hearers good-night, and the little crowd began to disperse, Dick followed him in the gathering twilight till he came up with him, and touched his arm. The man looked round.

"You have spoken kind words to a poor friendless fellow," said Dick. "I walked after you to thank you."

"Not my words," said the man. "I preach as I am bidden. God grants that they fall not upon stony ground."

"Master," said Dick, earnestly, "I'll tell you what I feel. I have met unkindness, and wrong, and insult, where I did not quite deserve them. No human being save you has given a thought to what I am, or where I am going, or what may become of me for many a day. If you have found the world as I have found it, you may be glad to know that I am grateful."

The man took Dick's proffered hand, and grasped it; and then pointing to a little public house bade his hearer follow him there, that they might talk awhile. They found a clean quiet room where a bright fire was burning, and glittering in the glass of the old-fashioned prints upon the walls. Dick, in his joy at finding a new friend, told him all his history, and the old man gave him advice. It was too late, he feared, to go back. The war demanded men, and nothing would release him: but he exhorted Dick to do his duty; to avoid the evil courses too common with his comrades; to pray to Heaven to turn the hearts of men from violence and bloodshed, and relieve him from his dreadful burden. Dick assured him fervently that he would strive to follow his advice. And so they parted; promising to meet next day, before the old man went upon his journey. When Dick saw him again, they had a longer conversation; they walked together a mile out of the town, upon the old preacher's road; and there Dick resolved to ask of him a favor.

"You know," said Dick, "after battles, they form a list of all the men who are killed. Now, I want you to promise to look always to these, and if ever you find the name of Philip Joyce, which is my name in the regiment, to let Margaret Ranson and her father know that I am dead."

"God forbid!" exclaimed his friend; "but should it be so, His will be done. I give my promise, and, if I live, it shall be fulfilled."

"Do not say where, or how," said Dick, in a faltering voice, "for it would grieve her more than need be. Say that you saw me after I left them, and that I was sorry for the pain that I had given them."

The old preacher grasped his hand and bade him hope, and be confident of the good wishes of Jacob Bonnell; and then took his farewell, and went upon his way.

Recruits were drilled rapidly in that time of rebellion, for soldiers must be had whether taught or not.

Richard Hayes was with the army under Wade and General Hawley at Falkirk and Culloden, and saw many a scene of carnage, but escaped without a wound. He heard no tidings of the old preacher; but his words were not forgotten. There was not a better or more humane soldier in all the army. Most men liked him, and the cavalry officers employed him to mend their saddles for them. Two years after he had enlisted, he embarked with his regiment for Flanders, and then fought at Roucoux. From the day he left his home he had never heard of Margaret or her father, but he still cherished the hope of seeing her again. The desire had grown with time. He guarded all the money that he earned with the hope of being allowed to buy his freedom, and return to England; and, with this idea forever present, he acquired a greedy love of money that looked like avarice in his comrades' eyes, and, indeed, grew nearer to that quality every day. The long delay preyed upon his spirits, and he became by degrees a sullen and silent man. The waste and luxury of young officers filled him with envy. The good luck of others made him hate them. The sight of successful roguery turned all his thoughts to bitterness.

Sometimes, in his great dejection, doubts would arise in his mind whether all honesty were not a mere delusion—a doctrine preached by knaves who were too wise to follow it, but palmed it upon weaker men for their own gain. He knew that sometimes after an engagement, or even when on the march, men would grow suddenly possessed of a store of money—from what source none told. Some would gamble this away, sitting at night by watch-fires, and would lose good sums without a thought, or with a laugh. Dick never joined in these; but he would sometimes look on with a strong interest. One night he was watching such a party, who were quietly throwing dice upon the top of a drum. The man who won was an idle and dissolute fellow. Hayes fixed his eyes upon the little heap of money which the winner swept into his pouch, and felt a gnawing envy. The blood rushed to his head. The forms of the men shot up into unnatural size, and dropped again; the whole scene reeled before his eyes in the ruddy glare of the wooden fire. A strong desire possessed him to seize the dice-box, and challenge the winner to stake his gains once more. A superstitious whisper was in his ear, that the purpose for which he wanted gold was good and just, and that the other man would squander it—and that, seeing all these things, Fortune would favor him. He advanced to the drum, and asked eagerly to be allowed to throw. The man accepted his challenge, and Hayes lost; he doubled his stake, and lost again; doubled it, and lost once more. Some men who knew their comrade's avaricious character, had gathered round, and he knew that they felt a satisfaction at his losses. Indeed, as he cast down his guineas and left the spot, a half-smothered laugh caught his ear, and roused in him thoughts more bitter still than he had felt upon that New-Year's Day when he wandered hungry and weary, a stranger in the streets of Newcastle.

There was a great battle on the next day, which lasted from daylight till near sunset, many hundreds being slain. The fight had spread over a wide country, many sharp struggles having taken place at distant points. The company to which Hayes belonged had been pushed on to the front; until near the close of the day it found itself alone, and the word was given to fall back. At this moment he received a blow upon the head, from what cause he knew not, for he reeled at once, and fell.

He could not have lain long. When he awoke it was daylight; but the place where he found himself was deserted. He rubbed his head and found a little blood, which he wiped with his handkerchief, but he seemed to have nothing but a bruise. After resting a few moments, he felt quite revived, and determined to go on at once in search of his comrades.

To those who have ever listened for noises real or fancied, in solitary places, where there is no wind, it will not seem strange that Hayes felt doubtful in which direction the body of the army lay; for sometimes he seemed to hear a confused murmur upon either side, and sometimes a noise like one hallooing at a great distance. Not doubting, however, that he should rejoin his comrades, he wound his way round a low hill till he came to a field of brushwood, where traces of the fight were visible. The flush of sunset filled the sky, like a crimson vapor risen from the battle-field; but the light was beginning to fail. Hayes walked quickly till he sunk again into a hollow, and there, a little off the path, beside a pool of water gleaming crimson in the sunset like a pool of blood, he found the body of a man. He lay there motionless, as if he had striven to gain the pool and drink, but had died before he reached it; and, being then some distance from the battle-field, had remained there unobserved; for Hayes knew, by the richness of his uniform, that he was an officer of superior rank.

Hayes paused a few moments, watching the body for some sign of life, but it gave none. His epaulets and sword-hilt glittered even in the waning light, and seemed to dazzle the young soldier's eyes. The uncontrollable madness of the night before came upon him once again. The lust for money; the yearning after his abandoned home; the casuistry that made the basest thing seem good, all drew him on.

It was too late to help the man. The gold or other things about him could be useful to him no more. Before many hours, the wretches who hover about a battle-field would plunder him of all. Hayes's comrades had never yet shown scruples on this point. He stooped quickly beside the body, and drew forth a purse. The man lay sideways, and Hayes perceived a ribbon that was round his neck, as if fastened to some trinket worn beneath his shirt. He clutched it greedily, and found a cross thick-set with diamonds that sparkled as he drew it forth. Hayes shrank from touching the body as he strove to disentangle the ribbon, when, to his astonishment, the wounded man uttered a faint groan.

Hayes started; and then paused; holding the cross still firmly. The man was evidently awakening from a swoon. His hand passed quickly to his breast, as if to feel for the cross there, and as quickly caught his plunderer by the wrist.

"Laissez-moi ça. Mon Dieu! la croix!" exclaimed the officer, as if still half-dreaming.

Hayes strove to disengage himself, but he himself was weak with recent loss of blood, and the man's strength was returning. He half-raised himself, and clutched Hayes with both hands, and they fell together, and struggled with their whole strength. Hayes held the cross still, instinctively, which engaged his hand, and his antagonist drew a pistol from his belt. In another moment he would have shot his opponent dead; but Hayes held off his arm, and, blinded by the fury of the struggle, drew a pistol from his own breast, and fired at his opponent. The officer uttered a groan, his hold relaxed, and he fell back heavily. Horrified by the dreadful act into which his cupidity had betrayed him, Hayes fled from the ground.

Night had fallen as he hurried on over fields and through lanes, till he must have journeyed some miles. He discovered no trace of his comrades, nor did he desire to meet them again. The words of the preacher who had left him at Newcastle rang in his ears, and reproached him with his crime. He would have given all that he possessed—all hopes that he had ever cherished, to go back and wipe out that one day from his memory forever. Toward daylight he met some laborers, who directed him to a little village, where he purchased a blue linen blouse, and a cap and trowsers, which concealed his military uniform. In this garb he wandered about for some time, till, finally, he found his way to the coast, and took ship for England.

Hayes found employment in London, but he lived a solitary life. Of those who employed him or came in contact with him, none knew his history, but all remarked his reserved and gloomy character, and shrank from him with dislike or dread. Some even said that he had been a highwayman; others did not scruple to hint their belief that he had stained his hands with some dreadful deed. Hayes knew their distrust or hatred of him, but he lived too much with his own thoughts to heed it. His sole idea was to remain cut off forever from all who had known him or cared for him, suffering a life of voluntary hardship in expiation of his crime; though, sometimes, the thought of the misfortunes he had met with, and how these had, step by step, drawn him onward through a kind of madness to this dreadful end, passed through his mind, and eased him for a moment of some portion of the burden that he bore.

Two years had elapsed, when, one night, coming to his cheerless home, Hayes passed a man, who stared at him for a moment, and then, following him, called to him in an anxious manner to stop. Hayes turned beneath a lamp, and the man, suddenly coming up with him, called him by the name of Philip Joyce!

Hayes recognized him as Jacob Bonnell, the street-preacher, whom he had parted with in Newcastle.

"They reported you killed," said the preacher; "and for these two years I believed that we could never meet again in this world."

Hayes was too much agitated to speak many words. He begged his friend to go home with him; and there the preacher told him that he had visited his native town, and, according to his compact, had communicated to Margaret and her father the intelligence that he was dead.

"Promise me," exclaimed Hayes, "never to let them know that I still live."

The wildness of his manner struck his hearer with astonishment; but Hayes that night made confession to him of the crime of which he had been guilty.

"This is horrible," said his friend, "and can scarcely hope for forgiveness."

Hayes made no answer; but taking a little box, he unlocked it, and displayed to his visitor's eyes a purse of money and a cross sparkling with diamonds.

"They are here as I stole them," says Hayes, "the accursed things that tempted me to murder a wounded man. I have touched no atom of their value."

"Such justice as is possible must be done," said the preacher. "I will endeavor by this clew to discover the family to whom they belong, that you may restore them."

Hayes thanked him, and his visitor took a description of the cross. They spent that night in serious converse, and Hayes felt a support in his presence which he had not known for a long time. When they parted, his friend told him that he was going from London, but would return again. * * *

Many months after this event, the young workman was sitting one night alone in his room, seeking occupation for his mind in reading, when a tapping at his door aroused him. Taking his lamp in his hand, he threw the door open, and there found his faithful friend, Jacob Bonnell, with a stranger. The light upon the stranger's face revealed a man advanced in life. His countenance was stern and worn, and he had a thick mustache like a foreigner. Hayes shrank from the man's gaze, as if he remembered some one like him, and remembered him with dread.

"Enter, Monsieur Bonnell," said the stranger to the street-preacher, in a foreign accent. "You can best explain this visit."

"This," said the preacher, "is the Count de Beauséant, the representative of Count de Beauséant who was killed in the action at Val. After much correspondence with persons on the Continent, I have discovered him, and he has traveled here in person to obtain from your hand the diamond cross, a precious heir-loom belonging to his family, which you took from his brother's person on the battle-field."

"They are here!" exclaimed Hayes, suddenly unlocking the box; but the stranger stopped him, and taking the lamp from his hand, held it up to his own face, and bade Hayes scan his features, and tell him if he knew him.

The man looked steadily at him, and Hayes trembled violently with a sudden suspicion of the truth that awaited him.

"I have deceived my friend here," said the foreigner, impressively. "It was I myself who was cruelly attacked and plundered on the field of Val. See here!"

The stranger thrust open his shirt, and revealed, near his left shoulder, a bullet-wound now healed. "This is your act," he added.

Hayes uttered a cry of joy, and, seizing the stranger by the hand, fell on his face, and implored his pardon for the terrible wrong that he had done.

Some tears rolled down the weather-beaten cheek of the old soldier as he took Hayes's hand, and assured him of his forgiveness. "This noble friend of yours has told me your strange story," he added.

"It is happily ended so far," said the preacher; "but with God's blessing it may have a happier sequel. Would you see Margaret Ranson once again?"

"The hope of such a happiness was gone forever," replied Hayes; "but this night and its unexpected joy revives it. Would she, or would her father, see me again?"

"She believes you dead," replied Bonnell; "that she would be rejoiced to find you living, how can I doubt? When I saw her last, she still wore mourning for her loss, and her father spoke of you with tenderness and regret as one who might have been happy with his daughter, and who might have relieved him of the cares of his business now in his old age."

On the morrow Jacob Bonnell wrote to Margaret and her father that Richard Hayes was known to be still living, and that he would come to them that week to bring more important tidings; and in a day or two Hayes and he started together. It was in the winter time, with some snow on the ground, and the old-fashioned Highflyer coach was four days upon the road—an endless and a weary time; but Hayes's heart was lighter than it had been for many years. In the old inns where he staid on the road, when he succeeded in falling into a doze at night, he dreamed of being again and again an apprentice in the old saddle-maker's shop, with all the miseries of his future life still mercifully hidden from his knowledge. A dream of dreams it was; but when they stood before the old house again, and looked up at its plastered front, and its worn wooden steps leading into the shop, in which he had known so much of sorrow and delight; and at the small-paned lattice window, from which he had dropped on to the porch on the night when he had fled—and found all still unchanged, a shade of doubt and fear passed over him, soon happily to vanish. Jacob Bonnell entered first, and staid some time, preparing the way for his companion. Then he came out, and led his companion into the room behind the shop, where the old man, though now decrepit, was sitting in an arm-chair by the fire, exactly as of old; and oh! crowning delight of all! his own good Margaret, who had mourned for and loved his memory through all, fell on his shoulder, uttering no word, but only sobbed for joy. Not dead! Unless the miserable outcast, the poor soldier, and the gloomy misanthrope were one with him.

Jacob Bonnell staid with them for some days, doing many good offices to poor persons in the town, though he visited them afterward once a year, taking their town in the circuit of his labors. He exhorted them always to be mindful of the Providence which had led them to so happy an issue; for Hayes, before his next visit, was the husband of Margaret, and the old saddle-maker, who had retired, leaving all the conduct of his trade to his old apprentice, had caused to be written over his windows the words "Ranson and Hayes, Saddle-makers."

MY FLORA.

Tell me, Gentles, have you seen
My Flora pass this way?
That you may know the Miss I mean,
Her briefly I'll portray.

No bonnet on her head,
But on her neck she wears:
An oyster-shell 'tis said
In size with it compares.
Its shape no eye can brook,
Its use is doubtful, too;
It but imparts a barefaced look,
And brings much cheek to view.

Her dress may please the Swell
For its swoln exuberance:
She looks a Monster Belle
In such Big Ben expanse.
Those air-tubes filled with gas
Might lift her to the moon;
The small boys mark it as they pass,
And screech out, "Ah Bal-loon!"

A parasol she bears
For ornament, not use:
For comfort gloves she wears
Too tight, and sleeves too loose.
Behind her hangs a hood
Just level with her chin,
An Indian Squaw might find it good
To put a baby in.

Of her hair she shows the roots,
Sham flowers the rest conceal;
And she's crippled by her boots
With the military heel:
Streets off you hear them stalk
Whene'er she ventures out;
And she seems to waddle more than walk,
Her hoops so sway about.

Her figure may be good,
But that no eye can tell;
A mere lay-figure would
Show off her dress as well.
She may have ankles neat,
But they're concealed by skirt,
Which chiefly serves to hide her feet,
And gather up the dirt.

Then, Gentles, have you seen
My Flora this way come?
She can not have unnoticed been,
She takes up too much room!

THE NATIVES OF CAPE COLONY.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

New York, January 12, 1858.

Allow me to correct a mistake which your correspondent makes in his communication to you from Cape Town, which appeared in your edition of the 9th of this month. He writes concerning the Hottentots: "They are not many, and mostly reside far in the interior, and are met with at Algoa Bay," and "at Natal, where they are split up into tribes of Zulus, Fingoes, etc."

The Hottentots belong to a race quite distinct from the Zulus or Fingoes, and are totally different from them in appearance and character. Their color is very much the same as that of the Chinese, and their eyes are generally of the same elongated form. They originally possessed the western part of the Cape, but are now scattered over the colony, and may be called the peasantry of the Cape. They drive wagons, gather in the harvest, and perform other farm labor for the colonists. The Fingoes are a tribe very similar to the Caffres in appearance (so much so as not to be distinguished except by an experienced person). They have the same color (varying from black to olive), and the same upright, tall forms and symmetrical limbs, and the same head, of Caucasian shape, although wool-covered. They were enslaved by the Caffres, but were liberated by the English; and I must give them credit for their gratitude, for they have ever remained the firm allies of their liberators. They also live, for the most part, in the colony, and perform the duties of cattle-herds and shepherds for the colonists—and most excellent cattle-herds they make. The Hottentot displays in his conduct a far lower moral nature than Fingo, Caffre, or Zulu. Although it may be said that they have been converted to Christianity by the good missionaries of the Cape, yet their conduct shows none of this conversion: they are addicted to the lowest and most degrading vices, and seem to be perfect slaves to all their appetites. The Fingo or the Caffre is not a drunkard, and does not give way to vice as the Hottentot, although making no profession. The Fingoes are as muscular and powerful as the Caffres, and have generally beaten them, when opposed by even superior numbers, in battle, but the tribe is not very numerous. They hate the Caffres most cordially. The Zulus are a finer race than either the Fingoes or the Caffres; they are very numerous, and live near and in the colony of Port Natal, north of Algoa Bay. They are very useful to the colonists in that quarter. I resided nearly four years in the eastern district of the Cape Colony, near Algoa Bay, where I was engaged in the pursuit of farming, and employed a large number of Hottentots and Fingoes (and Caffres, in times of peace). I am, therefore, pretty well acquainted with these people, and understand their character well.

Knowing that you would wish to have any mistake corrected which might appear in your valuable paper, I have troubled you with the above.

A Cape Colonist.

MR. ASPINWALL'S MURILLO.

MR. ASPINWALL'S MURILLO.

THE public of New York have had the privilege, within the past few days, of admiring a great work of art by one of the most eminent of the old Spanish masters—"The Immaculate Conception," by Murillo. This painting is the property of Mr. William H. Aspinwall, a late partner in the eminent house of Howland & Aspinwall, who is now occupied in expending in Europe a portion of his fortune in the collection of a gallery of paintings.

To understand the subject, it must be known that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, which has lately been adopted by the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church as an indispensable article of faith, was proclaimed early in the seventeenth century by the Franciscans of Seville and an influential section of the Spanish priesthood. Their idea was that the Holy Virgin, the Mother of God, was born without sin, and without share in the curse laid on Adam and his descendants. A party in the Papal Church had professed belief in this dogma ever since the thirteenth century; but at the time Murillo flourished it had not received the favor of the Papal conclave, and indeed was viewed with remarkable disfavor by many eminent Popes. The Spanish clergy were, in consequence, all the more anxious to set forth their peculiar views; and they naturally called art to their aid. Hence the great number of "Conceptions" by the chief Spanish masters, and especially by the chiefest among them —Bartolome Esteban Murillo.

He painted many Conceptions. There are several in Spain—four at Madrid, three at Seville, one at Cadiz—and others elsewhere. The Louvre contains two—one purchased by Louis the Eighteenth, the other by the present Government of France, at the sale of the Gallery belonging to the late Marshal Soult. For this last picture no less a sum than 615,500 francs (over $103,000) was paid. The picture purchased by Mr. Aspinwall belonged to the late King of Holland. At his death his Gallery was offered for sale, and all the paintings sold, save a few which the family bought in. Among these was this Murillo, for which $70,000 had been bid in vain. When Mr. Aspinwall passed through Holland, a short time since, he heard of the painting, and made an offer for it. Negotiations were opened between him and the royal family; but it seeming impossible to come to an arrangement, Mr. Aspinwall abandoned the hope of becoming possessor of the Murillo, and pursued his journey to Paris. He had been but a few days in that city, however, when he was waited upon by an emissary from Holland, who was a bearer of a message to the effect that on reflection the owners of the picture accepted his offer. Mr. Aspinwall thus became owner of this fine work of art. We are not aware of the sum he paid, but the picture is said to have been entered at the Custom-house at the value of $70,000—a larger value, probably, than is set upon any other single work of art ever brought to this country.

The leading idea of the painting is the sinlessness of the Virgin. She is represented as standing on the moon, because the Revelation speaks of the "woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet." (xii. 1.) Light, in the painting, radiates from her, to justify the expression, "clothed with the sun." The crescent shape of the moon is understood to have had reference to the prominence of the crescent in the old Moorish reminiscences of Spain. She is robed in blue and white, to agree with a tradition which declared that the Virgin had appeared in those colors to a pious Portuguese nun, named Beatrix da Silva. But the crowning idea of the work is the dignified serenity, the passionless innocence expressed in the features of the Virgin. In the language of an eminent writer, "the pure, unerring unconsciousness of sin or shame; Heavenly beatitude past utterance; the retiring virgin loveliness of the blessed Mary, seem to have stolen so gently on her, that she is not aware of her own power and fascination. She is about fifteen years old, with those regular features which the Greek artists selected to express the serenity of the immortal gods devoid of human frailties; her attitude—

> "'Her graceful arms, in meekness bending
> Across her gently-budding breast.'"

It only remains to express the wish that all who care for art will avail themselves of the present time to see this fine work of art. Many persons will regret that Mr. Aspinwall did not rather spend his money on modern paintings than on those of a defunct age; but this is his concern, not the public's. Perhaps when his Gallery is completed it may be found that modern artists have not been forgotten.

Miscellany.

A CHINESE DISH.

Where our party of six had seated themselves at the centre table, my attention was attracted by a covered dish—something unusual at a Chinese meal. On a certain signal the cover was removed, and presently the face of the table was covered with juvenile crabs, which made their escapes from the dish with all possible rapidity. The crabbets had been thrown into a plate of vinegar just as the company sat down—such an immersion making them more brisk and lively than usual. But the sprightly spirit of the infant crabs was soon checked by each guest seizing which he could, dashing it into his mouth, crushing it between his teeth, and swallowing the whole mortal without ceremony. Determined to do as the Chinese did, I tried to swallow one with one or two of a second set, finding the shell soft and gelatinous, for they were tiny creatures, not more than a day or two old. But I was compelled to give in to the third, which had resolved to take vengeance, and gave my lip a nip as sharp and severe as to make me relinquish my hold, and likewise to desist from any further experiment of this nature.—Life in China, by the Rev. W. C. Milne.

A NOBLE GUINEA.

In the eulogy delivered by the Rev. Dr. Guthrie, in Edinburgh, on the character of Hugh Miller, he spoke of him as possessing "that noble genius which was never dissatisfied to write a line or say a word but for the glory of God and the good of man." He concludes as follows:

"It does not matter how a man dies; the matter is, how he lived. God knows that circumstances in providence may happen to deprive me of my reason. No man has any more anxiety for his reason than he has for his life; and circumstances are not wanting to me at present. I may, in the whirlwind of uncontrolled and ungovernable passion, and when the lehmman has cast me away from his post, do what I would never have done in my calm and collected moments. The highest step may be eclipsed, the most splendid genius may be quenched in darkness, memory may fail to remember my wife, my children, my God, the very name of my Saviour. I can not say what may happen, but I can say what will never happen. I say this will never happen—and God is my witness for it, for it is an exceeding comfort in such an hour as this—the connection between me and the members of this sentence shall never be severed—For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain; and come death here, come death there, come what may, this may, this boy still remains—to 'me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.'"

A GOOD PILL TO TAKE.

Sir Astley Cooper received, perhaps, the largest fee ever given at one time for an operation. It was upon an old gentleman named Long, who was a resident in the West Indies, and when he arrived at the age of seventy, began to think he continued on going to England to undergo an operation. It was performed with his accustomed ability; and upon visiting him one day, after he was able to quit his bed, he observed to his surgeon that he had a heavy bill against him, and had not yet remunerated his surgeon. He desired to know the amount of his debt, and Sir Astley stated, "I've been considering that."

"Pooh, pooh!" exclaimed the old gentleman, "I thank you give you two hundred guineas;" but that is what I shall give you," taking off his nightcap and tossing it to Sir Astley.

"Thank you, Sir," said Sir Astley, "any thing from you is acceptable," and he put the cap into his pocket.

Upon examination it was found to contain a check for one thousand guineas.

One more anecdote must be related, as singularly illustrative of his character.

Mr. Storr considered Sir Astley at his own residence, and having received his advice, departed without giving the usual fee. Sir Astley took no notice of this, but gave him his attendance as usual; but, under a feeling that he was a gentleman who had more than days but who was not in independent circumstances. Shortly after, however, Sir Astley received a note, acquainting him that, on going to the Stock Exchange, he found that he had some omission, which he had disposed of, and that he had taken the liberty to put a £3000 of it in his name; and finding that it had soon after risen, he took the further liberty of selling it for him, and now sent the difference, which was £63 5s.

Sir Astley's amount of fees for exceeds that of any member of the profession. In ten years he received no less a sum than £21,000, and for many years from £15,000 upward. His patients have comprised all classes of society, and his reputation was bestowed equally on the wealthy and the indigent.

SHARP PRACTICE.

A French officer, who had served in Algiers, and had formerly been employed in the Government in Constantine, relates the following instance of the manner in which justice is frequently administered in Turkey by the subordinate officers. The details are claimed by foreigners:

"A manufacturer of Carcassone arrived at Constantinople with a large investment of cloths, which, for a new purpose, had rendered peculiarly fit for the Turkish market. An Armenian merchant was so pleased with the goods that he bought the whole lot, and paid by his note of hand at short date. When the note matured the merchant called upon the Turk to receive payment for the amount of the note, but his surprise may be well imagined when the Turk told him that he had already paid it, and owed him nothing.

"'But,' remonstrated the merchant, 'here is your note, which I should have given to you if you had paid it.'

"'It is of no consequence,' responded the Armenian. 'I have paid it, and can produce my witnesses to prove the payment.'

"In this dilemma the merchant felt that recourse was left but to seek the aid of the French Embassador, who, feeling the inefficiency of his own intervention, recommended him to plead his case in the hands of one of his own interpreters, who understood pretty well the chicanery of the Turkish law, and was aware of the devices pursued by native debtors to elude the payment of demands for which they received value.

"When measures were prepared the merchant and his debtor appeared before the Judge, who demanded of each party what he had to advance.

"'The payment of this note,' he replied, 'which the claimant to have received.'

"'What do you reply to this?' asked the Judge of the debtor.

"'That I have already paid it, and that here are my witnesses.'

"Truly enough, two men advanced from the crowd, and testified circumstantially to the payment of the note, mentioning the day and hour when it took place.

"The affair seemed decided, and the contentious Turk was about to withdraw, when the interpreter, who had remained silent, thus addressed the Judge:

"'We admit the payment of the note, as stated by these worthy men; but they have failed to tell you, or perhaps did not know, that a few days after, we lent the money back to the defendant for his convenience.'

"To corroborate this statement two witnesses stepped forth, and bare as full testimony as the two former had done to the opposite fact, that, as the defendant was unable to refund them, he was obliged to satisfy the claimant. This is fairly to the modern practice in some more civilized lands."

FOOD AND DIGESTION.

There can be no doubt that the palate is designed to afford a test of the quality of the food used, and, of course, that must best instruct us what food is fit for and what is not fit for human use or service. Nothing can be more clear than that those articles which are agreeable to the taste were by nature intended for our food and nourishment, whether liquid or solid, foreign or of native production. If they are sweet and unadulterated, they may be dreaded by their use: they will only injure by abuse. Consequently, whatever the palate approves, our stomach will digest; if it approves not, it never is excuse; keeping in mind that the first process of digestion is carried on in the mouth, the second in the stomach; and that, in order that the stomach may be able to do its work properly, it is requisite the first process should be well performed. This consists in masticating, or chewing the solid food, and in its being well and completely broken and small substances of meat and vegetables, mixing them well, and blending the whole together before they are swallowed; and it is of the greatest urged upon all to take plenty of time to their meals, and masticate well.

DOGS AND WOMEN IN ITALY.

"Are you fond of dogs?" inquires Ross Browne, author of "Yusef." If you are, I pray your indulgence for a few reflections on the subject. They are an important element in social life throughout France and Italy, and have been for ages past upon these three degrees its very existence; without them, it would be a blank. They are the friends, companion, puppet-shows, and lap-dogs. The last are by far the most numerous and the most important. In some respects they are more interesting than the human species: they form a safety-valve for the affections; they sincerely reciprocate the love they yes; they occupy a more exalted sphere in the social circle than many, because a Frenchman is always in earnest when he loves his dog, and is more respected than men, because a woman is never so unfaithful to a dog as to a man. Constancy, constancy, and love even a lap-dog accordingly. In Florence you have the same thing. The amount of affection bestowed upon the canine species is beyond calculation. As society is organized it is very necessary that it should be so. A young lady of any pretensions to gentility can purchase a lap-dog only from a married scull. A blowever beautiful or virtuous she may be, it is useless for her to think of getting married without a well-supported lap-dog. Her husband, her children, her husband may be obtained for these hundred; but to be always a lap-dog again even at that. Any man who would marry a girl without 'the tin' would be considered a simpleton. Such cases are never—not that they could not occur, but the world is tedious he simple is to marry without a settlement for your children. Hence the

MARRIAGE CONTRACT

and the specification of an evening or two before perhaps once a week. To love a woman with any sort of marriage but on that account is impossible. She may be all his fancy painted her; she may be lovely, virtuous, and all else to declare—but such the case is hopeless on her side. A very romantic case was related to me the other day by a Florentine lady. It was one which were left to my discretion portion each of six hundred scudi. It was all they had to depend upon besides their own industry. One had a lover, a gentleman of high standing, who was a miracle of devotion; he was impatient, fierce, and jealous, and would have no opposition soul not as with others, a mere part of its existence, but the whole very life-blood of their heart. Well, as he was on the eve of having his hopes of happiness realized, another lady, with a larger marriage portion, bid for him. He immediately knocked himself down to her, and said to the other, 'Dearest, I can't marry you. I love you with unabated ardor, but marriage is out of the question. I am offered more by another lady; and, dearest creature, you must be aware that my interests at heart, you will be gratified to learn that I have accepted the offer, and intend to be married immediately.'

"The young lady was in great despair, as may be supposed. Her lover was married, and there was an end to all her hopes. Some time after her suitor received the addresses of a gentleman, who was equally intense and devoted in his love. At last he consented to have the nuptial knot tied, he sent his lawyer to demand what amount of funds she had. 'Six hundred scudi,' was the answer. 'That won't do,' said he; 'to be united join the young lady and said: 'Dearest, you know I love you, but I can't marry you on such a paltry hundred scudi. It is too small a sum altogether—much below what a gentleman of my standing in society has a right to expect.' She was, of course, and declared that it was impossible to live without him. Her sister, pitying her case, and sympathizing, observed to her: 'Since the only man I ever loved or can love is married, and since it is impossible that I can ever marry him, I will give you my portion. It is better one of us should be married than neither.' The generous lover was soon informed of it. It was not quite enough yet; but, inasmuch as she was pretty and would receive also a just appreciation of her charms, he would marry her; and the marriage contract was accordingly duly signed and carried into effect. The husband is now an old maid, and lives upon the scanty earnings of her needle. Many other cases of a similar kind have been related to me, showing a very curious state of things in social life. Now, since it rarely happens that a lady and gentleman marry the object of her affections, and since it is equally impossible for a gentleman to live without loving where there is a lack of scull, there must be an intermediate class of beings to receive the outpourings of the heart. Ladies must have something to love; and so they love their lap-dogs. I have seen beautiful girls of eighteen lap-dogs, and fondle them as children. So little women till it made me perfectly nervous. But this is nothing to the displays of affection made by the other sex. Every evening in a café, I observe one two or three bearded men kiss one another. Not a lady present was engaged in kissing their lapdogs. I know a gentleman who means to have a dog, placing a small dog on his plate and trying to swallow its head, and every day he kisses it on the other day in consequence of having jokingly observed to an acquaintance that his dog was an ugly specimen. There are lap-dogs of all grades in Florence. Those of the nobility are seat out in handsome carriages, attended by footmen, to take the fresh air on the Casine; ours in the ordinary rakes of life are attended by equipages on the public promenades, who hold them by a small silk or silver chain. Besides are infatuated about their dogs, and can go nowhere without them. They seem to be the source of pride—I might say the great point of honor—with their owners. Touch a lap-dog, save in the way of jest, and you are a ruined man. Such assaults may be forgiven, but this is an unpardonable offense.

"From dogs to sausages—it is not a very wide step. Then in Bologna—that city being chiefly known to me through its sausages—I have taken pains to inform myself respecting the history of those articles of food. I have been told that it could find on the subject was, that there once existed in Bologna a confraternity of dogs, called Canipini, which were fed and cherished with great care some time in the Middle Ages, since which period they have gradually become extinct. The sausages, however, are excellent."

MEN OF BUSINESS.

Rare should a great poets—nurer, perhaps, than veritable saints and sages—become a commonplace men of business. A man, to be excellent in any kind, should only be variously gifted in order that his gifts should be merely proportioned to one another. He must have, in a high degree, that virtue which men have always found the least important of virtues—prudence. His prudence, however, will not be exercised in any small quaresome matter, but that which, being ever actively engaged, is more fully called discretion than prudence. Such a man must have a well-balanced mind, and not, as Bailey, blended (and this is a rare combination) with a high power of imagination, enabling him to look along extended lines of possible action, and put these details in their right places. He requires a great knowledge of character, with that nice perception of what feels unerringly the right moment when to act. He must have, in combination with these, the movements of his thought and action. He must be singularly free from vanity, and is generally found to be a taciturn man, who has the art to conceal his enthusiasm.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Conscience.—Mostly used by us in judging the actions of others.

All is vanity! I saw a dustman stop the other day to save his coat-tails.

Next to that of umbrellas, the ownership of baskets perhaps the most respected. Hence the philosophical though much travelled, that basketing, and wise man only.

The value of a "good thing" depends on him who utters it. The joke of the book is certain to be laughed at; that of the private circle is frequently received in silence.

My son, if thou wilt ever right hosts, there are three bad things thou wilt inevitably suffer: smoky, a bad wife, a bad dog, and a bad landlord.

It is the last stir on the hurdy-gurdy that gets the last penny from the crowd.

Once upon a time, an elderly Scotchwoman gave her grandson the newspaper to read, telling him to read it aloud. The boy began to read the first thing that came in the way of hearing was at the parish kirk, and he began to read in the exact tone in which he had so often heard the minister read. The good lady was shocked at the boy's irreverence, and exclaimed, "Hoots on the cat, ex-chelce!—What! dost thou read the newspaper with the Bible tawng?" Oh that Bible tone! how many well-meant prayers are vitiated in the hearing, how many with to thin of the number of those who are sadly annoyed by it!

A young lady being told that her lover was suddenly killed, exclaimed: "Oh, that splendid gold watch of his! I give me that—give me something to remember him by!"

The following notice appears on a country meeting-house: "Any person sticking bills against this church will be prosecuted according to law or any other nuisance."

Two negro women being tried in Petersburg (Virginia) market. One is a tall, powerful, black negress with a stentorian voice; the other, a slight, low creature, in a thin, diminutive creature. The big one is charged with peculiar tobacconist dwelling on the first subject. Mr. Black, otherwise? the other, as if perfectly satisfied that all the facts had been heard the announcement, after a moment's pause meekly clapes, "Me too!"

"Ma, here's a word in the paper I want to know what is meant by 'homicide.'" "Homicide, child, is the one murders another." "Well, ma, when Jack Noble killed Tom Jones, was he guilty of homicide?" "Yes, child."

"Sam," said a Dutchman, "you may say what you please 'bout Mr. Longshore's farm, but I tell you he never was. Mine pigs and mine hens come home mit der corn side, and Longshore's pigs and hens stay at home and starve."

Dr. Bay, Superintendent of the Butler Hospital for the Insane, Providence, Rhode Island, has written to the Governor of the mental health than any exercise of the reasoning faculties.

"What makes the milk so warm?" said Betty to the milk-woman, when she brought milk half to the door one morning. "Please, mum, the pump handle's broke, and mister took the water from the kittle."

The man that has the fork of a road into his eye has a hard row to hoe.

Dining "a la squirt," is a French idea. In Paris, at cheap restaurants, the tin soup basins for the guests are hired to them daily. From the coldness, in which the stock is seething, the attendant Lemoras draw up the soup in a large syringe, from which they squirt it into the guest's basin. He is then expected to pay for the whole day's dinner, and to have unlimited soup. Some hundred weeks up the claims of his soup, by drawing it into her syringe again. Ah! "Lemoras" indeed.

The man who lost his eyesight by injuries from a fall, has resumed his business at the old stand.

Fun should be cultivated as a fine art, for it is altogether a fine thing. Who ever knew a "funny man" to be a bad man? On the contrary, it is by the exercise of the generous, humane, social, and good? To be sure he is, now and then, a little too much addicted to practical jokes. He makes his acquaintances so merry that they sometimes shake, sulphurous smoke and flowers wherever we go. Now, we have a very jolly acquaintance who makes all the girls as pretty as June roses, and mankind one of the best families we know. We go in for him. The man who can't cultivate it must keep a good-sized half nelson about him.

Sunday morning, a young man with his intended wife presented themselves before the alter of St. John's church, and requested the rite of matrimony. The clergyman was astonished, and the minister had proceeded so far as to say, "Will you, Mary, take this man, John Smith, to be your husband?" when the bride in the truth started up and rushed to the door, followed by the astonished bridegroom, who tried in vain to stop her, and in vain, as she closed the whole colloquy by declaring, "I won't be beaten by King Dick."

A lady inquired at one of our dry-goods stores the other day for "chicken wire. The gentleman in attendance produced bundle of the article, and the lady remarked, "Pretty rigid stuff, isn't it?" "Yes, ma'am," was the reply. The whalebone was all but short by several feet. Some time after, the lady came in to undo the order, made another search through the store, in hope of discovering that article of the required length, but in vain. At last, however, she said "broke" her chagrin to the lady in a polite speech. On the office, "I am very much obliged to you—one of the ladies coming so great a demand for long whalebone that all the whales have fled from the coast of Long, and there were none but little ones now in the ocean—but, madam, they'll be back."

The people in a district in Wisconsin were represented in the last Legislature by a Mr. Jones. He was a very long noise enough, they have this year nominated a Mr. Johnson.

A lawyer in one of the Western courts lately threw a court of somebody hand. The court required him to speak more clearly. "Why, your honor," said the lawyer, "I was only trying to call Judge Spengler beforehand for throwing another case at him the moment it came."

A love-sick gentleman, who wrote sonnets, has hung himself with one of them.

The following appears upon the Clerk's record in Shasta: "Voted, That the March meeting be in April."

An individual advertises the following cure of whisky, which he had procured "expressly for his own use." He intended a gill or two of it:

The mantle of Tom Hood has descended upon "John Polloy," a contributor to the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, whose name is a synonym for punning. In a recent article, he denounces at his first visit to New York, and expresses his surprise at the following sights:

THEN AND NOW.

Then the bathers used to dip their own coon up to one's door and cut off any desired part—the animal so fabricate with the greatest ease and skill. The entire piece of business as not to mind it in the least—and as from door to door the animal was carried, the cry was "Here's your fresh meat, nice buffalo meat!" Now, in the streets of New York, as I have found never a decent market-stall, but only the meanest of the meaner kinds of provisions, and those principally cooking for tender-loins, and, probably, cheap deer meat. In the new Croton Reservoir, which is to be a large ship which I read, are to be found all kinds of vegetables, including potatoes, but not a single fish. I couldn't find out the colony of the clerk of the market. A coup told me he was paid a penny-a-head turnips, consequently his colony was raised every year.

Then.

The militia of New York I revived, that is, saw them on the 4th of July, when they were all in their wrong side of their buttoning—being armed with muskets. In some more modern days I have seen the militia in full dress, with a helmet brass of a shape to resemble a small scull mill, and a drunken lieutenant that had been eating cracker and cheese upon whom nothing in his set a knapsack opinion of Scott's tactics.

The Metropolitan Police are not only numerous but fine. The "Union Square," which is round, stands first, in which assembly is to be secured by a body of citizens who are acquainted with the public parts. The fountain, unfortunately, is dry, as a very serious water-cooler—it's lower pipes. The grass plots are very pretty. Critical people say that they are not as green as they used to be, but I observed that they were green on the first day I set my eyes upon them, and I have not seen a good-sized turf nelson about them since.

Then all the French barbers were Germans, and who have Police by their doors to attract customers.

An innocent young spritsman, in order to shock a rustic yet on the top of a tree, climbed another close by, and on being asked the reason of so fantastic a freak, said: "That he didn't want to strain the eye by a long shot."

We have no desire to be acquainted with the bachelor who proposed the following:

"Nature, impartial in her ends,
Where she made man she made the strangest,
In justice, then, to make amends,
Made woman's tongue the longest."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Jan. 25, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Jan. 23, 1858	$1,300,769	$1,354,742
Corresponding week, 1857	3,045,455	1,145,176
Decrease	$1,704,979
Increase		$209,571

This, like the statement of last week, is a gratifying and wholesome sign. There is reason to hope that for some time to come the importations may be but within due limits, and that, when trade revives, we may be found creditors, not debtors of the world.

Money continues to be a drug. There is no more demand for it than there was last week, or than there has been for the past month or more. Most of the Banks are using their deposits in lending at stocks at the Stock Street operators. Money can be had on sale at 6, and on approved paper at 6 per cent. Exchange on London rules at 108@109 for 60 day bills: on Paris at 5.15@5.12½.

The export of specie each week for the past is over a million and a quarter; but it is expected that the income from the interior will compensate this outgo, and that the Banks will show this evening, as they showed last Monday evening, an average not less than their legal millions.

The news from Europe is very encouraging. Money has fallen to 6 per cent. in London, and a corresponding reduction has taken place in all the Continental markets. The Funds are up again, and promise to go to par, notwithstanding the sad news of Napoleon's attempt to put upon the Indian mess. Several mercantile failures have occurred in Paris, but they are not numerous. A fair stock market has begun and deepens each week. There is a total absence of speculation save among the Wall street operators. The best State Stocks, however, have an improving tendency.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, January 25, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week have been rather quiet and dreadfully dull. Prices have not all not very much in value. The receipts were limited, particularly of Breadstuffs, and the demand was moderate, though shippers manifested more disposition to purchase. Cotton opened briskly and buoyant, but has closed tamely at dropping prices.... Provisions were in fair request, and prices have ruled in favor of purchasers. The grocery trade has been dull, and has not varied. Sugars are selling pretty freely at steady rates.... Hemp, Hops, and Grass Seeds were unchanged, and without any transactions.... Tobacco was offered on somewhat easier terms, and, consequently, attracted more attention.... Wool, especially pulled, was in rather better request, at former prices.... Kentucky Bagging was offered to a fair set, and it advanced considerably.... The regular trade in Dry Goods is still very backward; but, compared with last month's reserve, yet the leading brokers do not manifest any unusual desire to sell, and are not disposed to force their goods on the market. The supplies are being increased, but the jobbing trade is not sufficiently active to bring much in anticipation of the spring season. Prices, generally, are in favor of buyers, and, in some cases, have been limited, and, indeed, nominal in character.... An auction of about 2800 packages Domestic Cottons occurred on Saturday, which was very unsatisfactory to sellers. The bidding was remarkably vigorous, and the whole catalogue of goods found purchasers at prices ranging from ½ c. @ 1¼ c. per yard, under the currency in private trade. The amount reported for the week ensuing, though slightly manifested more disposition to purchase.... Cotton opened briskly and buoyant, and has closed tamely at dropping prices.... Previsions were in fair request, and prices have ruled in favor of purchasers. The grocery trade has been dull, and has not varied. Sugars are selling pretty freely at steady rates.... Hemp, Hops, and Grass Seeds were unchanged, and without any transactions.... Tobacco was offered on somewhat easier terms, and, consequently, attracted more attention.... Wool, especially pulled, was in rather better request, at former prices.... Kentucky Bagging was offered to a fair set, and it advanced considerably.... The regular trade in Dry Goods is still very backward; but, compared with last month's reserve, yet the leading brokers do not manifest any unusual desire to sell, and are not disposed to force their goods on the market. The supplies are being increased, but the jobbing trade is not sufficiently active to bring much in anticipation of the spring season. Prices, generally, are in favor of buyers, and, in some cases, have been limited, and, indeed, nominal in character.... An auction of about 2800 packages Domestic Cottons occurred on Saturday, which was very unsatisfactory to sellers. The bidding was remarkably vigorous, and the whole catalogue of goods found purchasers at prices ranging from ½ c. @ 1¼ c. per yard, under the currency in private trade. The amount reported for the week ensuing, though slightly manifested more disposition to purchase.... Cotton opened briskly and buoyant, and has closed tamely at dropping prices.... Previsions were in fair request, and prices have ruled in favor of purchasers. The grocery trade has been dull, and has not varied. Sugars are selling pretty freely at steady rates.... Hemp, Hops, and Grass Seeds were unchanged, and without any transactions.... Tobacco was offered on somewhat easier terms, and, consequently, attracted more attention.... Wool, especially pulled, was in rather better request, at former prices.... Kentucky Bagging was offered to a fair set, and it advanced considerably.... The regular trade in Dry Goods is still very backward; but, compared with last month's reserve, yet the leading brokers do not manifest any unusual desire to sell, and are not disposed to force their goods on the market. The supplies are being increased, but the jobbing trade is not sufficiently active to bring much in anticipation of the spring season. Prices, generally, are in favor of buyers, and, in some cases, have been limited, and, indeed, nominal in character.... An auction of about 2800 packages Domestic Cottons occurred on Saturday, which was very unsatisfactory to sellers. The bidding was remarkably vigorous, and the whole catalogue of goods found purchasers at prices ranging from ½ c. @ 1¼ c. per yard, under the currency in private trade. The amount reported for the week ensuing, though slightly manifested more disposition to purchase.... Cotton opened briskly and buoyant, and has closed tamely at dropping prices.... Previsions were in fair request, and prices have ruled in favor of purchasers. The grocery trade has been dull, and has not varied. Sugars are selling pretty freely at steady rates.... Hemp, Hops, and Grass Seeds were unchanged, and without any transactions.... Tobacco was offered on somewhat easier terms, and, consequently, attracted more attention.... Wool, especially pulled, was in rather better request, at former prices.... Kentucky Bagging was offered to a fair set, and it advanced considerably.... The regular trade in Dry Goods is still very backward; but, compared with last month's reserve, yet the leading brokers do not manifest any unusual desire to sell, and are not disposed to force their goods on the market. The supplies are being increased, but the jobbing trade is not sufficiently active to bring much in anticipation of the spring season. Prices, generally, are in favor of buyers, and, in some cases, have been limited, and, indeed, nominal in character.... An auction of about 2800 packages Domestic Cottons occurred on Saturday, which was very unsatisfactory to sellers. The bidding was remarkably vigorous, and the whole catalogue of goods found purchasers at prices ranging from ½ c. @ 1¼ c. per yard, under the currency in private trade. The amount reported for the week ensuing, though

ADVERTISEMENTS

OUR ILLUSTRATED FAMILY JOURNALS.

THE most popular and cheap Publications. Now is the favorable moment to subscribe.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED.—A First-Class Pictorial family Newspaper, which ought to be read by every family in the country. Only $2 50 a year, or 21 for $50. HOWLER & WELLS, 337 Broadway, N. Y.

THE WATER-CURE JOURNAL,

Devoted to Hydropathy, its Philosophy and Practice; containing also Articles on Physiology, Phrenology, Diet, Cookery, and those laws which govern Life and Health, $1 a year.

THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL,

Devoted to all Progressive measures for the Elevation and Improvement of Mankind. Illustrated with Portraits and other Engravings. $1 a year.

FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

RICH CLOTH COVERS FOR VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY ARE NOW READY. PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Bookbinders will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET "PAID FOR IT" is the title of a new Publication. The terms are such, there can be no possibility of a Benevolent Man or Woman's failing to succeed with them. For particulars address

J. C. HOLLS,
No. 39 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE & INDEX.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHER'S PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents of the Works, is now published, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter (if remitters, on enclosing a postage stamp).

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—embracing nearly TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—and to which constant additions are being made, as new and valuable works issue from the press.

To Librarians, and persons connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., this Catalogue will be found especially useful in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it being believed that it will prove a perfect and reliable guide in a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, wherever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittances should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.

This is the original and genuine article so famed for purifying the blood, and for the cure of Scrofula and Chronic Diseases; it has no equal; and being purely vegetable, it may be taken with safety at all seasons of the year.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.

SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.

IN THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,

Handsomely bound in Cloth and Half Morocco, may be had of the following Booksellers:

IN BOSTON.
A. WILLIAMS & CO.,
CROSBY, NICHOLS, LEE & CO.,
FEDERHEN & CO.

IN PHILADELPHIA.
W. WINDLE,
W. B. ZIEBER.

IN NEW ORLEANS.
E. ROBERTSON,
B. M. NORMAN.

IN ST. LOUIS.
JAMES E. YEATMAN,
E. K. WOODWARD.

IN CINCINNATI.
H. W. DERBY,
And of Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada.

GROVER & BAKER'S CELEBRATED FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,

475 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.

GUY LIVINGSTONE; or, "THOROUGH." A Novel. Harper's Illus. Library, 18 cents. (See Editorial reading.)

"Who wrote 'Guy Livingstone?' We do not know; but if William Makepeace Thackeray, Henry William Herbert, James Fenimore Cooper, and Harriet Beecher Ainsworth had been associated to throw off a novel impromptu, perhaps they might have extemporized such a work as this.—N. Y. Atlas.

"This novel possesses all the dramatic force of 'Wuthering Heights,' by Miss Bronte, and all the spirit of 'Rattle-'em-Charley.'"—It is an extraordinary book in every respect. The interest is thrillingly kept up from the first page to the last.—Boston Post.

We do not see how we are goaded to expletive. His style is rapid, brilliant, nervous, polished, witty, inherently powerful, and, withal, original, and seems to be made up in equal parts of Thackeray, Bulwer, Dickens, and the Author of Ruth La Roche.—Boston Literary Messenger.

There will be a vigorous, masculine, exciting tone, not always natural, but always strong and stirring, should read "Guy Livingstone."—The author writes fearlessly and powerfully. Whenever he may be, he is no commonplace writer.—Boston Courier.

It never too little for his subject. The most notable novel that has appeared in the field of an intensely interesting character, a fresh and genuine picture of life, and vigorous tone, to take up "Guy Livingstone; or, Thorough."—Boston Post.

This is a most extraordinary book—the most extraordinary and the freshest withal—the excitation since the first appearance of "Jane Eyre."—Nothing like the author of "Guy Livingstone" we know not; and if living man, except Lord Lytton himself, writes better.—Boston Transcript.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

* * HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

WILLIAMS, HAVEN & CO.,
No. 82 Highly celebrated for their great nourishing qualities, and known as an article of food, may be procured, at Wholesale, only of

A. N. STODDARD & CO.,
Nos. 211 and 213 Fulton Street, N. Y.

A Wonderful Book, full of Novelty and full of Romance, and full of Thrilling Interest.

THE NEW EDITION OF
DR. LIVINGSTONE'S JOURNAL
IS NOW READY.

MISSIONARY TRAVELS AND RESEARCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA; including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loanda on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi, to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D. 1 vol. 8vo. Cloth, 25s. Harper's Illuminated and Illustrated Edition. With numerous Illustrations. One Volume 8vo, $2 00.

NOTICE.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS take this opportunity of cautioning the Public against several spurious publications, which, by a little advertisement, are made to appear as though emanating from Dr. Livingstone, but which are in reality catch-penny, unimportant productions got up for the purpose of deceiving purchasers into their purchase, and which, while it is the generally known fact that the present work is the only authentic publication of his Adventures and Travels in Africa.

A book which has been in preparation for days in the hands of the Author, and has been perused by perhaps 50,000 people, and which is the result of Dr. Livingstone's labors of England in the inestimable extent of its circulation throughout the United States, in all the most intelligent circles—the great religious world, the commercial world, the scientific, the literary Circles.

No book of travels has been anticipated with greater interest than the present work of Adventure and discoveries. The book is one of the most captivating descriptions in this age of travels, and explorations, and it matter such as no other living traveler's experience could furnish. It is a book of facts, and of facts of interest; there is not a page that does not compel the attention of the reader, and there is not a line that is not read. It is a work that will be read by the whole civilized world.

This remarkable narrative, distinguished throughout for the modesty and simplicity of its style, for the precise, unaffected, and manly, it charms the reader, and leads him almost unconsciously to follow the author's fortunes to the last.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

As most entertaining literary work, it deserves to be read and studied by all classes.—London Post.

A new chapter in the history of the world.—London Leader.

Like the days of Mandeville, Marco Polo, and Captain Cook, we are given here to record a move extended theme of travel, or added more to the great discoveries of this world than by Livingstone. The work carries the dignity of scientific research with thrilling narratives of personal adventure.—Boston Evening Gazette.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

* * HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of Three Dollars.

An Uncommon, Genuine, Interesting Book.

DEBIT AND CREDIT. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. By L. C. C. With a Preface, by CHRISTIAN CHARLES JOSIAH BUNSEN, D.D., D.C.L., D.Ph. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

This novel is the most successful attempt at the romance of commercial life which has hitherto been made. As such it is perfect, and should be read by every old and every young man in the country.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

* * HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of Dollar.

THE CRUISE OF THE ROLLING STONE. A northern, generous, deeply human feeling pervades the book—the picture-making is admirable.—Athenæum.

Mr. Boner has the rare faculty of being able to create a situation and to describe it vividly.—London Spectator.

A story of uncommon fascination.—London Critic.

Full of interesting matter.—London Literary Gazette.

Fresh, rich in incident, vivid with character, thought, and feeling.—It is an uncommonly good, fascinating book.—London.

Will be the culmination of its many readers. A deep interest prevades every chapter.—News of the World.

Mr. Boner's pictures of the habitation of Indians of necessity, difficult operations, sharp pains in the lungs, burning thirst, deadly weariness, and the sufferings, in short, of a hunter, are finely, exciting story of the massacre. It partakes all the characteristics of a romance, and will provide profit for the reader.—London Post.

Mr. Boner has written a book which the new work reduced to pastime of ordinary food; it strengthens, cheers, and delights. Mr. Boner has the rare faculty of all internal nerve, tachelors, stories, and inflammations; of standards, and he is not without originality in it since obsolete constellation, building up waste fuels and records, as the rich and the poor, and the growth of the grass. It is without a rival as a tonic, and it immediately supplies the waste of the system, for as if it were a battery, to every part of the enfeebled and prostrate frame. Its effects are marvelous, and in many cases have also been found completely healthy and happy. Mr. Boner has the rare faculty of all internal nerve, as regards the nerves, when exercised, and is able to purchase the medicine, will have a recipe containing full instructions for making the Sarsaparilla prepared by the surgery of the discovery, sent free of postage, on receipt of their address. Address, A. B. & D. SANDS,

No. 79 Grand Street, Jersey City, N. J.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!

BEAUMER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, and other Eminent Writers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

THE THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL "THE VIRGINIANS" with many humorous illustrations by the author, commenced in the January Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets received by the Publishers in advance of publication in England of "The Unfinished Memoirs of Mr. Thackeray of Two Thousand Guineas."

THE CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF ALL TRADES—A MATTER OF FACT ROMANCE," written by Harper's Magazine, was also commenced in the December Number.

MRS. GASKELL, Author of "Mary Barton," has become a contributor to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and is writing story from her pen for publication in the January Number.

THE WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE MARRIAGE TRAGEDY," appears commencing in the December Number.

The above three stories are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS LITERARY JOURNAL.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the most powerful of this gifted Author's Literary novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
Two Copies for One Year 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 18 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

Volumes I. and II. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth, extra, Price $2 50, in new ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound at the end of the year. Price 50 cents each.

Cloth Binding Cases for Volumes I. and II. of HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S MONTHLY" are now ready, neatly gilt, price 50 cents each.

Subscriptions to the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimens copies furnished gratuitously. Circulars and Vouchers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received, at the following rates, viz.: Harper's Weekly, the Postage in Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces must remit Twenty Cents additional for Postage. Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

WINTER FASHIONS.

SCENES FROM THE ROGUE WORLD.

VETERAN BURGLAR. "Ven you get inside, Sammy, my boy, mind, you look out for the Spoons and Forks. Them's the Swag!"

APPRENTICE. "But, s'pose I'm caught?"

VETERAN BURGLAR. "You won't be Caught; and if you are, the Officer 'll let you go when I ask him."

APPRENTICE. "But s'pose he don't?"

VETERAN BURGLAR. "He will; and if he don't, you won't be tried."

APPRENTICE. "But if I am?"

VETERAN BURGLAR. "You won't be; and if you are, the jury won't agree, and you'll be acquitted."

APPRENTICE. "How if I ain't?"

VETERAN BURGLAR. "You will; and if you ain't, we get out a Writ of Error, and have a new trial."

APPRENTICE. "But suppose you can't?"

VETERAN BURGLAR. "But we can; and if we fail, why, we'll get the judgment suspended."

APPRENTICE. "But if you break down?"

VETERAN BURGLAR. "We won't; and if we do, we'll get a Petition, signed by all the respectable People, and the Gov'nor 'll Pardon you right away. Don't be afraid, Sammy, you'll never be punished."

[Exit Apprentice, reassured.

THE BURGLAR'S FRIEND. "This here, Sir, is a Petition to the Governor for the Pardon of JIM CURTHOAT—one of the best Fellows in the World—who had the Misfortune to knock his Wife's Brains out, set Fire to his House, and burn up his two Babies. All done, Sir, in a moment of ungovernable Passion, for which a Poor Fellow oughtn't to be held responsible. I hope you'll sign it, Sir. We've got the names of Eight eminent Merchants, Sixteen leading Lawyers, and Ten Wall Street Operators. See here?"

MORAL MERCHANT. "Ah! I see. Poor Fellow dashed his Wife's Brains out, eh? Burnt up his two Babies! Poor Fellow! Well, I suppose I must Sign it." [Signs his name.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies, 5 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal,
MRS. T. P. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

GEO. W. THORNE, AGENT, BOOKBINDER.
Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY. All descriptions of binding done in the best style and at low prices.
No. 331 PEARL STREET,
Three Doors below Harper's Building.

VALENTINES! VALENTINES! FOR 1858.
Philip J. Comas, Valentine Manufacturer, 197 Nassau Street, is now prepared to furnish Wholesale and Retail Dealers with the most
MOST COMPLETE AND EXTENSIVE
Stock of Valentines and Valentine Stationery ever offered the trade in the United States.
AT RETAIL PRICES TO SUIT THE TIMES.
Catalogues with prices and terms will be sent to any part of the United States or Canada when desired. Send on your orders early.
P. J. COMAS,
197 Nassau Street, New York.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE, one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

THE BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE
—GIBB'S PATENT.
$15 Sewing Machines.
$15 Sewing Machines.
$15 Sewing Machines.
$15 Sewing Machines.
$15 Sewing Machines.
$15 Sewing Machines.
These Machines are warranted to give entire satisfaction. MORE SIMPLE, ACCURATE, AND RELIABLE THAN ANY OTHER FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Best City references given. Wholesale and Retail.
THOMAS & CO., 481 Broadway, N.Y.

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,
handsomely bound in
CLOTH EXTRA,
is now ready.
Price $1 50.
N.B. This Volume can only be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 58.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS

OF THE PRESENT NUMBER.

I. Senator Brown of Mississippi, with Portrait.
II. Editorials.
III. The Lounger.
IV. Bohemian Walks and Talks.
V. The Island of Lebosun, with three Illustrations.
VI. Town and Country, with six Illustrations.
VII. Literary.
VIII. News, Domestic and Foreign.
IX. The United Extension and New Hall of Representatives, with two splendid Illustrations.
X. A Modern Wit-Song, by M'Donald.
XI. A Man of Business.
XII. My Yankee Maid.
XIII. Scat to Coventry.
XIV. Miscellany—Wit, Humor, and Anecdote.
XV. Advertisement to the Embarrassed.
XVI. Nena Sahib's Executioner, with an Illustration.
XVII. The Wives of the King of Dahli, with two Portraits.
XVIII. The Cuirass.
XIX. Famine Abroad.
XX. Things Wise and Otherwise.
XXI. Commercial, Financial, and Market Reports.
XXII. Comicalities.

SENATOR BROWN, OF MISSISSIPPI.

We present our readers this week with a portrait of the Hon. Albert G. Brown, Senator in Congress from the State of Mississippi.

This gentleman's life is one of the most remarkable of the frequent instances in our history of merit fostered by free institutions into early eminence. He was born on the 31st of July, 1813, in Chester District, in South Carolina. John Brown, his father, removed from that State when the subject of this article, the youngest of two sons, was about eight years old. Mississippi was then an infant State, having been admitted into the Union only three years before. Mr. Brown, therefore, had his full share of the hardships incident to a new and unsettled country; but his energy and industry overcame them, and ultimately placed him in easy, though not affluent, circumstances. The present Senator, in one of his public speeches, a few years ago, said of his father: "Removing from South Carolina, he pitched his tent amidst the unbroken forest, in the depth of winter. He had two sons able to work. He was in a strange land, without money and without friends. But with an iron will he attacked the forest. It receded before him, and in three short months the sun, which had been shut out for many centuries, was permitted to shine on a spot of earth in which the settler had planted corn."

The opportunities for acquiring a liberal education, now so ample in Mississippi, were, at the time of the immigration of the Browns, not in advance of those which are usual in new settlements. Of such as existed young Albert had the benefit, but he was never sent to any seminary of learning beyond the limits of the State. After he left school, a judicious course of reading and mental discipline completed the instruction begun by his early training, and prepared him for the study of the law. He was admitted to the practice of this profession before he was twenty-one years old. His success was quick and signal. At the second term of the principal Court which he attended he was engaged in more than forty causes; and when, a few years afterward, he passed from the bar to the arena of politics, there were more than four hundred cases on his docket. During his whole practice he exhibited a thorough knowledge of the principles of law, acuteness and discrimination in applying them, and effective eloquence as an advocate.

In the year 1832 Mr. Brown, though only ninteen years old, had been appointed a Brigadier-General in the State militia. In 1833 he married Miss Elizabeth F. Talisferro, of Virginia. This excellent lady died within a few months after the marriage. In the same year Mr. Brown was elected, and twice afterward was re-elected, a member of the State Legislature. In 1839 he was elected a representative in Congress; served there one term; and, in 1841, was elected a Judge of the Circuit Court of Mississippi. In the same year he married Miss Roberta F. Young, second daughter of the late General Robert Young, of Alexandria, Virginia—a lady whose exemplary virtues and attractive graces have endeared her to the citizens of Mississippi. In 1843, when only two years of his judicial term had expired, Judge Brown was elected Governor of Mississippi. Public affairs in that State were then in a somewhat perplexed condition, arising chiefly from financial causes, but having an embarrassing bearing on many other questions of State policy. The Governor met the difficulties of his position with a firmness and prudence which led to happy political results, and to his re-election in 1845, without opposition. At the close of his second term as Governor, in 1847, he commenced a new course of service as a representative in Congress; was re-elected in 1849, and again in 1851. In 1853 he was elected to the Senate of the United States; and in November last was re-elected for a second term of six years, to begin on the 4th of March, 1859. Though this re-election had been preceded by an exciting canvass, it was almost unanimous. Senator Brown has been for several years, and still is, Chairman of the Committee of the District of Columbia.

During the period of Mr. Brown's service in Congress questions have engaged its consideration of which many were of high importance, and none vital to the prosperity and even peace of the Union. Among them may be mentioned the Mexican War; the Territorial bills concerning Oregon, Utah, Kansas, and Nebraska; the admission of California as a State into the Union; our disturbed relations with England and with Spain; the Homestead Bill; the River and Harbor Bill; the Wilmot Proviso; and the Slavery question, in its various other forms of agitation. On these, and indeed on almost every important subject, besides his constant attention to the ordinary topics of legislation, Mr. Brown, as Representative or as Senator, has taken an active and memorable part. As a debater, he is distinguished for fullness and accuracy of knowledge, for a clear and vigorous logic, for felicity of illustration, for readiness in reply, and, above all, for fairness of reasoning. It has been remarked of him—what can not, with justice, be said of many orators—that he never speaks except when he has something to say, and that when he has said it he ends his speech. In addresses to public meetings, now so marked a department of popular eloquence in many portions of the Union, it is conceded that he has but few superiors.

SENATOR BROWN OF MISSISSIPPI.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY WHITEHURST OF WASHINGTON, D. C.]

In politics, Senator Brown is a Democrat of the straightest sect, and is especially tenacious of those limitations of the Federal Constitution which he regards as protecting the rights of the South. But though a decided party man, he is not a party bigot, and can look on great national questions with a statesman's eye. Recognizing in others the same right of independent judgment which he claims for himself, he is toward them liberal in conduct and courteous in manner; and, in consequence, has perhaps as many personal friends among the opponents as among the adherents of his own particular party. The high trusts which have been confided to him, almost from boyhood, prove his strong hold on the hearts of the people. Entering public life at the early age of twenty-one years, he has continued in it ever since. The utmost entertainment for him by his friends and neighbors has made him a candidate for almost every considerable office in the gift of the State of Mississippi, and he has never once been defeated. Such a career, perhaps without a parallel, indicates a popularity to which both pride and gratitude must forbid Senator Brown to be insensible. But it has been obtained by no arts of the demagogue, by no fawning solicitation, by no unworthy compliance. It is "the popularity which follows, not that which is run after." It is the natural reward of a life of integrity and honor; of sincerity, manliness, and decision of character; of fidelity to duty, and ability in its discharge; of devotion to the interests of constituents; of kind offices where needed, and of benevolence to all men.

As his Senator is now only in the forty-fifth year of his age, he may be expected, according to the ordinary course of human life, to live through many added years; and, if so, a future yet more brilliant than the past may be safely predicted for him.

It can be seen already that Senator Brown is destined to take a prominent part in the important controversy now pending in Congress in reference to the admission of Kansas; it would seem, from the newspapers, that the Administration counts upon him as one of its most reliable forces, though, as yet, he has rather held aloof from the front of the battle. We may be permitted to express the hope that Senator Brown will exercise the influence which his character and his talents impart rather to heal than to embitter a controversy of which the people, North and South, are heartily tired, and whose prolongation can be productive of no possible benefit. And it is but natural that the many admirers of this distinguished Mississippian should likewise entertain a wish to see him still further enhance his claims on the gratitude of his adopted State by lending his powerful aid to the party which seeks the settlement of the financial difficulties which have seemed to cast a shade on the escutcheon of Mississippi.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,

CIRCULATED IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and abilities of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS: Fifty Cents a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1858.

THE LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION IN CONGRESS.

AT length the famous Lecompton Constitution is found its way to Washington. By the time these lines are being read it will probably have been laid before Congress, with a Presidential message throwing upon that body the responsibility of admitting Kansas under it, or referring it back to the people of Kansas either for ratification or amendment. Questions of fraud apart, the legal case that can be made in favor of admitting the Territory under that instrument is very plausible. If the election of 21st December was a legal one—and it appears (always passing over the alleged wholesale fraud) to have been clothed with legal forms—then the election of the 4th January was quite superfluous, and could no more affect the result of the election than a new choice of a President made now could unseat Mr. Buchanan. If, again, the enabling act of session does not now require the submission of the State Constitution to the popular vote—and no such requirement has been cited—then the Lecompton Constitution having been framed by a prima facie lawfully elected Convention, fulfills all the requirements of the organic act, and Congress is bound to admit the new State with that Constitution.

This, however, is a mere abstract legal view of the question, and assumes the mere existence or the non-recognition of the alleged frauds which are charged upon the framers of the Lecompton Constitution. Practically, there no doubts that a large majority of the people of Kansas are not satisfied with that Constitution, and that, if the affairs of the Territory were left to their own management, they would take the earliest opportunity of repealing it, again, as to the frauds. Charges of gross fraud against the framers of the Constitution have been advanced by competent authority, and we must now look these charges altogether, and proceed to admit Kansas as though no frauds had ever been alleged to have taken place?

It is likely that the Republicans and the Douglas section of the democracy will take the ground that if one such fraud is laid before any vote on the admission of Kansas can take place, an inquiry must be instituted into the legality of the votes cast at this December, and likewise into the arrangements which were previously made for a registry of voters. Should this opinion prevail, the whole question will practically be open till next session. Should it be voted down, and the Lecompton Constitution driven through Congress by the power of the Administration, the Northern politicians will be remarkably strengthened for sectional operations in 1860.

One thing now seems certain. The Free-Slavery party in Kansas have no longer any thing practical or real to fight for. It has abandoned by the Free-State party of the irregular organization at Topeka, and their supposed triumph at the election of a State Legislature, seems to have thrown the selection of Senators completely into their hands; even though Kansas were admitted to-morrow under the Lecompton Constitution, nothing could prevent the election of two Free-State Senators from the next State, and no opposition by the Legislature of very decided and stringent Anti-Slavery laws Whatever contest, therefore, remains now to be fought will be as a question of party and party only. The practical issue is settled, and the prize won.

THE PERIL OF THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

IT has transpired during the past week that the Government at Washington has received dispatches from the Utah Expedition which it refuses to make public. Simultaneously with this startling revelation accounts have been published from the encampment of the Utah Expedition, tending to create the liveliest alarm for the subsistence of the force during the winter. It is well known that the bulk of the animals belonging to the force have perished, and that the remainder may die before spring from want of provender; that many trains of army supplies have been captured and destroyed by the Mormons; and that the army is reduced to the need of many essential articles, such for instance as salt. If there be any thing worse than this, any thing so alarming that the Government dare not tell it, the public not unnaturally suppose that it can be nothing short of an imminent prospect of the entire destruction of the expeditionary force.

Of course all this is mere conjecture at present. It is not likely that the news is so terrible as the public imagination pictures it. People naturally put the worst interpretation on that which is concealed from them. But it can not be denied that even the published advices from Utah depict a state of things which in the case of the army can continue for but a short time without grave apprehension.

Our little army is encamped in the midst of the snows at the summit of the mountain range which is the bleakest part of the inhabitable portion of this continent. They are in want of many necessaries of life. They must have a second danger of losing their entire transportation force; without which they would be incapable of moving in case their provisions were wholly exhausted. It is possible that their clothing is deficient; we are in doubt as to how much of their essential clothing was destroyed by the Mormons. Finally, they are surrounded by an angry and not overcivilized foe—a foe who is watching for their mistakes, and who, rightly or wrongly, regards the United States troops as the ruthless instruments of a cruel, unjust, and oppressive power.

Here are ample reasons for grave anxiety for our brave fellow-countrymen in Utah. Reasons, we say, after all, only hope for the best. In the soldierly qualities of Colonel Johnston, we believe, we have the most perfect faith, who know him heartily concur. But there is by no means the same confidence in the administration of the Government. Only a few weeks since money is abundant at three per cent. per annum. Even in Prussia, where the revulsion was half created by the panic, a political revolution, money is plentiful at 5½ per cent. Money flies every where to bank for safety.

So far as our mercantile returns are concerned the prospect is an unsatisfactory one. The world will no more next summer by so much in this idle country might have earned had it been actively employed. But, in respect of the future, the bottom promises well. So soon as merchants shall have paid their debts and regained confidence we may look for a revival of trade—and a revival proportionate to the amounts of money which the banks will have to lend. It will be the safer, as by summertime all liabilities of merchandise will be so low in price that there can be but little risk in dealing in them. It will be the sounder, as the revulsion will have swept away all the houses whose standing was doubtful and means inadequate to their operations.

THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT OF CANADA.

WE hear from Canada that the Queen of England has fixed upon Ottawa City (late Bytown) as the seat of Government of the Province of United Canada. For the last twenty years the location of the Government has been a bone of contention among the chief cities of Canada. It has been, by turns, housed in Quebec, Montreal, Kingston, and Toronto. It would have remained permanently in Montreal—which is the largest and most flourishing city in the Province—but for the blunder committed by the populace of Montreal in burning down the parliament Houses to revenge themselves on the Government for the passage of an obnoxious bill in 1849. Ever since then the several Canadian cities have quarreled furiously on the subject; and it is next impossible to devise a compromise on which all, or a majority, could agree, they decided, about a year since, to refer the question to the decision of the Queen. She has given her verdict in favor of the obscure and comparatively unknown city which, lately, bore the name of Bytown, on the Ottawa.

Three reasons may be presumed to have governed her choice. In the first place, no one of the four leading cities of Canada could have been chosen without grievously wounding the three others; whereas the obscurity of Bytown protects it from the jealousy of its neighbors. Again, it may be imagined that the British Government has not had to the last moment considerations which have induced the leading States of this Union to locate their respective Legislatures in small towns, remote from the great centres of trade and improvement; more especially since the disgraceful fracas of 1849 in Montreal intimated the danger of placing the Government in a spot where it was at any moment liable to be overawed by a mob. And, lastly, it may be conjectured that the British Government was not unmindful of the possibility of a war with this country; in which event the Legislature and the public records would, unquestionably, be safer in the distant city of Bytown, on the confines of civilization, than in any of the towns which—thanks to steam and railroads—may be considered as bordering upon our Northern States.

THE LOUNGER.

RACHEL.

THERE is something less to go to Paris for. Those who have been there within the last dozen years have secured a remembrance which is no longer to be secured. The Cowden-Clarke great actress in this country, saw her, indeed, but saw her as a Roman may have seen the Vala of Tivoli in Hadrian's villa at Tivoli. All the forms might be there, and the combinations; but where was the soft warmth of the figure and the bright lambency of the Grecian heaven? Rachel required Paris as transparent texture the genius, and the life of her associations, were French. And now Rachel is only a memory.

Nobody could have supposed she would live long. Her vitality seemed to be a fire-kindred, which she inherited from Judea, under a mask of Greece, but which consumed her still. That faultlessly graceful figure gilding across the scene—the wonderful face of the fate which inspired the dream she played—seemed also the Greek vase, frail as perfect, whose transparent texture betrays the deadly flame that burned within only a blush of beauty when seen from without. Her life was a consumption from the beginning; full of strange variety, of poverty and ignorance and desperate struggle, then of intoxicating triumph, flattery, wealth, and power. She was of the class who taste all the sweetness of their own fame—whose names are long names in the lists who never after—not influences and powers forever, like the names of the poets and the artists but to whom the world is grateful.

The details of her life have been told, and will be now curiously repeated. But the story of splendor in dress and equipage, in dress and society, can conceal the consuming sadness which her expert investigator sees all the way. She may have been mean, avaricious, sensual, deceitful, waywardly passionate; her life may have been wild, high, and voluptuous—nobody can know very much about that—but every body who ever saw her on the stage must have had the impression as profoundly as in those of other people, will not readily condemn what it is so easy to decry and so hard to understand.

Let the Pharisees keep their hands off. If the Master would not throw only that first stone which is to cast the first stone, why should we all be so anxious to fling something at the Magdalen? It is so much easier to throw stones as it is hard for it to be tolerably good! It is such capital exercise for muscle to cast them, and it is such an outsider which reach we can step into the temple to cool, and thank God we are not as other people—particularly Herbert the publican.

Don't misunderstand, and go away saying that the Lounger thinks badness as good as goodness. Neither genius, nor beauty, nor grace, can atone for the smallest sin, any more than giving to the poor, and building a church, and endowing Madeleine, can atone for it. But genius and beauty and grace are in the treasure-house of God, and they are united to the same old sin—which we all have in such abundance—the spectacle is so profoundly sad and full of compassion and terror, that it is almost better than a sermon.

Poor Rachel! She grew up, despite every thing —genius, glory, and success. The last part in which she played was Adrienne; but it was also her first part, and the first of her glory. The play was an epitome of her own life. The Lounger was in Paris when she died. At first, and with immense success seemed to be a national event. People had doubted whether she could do any thing but the austere Corneille manner—but doubted whether Rachel could play Rachel! They gradually learned that even the churches were thronged.

Poor Rachel! She could not bear a rival near the throne; but her countries could. Paris hailed Ristori as she had hailed Rachel, and had the departing Queen of the French Drama, without whose electric touch Corneille and Racine would never have seemed to be other than the mummies into which they now lapse again. Her success in this country was doubtful. We have not yet seen poetry too, pretty well; but we can not speak French, and we can not feel it. It was evidently a success to live and breathe and have our being in French, or as near it as possible.

Subsequent performances were to arrive and address the merchants of New York from the steps of the Exchange. Mr. Bryant, the venerable bard, had addressed the Common Council of the metropolis in Magyar. Would it have helped the matter much to have applied the Shakspearian Alien? Ristori, an ill-regulated sincere blowing upon a glacier. The lies was not melted, but the wind was frozen.

It is curious to reflect that her last illness is dated from Boston. All this proud passion—this fierce struggle—this impetuous, headstrong power, which will surely be the greatest tradition of the stage, as it has been one of the great attractions of contemporary life—was finally checked in the city, which, with good-humored badinage, is called—because it is the most conservative, quite without malignity—cold and unsympathetic.

The poet
MARYHEWS.
She was born of Syria and Italy, in 1859.
She died of Boston, in 1858.

But it is not with even the appearance of lightness that the last word should be said of this great artist. To have seen Rachel will be hereafter a proud remembrance. The children will listen with wide eyes to the story, and the youth of the storywriter will recur to him as to the aged.

"Grandpapa, was she then such a very naughty woman?"

"Children, there is one who knows. As for us, who are very apt to mistake our own red noses for the lights of heaven, let us leave her in His hands.

"'Cross her hands humbly,
As if praying dumbly,
Over her breast!
Owning her weakness,
Her evil behavior,
And leaving with meekness
Her sins to her Saviour.'"

WINE AND DIPLOMACY.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I want to ask a question—and request an answer.

"When you are in Rome, must you do as Rome does?

"Suppose the Hon. Hi. Phalooting, M.C., were to receive from our excellent President the appointment of Resident Minister at the Court of his Majesty the King of the Cannibal Islands, would it be dishonorable, uncourteous, or improper, for him, being present at the annual banquet of that worthy monarch, to refuse to partake with him of the roast baby, which, I am told, figures as the chief dish—the pièce de resistance—on that occasion?

"Or if, having a mind to display his good-will toward the members of the court to which he is accredited, he should give, say a dejeuner à la fourchette in their honor, would it be bad manners on his part were he to refrain from giving at that banquet 'one of the usual courtesies of such entertainments throughout' the Cannibal world—being the favorite dish of roast child?

"I ask these questions because I see some of the papers just now sneering at a worthy gentleman who is Resident Minister at one of the European courts, for refraining from what appears to be the fashion of that court—wine-drinking. I am told by those who should know that an American minister or envoy is one who represents the American people at a foreign court—acting for them and taking care of their interests. Now, so far as mere representation goes, who does this most faithfully—he who, going abroad, abandons the previous habits of his life, which must be to a certain extent those of the people from among whom he has been chosen, and apes the manners and customs of a people hitherto strange to him—or he who goes honoring by observing the habits and customs of his own land and life?

"Governor Wright, the gentleman in question, has been all his life a temperance man. During a long and successful political life he has, with a hospitality rare even in the West, kept open house to all comers—but for reasons evidently sufficient for himself, has never dispensed liquors at his hospitable board. Should he now put aside the convictions of a lifetime for the sake of escaping the sneers of a few foreign—and American—snobs? He has gone to Berlin, as Franklin went to Paris, a plain American citizen and gentleman, changing in no unnecessary particular his habits, which are those of an American gentleman. European snobs may sneer at him. They have sneered at American gentlemen before. But should not every true American honor the courage of the simple-hearted man who is not dazzled by the empty glitter of a foreign court? Yours,

"ONE WHO KNOWS GOVERNOR WRIGHT."

—The question of his correspondent reminds the Lounger of an incident of travel, which will serve as a pendant to the story of Governor Wright's Temperance breakfast.

In his days of wandering the Lounger had pitched his tent for a season in the same city of Berlin, and, while he yet tarried, there arrived a newly-appointed Minister to Prussia from the United States. The new Minister, unlike Governor Wright, was not a member of the Temperance Society, and commenced his diplomatic career by haranguing the Prussian people, in his shirt-tail, from the balcony of his hotel. The Lounger is not aware that any foreign or American journal took especial notice of the circumstance, or seemed to be in any wise troubled by that most bitter disgrace of the American name.

Which of the two ministers most fitly represented his country—which of them were the gentleman—are questions which the Lounger leaves to the discrimination of the American people.

It is a melancholy fact that the sea washes out a great deal of American loyalty from the American. He becomes a follower, an imitator, and a snob. To dine with a lord, because he is a lord; to bow in breeches to a king, though it be only King Bomba, of Naples, sends thrills of sweet satisfaction through the free and independent Yankee soul.

To sneer at a man who, believing the use of liquors to be wrong, spreads his table without them, is as gentlemanly as to quarrel with him because he does not introduce a corps of model artistes after supper. Temperance with Governor Wright is evidently no whim, but a principle; and in all our recent diplomatic history there is no little incident—not even excepting the annual eloquence of our Ministers in England at the Lord Mayor's dinners, upon the common bond of language, etc., of Shakspeare and Milton, etc.—which is more simply honorable, American, and sensible, or more becoming a gentleman, than the conduct of Governor Wright in quietly adhering to his principles, although my Lord A. might think it "extraordinarily odd"—or Monsieur le Comte B. might shrug his shoulders at this drôle of an American—or the Geheimrath C. might declare that it was ausgezeichnet besonders not to find any wine to drink at an American minister's.

Suppose they do think and say so. The Lounger has seen a President of the United States waiting to take his turn at a common towel upon a railroad excursion. My Lord B. would consider that, doubtless, "'pon my word, excessively odd!" The sooner Dr. Franklin is taken as the model of an American Minister abroad, so far as simplicity of manners is concerned, the better for us all.

DR. BELLOWS UPON POVERTY AND CRIME.

THE Rev. Dr. Bellows, who last year spoke a kind word for the play-actors—who, although they are play-actors, are still our fellow-beings—has recently delivered, at the Lowell Institute in Boston, a course of lectures upon the History and Philosophy of Poverty and Crime, with considerations upon their proper treatment by society. The course was most interesting and successful. Dr. Bellows is not afraid of looking at facts, nor of calling them by name. As a clergyman, a man brought into daily contact with the poor and suffering, his own experience authorizes him to speak of the subject, and his intellectual habit peculiarly fits him to discuss the reasons and the remedies. Several well-known men have asked him to repeat some of the lectures in New York for the benefit of a most deserving charity—and he will begin this week.

"TOLD YOU SO."

"COLLEGIAN" can not say he did not have fair warning last week. The Lounger told him that he was recklessly drawing the whole Greek alphabet about his ears—that he was tossing a bomb, and there was no knowing where it might explode, nor with what consequences. The Lounger little dreamed (people who give warnings never do) that he was to suffer in any way. But bang it comes into his own room, and blows up the whole family. Here is the Bohemien swearing at him dreadfully, and openly charging that he is double delta something—a d, d, sort of fellow, and yet not reverend.

The Lounger hereby solemnly implores the youth of the American colleges to beware how they cast him into the hot water which is always bubbling in family jars. His next neighbor and friend, the Bohemien, is, in short, a beta. He beats all, even Collegians and Loungers. Let them, therefore, agree to keep a peace or a part.

"MR. LOUNGER,—I am sorry for the 'Collegian' who writes to you a letter about the College Secret Societies. He is evidently afflicted with the mutual admiration fever so common to the scholastic youth who, when they ought to be attending to their Latin quantities, are drumming up recruits for 'our society.' You know, Sir, as well as I, what a pang you inflict upon the susceptible hearts of the Delta Psis, the Chi Sis, the Zeta Psis, and the Theta Delta Chis when you allow him to call them 'a few small societies left.' Left where? What is the meaning of that sinister remark? Left to be called for like a brown paper parcel? Left by a railway train, or a steamboat, or over the left, or what?

"The Theta Delta Chi is the most important society in all the world—in the opinion of its confrères, of whom, as the man said in response to the toast, 'The heroes who fought, bled, and died at Bunker Hill,' I am one. We have here a Chapter of Resident Graduates which includes some of the most brilliant ornaments of the learned professions, of which, etc., etc.

"We are never 'left' any where, as the Collegian will find if he will come down or over—I suppose he is a Union or Yale man—here next spring. In the mean time I remain,

"Yours, disgusted,

"THE BOHEMIEN.

"P.S.—Ethelinda shares my feelings on this trying occasion."

OUR LETTER-BOX.

"GOOD MR. LOUNGER,—I know you are a good man by the remarks you make. Will you listen to me, and give me your advice, or, at least, your sympathy and condolence? I have tumbled, head-over-heels, into an awful pool of prospective misery, and can see no honorable way of getting out of it. My deplorable case is, briefly, this: I was in love (mark the past tense), and am engaged (note the present one). It was in the country, by the sea-shore, where I had been spending my fortnight's vacation from business, that I first met and fell in love with Helena.

"What a charming, simple, affectionate, pure-hearted, sensible, pretty girl she then appeared to me, as we strolled together along the romantic coast, or read Tennyson's poems, which she said she liked so much (she has changed her mind since, and now pronounces them extremely silly), seated on the gray rocks, within sight and sound of the melancholy sea, her glossy black hair falling in soft showers over my cheek and shoulders, as we bent our heads closely together over the book! The beauty still remains; but, ah me! where are the charms, the affection, the simplicity, the amiability, the good sense?

"When she returned to the city, you may be sure I lost no time in going to see her. She lives in a stately house, and when I entered the drawing-room, where she was seated alone, I expected, of course, she would come bounding to my arms, like the good little cherub I thought her to be; but no, she advanced to meet me—me, who am to be her husband in six weeks—with as slow and stately a step as, I suppose, was that with which Queen Mary marched to execution, and presented to me the cold tips of her fingers, and nothing more, to shake. 'Can this indeed be my Helena?' thought I, as I looked with astonished eyes at her.

"The Helena I fell in love with had a lithe, graceful figure, but, bless me! the hoops she now wears have changed it into the proportions of a beer-barrel. Her beautiful hair is now so twisted and plaited that its beauty is almost entirely destroyed, and is so plentifully oiled that I would not relish having it brushing my cheeks, as it did when we were reading on the rocks. Oh, roses and carnations! what a lovely bloom the fresh sea-breezes blew into her fair cheeks during that happy fortnight when she won my love! But now—I am ashamed to tell it, but it is, alas! too true—they owe their color to the apothecary's shop! Her conversation, which, in the country, used to be all about love, and contentment, and heroism—about literature and art—about the glories of nature, the sweet flowers, the wild woods, the solemn mountains, the flashing sea, and the wondrous and plaintive harmony of its chanting waves—about the gorgeous sunsets and glorious sunrises (do you know, Sir, she rose one morning at five o'clock to see the sun rise?)—has now changed to the silliest chat about what Mrs. Buncombe wore at the Opera, and what a splendid 'turn-out' Mr. Potiphar showed on the Avenue yesterday, and what a fine house Mr. Jones has built, with a passing fling at the Misses Jones; while her wit, which is sprightly enough, is kept in constant exercise by throwing ridicule upon the manners, and dress, and looks of all her female friends!

"When I attempt to raise the tone of the conversation to its former level she laughs at me, Sir—actually laughs at my sentiments—and, tapping me on the chin with her fan, says, 'Such stuff is all very well for the country, but people can find something better to talk about in the city.' If I do not take her to the Opera, or Theatre, at least three times a week, she is not half pleased, and shows her displeasure very plainly too; though I am afraid, from her conduct during the performance, as well as her conversation afterward, that it is not her love of the music and the drama which furnishes her enjoyment there, but the display of wealth and fashion which she sees.

"Fashion! how I hate the word. Whenever I do any thing natural, she tells me it is not fashionable. It strikes me, Sir, it is not fashionable to do any thing but what a shrewd monkey, in a strait-jacket, could be easily trained to perform.

"This is my case, Mr. Lounger; and with an anxious, aching heart, I ask your advice. What shall I do? I loved, and could love forever, the Helena of the sea-shore; but the Helena of the city I can not but despise. She reads the Lounger; and perhaps you might write something which would influence her so as to change her appearance, manners, and voice back to its old looks, ways, and tones. Oh! Sir, if you could effect that, you would lift a mountain from my heart, and earn the eternal gratitude of "Your admirer,

"TOM DESPERATE.

"P.S.—What kind of a climate is there at the Cape of Good Hope?"

—The Lounger would gladly help you, Mr. TOM DESPERATE; but when you are stung by a bee it is rather late to tell you how to prevent his stinging. Bear this in mind, however, for your future guidance, as a maxim which experience soon teaches all lovers of the Desperate family—first, calculate all the chances of the game before you begin to play, and then keep a good face to the end. When you go, or any other Tom goes, to Newport, you ought to go with the knowledge that young people, of both sexes, congregate there to pass away the summer in the pleasantest way they can invent. Now is any thing pleasanter for the youth of twenty or twenty-five summers, and the maiden of a corresponding tenderness of years—let us suppose seventeen or eighteen—than to sit upon the shore of the sea, in soft weather, watching the anerithmon gelasma, and reading Tennyson's "Break, break, break, On thy cold gray stones, O sea?"

Several things are sure to happen under those circumstances. Thus, the female chevelure is very likely to mingle itself with the masculine whisker, and the sentiments of the melodious verse are very apt to become the views of the young people who read it, until Maria is at last sure that the Prince in the "Sleeping Beauty" was the very image of Augustus; and the gallant Gus., in a most gentlemanly shooting-jacket and toe-ventilated shoes, is persuaded of the identity of Maria and the "Sleeping Beauty" herself; and so, before they know it, as it were, he finds himself not only reciting those delightful lines—

"Oh, love, 'twas such as this, and this,"

but actually doing the "this and this."

Then they must be engaged, of course. But, Thomas, don't you see that it is, in its very nature, a limited partnership? You both come home. For summer, sea-side, time to kill, and reading poetry, you have counting-room all day and white gloves and "Lancers" all night; she has calling, shopping, dancing, and Grace Church. There is no more Tennyson, summer, or "Sleeping Beauty." The game, in fact, is played out. You have both won a pleasant summer, a pretty flirtation, a gay joke, a blush, perhaps. And what have you lost?

Lost your heart? No, dear Thomas; lost your head only, if you have put any thing so valuable as your heart into the keeping of a beer-barrel, however covered with silk (it is your own comparison). Hearts are not given away as easily as you think. Or if foolishly given, they are dropped again by the holder, with their value quite unknown to her; and, quite uninjured by the fall, they are as good as a diamond which slips from a lady's bracelet, and is a diamond still. Helena can not break your heart, for she can not hold it, and she is too light to hurt it by treading upon it. Allons, Monsieur Thomas! encore à Newport!

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

LYDIA LANGUISH IN COURT.

YOU don't know the Count of Timbuctoo, I presume. Like the servant girls who steal spoons, he has had his trials. Closely connected with the royal family at Timbuctoo, he was exiled on account of his enormous appetite. The sums that were expended for his dinners attracted the attention of the Opposition, who made such a row about it in the House that the Government had to send the poor Count away. Arrived here, his inordinate consumption increased the price of provisions, and made the hard times of '54 '55. I think it had a great deal to do with the late panic. The Count goes into society because he is a count; if he was a duke from Marquesas, with a passion for tender infants, a la Marengo, he would be invited out oftener than he is now. The Count, having a sanguinary disposition and an appetite for massacres, is a great patron of Wallack's Theatre, where he often meets Ethelinda, who says that while he is not eating he is always saying something severe about his friends. On a recent occasion two well-disposed young men, afflicted with the worst form of cacoethes scribendi, produced a play, "The Maiden Wife." One would suppose that even a cannibal would have some feeling, and would know that these unfortunate persons should rather be pitied than condemned. But the Count was as ruthless as his cousin of Dahomey, who kills all his captives that are not in sufficiently good condition for sale. He assured Ethelinda that the title was absurd—that there could be no such thing as a "maiden wife," and that "romance after marriage" was an absurdity. "Now mark," as Prince Hal says to Fat Jack, "how plain a tale shall put thee down."

We have, in real life, a maiden wife.

We have romance after marriage.

We have had her in Court, Supreme (Chambers); we issued a habeas; and we, the sovereign people, had her corpus. She is a young lady, says one of the reporters, with some attractions (thirty thousand attractions between her and her brother). She is sweet sixteen, and of a romantic disposition. She has a mamma who writes nice letters to a young man, asking him to marry her daughter. After a time, however, mamma changes her mind—thinks the young man will not "answer for the situation." Menalcus takes an appeal to Phyllis herself, who seems willing enough. Mamma's watch is strict; but who doesn't know the proverb about love and locksmiths? A clergyman is taken to a house in Ninth Street, where he remains, like a slave-trader in a creek, with a man-of-war boat outside, waiting to run his cargo. Mamma, the daughter, the young man, and some other young men, went to the theatre, where Phyllis contrived to give mamma the slip, and hied to the bower in Ninth Street, where she was straightway united to the fond youth. Returning, the maiden wife saw the remainder of the play, after which the parties separated as before.

Now comes the "Romance after Marriage."

Forty-eight hours elapse; the wife still remains a maiden, but mamma begins to suspect. Cross-examination brings out the terrible fact, and the wife is hurried off to the country, without even being permitted to say,

"Formose, vale longum, vale!"

Corydon flew to the writ of habeas corpus, and after a great deal of argument the lady is produced in Court; she tells the Judge that she married the young man freely, but that now she doesn't like him, and won't have him at any price; so the disconsolate husband is sent packing out of Court, with a long bill of costs for his friends to pay. What can be the matter? Why does the lady change her mind so suddenly? Ethelinda thinks she likes some one else. Ah! the inconstancy of lovers of both sexes has been the theme of poets in all ages.

"Brief time for Ariadne Theseus mourn'd;
Demophoon from his Phyllis ingrate turn'd;
In Jason's bark the sea Medea brav'd;
Yet lone, abandoned, curs'd the man she sav'd."

That's the end of the romance for the present, and we should like to ask the Count if he does not acknowledge himself to be demolished?

The case, however, presents some singular anomalies and contradictions. In the first place, What possible rule is there for proceeding to take testimony after the return on a habeas corpus, when the body of the person alleged to be improperly restrained is not before the Court? Second, What law justifies a wife, provided the marriage is admitted to have been legal, in defying the authority of her husband? Third, Is the decision in this case to be quoted as a precedent? And again: Can not there be a law to restrain mothers from holding out false signals to lure susceptible young men into the breakers of Matrimony, and then send them to perdition on the lee-shore of Disappointment? Further: Why is it that the law gives so many facilities to people to get married, and so few to get unmarried? Also, Why don't the New York female know better than to get married while she is only a day or two out of the cradle? Let the New York matron answer that. And, finally, after the New Jersey outbreak against taxes, and the case above cited, isn't it fair to ask what we are coming to? I wouldn't give much for the Constitution, the Star-spangled Banner, or the Eagle, or any other of our much-cherished institutions, if the rampant spirit among our female population is not speedily checked!

FLUNKEYISM AT WASHINGTON.

MR. JEAMES YELLOWPLUSH has crossed the Atlantic, and may be found in the fourth story of a Washington hotel. Mr. Yellowplush gets his bread by writing letters for the Squashtown Banner of Freedom, and various other journals, from which he can pick up a dollar or two. Mr. Yellowplush is the king of the "dead-heads." He gets his board for little or nothing, for an occasional puff of "our prince of a landlord," "our most gentlemanly clerk," or our "most polished and agreeable" boot-black. He does the society correspondence; he puts his nose in at the receptions by the wives of the Cabinet Ministers, and sends the most charming letters, descriptive of their persons and manners. You will find Mr. Yellowplush in every drawing-room where impudence can take him, and you will see, next day, that he has tried to earn his glass of wine and bit of cake. Mr. Yellowplush has heard that he is a snob, but can not be made to believe it. He has lately been "much interested" in the wife of one of the Secretaries. And why? Let us see:

"When we arrived there were so many distinguished gentlemen and accomplished ladies surrounding her that I began to feel that both my entrée and exit would prove a very 'French-leave affair;' but, with the quick eye of high breeding, our party were espied, and the manner in which we were received, put at ease with appropriate conversation, and shown to the refreshment table, somewhat elevated my previous ideas of entertaining."

This paragraph is a little "woolly," as the printers say, but it is nothing when compared to what follows. Here's a pretty bit:

"Mrs. —— is a generous representative of the 'Empire State of the South.' We always linger longest where the bland air and the sunshine greet us, and the half hour in which this eminently social lady, and her friends, Miss —— and Mrs. ——, carried me back to the sunny groves of Georgia, with a ten years' retrospection, left the most agreeable and enduring memories. It should be the pride of our nation that the ladies of our men high in political power can do so much by their high-toned courtesies to hold the Union together."

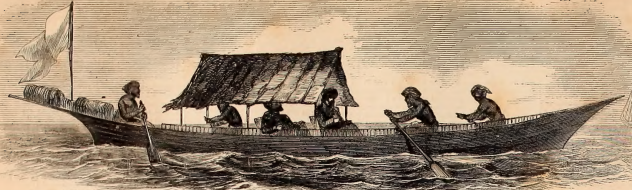
It is a great pity that the ladies ever brought him back from Georgia. I have omitted the names, which Jeames gives in full, as we do not believe the ladies would feel flattered by seeing them here.

Here we have Jeames in a classical point of view:

"Mrs. —— is the American type of what I understand to have been a Roman matron, provided that they were elevated socially to the high positions of their lords."

The proviso is good. Overhaul your Gibbon, Jeames, the next time you go to the Capitol to beg a frank or steal some stationery. I must, reluctantly, leave Mr. Yellowplush for to-day, with his sweetly-worded peroration:

"Having traversed the social heaven in the orbit of the seven stars of first magnitude, and there being yet an hour of summer-like radiance glancing adown the broad and endless streets of this city of magnificent distances, our party decided to gratify my preferences by a call upon the Misses ——. The three sisters were attired in the most comely contrast, and in the most exquisite taste and richness. It is intellect, after all, which gives position; and, though we had run an ordeal of the most elevated characteristics, we found that, even as the last ray which in summer sunshine melts itself away, and gilds the receding hills with increasing glory, so did this call shed a halo of friendly admiration round the others."



Now I call that grand. A good notice of "intellect"—a bit of poetry at the end, adopted from Byron. In fact, it is, like the ladies, "dressed with exquisite richness;" and I am glad to "shed a halo of friendly admiration" around it. Good dog, Jeames—you earn your money!

THE ISLAND OF LABOUAN.—[FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

SINGAPORE, November, 1857.

I FOUND myself one last day off Coal Point, Labouan, reading the first number of Harper's Weekly, and out of pure gratitude for the pleasure received have resolved to send you a few "jottings by the wayside" from this, one of those parts that few visit or know much about.

Labouan is a small island belonging to Great Britain, having been ceded by the Sultan at Brunì to that government for love and money, a few years since, and has already begun to develop its riches to Anglo-Saxon energy. Lying midway between Singapore and Hong Kong, so that a slight deviation by the mail steamers from their usual course, with the loss of a few hours only, would bring it in weekly communication with the home government, abounding in excellent coal, and contiguous to the immense and wealthy island of Borneo, whose mountains loom away to the west in the haze, it possesses advantages such as made its acquisition of no small importance—another demonstration of that great principle expressed by some English statesman of renown, who believed in "getting footsteps"—a principle which is being successfully carried into practice wherever there is the slightest opportunity, even though it may not be available for half a century to come.

A LABOUAN PRAHU.

From our decks the straight trunks of gigantic trees, topped with heavy foliage, form a background to the clearing, where a small village, piled about in the most irregular manner, is striving into existence. Every where else the graceful tropical trees, bushes, rank weeds, and parasites—or, all in one word, the jungle—presents an impenetrable barrier, leaning far out into the water, so that it is only at certain points a landing can be effected. Herein lurk—to report says—such animable characters as tigers, wild boars, anacondas, etc.; but though we traveled several weary miles in search of these or other game, we never had a single shot, and always returned on board in the most unavailable condition, from forcing our way through the suffocating forest.

One long pier of bamboo stretches out into the blue water, to accommodate vessels in loading, and ears full of bituminous coal come rolling quietly, comporting with the lazy atmosphere of this climate, from two small holes in the hill-side, dumping their contents into yawning hatchways; often will be found embedded in pieces of these black diamonds lumps of resin an egg in size, wanting a match only to ignite them; and that captain of an American war-steamer, who, on arriving in China, had his lumbers swept clear of this fuel, was wise, for it is too combustible to remain with safety any length of time in such warm quarters.

THE COMMISSIONER'S RESIDENCE.

Labouan affords, thus far, the only coal suitable for steam that has yet been discovered in the East. It has been found in many of the islands keresined, and in Formosa and Japan, but the quality, on testing, proved so inferior, that it was at once condemned as useless. It would be difficult to surpass this place, even should good beds be discovered elsewhere, for the convenience of mining and delivery are unexceptionable, not more than sixty rods of rail being all that is required to carry cars from the pits to the pier; so it may be said that England, with a foresight creditable to her wants, controls and owns every pound of available coal in this quarter of the globe. Our war-steamers even are often obliged to borrow from the Mail Company, on promise of return in a specified time. Immense quantities are transported to the Company's depôts at Singapore and Hong Kong, and a demand greater than the supply exists. At all times there are at least two or three vessels loading, and but that the mining is carried on under the disadvantage of bad workmen—or men who never knew what work was till thus employed—and the want of machinery, which will soon be supplied, treble the quantity would be shipped.

Snugly moored near the pier lies a small fleet of prahus, ranging in size from thirty oars to two. These most beautiful boats, with their tapering bows, that seem to cut through the water without a ripple, and their long, graceful hulls, speak speed in unmistakable terms; there are no faster boats in the world, and to them we are indebted for our clipper ships, their lines having been adopted by us in a modified form.

Not many years ago the appearance of a prahu was the signal to a merchantman cruising in these seas to prepare for his defence. With crews of a hundred men they came paddling at a marvelous speed from behind some island or point, and overtook their prize with but little exertion. It was hardly possible to run away, and, unless damaged by well-directed shot, their conquest was all but certain. Few of these pirates are to be met now, British cruisers having taught them lessons of severity; and they either prey upon themselves or are engaged in legitimate trade. There lying here have come Iolen with produce from neighboring towns, and find a ready market for all they can bring. It is not impossible that Labouan may yet be a depôt for collecting the wealth of Borneo and adjacent islands, in preference to Singapore, which, from some cause, has ceased to advance, if not actually losing ground.

One or two Europeans are occasionally met on shore superintending the work, and indolent natives are either sitting on piazzas or in shady spots, chewing betel-nut, dozing on their mats, or working leisurely at breaking coal, driving horses, and killing mosquitoes. I call them natives. Labouan was uninhabited, except by roving people, who made it a rendezvous when on predatory excursions, until it changed owners; then flocked in from Borneo a goodly sprinkling of Dugis, Dyacks, and Malays. The Chinese are yet scarce, and probably these, being naturally industrious, would be the most preferable emigrants; they will come if any money is to be made, but the dreadful punishment just inflicted on them at Sarawak will have the effect of checking their advance here for some little time. Sarawak is only one hundred and

COAL POINT, LABOUAN.

THE COUNTRY DOCTOR.

THE COUNTRY BELLE.

THE COUNTRY STORE-KEEPER.

THE CITY DOCTOR.

THE CITY BELLE.

THE CITY STORE-KEEPER.

thirty miles distant; so, with British influence thus powerfully exerted, it is not difficult to prophesy the future masters of Borneo.

To the right, on a rocky bluff, overlooking the whole place, lives the Company's agent, in as European a house as can be built here; the situation, for air and scenery, is delightful, and, surrounded by a dozen old guns, barely seen through the tall grass, with the meteor flag floating over all, he feels, no doubt, considerable security in case of a row.

Victoria, the capital of this colony, or settlement, lies a mile or two further on, at the head of a small bay, affording safe anchorage for ships; here resides a governor, some soldiers, and a bishop.

To us time would pass in that little town with fearful monotony; but people quickly learn how to eat, sleep, and make away hours in such a lazy, loving climate.

I have not visited Victoria, and can say nothing about it, being exclusively occupied at the Point; but frequently, escaping from the ship, was glad to lie during spare moments on the matted floors of a Malay cottage, gazing upon the charming scenery, smoke, and think of nothing. This domicile is a jewel of its kind; built on posts to avoid dampness, and partially surrounded by a covered piazza, the air circulates below and about, while the direct rays of a broiling sun finds no opening to penetrate. No architect could design a dwelling better adapted to the climate than this. Straight limbs of trees stripped of their bark, or large stalks of bamboo—that blessing to the East—form postbeams, and rafters; while broad leaves, that shrink when dry, and permit a circulation of air through every part, and swell tightly together at the first drop of rain, stitched into squares with splints of wood, make walls, roof, and partitions—all permitting a speedy removal of the whole establishment.

But few doors or other openings are necessary; the cooking is done outside, and meals served on the front piazza; neither chairs, tables, nor beds are required among a people who sleep on rolls of matting, and sit cross-legged; so the interior appeared rather bare, but was all the cooler.

Just now Labouan is the dullest place imaginable. What it may become when Borneo develops her mineral wealth no one can calculate. Probably there is not a richer island in the world; gold, platina, diamonds, and coal wanting only pickaxes and shovels to gather them from beds barely covered by the soil, while valuable trees, overflowing with gums, wait only to be tapped or cut down for ship-building and furniture.

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

WHEN I made that operation in sugar I had no idea how it would result. I had a notion, certainly, that I could get rid of it; Boggs of Chicago, Scroggs of Cincinnati, Boggs of Columbus, and Poggs of Buffalo, I knew would take the bulk of it; and, without some unforeseen accident, there was no good reason for supposing that I should lose money. I could have carried it several months if it had been necessary. But I never dreamed, in my wildest moments, that sugar would rise from seven to ten cents, and that on my little operation I would realize—well, it don't matter how many thousand dollars. Suffice it to say, that having, in a moment of expansion, confided to Mrs. Smith the net figure of my profits on that affair, she said to me, "Smith, dear, if that is the case, we must go and live in the country."

The result of that confidence of mine was that my neighbor Dimity, who is in the dry-goods line, sold me his place in Jersey for —— dollars, being, as he declared with many oaths (Dimity is a profane talker, having been at one time a militia dragoon), just what the exotics on the place had cost him. The land and house were thus thrown into the bargain; and I congratulated myself on having pleased Mrs. Smith—which I take to be the First Duty of Married Men—and made a safe operation in real estate at the same time.

I intended at first to have come to the city every day, by favor of the railroad. Though I had retired from the firm of Rum, Molasses, & Co., I had still some little business to arrange, and I calculated that, by spending four hours per day in the cars, I could have two hours in the city, and still take a comfortable breakfast and dinner at home. But I soon discovered that the inconveniences of railway travel were greater than I had supposed. I missed the train several times a week; and after resolving to restrict my visits to the city to Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, I finally came to the conclusion that all I had to do could be done in two days each week. Accordingly, now I go up on Tuesdays and Fridays, and find that I can safely spend the rest of my time on our place.

Accordingly I see a good deal of society in our village, and it amuses me to contrast it with what I used to see when we lived in ——th Street. Take the doctor. When we lived in the city, none of my acquaintance were better plexed or more faultless clothes than our doctor. He was a delightful man, Dr. S——. He always knew what was going on in the world, from the Empire of China to the Brown and Jones clique in ——th Street. He had the latest information about the sad affair between Miss Calico and young La Pinche, and what old Calico had said to La Pinche's father when they met by accident at the Broadway Theatre. He knew exactly how much Commodore Marlinspike had lost at faro at the —— Club. He confided privately to my wife the ultimatum of Mrs. Fauxpas in her unfortunate quarrel with her husband. Then he was so obliging. He took a hand at whist with us; played backgammon with my sisters-in-law, and once drove my son to see the elephants at the menagerie. He was a thorough man of the world. Our country doctor, on the other hand, is a very good fellow, but his conversation is limited to the subjects of your health and the crops. When he sees you, he either says—

"Ha! fine growing weather—turnips amazing," or "Show me your tongue—bad digestion—pains in the—hum, ha—requires care, your case—must be careful what you eat."

From these two subjects you can not divert him. If you ask him what he thinks of Seward's chances for the next Presidency, he says that Douglas, who may be President, had an attack of dyspepsia ten years ago, and instead of taking the legitimate remedy, consumed a quantity of quack medicines, and he wouldn't be surprised if he went off the hooks any day, in consequence. If you hint that the matrimonial market is dull, he says that so long as young girls get wet feet, and refuse to take his anti-catarrh-and-inflammation powders, they must expect that men will be shy of marrying them. If you suggest that stocks are declining, he observes that if the weather holds out the mangel-wurzel crop will be immense, and that will regulate the stock market. I know not how it is, but since we came here we have not required the doctor once a month, whereas in the city he called at our house twice a week. No doubt it is the effect of the country air; but I shouldn't like to see a fashionable doctor established near us for all that.

My wife says she sees the contrast most strikingly when she goes to the village to shop. When she did her shopping in the city she was waited upon by a very handsome young fellow, with a lovely black mustache and sweet hands. He spoke in a low voice, which was respectful yet tender, and when he asked her whether she needed flannel he always blushed. This is my wife's story. Now, she says, she finds a huge, rough-looking fellow, in shirt sleeves, who sometimes stares at her as though he would chuck her under the chin, and asks her, when she enters his store,

"Well, Missis, what d'ye yer want? 'lasses, or ribbons, or a stick o' candy? Say!"

Mrs. Smith is not aware of the fact that the rough fellow in shirt sleeves pays his debts, which the fashionable youth in mustache and broadcloth sometimes omits to do; that the one—unpolished as he is—is an honest, hard-working man; while the other often differs very slightly from the regular Jeremy Diddler.

For my part, I am in favor of the country. Compare, for instance, the city belles with the country belles. My cousin Leonora is admitted to be a city belle. Between you and me, I have measured her circumference round the skirt: fifteen feet, as I am a Christian! Do you think any man could afford to marry the whole of a woman fifteen feet round the skirt? He might marry part of her; but the whole fifteen feet—ridiculous! Then listen to her talk! She talks about the Opera, about Stewart's, about the weather, of course, about the prospect of Lucy Flinn's marrying; but you might listen to her for a month without gaining an idea. Whereas my little friend Mary Berry, whose father has the next farm to mine, who wears no hoops or other mechanical contrivances for altering her shape from what nature made it, and who trips along over the grass like a sweet little bird—it is a perfect privilege to be near her, to see the soft radiance of her bright eye, and to hear the gentle tones of her voice. She has very few subjects of conversation; but she can talk sensibly on the books she reads, and on the people she meets. She has latterly been reading the Vicar of Wakefield, and has surprised me by her criticisms on the character of Moses. My wife asked her the other day whether she was going to marry young Sturges, who is very tender upon her.

"Oh! no, ma'am," said she, in her simple country manner; "Mr. Sturges doesn't care for me; he only talks to me when he is down here because he is dull."

Altogether, the contrast between town and country strikes me as so full of interest that I send you some sketches, which you may use or not, as you please.

LITERARY.

Bayard Taylor's Northern Travel (in Sweden, Denmark, and Lapland), published by Putnam, is at length out, and will be read with delight by all who admire freshness, freedom, and piquancy in a traveler or writer. It was with some surprise that we heard of the new route selected by Mr. Taylor, promising little of interest to the visitor himself, and perhaps less to the reader whom he should afterward write for. But, as in all else that he undertakes, there is a charm in his style of relation that invests commonplaces with interest, and makes his volume an acceptable addition to the winter's stock of reading, as well as to the library shelves. It is understood that Mr. Taylor is passing the present winter in Greece with his bride, whence we may anticipate observations and notes of increased value for future volumes from his industrious pen.

Parton's Life of Aaron Burr (published by Mason Brothers) has attracted great and deserved attention. It is certainly a very fascinating book. Aside from the interest which always attends the history of Mr. Burr, even in the smallest particulars of it, Mr. Parton has succeeded in making a most charming book, and has in the main, we think, done justice to all parties.

But in saying thus much we, perhaps, should explain, by adding that this justice is, in some instances, more the result of the facts given than of the author's comments. Mr. Parton feels that affection for his subject which the author of a biography is apt to feel. It is seldom that the biographer of a contemporary is otherwise than favorably inclined, and few instances occur in which, during the lifetime of a man's own compeers and friends, any one can write strictly impartial comments on his acts and character.

Mr. Parton struggles against this feeling. He stoutly resists the temptation to praise his subject, to gloss over his sins, and polish the dark spots on his character. The result is sometimes such curious contradictions as we find in passages like the following:

"Aaron Burr, then, was a man of gallantry. He was not a debauchee; not a corrupter of virgin innocence; not a despoiler of honest households; not a betrayer of tender confidences. He was a man of gallantry. It is beyond question that, in the course of his long life, he had many intrigues with women, some of which (not many, there is good reason to believe) were carried to the point of criminality. The grosser forms of licentiousness he utterly abhorred; such as the seduction of innocence, the keeping of mistresses, the wallowing in the worse than beastliness of prostitution. Not every woman could attract him. He was the most delicate and fastidious of men."

Probably no one will fail to get from this passage a very correct idea of Mr. Burr's moral character, though Mr. Parton stoutly defends him from the crime of "the seduction of innocence"—a defense that might avail a hundred years hence, but can not in this day, when there are so many who can relate instances within the memory of their parents in which Mr. Burr brought desolation into "honest households."

Perhaps no man ever lived who lived for self as completely and wholly as did Aaron Burr. Personal success, in whatever he undertook, at whatever cost to himself or others, was the impulse of his existence. Whether it was in the achievement of a political plan, the winning of a cause in which he was a counsel, the seduction of a woman, or the gratification of a whim, he asked no question beyond that one, "How shall I best succeed?"

This is the key to his whole life, to his melancholy old age, and his miserable death. All his life long he was a grand ruin. No more so when he lay, at fourscore, on his bed, and groaned out his last breath, than when he deserted the army in Canada, or abandoned his country in his great filibustering expedition. His mind was dilapidated always, from the mere fact that he had no steadfast purpose, no arrangement, no principle, no standard except the desire for immediate success in the matter in hand.

We have not space for longer notice of Mr. Parton's book. It abounds in personal anecdote. It might have contained much more, but we presume he was limited by the size of his book. There is abundant material, in the personal recollections of many of our citizens, for another volume of the same size, but this is enough for the present. The author differs from the late Matthew L. Davis in many respects, and we recommend readers who wish to examine Mr. Burr's character thoroughly to take the two biographies, Davis's and Parton's, and read them together, as we have done. The result will be, to give a fair and full idea of the life and character of one of the most remarkable men of the century, who might have been a man of honor and fame in both hemispheres, but who became a miserable old man, friendless and despised, and found at last a dishonored grave at the feet of his illustrious ancestors.

Lord Palmerston has granted a pension of £50 a year to Mrs. Dick, widow of Dr. Dick, author of "Christian Philosophy," and other works of wide popularity.

Sir Henry Havelock, whose loss the world now deplores, knew how to wield the pen as well as the sword. In 1827 he published a "History of the Ava Campaigns." In a "Memoir of the Afghan Campaign" he has given an animated narrative of the war, in which the storming of Ghuznee and the occupation of Kabool formed memorable events.

Mrs. Clive, author of "Paul Ferrol," is engaged on another novel.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, January 25, in the Senate, Senator Mason presented the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the arrest of Walker. The report is lengthy; the gist of it is given in the following resolutions:

Resolved, That no further provisions of law are necessary to confer authority on the President to cause arrests and seizures to be made on the high seas for offenses committed against the Neutrality law of 1818. The Committee find that such power is necessarily implied by the terms of the eighth section of that act.

Resolved, That the place where William Walker and his followers were arrested, being without the jurisdiction of the United States, their arrest was without warrant of law; but in view of the circumstances attending it, and its result in taking away from a Territory and State in amity with the United States American citizens who were there in hostile intent, it may not call for further censure than as it might hereafter be drawn into precedent if suffered to pass without remark.

Senators Douglas and Foot dissented from the report of the Committee. The Bill for the Increase of the Army was called up by Senator Davis, but, after some remarks from Senator Fessenden, further consideration thereof was postponed. The remainder of the day was devoted to the consideration of Kansas affairs, Senators Harlan, Polk, Stuart, Wilson, Davis, and Brown being the speakers.——In the House, a special Committee on the Pacific Railroad was appointed by the Speaker. On motion of Mr. Keitt, the consideration of Matteson's case was postponed. The House having gone into Committee on the State of the Union, Mr. Gartrell made a speech in favor of slavery, Mr. Washburne on the banks and the currency, Mr. Granger on the increase of the army, and Mr. Bingham on Kansas.

On Tuesday, Senator Douglas, from the Committee on Territories, reported to the Senate a Bill for the admission of Minnesota. The deaths of Messrs. Brenton and Lockhart, of Indiana, were reported to the Senate, and eulogies pronounced. The Bill to increase the army was then taken up, and speeches in favor of it made by Senators Davis and Hunter, and against it by Senators Toombs, Hale, Fessenden, Foster, and Seward.——The House, in Committee of the Whole on the Invalid Pensioners' Bill, heard a speech from Mr. Anderson on Kansas, and passed the Bill. It then went into Committee on the Printing Deficiency Bill, and Mr. Phelps spoke on the printing question, Mr. Cochrane and Mr. Keitt on Kansas. The following resolutions were proposed, but were not permitted to be introduced: by Mr. Clingman, to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; by Mr. Morris, to negotiate for the purchase of Utah; by Mr. Florence, to fix the 7th June for adjournment.

On Wednesday, Senator Wilson presented to the Senate a resolution for a commission to inquire into the Utah question before resorting to force. Resolutions from Ohio indorsing the President but censuring the Lecompton Constitution were presented by Senator Pugh, severely handled by Senator Wade, and ordered to be printed. Bills were introduced by Senator Davis, from the minority of the select committee on the Pacific Railroad Bill, and by Senator Broderick respecting customs duties in California. The question of the increase of the army was then taken up, and speeches made by Senators Gwin, Bell, Iverson, Simmons, Chandler, and Davis.——In the House, on motion of Mr. Zollicoffer, a resolution was adopted for information on the Utah question. The House went into committee on the Printing Deficiency Bill, and speeches on slavery, Kansas, Mormonism, and filibusterism were made by Messrs. Davis, Leach, Avery, Thompson, and Giddings.

On Thursday, in the Senate, Senator Foot introduced an amendment to Senator Davis's Pacific Railroad Bill. Senator Slidell reported a bill prohibiting the issue of bank-notes by corporations or individuals within the District of Columbia, or the issue in the District of bank-notes under $50 by corporations or individuals without the District. A resolution was adopted, on motion of Senator Hamlin, directing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the propriety of repealing the Lighthouse Board Act. The Army Increase Bill being taken up, speeches were made by Senators Hale, Davis, Toombs, Stuart, Fessenden, and Greene. Senators Slidell and Pearce spoke on the question of presenting a medal to Commodore Paulding.——The House, in Committee on the Printing Deficiency Bill, heard speeches, chiefly on Kansas, from Messrs. Shaw, Burnett, Harris, Smith, Cousins, Hickman, and Sherman.

On Friday, the Senate not being in session, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Printing Deficiency Bill, and speeches, chiefly on the question of the printing, were made by Messrs. Burnett, Letcher, Phelps, Crawford, and Nichols. The House then adjourned.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

There is but little to add to the items of news given last week respecting the Kansas imbroglio. Mr. Clarkson, the bearer of the Lecompton Constitution, has arrived at Washington. There was a rumor early in the week that Mr. Calhoun had thrown out certain votes, cast at the recent election, which had been returned to Governor Denver instead of himself, and that thereby the Pro-Slavery party had secured control of the Kansas Legislature; but the story lacks confirmation, and is generally discredited. It is generally supposed that the Administration adheres to its purpose of making the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution a party measure. Several caucuses have been held to ascertain the relative strength of the two parties in the Senate and in the House; various conflicting results are given in the daily papers. It seems likely that the President could command a majority in both Houses.

THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

The Administration has received advices from the Utah Expedition which it has been thought advisable not to publish. Colonel Cooke's report of his march across the plains has been published; it describes the sufferings of the troops and cattle as fearful and heart-rending. Some additional items have been brought by a late bearer of dispatches. Captain Marcy was expected back about the middle of April, and soon thereafter transportation would be effected, and Colonel Johnston would make an effort to enter Salt Lake City. Colonel Johnston's impression, from the demonstrations made in the valley, is that the troops will have to fight. At Judge Eckel's Court of Session a great many presentments were made to the Grand Jury, involving business enough for two or three weeks. The Committee of Congress on Mr. Bernhisel's case are expected to report that there is no ground for expelling him.

THE ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

The bill reported by Mr. Douglas, from the Senate Committee on Territories, declares that Minnesota shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. It provides that the State shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress, and such additional representatives as the population may show they are entitled to according to the present ratio of representation, leaving the House to ascertain the number when the full returns of the census shall be received, presuming that the residue of the returns will be received by the time the bill shall become a law. So far the ascertained population is 136,461, with seven counties and part of another to hear from.

STATE LEGISLATURES.

The New York Legislature has organized at last, by the election of Alvord (Democrat) as Speaker, and Wilson (Know Nothing), Clerk.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania has authorized the Governor to open a correspondence with the Governors of other States for the purpose of calling a convention for the adoption of measures to prohibit notes of a less denomination than five, ten, or twenty dollars.

PERSONAL.

The following description of Lord Napier's ball in honor of the Princess Royal's marriage is from the Times:

"The cards were issued for 9½ o'clock. Within an hour after between four and five hundred guests had assembled, presenting an array of intellect, station, beauty, wealth, and distinction in the various departments of life such as was never collected before under one roof in Washington, heightened by accessories which contributed greatly to the striking and brilliant effect of the spectacle. Every important branch of the Government was represented. Miss Lane, who so becomingly presides at the White House, and who had not appeared in society during the winter, was present, to testify the respect of the President's household. The Cabinet attended either in person or through their families. The whole diplomatic corps, in full court costume, resplendent with orders and insignia, united in doing honor to the celebration. All the prominent officers of the army and navy, in uniform, with the grand person of General Scott towering, in its fine proportions, above them, rendered more noticeable by the military trappings of a Lieutenant-General, mingled with the throng. The leading members of both branches of Congress, of all parties and sections, were also present. British and other foreign Consuls from the principal ports, in their official dress, added to the general interest. Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other cities, contributed their quota of representation through citizens eminent in the learned professions."

The States, in describing the costumes at the last President's reception, says: "Several of the belles wore their hair dressed with flowers à l'Ophelia, the drooping flowers and tendrils giving a becoming effect to their profiles."

The Southern Chronicle, published at Orange Courthouse, Virginia, says: "We learn that the remains of Mrs. Madison were brought from Washington by her nephew, Mr. Cutts, on Wednesday, the 13th ult., and deposited in the cemetery at Montpelier, near the monument recently placed by the citizens of this county over the grave of her husband. This, we understand, was in compliance with a wish expressed by Mrs. Madison herself. Circumstances unavoidable have heretofore delayed it. It would, however, have been consummated when the Madison monument was erected, in September last, if her relatives in Washington had known at the time that this was about being done."

Miss Petit, the Virginia authoress, is, we understand, to give a series of Shakspearian readings through the Southern cities. She can not fail to make a sensation, for in addition to genius of a high order, her personal attractions are remarkable. Her face and head are in themselves a study of classic beauty, while her voice has all the soft rich music which belongs to the accents of her clime. Those who are familiar with that exquisite production of poetry and passion, "Light and Darkness," will need no other inducement to attend these readings than the natural desire to behold the fair and brilliant authoress.

A letter from an officer on board the United States steamer Powhatan states that ex-President Pierce and Mrs. Pierce had both improved in health, though the latter had suffered considerably from sea-sickness. The officers and crew were all well, and the ship in fine order. She reached Madeira on the 27th of December, in sixteen days from Norfolk, after a rough passage, and was to have sailed for St. Helena on the 5th of January.

A young lady in one of the leading circles at Washington was complimented by a gentleman on the simplicity and good taste of her dress at an evening party. She replied, "I am glad you like my dress, it cost just seven dollars, and I made every stitch of it myself." When young ladies pride themselves upon the cheapness of their attire, instead of its expensiveness, we shall have fewer "broken" fathers and husbands.

Rev. John M. Reid, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a member of the New York East Conference, has be[en] elected to the Presidency of the Genesee College, in pla[ce] of Dr. Cummings, recently elected to the Presidency of the Wesleyan University. He will accept, and en[ter] upon his duties at the commencement of the next term.

The following paragraph is from the Washington co[r]respondence of the Herald: "A novel scene was witness[ed] at the White House yesterday, with the 'Old Fo[lks] Concert Professionals' and the President. During the call they proposed to sing, and requested Mr. Buchanan to name the song. He named 'Sweet Home,' which they sung with effect, making the Presidential mansion e[cho] with their voices."

Peter Cagger has left Albany for Washington, says the Knickerbocker, to hunt up a foreign mission for John V. L. Pruyn, leaving behind him much legislative patronage undisposed of. The following is given as the list of office-seekers who called at his office during the afternoon of Wednesday:

"Eighty-seven married men, one hundred and twenty-three single men, four hundred and sixty-one women, three hundred and ninety-two boys, and ninety-three wood-venders. Owing to the rush, Hill and Porter had to vacate the premises and leave for home."

The Detroit Free Press notices the passage through that city of a man having in charge a raving maniac, who was secured in a box for safety, on his way from Minnesota to Maine. The box was just sufficient to allow of his turning round in it, but not large enough to allow of his harming himself. When it was taken out of the cars it was set up on end, and the raving, gibbering maniac looked through the bars at the crowd who gathered around curiously, and beckoned to them to come and release him. He was taken out of his cage at Monroe and fed.

When Mrs. B., the actress, was making a summer excursion in the country, she was accompanied by her husband, and a party of his and her friends. One of them was Mr. ——, formerly a pilot on the Boston station, who had laughed and grown fat so long that he had become, like Woolsey, a "man of unbounded stomach." Some one asked, "Who is this large man in Mrs. B.'s suite?" "That," said his informant, "is Mr. ——; he is a pilot." "Exactly," was the response, "I should think he was a paunchеous Pilate!"

Judge Bosworth, of the Superior Court of this city, is confined to his bed with a severe attack of the pleurisy. Judge Duer, of the same Court, who fell and broke his thigh a few weeks ago, is improving rapidly.

W. Carey Jones and secretary have taken formal leave of the Government of Nicaragua.

Ex-President Tyler is lying very ill at his residence, "Sherwood Forest," Charles City County, Virginia. He has been suffering for several weeks past with a severe chronic attack.

Mademoiselle Rachel had a narrow escape of being buried alive. Eleven hours after the telegram reached Paris of her death, she was still breathing. The operator who came to embalm first felt the carotid artery, and was startled to find pulsation. The truth was known at once, and she only died in the evening.

It is reported in Washington that General Persifor Smith will have command of the eastern division of the army in Utah in the next campaign, if Scott goes to California.

Mr. John J. Palmer, President of the Merchants' Bank, is, we learn, ill with paralysis. He was struck with the disease a few days since, but yesterday his symptoms were pronounced favorable, and it is likely that he will soon recover.

Mr. John J. Eckel, held on his own recognizances as participator in the Burdell murder, has been set completely at liberty, a nolle prosequi having been entered.

Mr. George Taylor having married clandestinely a young lady named Emma Hawley, has found out that he is wrong in his speculations and has no right to her. The maiden wife having testified in propria persona that she would not go to George—she would not live with him, speak to him, write to him, or look at him, the Judge decided that she might go where she chose, and she thereupon walked off with her mother, brother, and friends, leaving the hapless husband to mourn over the hopes that left him.

There are four ladies in the Utah military expedition against the Mormons. They are Mrs. Governor Cummings, Mrs. Colonel Canby, Mrs. Tyler, and Mrs. Burr. Mrs. Cummings froze one of her feet while crossing the mountains.

Senator Sumner writes, from Boston, that his health has so much improved that he will go to Washington in time to vote upon the Army Bill.

Ex-Governor Grimes was elected United States Senator from Iowa, on the 25th January, by twenty-one majority.

George Vail, of New Jersey, has been appointed Consul to Glasgow.

The famous Chippewa Chief, "Hole-in-the-Day," known for his efforts in arresting the Spirit Lake murderers, was killed in a duel at Crow Wing, Minnesota, on the 12th inst. His adversary was a Mr. Giggy, a citizen of Crow Wing. The cause of the duel was an insult given to Mr. Giggy, by the Chief, while drunk. Two shots were fired by each party, Mr. Giggy receiving one in the right side. At the second fire, Giggy was wounded in the left side. It was with difficulty that he could stand up for the third fire; but the Indian Chief would not agree to settle the difficulty, and the third fire was exchanged, and poor Hole-in-the-Day was shot through the heart.

There are grave doubts as to the death of Dr. Vogel, the celebrated African traveler. Several Mecca pilgrims from the interior coincide in the assertion that Abd-el-Wahed (Dr. Vogel) has not been killed, but is kept prisoner by the Sultan of Waday, who, according to their description, is not only a very severe, but also a very cautious and astute man. Baron Neimans has gone in search of the missing traveler.

A. Jennings Wise, son of Governor Wise, and Mr. Ridgway, editor of the Richmond Whig, have a quarrel and personal conflict, and have been arraigned before the Mayor, to prevent them from fighting a duel, and held to bail in the sum of $3000.

Mr. Parton, the biographer of Aaron Burr, is understood to be engaged in preparing a Life of General Andrew Jackson, for which he obtained much new material while writing the life of the great "conspirator."

The Fredericksburg (Virginia) Herald states that Colonel Daniel Ruggles, United States Army, who has been on a visit to his friends in that section of Virginia, left on Friday morning for Jefferson barracks, where he will be engaged in receiving recruits and preparing for the Utah campaign, which the army has before it in Utah Territory. Colonel Ruggles's regiment (the 5th infantry) is now west of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. Theodore Parker delivered a lecture at New Bedford on Tuesday night, and among other things wise and witty he said: "The aristocratic families of Boston began from some bare-legged and bare-footed ancestors, and by-and-by will become bare-legged and bare-footed again." Mr. Parker himself came into the world without a shirt to his back, or a pocket to put a penny in: and in view of this historical fact, we do not see the utility of his fling at others whose condition was no worse than his own.

A public meeting was held on the 13th ultimo in Scottsville, Albemarle County, Va., at which resolutions were adopted denouncing the arrest of Walker, and denouncing the dismissal of Commodore Paulding from the service. A correspondent of the Charlottesville Advocate says: "After the adoption of the resolutions the meeting adjourned, and repaired to Jefferson's Mount, a commanding eminence, which rears its lofty summit above the tallest house which adorns the village, and after successive yells from the large and excited crowd which had congregated to see and hear, the image was set on fire and consumed, amidst the loud and enthusiastic shouts of an indignant population."

At the Museum, in Leicester Square, London, there is now on exhibition the veritable ceremonial robe of the "Hindoo demon of a Nena Sahib," as the Bombay letters describe him, which is daily inspected by immense crowds. The shawl alone is said to be worth a thousand pounds sterling, and is a most perfect specimen of workmanship.

Mr. John Oothout, who for nearly thirty years past has been well known to our citizens as the President of the Bank of New York, died last week, at his residence, 83 Waverley Place, after a long illness. Mr. Oo[thout] was a familiar face in Wall Street for many years past. and his death will be widely regretted. He was a man of great experience in monetary affairs, and his loss will be severely felt by the institution over which he presided so ably for many years.

The new Douglas mansion in Washington, says the Boston Post, is palatial in dimensions, and is furnished in excellent taste. The largest parlor (of which there are three) is nearly as large as the east room in the White House, and is adorned by a large and fine collection of pictures, many of them purchased by Mr. Douglas while in Europe.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE APPROACHING MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

EVERY thing connected with this now rapidly-approaching event is proceeding as speedily as possible. In the works at St. James's Palace such great progress has been made that some days before the time appointed the whole will be completed. Every thing will be as perfect as possible; and when the state apartments and Chapel Royal are thrown open to the public, there will be but one opinion as to the great taste that has been displayed in these decorations and improvements. The number of workmen of all classes has been increased, and the works go on continuously from six in the morning until 11 o'clock at night—in some departments even later—in order that as much may be done as possible before the Court comes to town, which is expected to be either on the 14th or 15th January at latest. At the wedding some of the highest families in the empire will be represented in the persons of the young ladies who will have the honor of officiating as bridesmaids. Among the families thus honored will be those of the Dukes of Richmond, Newcastle, Hamilton, Sutherland, and Athol; and those of the Earls of Derby and Clarendon. The names of these fair representatives of the high aristocracy are said to be Lady Cecilia Lennox, Lady Susan Pelham Clinton, Lady Susan Murray, Lady Catherine Hamilton, Lady Emma Stanley, Lady Constance Villiers, and Lady Cecilia Molyneux, sister of the young Earl of Sefton.

COSTUME OF THE BRIDAL PARTY.

A London Journal says: "The costume which her Majesty will wear at the marriage of the Princess Royal and Prince Frederick William will be of peach-color moiré antique, with Honiton lace flounces, being the same which the Queen wore at her own wedding. The bridal costume of the Princess Royal will, we understand, be of rich white moiré antique; the lace dress of exquisite Honiton guipure, consisting of three flounces, the body being trimmed to match. The vail will be of Honiton guipure lace, which will be worn in a style completely novel in this country for bridal costume, and will be attached to the head with magnificent Moorish or Spanish pins. The dress and vail are splendidly worked, the emblem being the rose, shamrock, and thistle. The latter has employed fifty girls for the last twelve months. This new style of vail was entirely her Majesty's suggestion, and the carrying out of the idea has met the approbation of the Queen. The cost of this production will be about £600."

AN ANECDOTE OF THE PRINCESS.

An Edinburgh paper contains the following anecdote of the Princess Royal: "Several years ago, when quite a young girl, a matron, for whom her Royal Highness had a special liking, had added one more to her husband's family. The baby, of course, was an object of superlative interest; and, when the christening was about to take place, the Princess asked to be permitted to attend and act as godmother. This was freely agreed to. The day came, and so did his Presbyterian reverence, but the expected godmother, from some cause, did not make her appearance, and after a little the ceremony went on in her absence. It was barely concluded when the Princess came, breathless with haste and excitement. On being told how matters stood, her undisguised feelings found vent in a sorrowful 'Oh! but couldn't you do it over again?' When the court left Balmoral last summer, the dependents were invited up to the lawn to bid farewell to her Royal Highness. The feelings of the Princess so overcame her, however, that she was unable to make her appearance before them, and the Prince Consort bade adieu on her behalf. It is a cherished hope that they will yet see her at Balmoral, though her home must now be at a foreign court. Invitations to be in London at the Princess's marriage have been sent, by her own special request, to Dr. Robertson, the Prince Consort's commissioner, and to Mr. Grant, the head game-keeper at Balmoral.

THE LEVIATHAN TO BE LAUNCHED AT LAST.

The Leviathan has been pushed to within half a dozen feet of the extremity of the launching ways. She was to remain in that position until the prevailing spring tides were over, when she would be pushed off the ways, and so await the high tides of January to float her.

PRINCE ALBERT TO BE KING.

The Court Circular thinks the time is come when the Prince Consort's position should be "rectified," and that he should receive the style of King. It informs its readers that "his right to that honorary style does not rest with the volition of Ministers or with the pleasure of the people. It is the law of England since the days of Henry VIII. that the husband of a peeress in her own right shall, if he has issue by her, be tenant, by courtesy, of her barony, earldom, etc. This rule, it is said, applies, not by right but 'by grace,' to the spouse of the reigning sovereign; but the law of grace is just as potent in a question of this nature as is the law of right. It is clearly within the personal prerogative of the Sovereign to order and command that the Consort of the Crown shall, in all such things as title, place, and precedency, have and enjoy the attributes of royalty."

PHOTOGRAPHS BY QUEEN VICTORIA.

An Antwerp paper mentions that Queen Victoria, who has of late devoted much time and displayed great talent in the art of photography, has lately sent the Empress Eugénie, as a New Year's present, a charming album full of photographs taken by herself. On the leaves of this very unique work are to be found portraits of the royal children in the costumes of various Shakspearian characters, the portrait of Prince Albert, together with views of Windsor Castle, Balmoral, and Osborne House.

CHEAPNESS OF MONEY IN LONDON.

On the 14th ult. the Bank of England reduced its rate of discount to 5 per cent., being the lowest point touched for fifteen months. It was anticipated that a further reduction would take place in a week or two. The discount houses have reduced the rates of allowance at call from 4½ to 3½ per cent. The Joint Stock Bank has reduced the rate for deposit to 3 per cent. This action of the Bank imparted firmness to the Stock Market. Choice paper was negotiated in the discount market at 3½ to 4 per cent.

IS HAVELOCK A BARONET?

We hear it questioned in some quarters whether the baronetcy intended for General Havelock does not formally fall to the ground, from the fact of the death of the lamented General preceding the date of the patent. He died on the 25th of November, and the baronetcy was conferred on the 26th. It may therefore be an error to describe Captain Havelock as "Sir Henry Marsham Havelock, Second Baronet." Lady Havelock is Lady Havelock by reason of Sir Henry having been previously created a K.C.B. The grant voted by Parliament is also not yet completed, the bill authorizing it having been postponed till after the recess. Some entirely new arrangement must therefore be come to. It is understood that the Queen will date his patent as a Baronet on the day he entered Lucknow.

FRANCE.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE EMPEROR.

The Moniteur of 15th January gives the following account of the attempt to assassinate the Emperor:

"Last night, at half past eight o'clock, at the moment of their Majesties' arrival at the Opera, three explosions of shells were heard. A number of the crowd who were standing by the door-way, several of the soldiers of the escort, and of the Garde de Paris, were wounded, two of them mortally. Neither the Emperor nor the Empress was touched. A piece of shell, however, pierced his Majesty's hat; and General Roguet, Aid-de-camp in waiting, who was sitting in the carriage, was slightly wounded on the back of the head. The carriage itself was much shattered. The Emperor and Empress, on entering the Opera, were received with the warmest enthusiasm. The course of the performance went on as usual. On hearing of the event which had taken place, their Imperial Highnesses Jerome Napoleon and the Prince Napoleon, the Princess Mathilde, as well as Prince Murat, the Ministers, several Marshals and great functionaries, the members of the diplomatic body, and the Prefects of the Seine and of Police, the Procureur-General of the Court of Paris, and the Procureur-Imperial, attended their Majesties. The 'instruction' was at once commenced, and several arrests were effected. Their Majesties left the Opera at midnight. The Boulevards were spontaneously illuminated, and a vast concourse of people cheered the Emperor and the Empress most enthusiastically and touchingly as they passed on their way to the Tuileries. On arriving there their Majesties found a great number of persons, among them the Embassador of England, the President of the Senate, members of the diplomatic body, and several Senators, waiting to offer their congratulations."

Another account says: "The Emperor's face is slightly scratched by fragments of glass. The Emperor and Empress are perfectly well. At twelve o'clock the imperial family attended a solemn mass, with the ministers of state. The conspirators are Italians. Four have been arrested. They came from England, and belong to the sect of assassins. Fifty-two persons were wounded, some dangerously, by the three shells thrown at the carriage."

THE FUNERAL OF RACHEL.

The correspondent of the London Times says: "The funeral of Mademoiselle Rachel took place this morning. At eleven o'clock a large crowd attended at the Place Royale, where the deceased resided. The remains arrived on Saturday night, and were, in conformity with the Hebrew ritual, watched by two women, who recited prayers by the side of the coffin. At twelve o'clock the body was deposited in a hearse drawn by six horses; the coffin was covered with a white pall, sprinkled with silver stars, and on it a crown of immortelles. The Grand Rabbi of the Jewish Consistory of Paris, dressed in a black gown, or soutane, with a cincture of the same color, walked immediately after the hearse. The chief mourners were the father, the brother, and the two sons of Mademoiselle Rachel. The corners of the pall were held by Alexandre Dumas, père; Baron Taylor; M. Maquet, President of the Society of Dramatic Authors; and M. Geoffray, of the Theatre Française. The cortege, consisting of sixteen mourning and a considerable number of private carriages, moved on to the Jewish burial-ground, which is at the extreme end of Père la Chaise, by the Place Royale, the Rue Bas du Mule, and the Chemin-Vert. An immense crowd, among whom were all who are most celebrated in art and letters, followed. All the theatres in Paris were represented by deputations composed of the principal artistes. On arriving at the gate of the cemetery the coffin was laid on the ground, and the Rabbi recited, in Hebrew and in French, the Prayer of the Resurrection; after which it was borne to the grave, the Rabbi chanting the 91st Psalm. When the coffin was lowered into the earth, he repeated aloud, and in Hebrew, the prayer called Haskabe, and then a prayer in French. Speeches were made by MM. Jules Janin, Bataille, and Maquet. That of M. Janin was particularly effective when he alluded to the loss, within so short a time, of all that was celebrated, glorious, and free; and he expressed his regret that the deceased was not eulogized by a man who only was competent to do so, but who was now in exile—namely, M. Victor Hugo. The family of the deceased then threw handfuls of earth on the coffin, the grave was filled up, and all was over. The crowd was immense, and several detachments of cavalry were on the spot to keep order."

RACHEL'S RELIGION.

A Milan journal, the Bilancia, announces that Mademoiselle Rachel, having embraced the Roman Catholic faith, was baptized on the 18th ultimo; but the authenticity of this statement, though repeated in other quarters, is doubtful. It is very positively stated that, on Saturday (the day before her death), she sent to Nice for a Jewish Rabbi, who performed, by her bedside, the service in extremis prescribed by the Jewish religion.

AN AMERICAN CLIPPER'S ESCAPE FROM MARSEILLES.

A letter from Marseilles, dated January 10, gives the following story: "Since yesterday the whole town has been talking of a strange affair, which it is thought may give rise to serious diplomatic complications. You remember the fearful collision between the Lyonnais, a French steamer, belonging to the Messrs. Gauthier Brothers, and the Adriatic, an American ship, when the former vessel foundered. Upon that occasion the American captain left the scene of the disaster without troubling himself about the result, and on reaching his destination omitted to make any mention in his report of the unfortunate occurrence. Several months having elapsed, the Messrs. Gauthier learned that the Adriatic was lying at anchor in the harbor of Ciotat. An order was instantly obtained to sequestrate her and bring her here, where a stricter surveillance is maintained in the port. Captain Durham lost no time in protesting against this measure, and appealed to our Tribunal of Commerce, in which the pleading of a young avocat, M. Aycard, himself an American by descent, gained the day for his client. From this judgment the French owners of the Lyonnais appealed to the Court of Appeal at Aix, and the cause was brought before that tribunal, when the previous decision was quashed, and the American ship declared a lawful prize. During the proceedings in this latter court the Adriatic was unrigged. Captain Durham was not the man to submit quietly to an adverse sentence, and, accordingly, in concert with one of his fellow-countrymen, he devised the following scheme: The ship Meaher, commanded by Captain Smith, was also under sequestration on account of a heavy debt contracted by her, and which had not been paid. Captain Smith, a daring and resolute fellow, contrived to bring her alongside of the Adriatic. This manœuvre being effected, the Meaher's cargo was shifted in a very short time to the hold of the Adriatic, on board of which at the same time the other's rigging was transferred. The captain then followed, and at three o'clock in the morning of Saturday last the Adriatic passed the Joliette port. At this point there is always on duty a boat of the Custom-house, and the officer who was in her hailed the ship, when Captain Durham leaned over the side. 'Are your papers all right?' asked the officer. 'Oh yes,' answered the captain. 'What's the name of your ship?' 'The Moon,' replies he, and out to sea the Adriatic goes, though condemned to be sold for the benefit of Messrs. Gauthier, with her double cargo. Her departure was not perceived till broad daylight, and then a complaint was lodged, but a whole day had been lost. They say that the Prefect ordered out the Chacal, a war paddle-steamer stationed in the old port, and away she has gone to catch the Adriatic, if she can. She has not returned from her chase, and our seafaring men think the American has run into some creek along the Spanish coast. Captain Smith, just before his departure, bought three guns, other arms, and some powder, all of which were conveyed from the Meaher to the Adriatic. This curious affair will, perhaps, not so easily be settled."

THE BOTTOM OF THE SEA TO BE ROBBED OF ITS TREASURES.

A member of the Académie des Sciences of Paris, who is also an eminent chemist, has invented an apparatus which he thinks will enable human beings to breathe as freely at the bottom of the sea as on the surface of the earth. He proposes to form an association for collecting all the treasures now lying at the bottom of the ocean, and estimates at about £800,000,000 sterling the harvest of treasure to be gleaned on the route between England and India only.

A NEW IMPERIAL ORGAN.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald says: "A new journal has made its appearance, under the auspices of M. G. de Cassagnac, deputy of the Corps Legislatif, and one of the principal writers of the Constitutionnel. Its first article is from Cassagnac himself. Under the title of 'Silence de l'Orgie' he sets forth his views on journalism, literature, and the new drama, and his object in publishing a new journal. His words are worthy of remark: 'It must be evident to all men that at the present day political journals, without having lost their utility, have lost a little of their importance. Generally speaking, when the political press is strong it is because the ruling power is weak. For writers to take up questions it is necessary that ministers should have let them slip from their hands; and as power must necessarily exist somewhere, it falls into the hands of journalism as soon as the government can not hold it. But as soon as a beloved and energetic power is established in a country which shows itself jealous of its work, and accomplishes it manfully, questions and affairs remain within the circle of government; or when they leave it, they leave it sifted and settled. This is precisely the position in which France now is, after many years of confusion and struggles. The government governs. The executive power is at the Tuileries and in great bodies of State, and not in half a dozen ink-stands. Public opinion and public interests follow their natural guides, instead of losing themselves in a thousand labyrinths, the tracks of journalists, tribunes, etc. The press envenomed questions without solving them; the government solves them without envenoming them. Let us praise God for it.'"

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

The weekly mail from Bombay, with dates of the 24th December, had reached Alexandria when the last European steamer left. It contained nothing from Oude or Cawnpore, owing, it is presumed, to the continued interruption of the mail between Calcutta and Bombay. The garrison at Futtepore was pressed by the insurgents, and they had abandoned part of their intrenchments, and taken up another and more secure position. A column from Delhi, under Colonel Seaton, attacked a body of insurgents at Genowree, and defeated them, killing 150, and taking three of their four guns. Three British officers were killed and one wounded. The insurgents in the neighborhood of Jubbelpore were attacked on the 29th of November, without decisive results. Reinforcements were advancing to Jubbelpore. The Rajah of Aamjheer and his Minister had been tried and sentenced to death. The Minister was hanged, but the sentence against the Rajah awaited the confirmation of the Governor-General. Other executions had also taken place. The Punjab, Scinde, and Bombay were all quiet. No further rebel depredations were reported, and quiet generally prevailed.

THE DEFENSE OF LUCKNOW.

The official report of Colonel Inglis, recounting the wonderful defense of Lucknow, has just been published. It is full of interest, and we make a few extracts:

THE DEATH OF LAWRENCE.

"It is my very painful duty to relate the calamity which befell us at the commencement of the siege. On the 1st July an eight-inch shell burst in the room in the Residency in which Sir H. Lawrence was sitting. The missile burst between him and Mr. Couper, close to both, but without injury to either. The whole of his staff implored Sir Henry to take up other quarters, as the Residency had then become the special target for the round-shot and shell of the enemy. This, however, he jestingly declined to do, observing that another shell would certainly never be pitched into that small room. But Providence had ordained otherwise, for, on the very next day, he was mortally wounded by the fragment of another shell, which burst in the same room, exactly at the same spot. Captain Wilson, Deputy-Assistant Adjutant-General, received a contusion at the same time. The late lamented Sir H. Lawrence, knowing that his last hour was rapidly approaching, directed me to assume command of the troops, and appointed Major Banks to succeed him in the office of Chief Commissioner. He lingered in great agony till the morning of the 4th July, when he expired; and the Government was thereby deprived, if I may venture to say so, of the services of a distinguished statesman and a most gallant soldier.

THE LAST ASSAULT OF THE ENEMY.

"On the 5th September, the enemy made their last serious assault. Having exploded a large mine, a few feet short of the bastion of the 18-pounder gun, in Major Apthorp's post, they advanced with large heavy scaling ladders, which they planted against the wall, and mounted, thereby gaining for an instant the embrasure of a gun. They were, however, speedily driven back with loss, by hand grenades and musketry. A few minutes subsequently they sprung another mine close to the brigade mess, and advanced boldly; but soon the corpses strewed in the garden in front of the post bore testimony to the fatal accuracy of the rifle and musketry fire of the gallant members of that garrison, and the enemy fled ignominiously, leaving their leader—a fine-looking old native officer—among the slain. At other posts they made their similar attacks, but with less resolution, and every where with the same want of success. Their loss upon this day must have been very heavy, as they came on with much determination, and at night they were seen bearing large numbers of their killed and wounded over the bridges in the direction of cantonments.

THE NATIVE SHARPSHOOTERS.

"Our heaviest losses have been caused by the fire from the enemy's sharpshooters stationed in the adjoining mosques and houses of the native nobility, the necessity of destroying which had been repeatedly drawn to the attention of Sir Henry by the staff of engineers; but his invariable reply was, 'Spare the holy places, and private property too, as far as possible;' and we have consequently suffered severely from our very tenderness to the religious prejudices and respect to the rights of our rebellious citizens and soldiery. As soon as the enemy had thoroughly completed the investment of the Residency, they occupied these houses, some of which were within easy pistol-shot of our barricades, in immense force, and rapidly made loopholes on those sides which bore on our post, from which they kept up a terrific and incessant fire day and night, which caused many daily casualties, as there could not have been less than 8000 men firing at one time into our position. Moreover, there was no place in the whole of our works that could be considered safe, for several of the sick and wounded who were lying in the banqueting-hall, which had been turned into a hospital, were killed in the very centre of the building, and the widow of Lieutenant Dorin and other women and children were shot dead in a room into which it had not been previously deemed possible that a bullet could penetrate. Neither were the enemy idle in erecting batteries. They soon had from twenty to twenty-five guns in position, some of them of very large calibre. These were planted all round our post at small distances, some being actually within fifty yards of our defenses, but in places where our own heavy guns could not reply to them, while the perseverance and ingenuity of the enemy, in erecting barricades in front of and around their guns in a very short time, rendered all attempts to silence them by musketry entirely unavailing. Neither could they be effectually silenced by shells by reason of their extreme proximity to our position, and because, moreover, the enemy had recourse to digging very narrow trenches, about eight feet in depth, in rear of each gun, in which the men lay while our shells were flying, and which so effectually concealed them, even while working the gun, that our baffled sharpshooters could only see their hands while in the act of loading.

THE SUFFERINGS OF THE TROOPS.

"I can conscientiously declare my conviction that few troops have ever undergone greater hardships, exposed as they have been to a never-ceasing musketry fire and cannonade. They have also experienced the alternate vicissitudes of extreme wet and of intense heat, and that, too, with very insufficient shelter from either, and in many places without any shelter at all. In addition to having had to repel real attacks, they have been exposed night and day to the hardly less harassing false alarms which the enemy have been constantly raising. The insurgents have frequently fired very heavily, sounded the advance, and shouted for several hours together, though not a man could be seen, with the view of harassing our small and exhausted force, in which object they succeeded, for no part has been strong enough to allow of a portion only of the garrison being prepared in the event of a false attack being turned into a real one. All, therefore, had to stand to their arms and remain at their posts until the demonstration had ceased; and such attacks were of almost nightly occurrence. The whole of the officers and men have been on duty night and day during the eighty-seven days which the siege had lasted, up to the arrival of Sir James Outram, G.C.B. In addition to this incessant military duty, the force has been nightly employed in repairing defenses, in moving guns, in burying dead animals, in conveying ammunition and commissariat stores from one place to another, and other fatigue duties too numerous and too trivial to enumerate here. I feel, however, that any word of mine will fail to convey any adequate idea of what our fatigue and labors have been, labors in which all ranks and all classes, civilians, officers, and soldiers, have all borne an equally noble part. All have together descended into the mine, all have together handled the shovel for the interment of the putrid bullock, all accoutred with musket and bayonet have relieved each other on sentry, without regard to the distinctions of rank, civil or military. Notwithstanding all these hardships, the garrison has made no less than five sorties, in which they spiked two of the enemy's heaviest guns and blew up several of the houses from which they had kept up their most harassing fire. Owing to the extreme paucity of our numbers, each man was taught to feel that on his own individual efforts alone depended in no small measure the safety of the entire position.

DEFERRED HOPES.

"We sent our messengers daily calling for aid and asking for information, none of whom ever returned until the twenty-sixth day of the siege, when a pensioner named Ungud came back with a letter from General Havelock's camp, informing us that they were advancing with a force sufficient to bear down all opposition, and would be with us in five or six days. A messenger was immediately dispatched, requesting that, on the evening of their arrival on the outskirts of the city, two rockets might be sent up, in order that we might take the necessary measures for assisting them while forcing their way in. The sixth day, however, expired, and they came not; but for many evenings after officers and men watched for the ascension of the expected rockets, with hopes such as make the heart sick. We knew not then, nor did we learn until the 29th of August—or 35 days later—that the relieving force, after having fought most nobly to effect our deliverance, had been obliged to fall back for reinforcements, and this was the last communication we received until two days before the arrival of Sir James Outram on the 25th of September.

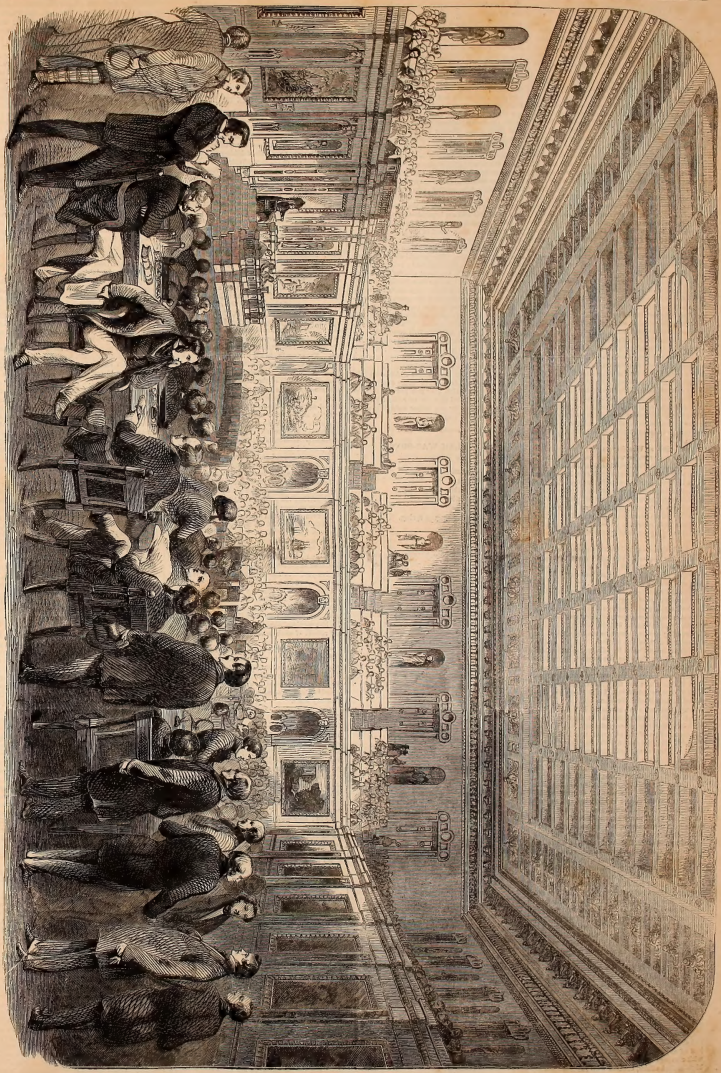
THE LADIES.

"The mortality among the women and children, and especially among the latter, from these diseases, and from other causes, has been perhaps the most painful characteristic of the siege. The want of native servants has also been a source of much privation. Owing to the suddenness with which we were besieged, many of these people who might perhaps have otherwise proved faithful to their employers, but who were outside the defenses at the time, were altogether excluded. Very many more deserted, and several families were consequently left without the services of a single domestic. Several ladies have had to tend their children, and even to wash their own clothes, as well as to cook their scanty meals entirely unaided. Combined with the absence of servants, the want of proper accommodation has probably been the cause of much of the disease with which we have been afflicted. I can not refrain from bringing to the prominent notice of his lordship in council the patient endurance and the Christian resignation which has been evinced by the women of this garrison. They have animated us by their example. Many, alas! have been made widows, and their children fatherless, in this cruel struggle. But all such seem resigned to the will of Providence, and many, among whom may be mentioned the honored names of Birch, of Polehampton, of Barbor, and of Gall, have, after the example of Miss Nightingale, constituted themselves the tender and solicitous nurses of the wounded and dying soldiers in the hospital."

GENERAL WYNDHAM'S DEFEAT.

The Indian correspondent of the London Daily News thus describes Wyndham's defeat: "General Wyndham, marching at the head of more Europeans than the lamented Havelock had ever had under his command, went down, confident of success, to attack the rebels. Our troops, accustomed to be led to victory, went on with their usual dash, the 64th, one of Havelock's victorious regiments, leading. They charged a battery in the left centre of the enemy's line, and gained it, the enemy yielding to them at every step. By advancing the other regiments to support the 64th, the victory would have been assured; but they were left alone, and the enemy closing on them with their left wing they suffered severely; they were compelled to abandon the guns they had gained. The want of a general was every where conspicuous, confusion reigned on all sides; no distinct orders were issued, and our troops had to beat a hasty, it may be called a disgraceful retreat into the intrenchments, leaving standing camp, stores, camp equipage, and the entire station of Cawnpore to the west of the Canal in the hands of the enemy. Our loss was proportionately heavy, and several of our men, and even some officers, fell alive into the hands of the enemy. It was stated in private letters that one of these was forthwith hanged, and a second beaten to death with shoes, and a third tied to a cart-wheel, which in a few successive revolutions crushed him to death. Our camp and stores they burned, and that same evening advancing close to our intrenchment, they took possession of and burned the whole of the cold-weather clothing for our men, which had been stored up at Cawnpore. On the following day the rebels attacked the intrenchment, commencing with a very heavy cannonade from the right and left of their line. Wyndham attempted a sortie, in which, after some hard fighting, the Rifles managed to capture two guns, but our right were driven back with much loss. It was the sound of the firing on this day which reached the ears of Sir Colin Campbell; a messenger at the same time arrived with accounts of the critical state of Wyndham's party. Had the rebels at this time cut the bridge of boats, which affords the only means of communication with Oude, Sir Colin Campbell would have found it a difficult matter to cross the Ganges; but the rebels, not expecting his return, and making sure of Wyndham's force, were probably anxious to avail themselves of the bridge of boats to crush Sir Colin Campbell. At all events they let it remain, and by so doing were lost."

THE NAVY MEN IN ACTION.



The following is from Sir Colin Campbell's account of the attack on Lucknow: "The Shah Nujjeef is a domed mosque with a garden, of which the most had been made by the enemy. The wall of the inclosure of the mosque was loopholed with great care. The entrance to it had been covered by a regular work in masonry, and the top was crowned with a parapet. From this, and from the defenses in the garden, an unceasing fire of musketry was kept up from the commencement of the attack. This position was defended with great resolution against a heavy cannonade of three hours. It was then stormed in the boldest manner by the 93d Highlanders, under Brigadier Hope, supported by a battalion of detachments under Major Barnston, who was, I regret to say, severely wounded; Captain Peel leading up his heavy guns with extraordinary gallantry within a few yards of the building, to batter the massive stone walls. The withering fire of the Highlanders effectually covered the naval brigade from great loss, but it was an action almost unexampled in war. Captain Peel behaved very much as if he had been laying the Shannon alongside an enemy's frigate."

HAVELOCK'S HABITS.

A letter from Calcutta says: "This model of a Christian knight has found that rest which he seldom knew on earth. It may interest your readers to be told that even on such arduous service as the Afghan campaign and the siege of Jellalabad—where he was almost the only officer who supported Broadfoot in maintaining, against the opinions of both Sale and Macgregor, that Jellalabad should be defended and not surrendered—even there Havelock invariably secured two hours in the morning for reading the Scriptures and private prayer. If the march began at six, he rose at four; if at four, he rose at two."

THE CAPITOL AT WASHINGTON, WITH THE NEW EXTENSIONS.

THE NEW HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES, WITH THE MEMBERS IN SESSION.

THE CAPITOL EXTENSION AND NEW HOUSE OF CONGRESS.

We gave some time since a picture of the House of Representatives, at Washington, with two illustrations now present our readers with two illustrations —one representing the Capitol with the new extensions, and the other the new Hall of Representatives with the members in session.

The extension of the Visitor, on approaching the Capitol for the first time, is that of disappointment, from the fact that he beholds it from the west or rear, which is the least attractive point of view. When the city was laid out the Capitol was made the centre, upon which radiated numerous avenues, extending almost to the confines of the "Territory of Columbia;" and as it was presumed that the most thickly-settled portion of the city would be on the hill, the principal facade of the building was placed so as to be most conspicuous to that section. When the present and many succeeding generations shall have passed away; when the vast extent of territory embraced within the boundaries of these United States shall have been filled up with a busy, active, and thriving population; when the city of Washington shall have become, in deed and in truth, the centre of the mightiest nation on earth —then will this no longer be an evil. The majestic eye of the Junior Patriot, looking along the vista of the future, can see the Capitol of the West, where he had hurried the Red man from his lair, teeming with a population numbered by millions, and in luxury on the capital of that great nation which he saw most arise here, as the result of free institutions, as governed by the voice of a people, and his plans were conclusive. It was fortunate for the country that Mr. Walter had the duty of selecting the site and designing the plan; that the partisan spirit which, even then, had its influence upon the councils of Congress did not prevent the interests of the future, and limit that plan by a narrow political policy, which should result in a cause for regret and embarrassment. Experience has proved already the wisdom of his selection, and it is a matter for that many, if not necessity, of the improvements in and about the city, which are now being carried into effect, had already been in the mind—as, for instance, the supplying the city with pure and wholesome water from the Potomac at Little Falls. This was one of the features which probably recommended the site, and the aqueduct now being constructed proves the feasibility of the design.

The Capitol at Washington was commenced in 1793; the corner-stone was laid on the 18th September of that year by President Washington. But little progress was made toward completing the original plans. Accommodation was provided for the national legislature; but the embargo and war supervening, the work was suspended. During the war, as is known, the interior of both wings of the Capitol was destroyed by the British. When Congress met, after the peace, it assembled in a private building provided by the citizens of Washington.

In 1815, Congress made an appropriation for rebuilding the Capitol. The work was placed under the superintendence, first of Mr. Latrobe, and subsequently of Mr. Bulfinch; it was completed in 1825, and cost a sum of $3,000,000.

The old Capitol—as it must now be called—suffered much for want of room for business. Anticipating the progress that measures be actively taken for the enlargement of the Capitol, in 1850 the senior the Committee of Public Buildings was authorized to advertise for plans for the work. Some thirty to forty plans were accordingly submitted. Among these, the one which was preferred by President Fillmore was one from Mr. T. U. Walter, of New York, which obtained the strenuous support of the late Daniel Webster.

Strange to say, after accepting Mr. Anderson's design the President instructed the duty of carrying it into effect to another gentleman, Mr. Walter. The consequence of the extension was laid on the 4th July, 1851, the orator of the day being Daniel Webster, whose oration still lingers in many memories. In 1853 the work was transferred from the Interior to the War Department, and Captain Meigs, of the Engineers, was placed in control. Mr. Walter, the architect, continuing to assist him with his counsels. The number of persons who have thus had the matter in hand has not, as may be imagined, conduced to unity of purpose in carrying out the work; many changes have been made, and experiments attempted, at no slight cost, whether the result will be satisfactory to the public and to the several professional men who have had their will on this direction of the public taste.

The extensions consist of two wing buildings, at the north and south extremities of the present line of the old Capitol, and connected with it by corridors. These buildings are each 192 feet 8 inches by 324 feet, the sides being over three hundred feet in length of front and rear. There are porticos on each face, with magnificent rows of columns and fine architrave. The pediments are to be adorned with statues designed by Crawford, some of which are now being cut in the marble under the direction of the superintendent of the works. We shall take occasion to refer to these extensions again as the work progresses.

The new Hall of Representatives, which has been the subject of so much discussion of late in the press, is in the centre of the front wing of the new extension, south. It is a room 139 feet long, 93 wide, and 36 feet high. The members' desks, which number 200 altogether, are arranged in a semicircle; the reporters have seats behind the Speaker, and spectators are accommodated in a large gallery running round the room, and capable, it is said, of seating 1200 persons. The desks and chairs of members have been got up "regardless of expense." The former are of oak, richly with carvings on the back; the chairs are antique, high-backed affairs, covered with red Morocco.

Two objections have been taken to this new Hall. The first is, that it has no communication with the free air of day. It has no windows. Light penetrates through a stained glass square in the ceiling; over which, at night, gas-burners are lit. The idea of the architect is, that they can ventilate the Hall by pumping fresh air in, and providing an escape for the impure atmosphere which has been breathed by members. But this diving-bell arrangement does not meet with general approval. It is urged that until fresh air, pure from the vault of heaven, can be got into the hall without the intervention of pumps and tubes, cases of paralysis and other evil results frequently among members who are attentive to their duties. Reference is made to the steaming which was made in the new Parliament Houses in London, where the pumping system was quickly abandoned, and the old plan of letting in fresh air by the windows finally adopted. It would seem as though the contrivance of the new Hall had given no much attention to the subject of acoustics that they overlooked the minor matter of sanitary arrangements.

Some critics have cavilled at the profuse and gaudy decorations of the new Hall. It will be perceived, on a hasty glance, that the general painting, save that the wall is laid out in panels—each panel being intended to receive a historical painting in fresco. The mouldings are painted in the brightest colors; and the stained glass in the ceiling, on the same plan, represents the arms of the thirty-one States of the Union. The general effect, says one of the Washington correspondents, is dazzling and meretricious; one is reminded of a fashionable saloon in agay capital, rather than the place of meeting of a deliberative body. One thing for something more in keeping with the gravity of the interests to be adjusted in that room, and the solemnity which ought to pervade the debates of an American Congress. Time, however, will do much toward softening the effects which have critics deplore. A few years will wonderfully mellow the bright colors of the panels and mouldings; the gilding will wear away, and a solemn dun hue will gradually overspread the chamber.

Let us hope that the decision which shall take place in that Hall shall put to shame any mercenaries whose conduct may now provoke the censures of critics; and that the new Chamber may never be disgraced by any deeper stain than a few ill-judged deeds of bright paint.

A MOSLEM WAR-SONG.

BY M'DONALD.

On! the wine
Of the vine
Is a feeble thing
In the battle
Of battle
The true grapes spring.

When on force
Of the horse
The arm flung abroad
Is sweeping
And reaping
The harvest of God.

When the fear
Of the spear
Makes way for its blow;
And the faithless
Lie breathless
The horse-hoofs below.

The wave-crest,
Round the breast,
Tosses ashes all red;
But under
Its thunder
Is dumb to the dead.

The drop
From the top
To the sear leap below;
And deeper
Down steeper
The shields go.

But bright
Is the light
On the true-hearted breaking;
Supernal
Eternal
Beat for embraces
Wait on his waking.

And he hears
In his ears
The voice of the river,
Like a maiden,
Love-laden,
Go wandering over.

Oh! the wine
Of the vine
May lead to the gates;
But the rattle
Of battle
Wakes the angel who waits.

To the lord
Of the sword
Open it must;
The drinker,
The thinker,
Sits in the dust.

He drowns
Of the gleams
Of their garments of white;
He misses
Their kisses,
The maidens of light.

They long
For the strong,
Who has burst through alarms,
Up, by the labor
Of stirrup and sabre,
Up to their arms!

Oh! the wine of the grape is a feeble ghost;
But the wine of the fight is the joy of a host.

THE STORY OF A MAN OF BUSINESS.

I DID not wish to be married. I was content with bachelorism. Before the last word had left each lip I was in the saddle, and, putting the spurs to my horse, I left the town. Only one thought was in my heart, and yet I could not help, even in that mad gallop over the hills, drinking in, throughout sense, my fill of beauty. White and still lay the moonlight over the fields on either side. I could see my whole world, Centaur-like, upon that green sward. Not a breath of air was stirring—it was one of those sultry, dull, and oppressive nights that fall gives us—parts snatched from the necklace of the summer. Pure and white and silent was the world on which I gazed; and I was riding on through its stillness toward the home where the woman I loved best was to die for me.

Involuntarily I slackened my rein as I approached it. This was my old habit, when Lilias had stood on the gate to meet me, and I had passed alittle to look upon her exceeding beauty, and heighten, by a moment's delay, the joy of our first meeting. It was all a delusion, I knew, but I almost thought she stood there now! Under the filacs by the gate it was, or seemed to me, the gleam of a white robe, to catch the outlines of a slight, girlish figure, the light of a face more important than all the world.

Lilias Hunt would stand there never again.

In that upper chamber, on whose windows the moonlight seemed to shine, I knew well that she lay dying. Never again, in all time, would those lights and spring her name from the lips that should I ever the glad echoes of that voice, sweeter and sorrier than all the birds of the forest, as she tripped lightly me into my open paths of love and poesy. How could I go in and look upon her now? I enjoyed my life in the very gateway.

Again that curious sense took possession of me by means of which the mind, utterly absorbed in one great thought, seems, yet, time and the of the minutest particulars of surrounding objects. I have how peaceful and beautiful the old house was, the farm-house, battened and stained by the winds and rains of a whole century of years, looked now, in the white moonlight, like a dream. The trees, weary and gone to sleep. A faint, sweet scent came from the almost hidden hedges of the rose-trees under the door. Along the path leading up to it from the gate were autumn blossoms—asters and dahlias; it could even distinguish their colors.

It might have been five minutes, or five seconds, in which I was in this—I can not tell. Suddenly a voice seemed to say to me:

"Go in there now, you who have killed Lilias! Go in and look upon her before the day. Wipe the death-sweat from her forehead, and ask her to forgive you, and see the gaping where the rich and the poor shall all be alike!"

I turned, but no one was near. There was nothing round me but the stillness of that beautiful night; only, far off, from among a clump of firtrees in a distant corner of the yard, came again the last words of the sentence, sighed out like the low refrain of some tune—sorrowful, yet triumphant:

"Where the rich and the poor shall all be alike."

My horse's head was still, tumultuous thoughts of anguish. I pushed open the gate door, which was already ajar, and went in. Her mother met me at the foot of the stairs, and was weeping, but with a quiet, speechless sorrow upon her worn face, more pitiful than any tears.

"I know the way, Mrs. Hunt; let me go to her alone."

She did not speak—she made a motion for me to proceed. Quick as thought I sped up the stairs, and went within the room where Lilias lay. It was lighted only by the moon-rays. I could see how like herself it looked—pure and aunt, and very, very quiet. I was still alone. I went up to her and would have spoken, but something in her face stopped me. A smile seemed to be of indelible peace. Her dark hair fell heavily over the pillows. Her lips were closed, and one hand lay outstretched upon the counterpane. Trembling I touched it. Oh Heaven! how cold it was. Those fingers that had been warm with all my lightest touch lay like ice in my clasp. O God! was I then too late! Is all the anguish of that wild night-ride this worst fear had ever come to me.

No need now to rain repentant tears—to press throbbing temples that mutely beat brow; and yet the tears fell, and the kisses—will enough almost to have awakened from the long sleep of death her who had so loved me—were dropped upon that forehead; and yet she stirred not. Clutched and broken was my life's anguish in my hand; cold and still and the great Gardener had only lifted her up to bloom forever in the fields of the upper country! But I avalked me to know how to know that I was gone where the world's cold touch could never again chill her. I could have prayed for her then my life but to have seen those pale lips unclose for one moment—but to have heard her voice my just once, "Harry, I forgive you!"

I loved Lilias Hunt. Standing this moonlight night—just such a night as that on which years and years ago—standing in memory by that death-bed, I tell you I loved her as I never loved another—as man seldom loves woman. And yet my cruelty broke her heart. God forgive me!—I can never forgive myself.

She and I were children together. Both our parents were poor. We had walked to school through the same fields in summer, and in winter I had drawn her upon my little sled. When she grew up to innocent and beautiful maidenhood the love of our childhood had strengthened with our years. I used to think of the dead woman who was crown my life. A purer creature never walked forth under the light of heaven; a more beautiful woman, I think, God never created. Lilias Hunt, in her glad, innocent youth. I loved her, but I never asked her to be my wife. Not as I am, I never could have broken my plighted troth. My parents had contrived, by severe toil and strict economy, to assist me in obtaining a very good education, and at twenty I left home to study law in one of the most eminent offices in the neighboring county. My parting with Lilias was playful, and yet, in my heart, was the bitterness of pain that I was not undergone. I had resolved not to tell her my love, and yet it seemed almost impossible to leave her without. "And I shall be able to come back at her half—a keepsake for the memory of the old playmate-days." I said, when the matter was suggested, and then she said, in a laughing tone, assumed—as I knew it was—to conceal deeper feeling:

"And now, Harry Morsfield, you have been one of your own lowns curb, just by way of retaliation. What a year you will be away! Why, it is a year, for I shall take the very prettiest one, and you'll miss it in your morning devotions before the mirror!"

I attempted laughingly to bar illustration of the her fickleness, and I went away with her tress of hair lying close to my heart. I have been looking at it to-day. It is dark, and soft, and shining as ever, though the white brow round which it used to cluster is cold as marble, and has been for twenty years under the daisies of the church-yard.

When I left Mayfield that evening, I thought my sorrow, a lover's hopes lay warm and strong at my heart. I was young, vigorous, and possessed a full share of talent. I was sure of success. Hope whispered. I would win a name and a position, and then I would return and claim my beautiful Lilias. All my struggles should be ennobled by her memory—should have her for their reward.

Years passed. I made my successful strides. I think Judge Wentworth was pleased with me. He went to visit me that day Lilias was buried, if I could but hold out as I had begun. I have told you that I was poor. I had neither time nor money to spare from my profession to go to Mayfield. I had resolved to remain six months in Windham before paying home, and I kept my word. The reason was I did not allow myself the luxury of writing to Lilias. It would not be right, I thought, until I could ask her to be my wife. She had waited and said she loved me; but I had seen her cheek flush and her eyes sparkle at my coming, and I was sure that I could trust her. I was contented to wait.

Three months of my absence had passed away, and I received a letter from Lilias. It was short, and to me.

"You have heard of my niece, Clara Burton? Mrs. Wentworth and Judge Wentworth have in an adopted daughter. She has taken the place of our own children, when God saw fit to take away. He has loved me, and has been to visit every year come here; but this morning we expect her back, and I want you to meet us at tea-table, and make her acquaintance. There is very little society here at all suited to her taste, but you and she will have much in common."

I had heard, through other sources, of Judge Wentworth's orphan niece, her pet pride, her wealth, her rare beauty. I could hardly expect to be received into her society on a footing of equality, but I had no intention to cast my fate in the heart of her, however, had not prepared me for the vision which greeted me when I entered the Judge's parlor.

Among all the women I have ever met I have never seen one like Clara Burton. Lilias Hunt was quite as beautiful; but between them was a difference, not unlike that which exists between a wild rose, hanging fair and fragrant and wet with dew upon its parent stem, and some regal blossom of the tropics, lifting its head proudly and haughtily under the fiery beams of southern suns, and filling the air with a fragrance subtle, intoxicating, dangerous. I was still for a moment under the too forgetful of courtesy and propriety, and looked at her.

She was a woman not much more than twenty, but her form was full, mature, regal. She was above the medium height, and yet not above it. She wore a plain white dress, with no ornaments save a band of black velvet around her throat, and each rounded arm, a bunch of crimson roses upon her bosom, and another drooping low in her jetblack hair. Her forehead was low and broad, with the black, shining hair waving away from it, and gathered behind in a mass of curls at the back of her neck. Her complexion was a clear, dark olive, with a rich crimson tint that came and went in the face. Her mouth was small and well proud. Her face indicated a strong and positive will, and her eyes—large, dark, and full—were flashing fire and power. Nothing, I regret, could have been more unlike Lilias. In cultivating the acquaintance of this daughter Lilias I could apprehend no danger to my heart.

I was not deceived me exceedingly. Her conversation was brilliant beyond any thing I had ever before listened to; her thoughts were fresh and original, and she conversed most of them for me wisdom exerting herself to talk much with others—a habit common to all, but to many a vanity is ever insensible.

I thought of the events that followed, in one blind, dizzy whirl, my first introduction to Clara Burton, as to incomprehensible, even to myself, that I should be ever making love to the daughter of a loved Lilias Hunt—God knows I loved her!—and yet—but I will not anticipate.

I had not known Miss Burton long before I discovered—how, I can not to this day tell, for she never descended for one moment from the pedestal of her own dignity—that she loved me, and was resolved to be my wife. I was flattered by her preference, as, I think, any man would have been; but for a long while every beat of my heart was faithful to Lilias. I, as I said, daily invited the Judge's on, one pretext or another. Sometimes it was a book I was to bring; a song I was to practice with Clara; a rare flower I was to examine; and sometimes I went because it had become my habit to go, and I was lonely away. After a time I began to listen to the voice of ambition. I was proud and poor. Next to love, ambition was the regnant passion of my nature; for a time it overpowered even love itself. I had known what poverty was. From my childhood it had stung me, crushing out warmth and light from my life. If I married Lilias we must both suffer its stings together. Our children must grow up to struggle with it as I had done. No leisure for the æsthetic part of life; no means to surround one's self with works of art, choice books, rare pictures. And in return for these privations what should I have? A low, soft voice, like Lilias Hunt's own, spoke in my heart, and answered—"Love;" but the tones of ambition hushed it into silence. Tauntingly, they said to me:

"You have seen love and poverty in the home of your childhood. Did love make poverty less grim? Did it keep your mother's eye bright and her cheek young? Did it shed a silken lustre over her faded calico gown? Marry your pale, fair Lilias, if you will, and see her eyes grow dim with care, her hands grow coarse, her slender figure bowed and thin; and then look into those eyes and try to recall the bright young Lilias of your love till your tears come, at the very contrast. Or, marry Clara Barton; be Judge Wentworth's partner and adopted son; be the husband of a wife, rich not only, but cultivated, graceful, accomplished, fairer than any of the houris in Paradise—loving you, too, with all the might of her tropical heart. Leave Lilias in maiden peace. You do not know that she loves you—you have never asked her—and by-and-by some other will woo and win her, one rich enough to set worthily the gem of her bright young beauty—to make her happier than you ever could."

Alas! even then the thought that any other should ever make the happiness of Lilias Hunt smote my heart with a sudden, deathly pang. To stifle it I went out of the house—it was an afternoon in the late summer—and walked hurriedly toward Judge Wentworth's. I had no purpose in this visit, beyond the wish to divert my mind from unwelcome thoughts; and yet it must have been fate or Providence which led my steps there at that hour. I pushed open the door without knocking, as was my habit since I had become such a familiar visitor, and went into the parlor. Clara Barton was its only occupant. She raised her head from the arm of the sofa as I went toward her. She had been weeping. A bright red spot burned on either cheek, and round, shining tears still glittered upon her heavy lashes. Her eyes flashed, and her voice was full of pride and passion.

"I did not want to see you, Mr. Lincoln. You had no right—you of all others—to come stealing upon me thus—to surprise me in my weakness."

Was it I, or some demon voice within me, which answered her? In that hour my soul fell from its high estate. I sat down beside her, and put my arm around her. I said,

"Give me the right—me of all others—Clara, to share all your sorrows—to shield you from grief, as far as in me lies, through the whole of our two lives."

I had crossed the Rubicon. There was no longer any room for repentance, though I might seek it ever so wildly, with tears and anguish.

Her answer was a burst of passionate tears. That proud head sank upon my shoulder—that little hand, flashing with jewels, was laid in mine—and, almost before I knew it, I was betrothed to Clara Barton. And yet never had my love for Lilias surged in my heart more wildly than in this very moment, when I had raised up between us an invincible barrier forever! I saw her then as I had seen her last, standing in the shadow of the lilacs at the farm-house gate, her tender eyes sad and misty with the sorrow of parting; her sweet, pale face uplifted to the summer sky. But she was my Lilias no longer, even in hope. Forever and forever must roll between us the inexorable tide of a destiny of my own creating. Ah, I wonder if Clara Barton felt the passionate beats of the heart against which her head was resting, and thought they were for her!

Well, in three months more I was a married man. I never knew exactly how this happened. I certainly had not expected it myself. I think it all originated with Clara, whose influence with the Judge was unbounded. At all events he sounded me on the subject, and gave the plan his warmest approbation. He did not believe in long engagements, he said; Clara's fortune would be enough for us both; I might as well be married, and continue my studies afterward. And so, one warm November day, I walked up the church aisle with a stately figure, robed in bridal satin, upon my arm, and went out again—a husband. I wonder if there was a single hour of real happiness in the winter which followed? I had striven to cast the memory of Lilias Hunt out of my heart, and sometimes, with my wife's superb head lying upon my breast, looking into her matchless eyes, toying with her magnificent hair, I cheated myself into believing that I was happy. My ambition was satisfied; my taste for wealth and splendor was fully gratified; I was no longer the poor student, with his uncertain way to work out alone. Rich and influential friends were around me; power and fortune were in my grasp; and for these things I had given up love and Lilias.

I think Clara loved me truly, but it was with a passion like her nature, self-willed and imperious. She had little in her character of self-abnegation or silent fortitude.

I did not carry her to Mayfield until the next spring. My parents did not rejoice in my good fortune as earnestly as I had expected. In especial, I could see something of disappointment in my mother. I think she had suspected my love for Lilias Hunt, and she would have far rather seen me married to a gentle, loving woman in my own rank in life than the possessor of Clara Barton's fortune. Still she received my wife lovingly, for my sake; but I could see that my humble home was but a dull place for Clara, and I determined to cut our visit short.

The day before we left I was driving through the town in my own luxurious carriage, with my wife beside me. Going slowly along a well-known road, I met Lilias Hunt and her father, face to face. They, too, were riding in their humble, old-fashioned wagon; and as they slowly drew near I could see them distinctly. O God, that white, white face! Was that my Lilias? As she saw me she crimsoned to her very temples, and then turned pale as death. Slowly I saw her beautiful head sink and sink, till she lay, like one dead, across her trembling old father's knees. I would have given all the world but to have snatched that fair head to my bosom—to have covered that pale brow with my kisses; but I was a slave, as is every man or woman who sells heart and hand for wealth and a name. I drove on, and left Lilias Hunt lying there in her father's arms, without one word.

"Poor thing, I should think she had the consumption!" said my wife, carelessly, as we passed along. "Do you know her, Harry?"

I do not think the finest alchemy of even the most jealous love could have detected any change in my voice as I answered,

"I used to; her name is Hunt."

The next day we left Mayfield. Oh, how glad I was to go back to business—to drown, or strive to drown, in the great turbulent battle of life, one weak woman's voice, whose tones must haunt me forever; to bury myself in study, closing doors and windows, and shut out the gleam of one pale, still face. And yet there were hours when memory was omnipotent—when I looked on my wife's proud beauty, or listened to her words as one in a dream—and my heart kept its sorrowful tryst beside the lilac-trees with Lilias Hunt. All that summer I never heard from her, except that once this brief sentence, in the postscript to one of my mother's letters, filled my heart with a wild, vague sense of dread—

"Lilias Hunt is very feeble, and they doubt if she will ever recover."

It was the late autumn before I again visited Mayfield. This time my wife did not accompany me. The old farm-house was never much to her taste, and I was willing enough to leave her behind.

Almost my first inquiry was for Lilias Hunt. I was told that for some time she had been considered in a decline, but, my mother added, she thought her malady was of the heart rather than the flesh. I had been home only three days when the messenger came who told me she was dying. She had heard of my presence in the village—she wanted to see me.

I have told you of my mad night-ride over the hills, and how, when I stood by her bedside, it was too late. I could only kneel beside her, and rain my repentant tears on eyes that would not open—pour out my agonized prayers for forgiveness to ears that would never again listen. And yet sometimes I think that she heard me, even then, my dead Lilias; that from heaven she has forgiven me, and is waiting on the other side of the river for my coming. God knows!

When they robed her for the burial, her mother found, lying upon her innocent heart, a locket such as her small means could purchase, containing the curl she had severed from my head the last time I ever heard her voice. They left it there.

Twenty years have passed since then. Honor and fame have come to me. My stately, fashionable wife has walked or sat by my side. Merry children have sported round my knee, and grown up to manhood and womanhood; but Lilias has slept on through the years very quietly, with willows waving above her grave, and my hair lying still upon her virgin breast. Ah, I have sometimes thought they buried my heart with it!

MY YANKEE MAID.

I WOULD not give a fig, I swear,
For all the goddesses that share
That spot—that's neither here nor there—
Baptized the Olympian Hill!
Venus, I fear, would be untrue,
The learned Pallas is too blue,
And Juno's known to be a shrew—
An awful bitter pill.

Psyche, pretty butterfly,
Might feel inclined her wings to try—
Besides, she's Cupid in her eye;
The Muses are too bold.
Diana's awful chastity
Would make a dozen men like me,
Who dread Actæon's antlers, flee;
While Hecate is too old.

But give to me my Yankee maid,
In spotless dimity arrayed,
A flower that blooms in woodland shade,
Which I as gardener tend.
Her breath as pure as morning breeze
That, jocund, threads the trembling trees,
Her eyes as blue as summer seas
Where summer sunbeams blend.

I can not sing as Ovid sung,
My harp with rustic cords is strung;
No Hyblæan honey on my tongue
Was dropped by Plato's bees.
But I can chant a simple lay
To please myself, as well as they;
A carol caught from June and May,
And learned beneath the trees.

Oh! I can sing the summer days,
When in New England's woodland ways
We wandered 'til the sun's red haze
Came slanting through the boughs;
How, listening to the cat-bird's note,
And to the oriole's honeyed throat,
And the soft low from fields remote
Sent up by milking cows;

How, while one loving arm embraced
The roundness of her willing waist,
The other hand with hers enlaced,
And cheeks that almost met,
We walked and talked, while rolled the time
As softly as an antique rhyme
To which our hearts beat gentle chime,
Love's passionate duet!

Ah! poets sing Athenian girls
With gold cicalas in their curls,
And eyes like stars, and teeth like pearls,
And necks like Parian stone;
As far as I'm concerned, they may
Forever by Illyssus stay,
Until their braided locks are gray,
And all their charms are flown.

For have I not my Yankee maid,
The bud that blooms in woodland shade,
In spotless dimity arrayed,
To vie with Athens' best?
Ah! had I but the lore to speak
About her to you in the Greek,
You'd find new roses on her cheek,
New beauties on her breast!

SENT TO COVENTRY.

If I could bring myself to make the Atlantic transit, and spend a week in getting rid of the dismal breakfasts one gets in ships, it would be to see Coventry. My journey thither is not deferred that I may be sent abroad by the Government at Washington. Sanders and Sickles, Buchanan, Carey Jones, Abbott Lawrence, Hannegan, and Bancroft have been embassadors. I would not join that company. Coventry is the oldest kingdom I read of since Livy—the good old Livy, who wisely wrote history up to the traditions of his time, crystallizing in purest Latin those kindly Latian dreams. With mean actualities, which are no more history than Tammany Hall is the American Republic, he did not seek to mar his clear pages. Those he left to be excavated in after times by old Niebuhrian moles, digging in the earth like the hoarse, unquiet, disembodied father of Hamlet. I would that Livy, instead of Cæsar, had crossed over to Britain. Then might we have had a worthy history of Coventry. Of Washington, we who have lived near his time have accounts written in the Livian vein. They gift us with the people's Washington. Time will come when German critics, and critics who are neither German nor American, epicene Dryasdusts, will write down, asses as they are, that Washington was wont to swear like a pirate on no greater occasions than when there was brought for his riding a horse each particular hair of which did not avouch the nicest grooming. Sparks excised the recorded oaths; in certain quarters he got many curses thereby. Why, forsooth, two men now gone, whose loss American scholarship mourns, each of whom has prepared biographies of the Father of his Country, asserted to me that Washington was an arrant fortune-hunter—seeking, they said, the hand of the richest woman in all the colonies, and when he failed to win Mary Phillipse, marrying Martha Dandridge, the richest woman of her time in the South—but they would not speak of it in their histories. It was a wise reticence. Does any one doubt that Zachary Taylor is in heaven? Killed he was by four bareheaded hours in a July sun, then a surfeit of cherries and milk, and the Galphin swindle on the head of that. Yet Daniel Webster—high authority for some mousing marplot biographer—affirmed that Taylor was nothing more than "a swearing frontier colonel." At the time of that speaking the Philadelphia nomination was pending. In heaven, as he is, the honest old general will be called to testify at the grand assize, which should not much longer be deferred, touching the Treasury robbing at Washington. His rough phrase will not detract from the force of his testimony; though he may know less than some of the subject-matter, to what he does know he will be swift to swear. Names of more comprehensive deponents I could suggest.

Some Niebuhr of narrower bore has undertaken to argue of that oft-quoted speech, "sent to Coventry." He locates it in the day of Charles the First—"holy martyr of blessed memory," as my Oxford prayer-book styles him—and thus he states his threadbare hypothesis: "Coventry was a stronghold of the Puritans at the commencement of their troubles. Many of the despised sect in the neighboring country resorted there." (Despised sect! Did you see the Manhattan Puritans swell at their 22d of December dinner at the Astor House the other day? Despised sect, indeed!) And then our scholiast goes to quote Baxter, the same whose Call to the Unconverted is yet a volume read, and moreover may yet reach the Tribune people, and, for aught we know, bring to grace some others in Nassau Street. I will not mention William Street and Wall in this connection. With a writer too sanguine, older and graver readers are ill at ease. Baxter says in this behalf: "They that fain would have lived quietly at home were forced (by the Royalists) to be gone, and to Coventry they came." And thus our Scaliger finds the origin of the phrase, "Sent to Coventry," from the Puritans! Was ever any thing more awry?

"'Twould move my mirth—"

as that magnificent dialogue we used to learn out of "The American Preceptor" has it—

"'Twould move my mirth at any other time;
But now trifling's out of tune."

I will examine the premises gravely.

Did the Puritans ever hand down a slang phrase or catchword? Did they ever have one? Could they bring themselves to speak one, if perchance their memory retained it when sounded by unregenerate voice in their presence? Imagine one of the Pilgrim Fathers uttering, "I acknowledge the corn." Who could believe that one of those grave men, seeing a brother in abbreviated skirts, would pronounce him a "Shanghai?" Lawyers like to beat an adversary on his own ground—as it were an ass well smitten with his own jawbone. So we refute our commentator on his own case. In all my reading, careful and continuous, of the doings of the Fathers (Pilgrim), and the record thereof, I have found no slang phrase. Nearest is what occurs in the account of the earliest trading voyage from Plymouth, a corn-exporting venture. In 1626, the Fathers harvested more maize than sufficed for the season's use. With an itching for traffic, which unfortunately has not passed down to their descendants, they cast about for a market for their overplus of corn. It was shipped on board a shallop, and they sailed for the Penobscot to trade it off for furs. "But though they had a ship," says the historian, "they had no sailors; whereupon the old Stand-bys" (meaning the principal men of the colony) "were constrained to go the voyage; and they slept on the deck, as the vessel below was filled with corn. It was tempestuous; but they returned in safety, and made good trade in the parts to the eastward." Imagine for yourself the aspect of those stern sailor-Pilgrim corn-exporting farmer Fathers, with long icicles on nose that precluded audible prayer, a tough northeaster blowing down from Labrador! "Stand-bys" is the nearest to slang that can be traced to Puritan mouth or pen. That people did not preserve or record catch phrases and cant terms. Royalties, skittle-grounds, courts, universities, camps, race-courses, inns of the Temple, court-jesters, tournaments, easy-going parsons—these are the soils in which slang thrives. If there is a cant of the conventicle, it is a heavenward cant, and nothing like these ungodly I have just enumerated.

Besides, if I may descend to verbal criticism, belaboring the topic etymologically, I should straightway show that "Sent to Coventry" could not be born of the Baxterian phrase. He says, "And to Coventry they came." Of course they did. Nobody sent them. They came, of themselves—came with their own beasts of burden, and brought omnia catalla, their goods and chattels with them. They all owned horses. They were never sent. They came to Coventry as they came to Plymouth, paid their own bills, and no doubt increased their substance by their industry and frugality while they dwelt in that city. Coventry was a place in which thrifty men might profit.

And this last consideration brings me to the main intent of this present writing.

I shall proceed to show that Coventry was a kingdom in its palmy days. Embassadors were sent thither from foreign courts.

The proofs that Coventry was an independent kingdom in its prime are not, you say, found in the writings of the English historians. Grant they are not. Pray, in what books of Egyptian record do you find the history of Thebes?—and was not Thebes a kingdom? What Syrian historian mentions the kingdom of Troy?—and was Priam not a King? Perhaps not. By-the-way, where would the history of Troy have been had not some gloriou fellow, who lived long after Homer's time, compile and edited the blind old bard's song? Who shal say that, long after Lingard, Hume, and Smollet shall have been forgotten, and when shall hav gleamed no more the veneer of bright words whic Macaulay has glued upon English facts—who shal say that some traveler from New Zealand, takin his stand on the half submerged wheel-house of sunken Peck-slip ferry-boat to sketch the ruins o Pearl Street (after the widening), may not stumbl on this very Number of Harper's Weekly, and restore to the world the proof that Coventry was sovereign realm once on the North Sea's strand.

Thebes had a hundred gates. Where is the proo that it had? Why, besides that the fact is mentioned in a speech of Counselor Phillips, confessed ly the Richard Busteed of his time, Homer als calls it the "hundred-gated city." Well, Coventr had, on towers and churches, a hundred city-clock which struck the hours. Godiva, it will be remem bered, rode forth at noon. Thus the poet record the hour:

"The shameless noon was clashed and hammered fro a hundred towers."

Is it any more likely that Tennyson should hav misstated the number of clocks in Coventry tha Homer the number of gates of Thebes?

It is allowed by common prose historians th Coventry was surrounded by a strong wall and ha twelve gates. These were larger than those Thebes. This last-named city, built upon the de imal plan, had a hundred gates—ten times ten comparatively small, but yet substantial gate Coventry was constructed externally upon t duodecimal scale and had twelve gates, very lar ones. New Yorkers think that the spire of Trinit 264 feet high, is a very tall one. (Here I beg disclaim that I shall contend that there was a Wall Street in Coventry. All writers deny tha Trinity Church, in Coventry, is only 237 feet hig But St. Michael's Church there—a comparative modern structure in the lighter Gothic style—h a spire which lifts 363 feet. St. John's Chur in the same city, built as late as the time of Edwa III., need not be mentioned in this connection. T town is now lighted with gas, and the inhabita are supplied with water by the corporation wat works. It is the greatest ribbon emporium in E gland, and yearly more watches are made th than in London.

But these are facts for statistical people. I t them over to the industrious Fellows of the Am can Geographical Society.

Where does the world get that term, "t blue," eloquent of good faith? From Covent The Gazetteer says: "Coventry was celebrated its cloth caps and bonnets as early as the sixtee century, and also for a kind of blue thread ca 'Coventry true blue.'"

Coventry was a kingdom dwelt in by honest

ple. The story of Queen Godiva shows this. I will cite incidents thereof to the point. The King of Coventry had proclaimed some regulation, after the fashion of his government, of which the people very strenuously complained. Honest citizens often complain of, and sometimes abrogate, rules, which, duly tried, would be found to be wholesome. The King turned a deaf ear to their expostulations, satisfied, no doubt, that the law objected to was salutary. As he was despotic in his government—by-the-way, some contend that a wise despotism is the best form of human rule—he insisted on continuing his edict in force. At length his wife, the gentle Godiva, moved by the anxiety of the people, prayed the King to give way and abolish the law that seemed to bear so hard. Seeing him still resolute, she fell upon her knees and besought him fervently to change his will; nor were her tears wanting. At heart willing to indulge his wife and yield, he seized the occasion to prove to their subjects that his queen was their sincere friend, willing to make any sacrifice for their welfare. He therefore signalized his compliance by adding the condition which has been told by writers innumerable. It was indeed a hard stipulation—that she, the queen of that fair realm, should, on horseback, at high noon, ride naked through the great thoroughfare—the long Broadway—of Coventry. In a good cause she did not hesitate. Giving orders that at the hour fixed none of the people should be abroad, that all should be within their homes, and look not forth from chink or casement, she mounted her palfrey and rode through the town, girt alone in the invisible robe of wifely chastity. The honest people of her realm heeded her request. One scamp alone, an embassador just then accredited to the court at Coventry, the Baron Tom, peeped through a loop-hole as she passed, to the disgrace of his name, his office, and his manhood. How his sight was blasted before it fell upon the fair form that Innocence and Honor shielded is known to all the world. She dismounted at her palace door, the decree was annulled, and Coventry was happy. We are not informed that diplomatic intercourse was broken off with the power which Baron Tom represented; but, like Crampton, he departed; poor, sightless plenipotentiary (Tom, not Crampton), he groped his dishonorable way from the walls of Coventry, and his name is a by-word even to this day. His effigy is found here and there on low ale-house signs.

The intelligent reader will have concluded that Coventry, with a court and people so frank and honorable, was but a sorry place for the courtiers of other courts. It was no atmosphere for the trade of diplomacy. What is the function of an embassador? One of the ablest of the craft has described an envoy to be "a gentleman who lies abroad for the good of his own country." In a truthful place like Coventry, how uncomfortable must have been these wily liars whom their sovereigns severally sentenced thither! What Siberia with its cold is to the courtiers of the Czar, Coventry with its honesty was to the courtiers of the contemporary courts. When a king desired to punish an eminent subject whom he would not openly disgrace, he sent him to Coventry—as embassador. The dread of being elected to this mission kept many a paltering fellow faithful to his king. The reader will now have seen how it came to be a by-word that one was "sent to Coventry."

Miscellany.

LITTLE BY LITTLE.

"Little by little," an acorn said,
As it slowly sank in its mossy bed;
"I am improving every day,
Hidden deep in the earth away."
Little by little each day it grew;
Little by little it sipped the dew;
Downward it sent out a thread-like root;
Up in the air sprung a tiny shoot.
Day after day, and year after year,
Little by little, the leaves appear;
And the slender branches spread far and wide,
Till the mighty oak is the forest's pride.

Far down in the depths of the dark blue sea
An insect train work ceaselessly;
Grain by grain, they are building well,
Each one alone in its little cell.
Moment by moment, and day by day,
Never stopping to rest or to play.
Rocks upon rocks they are rearing high,
Till the top looks out on the sunny sky;
The gentle wind and the balmy air,
Little by little, bring verdure there;
Till the summer sunbeams gayly smile
On the buds and flowers of the coral isle.

"Little by little," said a thoughtful boy,
"Moment by moment, I'll well employ,
Learning a little every day,
And not spending all my time in play.
And still this rule in my mind shall dwell,
'Whatever I do, I will do it well.'
Little by little, I'll learn to know
The treasured wisdom of long ago;
And one of these days perhaps we'll see
That the world will be the better for me."
And do not you think that this simple plan
Made him a wise and a useful man?

DOMESTIC ETIQUETTE.

A carelessness of speech is a fertile source of estrangement in married people. Now, it is too much the fashion in all households to have a domestic colloquy, very different in its tone and carefulness to that in use with strangers. The very best of us, it is feared, are too prone to this; but, from wives to husbands, and the reverse, matrimony seems certainly to possess the chemical property of converting sweets into acids in no time. Short answers—foe the direst of domestic happiness—or else no answers at all; no conversation for his leisure for whom, once on a time, you carefully brushed up all your stores of knowledge; and an utter oblivion of the personal politeness which most well-conducted people think due to a stranger. Pity such things are kept, like your choicest preserves and bonnes bouches, merely for strangers. None can place too much value on domestic warmth of politeness, unmixed, of course, with hypocrisy or shallow words. Kindness might be a better word, perhaps, for what is meant; for where there are kind hearts there is almost sure to be a certain suavity of manner. But this etiquette of the heart you keep, like your best clothes, for company; never thinking that everyday use is your true polish, not merely for the baser metals, but even to keep bright gold itself.

Regard these things in a higher light than as mere everyday trifles; for home, domestic love, joy, happiness—all hang on a series of well-directed trifles, and small is her chance of happiness who sees fit to neglect or overlook them entirely.

THE SECRET OF LONGEVITY.

The means known, so far, of promoting longevity, have been usually concentrated in short, pithy sayings, as, "Keep your head cool and your feet warm;" "Work much, and eat little," etc.; just as if the whole science of human life could be summed up and brought out in a few words, while its greatest principles were kept out of sight. One of the best of these sayings is given by an Italian in his 116th year, who, being asked the means of his living so long, replied with that improvisation for which his country is remarkable:

"When hungry, of the best I eat,
And dry and warm I keep my feet;
I screen my head from sun and rain,
And let few cares perplex my brain."

The following is about the best theory of the matter: Every man is born with a certain stock of vitality, which can not be increased, but may be husbanded. With this stock he may live fast or slow—may live extensively or intensively—may draw his little amount of life over a large space, or narrow it into a concentrated one; but when his stock is exhausted, he has no more. He who lives extensively—who drinks pure water, avoids all inflammatory diseases, exercises sufficiently, but not too laboriously, indulges no exhausting passions, feeds on no exciting material, pursues no debilitating pleasures, avoids all laborious and protracted study, preserves an easy mind, and thus husbands his quantum of vitality—will live considerably longer than he otherwise would do, because he lives slow; while he, on the other hand, who lives intensively—who beverages himself on liquors and wines, exposes himself to inflammatory diseases, labors beyond his strength, visits exciting scenes, and indulges exhausting passions, lives on stimulating and highly seasoned food—is always debilitated by his pleasures.

INDUSTRY ITS OWN REWARD.

Any thing we make up our minds to do we can do. There is nothing impossible to be done by determined, persevering effort, and nothing of importance can be accomplished without it. It was labor that built the pyramids; by labor the arts and sciences were brought to their present state of perfection; and labor is necessary for the health and happiness of all. Industry is the law of our being, and we are so constituted that when the law is fully recognized it brings its own reward. Bodily labor is not the only kind that is necessary—mind and body should be exercised. In this way cheerfulness and contentment are promoted, and we are prepared to fill with honor any station assigned us by Providence. We often regard the doom pronounced on man, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," a curse; but it is really a blessing, for we find that all rational enjoyment follows in the train of industrious labor, whether physical or mental.

CHARACTER IS ESSENTIAL TO HAPPINESS.

Without a good character happiness is never known. All that exalts, ennobles, embellishes, and dignifies humanity is blended in the beauty and the glory of a truly genuine character.

All the treasures of ten thousand worlds will not compare in value with one pure heart for the production of all that is satisfying and blessed. They will not purchase peace, nor joy, nor sacred rest, nor the sweet tranquillity of an unsullied conscience, nor one single moment's real bliss. They can never be exchanged for those golden-gloried virtues that blossom all over a good character, like the blossoms on a thick bed of roses, and which are as rich in the sweet incense that the heart loves most as the flowers are in refreshing fragrance.

The youth who places a proper estimate upon a good character has learned a lesson that is more valuable to him than any thing else possibly can be. He has learned the source of his purest joys.

But the happiness and blessedness of a good character are not confined to the sunny chambers of its possessor. Character is catching. If one has a good character, he gives something of its goodness to all with whom he associates. If his heart is radiant with the light of virtue, that light gets out, and shines in upon the hearts of others. He can scarcely look at another without impressing some mark of his own character on the heart of the one upon whom he gazes. A man's face is almost always radiant with the light of his true character. Character, like murder, will out. It can not long be concealed. You might as well attempt to chain the lightnings in the black caverns of the surcharged cloud, or put a hood over the great bright face of the sun, as to lock up a man's character from the sight of his fellows. God never designed that it should be. Character was made to be seen. It is the government of the soul: put on, not only for the comfort and convenience of the wearer, but for the pleasure of other people's eyes. It is not worn for self alone, for that would be mean, but for all by whom it is surrounded.

THE FORTUNES OF THE ANCIENTS.

Crœsus possessed, in landed property, a fortune equal to £1,700,000, besides a large amount of money, slaves, and furniture, which amounted to an equal sum. He used to say that a citizen who had not a sufficient sum to support an army, or a legion, did not deserve the title of a rich man. The philosopher Seneca had a fortune of £3,500,000. Tiberius, at his death, left £23,624,000, which Caligula spent in less than twelve months. Vespasian, on ascending the throne, estimated all the expenses of the state at £35,000,000. The debts of Milo amounted to £600,000. Cæsar, before he entered upon any office, owed £2,995,000. He had purchased the friendship of Curio for £500, and that of Lucius Paulus for £300,000. At the time of the assassination of Julius Cæsar, Antony was in debt to the amount of £3,000,000; he owed this sum on the ides of March, and it was paid by the kalends of April; he squandered £147,000,000. Appius squandered in debauchery £500,000, and finding, on examination of the state of his affairs, that he only had £80,000, poisoned himself, because he considered that sum insufficient for his maintenance. Julius Cæsar gave Satulla, the mother of Brutus, a pearl of the value of £10,000. Cleopatra, at an entertainment she gave to Antony, dissolved in vinegar a pearl worth £80,000, and he swallowed it. Clodius, the son of Esopus, the comedian, swallowed one worth £8000. One single dish cost Esopus £80,000. Caligula spent for one supper £80,000, and Heliogabalus £20,000. The usual cost for a repast for Lucullus was £20,000; the fish from his fish-ponds were sold for £35,000.

THE HANDS.

One of the most common signs of want of breeding is a sort of uncomfortable consciousness of the hands, an obvious ignorance of what to do with them, and a painful awkwardness in their adjustment. The hands of a gentleman seem perfectly at home without being occupied; they are habituated to the dolce far niente, or if they spontaneously move, it is attractively. Some of Queen Elizabeth's courtiers made playing with their sword-hilt an accomplishment, and the most efficient weapon of the Spanish coquette is her fan. Strength in the fingers is a sure token of mental aptitude. When Mutius burned his hand off before the eyes of his captor, he gave the most indubitable proof we can imagine of fortitude; and it was natural that, amidst the ferocious bravery of feudal times, a bloody hand in the centre of an escutcheon should become the badge of a baronet of England.

HANDWRITING.

Lord Chesterfield says that every man who has the use of his eyes and his right hand can write whatever hand he pleases. This is hardly true. Handwriting indicates character, and corresponds with it; and however great our powers of imitation, we must always possess more or less strongly marked individual traits. It is no more to be expected or desired that we all shall write alike than that we all shall look alike or act alike. But it is true that every one, with the use of eyes and hand, may write well—write a free, regular, and graceful hand—write legibly, at all events.

If you write a cramped, irregular, and illegible hand, the sooner you set about reforming it the better. Go to some good teacher of penmanship, if one can be found in your neighborhood, and take a few lessons, with the strong resolution to improve; but if no teacher is at hand, never mind, set about the task without one. All difficulties will vanish before resolute effort. Try it and see. Form your letters clearly, distinctly, symmetrically, and with a uniform slope or angle, and make your lines straight and even, and your manuscript will look well and be easily read. The more graceful the curves, and the smoother the lines, the better; but these last qualities are not essential.

THE OLD AND NEW RECEPTION OF BOOKS.

"In times of old," says Coleridge, in his "Biographia Literaria," "books were as religious oracles. As literature advanced, they next became venerable preceptors; they then descended to the rank of instructive friends; and as their numbers increased they sank still lower, to that of entertaining companions; and at present they seem degraded into culprits, to hold up their hands at the bar of every self-elected, yet not the less peremptory judge who chooses to write from humor or interest, from enmity or arrogance, and to abide the decision (in the words of Jeremy Taylor) of him that reads in malice or him that reads after dinner."

NIGHT AND DEATH.

One of the noblest sonnets in the English language is that written by Joseph Blanco White on the analogy of Night and Death, in which, by a sudden revelation which has the highest effect of wit, a usually dark and discouraging theme is turned into the highest exaltation. Once read, it can never be forgotten for its sublime consolation:

Mysterious night! when the first man but knew
Thee by report, unseen, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperus, with the host of heaven, came,
And lo! creation widen'd on his view.
Who could have thought what darkness lay conceal'd
Within thy beams, O Sun? or who could find,
While fly, and leaf, and insect stood reveal'd,
That to such endless orbs thou mak'st us blind?
Weak man! why, to shun death, this anxious strife?
If light can thus deceive, wherefore not life?

This sonnet was communicated by the author to Coleridge, who was in the habit of repeating it, and it thus found its way into The Bijou, an annual of the year 1828. The author subsequently made some trifling verbal alterations in it, but we prefer the first version as the more vigorous in expression. Coleridge, and that refined scholar and poet, John Hookham Frere, thought this one of "the finest and most graceful sonnets in the language," ranking with Milton's and Wordsworth's.

White, the author, belonged to an Irish family settled in Spain, was educated as an ecclesiastic, distrusted his religious creed, and, to escape his professional obligations, expatriated himself and went to England. He was well received in the Holland House circle, became a Church of England man, and came greatly into notice by his publications against the Roman Catholics. He changed his opinions again, and attached himself to the Unitarians. His biography by John Hamilton Thom, besides its materials for the study of his subject's various changes of religious opinion, has many fine passages from his correspondence.

SPANISH ETIQUETTE.

We have all heard of the Spanish monarch who was roasted alive while the courtiers were arranging the order of precedence for going to his relief. The monarch was the successor of Philip II. (Philip III.), who died in 1621. The Countess D'Aunoy, writing from Spain some fifty years after the event, thus describes the circumstances from the lips of a Spanish lady of quality: "This Prince was writing letters in his closet; and it being very cold that day, they had placed very near him a quick fire of coals, whose reverberation struck so much on his face that he was all in a perspiration, as if a great quantity of water had been poured on his head. The easiness of his temper hindered him from complaining, and even speaking of it; for he never found fault with any thing. The Marquis de Pobar, having observed the injury which the King received by this extreme heat, informed the Duke of Alva's gentlemen of his chamber of it, to the end that he might remove the fire away. He replied, 'It was not his office, and that the Duke Duesda ought to be made acquainted with it, whose proper business it was.' The Marquis de Pobar, being troubled to see the King thus suffer, and not daring himself to ease him for fear of invading another's province, left the fire still in its place; but he sent to give notice of it to the Duke Duesda, who was, by misfortune, gone near Madrid to see a stately house he was building there. Word was brought of this again to the Marquis de Pobar, who proposed again to the Duke of Alva the taking away the fire. But he found him inflexible hereunto, and chose rather to send into the country to the Duke Duesda; so that, before he was come, the King was almost spent, and that very night he fell into a violent fever, accompanied with an erysipelas, which inflamed, and the inflammation degenerated into the purples, which caused his death."

A SCORE OF PROVERBS COLLECTED BY GEORGE HERBERT.

He that stays does the business.
I wept when I was born, and every day shows why.
Every path hath a puddle.
Advise none to marry or go to war.
A long tongue is a sign of a short hand.
I had rather ride on an ass that carries me than a horse that throws me.
I had rather ask of my fire brown bread than borrow of my neighbor white.
A mountain and a river are good neighbors.
Prayers and provender hinder no journey.
Call me not an olive till thou see me gathered.
Be not a baker, if your head be of butter.
Little sticks kindle the fire; great ones put it out.
Stay till the lame messenger comes, if you will know the truth of the thing.
He that is not handsome at twenty, nor strong at thirty, nor rich at forty, nor wise at fifty, will never be handsome, strong, rich, or wise.
Serve a noble disposition; though poor, the time comes that he will repay thee.
My house, my house, though thou art small,
Thou art to me the Escurial.
In the morning, mountains;
In the evening, fountains.
In the kingdom of blind men the one-eyed is king.
Bells call others, but themselves enter not into the church.
Little dogs start the hare, the great get her.

[Advertisement.]

TO THE EMBARRASSED.—A Gentleman of varied mercantile acquirements, an experienced book-keeper and practical Cashier, and having long been placed in situations of great trust, is open to an Engagement in no matter what capacity, provided only that his salary be proportioned to the dirtiness of the work which is required of him. Having for some years been employed as Confidential Clerk in the counting-houses of a number of the most shaky firms in London, he has acquired a perfect knowledge of the principles of trading under false pretenses; and is well acquainted with the means which are employed by business men to keep "concerns" afloat when they are plainly sinking. From long and varied practice he is well versed in the methods of creating and maintaining a fictitious show of credit, and of supplying substitutes for capital to firms that find themselves without it. He can write a good hand, and is not less an adept in imitating signatures than expert in devising how to turn them to advantage. With the System of Accommodation Bills he is thoroughly acquainted in all its varied branches, and has no objection either to accept, draw, or indorse, at a moderate percentage, and to any requisite amount. He is also gifted with considerable inventive talent, and can supply fictitious names and spurious addresses, of the showiest description, and at the shortest notice. In cases of emergency he is willing to impersonate deceased or absent parties, or to attend appointments and officiate in character as referee or surety, or in any manner to facilitate whatever means may be adopted by a smart and enterprising trader to provide himself with funds, and restore his failing credit. In fact, without wishing to brag, the advertiser may assert, without much fear of contradiction, that he is as thoroughly well up to all the tricks of trade as any man in England, or even out of it; and in matters of finance he will back himself to go as far due north as any over-speculator in North Britain or America.

As the Advertiser entertains a most decided objection to travel (in a Colonial direction and at the Government expense), he begs to state that where he is engaged in any work that may bring him into trouble, he expects a special bonus in addition to his salary as compensation for the risk. He is willing to make himself generally useful, and to do whatever dirty work may in reason be required of him; and he has abundant vouchers to attest that his fidelity (when duly paid for) may be most thoroughly relied on: but in cases where detection might occasion him not only personal discomfort, but public loss of character, he insists on an equivalent in money for the risk; and he will only take in hand three hazardous transactions upon the terms of pocketing a half-share of the swag, called otherwise the profits.

From long experience in houses of the worst commercial character, having been employed by some of the most thoroughly unprincipled principals in London, the Advertiser has completely lost that squeamishness of conscience with which he was by nature, and in grosser years, afflicted; and whatever dirty work may be intrusted to his hands there need be no fear that his scruples will prevent his doing it. If any doubts be felt as to whether he be trustworthy, he can furnish the best references as to this important point. He need not hesitate to state that, in spite of all temptations, his honor has been kept in an unblemished, spotless state; and he has vouchers to attest that where inducements have been held out to make him blow the gaff, he has never once betrayed the least propensity to peach. At the same time he should state, to prevent misunderstanding, that on each of the occasions on which he has proved faithful, the seal upon his lips has borne the impress of the Mint. Even among thieves honor must be paid for; so whenever his employers require him to be mum, and keep a matter dark, to insure its holding good the gag must be a golden one.

Address, stating terms and nature of the business, to NUMBER TWENTY-FOUR, EXCETER, care of MR. CADGER, 27 Scamp Street, Seven Dials. N.B. Parties wishing for an interview will please call after dark.

NENA SAHIB'S EXECUTIONER.

THE portrait here given is said to be a correct likeness of the executioner who was employed by Nena Sahib to put his victims to death at Cawnpore. The fellow sat for his likeness, it is said, to a lady named Archer, who was at Cawnpore, and somehow contrived to escape with her picture. It is in great demand in England. A British contemporary not unruly remarks upon it: "The intolerable brute has the true Asiatic cast of countenance — the slow, cruel, sluggish, cunning, demoniac, devilish face that leers upon us sometimes even in this country from beneath the tortoise of a Lascar beggar sweeping a crossing or selling tracts, and that horrifies us in a reminiscence of Delhi and Cawnpore."

Most of the victims of the Cawnpore massacre were killed, it would seem, in a body, by the Sepays. But more than one was butchered singly, and this fellow was, probably, the instrument of their slaughter. We give, a few weeks since, an account of the awful murder of a young lady who had the courage to threaten Nena Sahib with the vengeance of her countrymen: it was, probably, by the hands of the wretch depictured above that she died. It was the same man, no doubt, who cut off the feet of thirty ladies and children, and placed them in a row, with their boots or shoes on — a sight which to horrified Havelock's Highlanders that they swore from that time forth to give no quarter while the war lasted. One may gaze on such a face as one would upon the form of a hideous brute—an alligator or a shark—and lament one's destiny that the duty and pleasure of punishing the monster to whom it belongs devolve upon others.

NENA SAHIB'S EXECUTIONER.—[FROM A SKETCH TAKEN AT CAWNPORE.]

THE WIVES OF THE KING OF DELHI.

THE illustrations given below are said to be faithful portraits of the favorite Queens of Delhi, who, with the other members of the royal family, have lately fallen into the hands of the British troops. Of their history, of course, little or nothing is known. As a general rule, these Oriental queens begin life as slaves in the harem, or are presented—still as slaves—to the emperor or king whose wives they subsequently become. Some day their beauty or grace attracts his notice, and in a day the humble waiting-maid may be promoted to the highest place in the royal seraglio. They are, of course, ignorant, indolent, and selfish—valued simply as physical instruments of pleasure, like so many dwelling-bottles or rich dishes.

Grave questions have been agitated in Delhi, since the capture, as to the share which the women of the harem had in the outrages that were practiced on the European lady captives. One of them—whose portrait is given below—was visited by some English ladies, who sought to ascertain from her whether the King's wives were participators in his infamies. "The Queen of Delhi," says the narrator of the interview, "was found seated on a common charpoy (bedstead), dressed in white cotton clothes, with few and very trifling ornaments—all her grand things having been taken from her. She is short and stout, above thirty years of age, with a round, animated face, not at all pretty, but having pretty little plump hands. She was eating betel-nut to eat with her pawn. Some thirty females, relatives and menials, surrounded her. She professes the utmost horror of the Sepoy Cavalry, to whom she traces all her misfortunes. She says that the King was helpless to control them, and that, when their arrival had placed Delhi in rebellion, they were as ready to rob her as any one else. She says the mutineers did rob the palace, and that all her jewels were only saved by being buried. She does not seem to blame the English for their present captivity: she understands the necessity for inquiring into guilty or innocent parties, but she did not seem to resent the King's innocence as much as her own. She said she had been in the hands of bad people. There appeared to be frightful rivalries among the women. She eliminated the sons of the former wives, she being the last."

Another wife, the sister of this last, declared that the King's wives had endeavored to save several of the English ladies, by secreting them in the palace chambers, but that the mutineers hunted them out and bore them away. This story is not very consistent with another, which was obtained from another inmate of the palace, and according to which the native women are said to have complained bitterly that the Europeans were better fed and cared for than themselves. Jealousy is so thorough a feature of Oriental life that this is quite likely.

THE FAVORITE WIVES OF THE KING OF DELHI.—[FROM MINIATURES BY MOHAMMED ISMAIL KHAN, PORTRAIT-PAINTER TO THE KING.]

THE CUIRASS.

She wound her arms lovingly
About his stalwart shoulder,
And she pressed his steel-clad bosom to her own,
And said, "May Heaven's mercy
Through the raging battle nurse ye;
For if you die, you will not die alone!"

He said, "See how thou'rt mirrored
In this stainless, polished cuirass;
Thus, so long as life is left me, shall thy form
In my heart be brightly painted,
Like an image mild and sainted,
That will shield me through the battle and the storm!"

But when the sun was setting
O'er the black and distant mountains,
From the tower where she sat watching, she beheld
A cavalcade wind slowly
Through the gorges melancholy,
While the death-bell from the convent chapel knelled.

And the stalwart knight lay laxly
On his shield, upheld by bearers,
And the lances of his comrades were reversed;
And she knew by his great pallor
That his mighty heart of valor
Had ceased to hold the image that it nursed.

So she lay upon his bosom,
While the dimmed and bloody cuirass
No more mirrored her pale features; and she died—
And they buried them together
Where the purple-blossomed heather
Waved above them on the lonely mountain-side.

FAMINE ABOARD!

"When I was such a lad as you," said Thorsby, "I ran away from a good home, and went to sea. I came back to England many times, visited secretly my native place, saw my father and mother, and once even heard them speak; but they never saw me again, or knew where I had gone. How this was does not matter, for it is no part of my story. Nearly thirty years ago, I sailed from Montreal for Liverpool, aboard a vessel laden with timber. We had a crew of thirteen persons, including the captain; besides four passengers—a physician and his wife, and an old Canadian Frenchman and his niece. It was in the month of January, and we had a fair wind; but we soon came among ice-fields, and had bitter cold watches, which make men think of home, and comfortable fires ashore. Many a time I went aloft, and, holding on with hands or belly to the frozen yards, and fumbling with numbed fingers at the stiffened reefs, have thought I must go off with every blast that cut me in the face. We kept among the ice a long time, and got far out of our course: so at last the captain told the passengers that, as he had not counted on the delay, he must shorten the allowance of food for all.

"This set me thinking. What if we should be many weeks in that situation? Our provisions must be all gone, and we must perish one by one of hunger and cold, or do something worse. I had read stories of drawing lots aboard ships in such a situation; and at night I dreamed about it. I do believe it was not so much the dread of death as of coming to be one at that horrible kind of feast, that frightened me. However, I devised a plan—a selfish plan it was—for escaping from such a horror. Our allowance of food was as yet very slightly diminished. Every day I saved some portion; and sometimes, on pretense of being more hungry than usual, I bought the ration of a man who was sickly, and could not eat. Such of those hoardings as could be preserved I put away in a box, inside my chest, and now and then, when I went down to my hammock, and found myself alone, I used to open it, and contemplate my store with a miserly sort of satisfaction, which is horrible to me now to think of; for I knew that in my secret heart I looked forward to a time when the bottle of water which I hoarded there would have become more costly than any wine that mortal lips ever tasted; when, if I had an opportunity, I meant to use my treasure slowly, to maintain my own life while my companions starved.

"The Frenchman and his niece I knew well, for I had lodged in their house. He was a superannuated government-clerk, with a small pension, who was going to live in France for the benefit of his health. The niece was an intelligent and pretty young woman, who spoke English well, for her mother was an Englishwoman. They were cabin passengers, but had taken a passage at an intermediate sum, which restricted them to plainer food than others got; but they fared no worse than the rest now. The rations were reduced again, and we all began to feel the pinch.

"We had heavy snow-storms, succeeded by bright moonlight nights, awful in their silence; but, at last, the ice became rarer, and we began to sail clear. However, a worse trouble awaited us. From the moment that the last ice left our sides, it was manifest that we were sinking rapidly, from some great injury to the vessel's bottom. It was in the night-time when we discovered it; and, in the hurry and confusion, little was done to save stores until too late. One man, who volunteered to go below, was killed by the floating timber. The water bilged up the hatches, and kept the vessel flooded amid-ships; but the upper deck was comparatively dry, for the timber aboard kept the vessel afloat, and there we all took refuge. We knew she could not sink, being merely water-logged.

"When the first alarm was given I was below, and I thought at once of my box. It was heavy; but, taking it on my shoulder, I crept on deck, and groped my way aft with it. On the way I ran against several persons coming forward; but in the darkness they took no heed of me, and I deposited my treasure in a boat on the after-deck, and covered it as well as I could with coils of rope. I knew they would not take to this boat while the vessel floated, and I hoped that no one would think of disturbing the ropes.

"For four days I took the share of the rations which the Captain distributed to us all. The physician's wife, who was in ill-health, died, and was cast into the sea. This left us fifteen persons. The old Frenchman was also in weak health; but he held out, and his companion tended him constantly. Every body took interest in them, wretched as they were, and it was a fine thing to see her bravery and constant care for her charge. I remember looking at them, and thinking that if there were no more than they, I would gladly give them a portion of my store; although, perhaps, I was then too selfish for that, and only flattered myself with the thought. I did not dare myself to go to the boat until the first dark night, when I pulled off my boots, and, groping along, found my box, and stealthily ate a portion of its contents; eating, however, in great fear, lest my secret should be discovered; in which case I knew my famished comrades would have killed me for my selfishness. I knew I could have relieved them to some degree; but I did not stir. I heard their murmurs, but I held my tongue; all which I justified to myself; for what, thought I, would be my little hoard among all these? Better that one should live than that all should eat, merely to live another day.

"Soon after this our case became dismal indeed. The ship sunk deeper, and even the after-deck became gradually immersed, so we all took refuge in the tops and rigging, where we lashed ourselves; and all day long, as shipwrecked men will do, reported a strange sail. As to my box, I had managed to fold its contents in a large sail-cloth which I carried with me, and of which we all had plenty. And now, seeing my companions' weakness, I took the devilish idea of feigning weakness equal to theirs, lest otherwise some suspicion might arise against me.

"I had lashed myself in the main-shrouds, having made a better place for myself with a swinging board and an old coat. Immediately above me in the main-top were the Frenchman and his niece; but most of the crew were in the mizen-shrouds and top. I used to look up and exchange a few words with the Frenchman and his charge. They were better sheltered than I was, and the girl, who was of a cheerful temper, bore up well. We threw no more bodies in the sea, but several were dead, as I knew by the drooping of their heads, they being lashed to their places. One man, who had untied himself accidentally, fell with a splash in the deep water on the mid-deck, and no one offered to descend, or even spoke. There now began a dreadful silence among us, so that I began to doubt if many lived save I, the Frenchman and his niece, and an old sailor who was on one of the mizen-yards. This man, whose name was Ephraim, sat drooping, and apparently very dejected, for several days; but one day looking toward him, soon after daybreak, I found his eyes fixed upon me in a manner that perplexed me. He was a man of a hideous cast of countenance, his face being furrowed with scars, as if it had been at some time burned with gunpowder, and his upper lip being slit in a way that showed all his front teeth even when his mouth was closed. He had a low forehead, and long black hair like a Malay, and he regarded me with a scowl that at such a time would have terrified the bravest. I could not see him unless I turned toward him, but at first a curiosity, and finally an impulse which I could not control, compelled me to meet his eyes. For, when I did not look I felt them upon me—nay, even at night when I could see him no more, I felt that he was still looking toward me, and bending forward as if striving to discern my figure in the gloom. Sometimes he regarded me with a grimace which was at once ludicrous and terrible; but he spoke no word, only uttering now and then a dismal cry, not like the sound of any human voice.

"All this so fretted me in my weakness and depression, and so filled me with a kind of shame, that I sat one night in my place and omitted to creep down to my box. When day dawned, it was a relief to me to find our ship enveloped in a mist; and just at that time I heard a moan either from the Frenchman or his niece in the tops. Touched with a sudden pity, which in my selfishness and fear I had not known until then, I crept up the shrouds to where they lay, and there found what might have moved a stonier heart. The man lay back against the mast quite cold, but his companion, who had been enveloped in a cloak and heap of sail-cloth, evidently by his hand, was living still. It was her moans that I had heard. She could not have eaten any thing for some days, nor had they had any water for a longer time, save a few drops of rain which they might have collected in the sail-cloth. I turned and crept down again to my box, where I had still some biscuits, a piece of raw pork, some grocers' plums, a bottle containing in the bottom a little rum, and another small bottle of water. With some drops of the spirit-and-water mingled in the palm of my hand I wetted her lips, and after a while revived her a little, though still insensible—a happy thing. For finding the Frenchman quite dead, I moved his body to the edge of the top, and then let it down into the sea, which now covered the mid-deck above the bulwarks.

"She remained in this weak, half-senseless state for some days, during which the mist continued, and shrouded me from the terrible gaze of old Ephraim; but I heard him still. By what dreadful means he sustained his life I only guessed. Sometimes he shouted out my name, and then began again to utter those cries that I had heard before. It was evident to me that he felt some spite against me; why I knew not, for he could not have discovered my secret. If he had, he might have rifled my box long before. This idea, however, induced me to remove it by night into the top, where I finally withdrew myself, and now sought, in cherishing my poor companion, to find relief from evil thoughts. Once, when she opened her eyes, looking round, as if in quest of her former protector, she shuddered, and turned her face to me imploringly, as if she knew that I had power to save him yet; but at other times, even when conscious of my care—as when I wetted some biscuit into a paste and put to her lips—she seemed to have forgotten the horrors of the place.

"Hour by hour I felt an interest in the fate of this girl growing up within me, more deep than any feeling I had ever known. I reduced my own share of my little store of food and water to the lowest point, that I might sustain her the longer. I watched her face as she lay sleeping, and it seemed to me so beautiful, that sometimes I fancied that my sufferings had brought upon me a kind of delirium in which shipwrecked men see visions which mock their horrible and lonely state; but, at most times, I clung to her with no thought but that of saving her from death. It seemed to me as if in hiding my store of provisions I had but unconsciously prepared a means of rescuing her from that dreadful end which had befallen our companions. Sometimes, indeed, the idea would come upon me that, if she should escape, she would remember that I had had the power to prolong her uncle's life—that I had marked his sufferings, and had yet held my hand. Would this make her hate me? The thought was now more terrible to me even than death.

"One night, having shrouded myself in sail-cloth—worn out with tending her—I dropped asleep. I dreamed of warm and sheltered places—of walking in gardens in which the sunlight fell on an ancient red-bricked wall, where fruits were ripening; and with me was my dear companion—she my wife, and I no longer a poor, horny-handed seaman, but a gentleman, as I had thought to be before I ran from home. This, and many such places, I had dreamed of, she with me in them all. I was suddenly awakened by a shriek, and, starting, found a hand at my throat. In an instant I felt a wound as from a knife upon my arm; but I grappled with my antagonist in the darkness. A cry that he uttered told me in a moment that it was old Ephraim.

"'To the devil!' he exclaimed, as he struck at me again with great force; 'why should I eat vultures' food?'

"He was a man of great strength. I struggled hard. I had no weapon; and if I had not warded off his last blow he had struck me dead. But the top was slippery with the misty night-dews, and his foot tripped, and he staggered over the rope and sail-cloth in which I had been wrapped. Following up my advantage quickly, I thrust him from me, and he fell. I heard a dull splash in the water below. I slipped down the shrouds some distance and listened, but could hear nothing. Old Ephraim had perished!

"Gray light was dawning, and the mists had cleared away, when I hastened up again to my companion, calling to her by the way; for her silence made me think that she had fallen into a swoon. She gave no answer, nor did she speak as I raised her from the ground, and found to my horror that there was blood upon her. My box, in which I had still some biscuits remaining, I had made a resting-place for her head, but it had been pulled out, and the sail-cloth which covered her had been drawn aside. The madman or devil who had assailed me had roused her in endeavoring to remove the box, and when she shrieked had stabbed her. She was still warm and gave some signs of breathing; but they grew fainter. I spoke to her by name, calling aloud as I would call to some one at a distance; but she was already in the distance of eternity.

"Of all that wretched band none now was living except I. Careless of all, and with a superstitious feeling that the box had somehow brought this fate upon me, I arose and cast its contents out into the wind, and sat down upon the edge of the top, with my feet hanging over, and with my head resting on my hand.

"Loss of blood from my wound quickly made me feel a drowsiness in which it was strange that I did not fall from that height. Some time after this—like a man neither asleep nor awake—I heard a noise of voices below, and rousing myself, with an effort, I looked down and saw a boat alongside, with two seamen guarding it; and there, about a mile on our larboard side, was a large brig brought to in a calm sea.

"They nursed me and brought me round," he continued, "but they did not like me. They thought that I had killed my companion and her protector, and that the wound that I had got had been received in the struggle. They whispered together that I had done this to rob them of their stock of food; and when they got into a French port they would have had me tried for murder and hung, or sent to the galleys. But they could make no case against me; and I was free. Ay, I was free!" Thoresby continued, clutching my arm; "but the calumnies stuck to me. The old story has followed and come up against me many a time, forcing me sometimes to fly, and making me the sullen, hated fellow you have known me."

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

He who has learned to obey will know how to command.

A wag, on hearing that a man had given up chimney-sweeping, expressed surprise, as he thought the business sooted him.

A RECIPE FOR COURTSHIP.

Two or three dears, and two or three sweets,
Two or three balls, and two or three treats;
Two or three serenades given as a lure,
Two or three oaths how much they endure;
Two or three messengers sent in one day,
Two or three times led out from the play,
Two or three soft speeches made by the way;
Two or three tickets for two or three times,
Two or three love-letters writ all in rhymes;
Two or three months keeping strict to these rules,
Can never fail making a couple of fools.

Wanted.—"A female who has a knowledge of fitting boots of good moral character." We suppose boots of a good moral character means those that are well soled.

"What is the difference between a man in deep thought and King Henry VIII?" Ans.—One is a fat king, and the other is a thin-king.

"I believe," said a very tall representative, "that I am one of the tallest members of the House." "Yes," added a fellow-representative, "and the slimmest too."

An honest grazier, who had seen Richard performed one night in town, waited upon the manager next morning to say, that if the gentleman who wanted a horse on the previous evening held his mind, he had got an abundance of tidy nags in his meadows, and should be happy to have a deal with him.

Queen Elizabeth, admiring the elegance of the Marquis of Medina, a Spanish nobleman, complimented him on it, begging at the same time to know who possessed the heart of so accomplished a cavalier. "Madam," said he, "a lover risks too much on such an occasion; but your Majesty's will is law. Excuse me, however, if I fear to name her, but request your Majesty's acceptance of her portrait." He sent her a looking-glass.

DIGGING POTATOES.

A soldier on furlough, and just convalescent,
Sought a job to supply him with cash for the present,
And promised a farmer to dig up a patch
Of potatoes, with faithfulness, care, and dispatch.
A bottle of whisky, his spirits to stir,
Was given to Bob as a sort of a spur;
Which bottle, with many a copious pull,
He emptied, and left the potato-hills full,
While he with some difficulty held by a stump,
Saluting it oft with a staggering thump.
Some hours had elapsed; his employer returned,
And said, while his bosom indignantly burned,
"You indolent rascal—you slave of the jug—
Not a single potato, you sot, have you dug!"
"Po-ta-toes!" said Bob, with a stammering tongue,
"If you want your potatoes dug, fetch 'em along!"

Men are often capable of greater things than they perform; they are sent into the world with bills of credit, and seldom draw to their full extent.

Genius.—A distinguished teacher, and president of a college, defined genius to be "the power of making efforts."

"Do try to talk a little common sense," said a lady to her visitor. "Oh! but wouldn't that be taking an unfair advantage of you?"

There is a great difference in rogues. There is your honest rogue, who will do you a good turn, and always remembers a kindness; there is the dishonest rogue—he is a hypocrite. One of the former kind was working for a friend of mine, who told me the dialogue that passed between them. "How comes it, John, that you're no better off—you're a handy fellow enough, but it seems you're one of the poorest, and never did yourself much good?" "Why, I'll tell you what it is, Sir. I was as honest a feller as any in the parish, but I don't know how 'twere, but I were always poor; and so says I to myself, John, this won't do, thee must make a change; and so, Sir, I took to stealing a bit—warn't particular, a duck, or a goose, or some such matter—and then I fell into poaching, and then I got into jail, and somehow or other I got out o't; and then said I to myself, John, this won't do neither, thee must change again." "Well, John, and what then?" "Why, Sir, now I do mix it."

Montaigne kept a register of the oddities of all his friends, and introduces them to us whenever he can. "I know a lady of very high rank," he says, "who believes that it gives a person a disagreeable appearance to be seen in the act of chewing, and, for this reason, will scarcely ever eat in public." This lady would have met with the approval of Byron.

Admiral Rodney gave a punch in honor of his officers. He took for that purpose 4 tons of water, 1200 bottles of Malaga wine, 600 bottles of rum, 600 bottles of Cognac, 600 pounds of sugar, 200 nutmegs, 2600 lemons; the bowl being a marble basin, upon which a handsome boy, clothed as Hebe, paddled a little canoe of Acajou-wood, filling always the emptied glasses of the enchanted seamen.

It is worthy to be remarked, that almost every nation denotes "a fool" by the name of its favorite dish. The German calls him "Hans Wurst;" the Frenchman, "Jean Potage;" the English, "Jack Pudding;" the Dutch, "Pickelhäring;" the Italian, "Maccaroni;" the Russian, "Kapustnick;" the ancient Greeks and Romans, "Parasit, Sycophant, and Scurra."

Professor Stäudlin, at the University of Göttingen, once argumented before his audience as follows: "Man does not die! For he dies either in the last moments of his life, or in the first moments of his death, or in both together. Yet he dies not in the last instants of his life, for he is still alive; neither in the first instant of his death, for he is already dead; nor in both together, for he can not live and die at once; consequently, he dies in none, or not at all."

Mithridates, king of Pontus, knew each one of his eighty thousand soldiers by his right name.

Seneca was able to rehearse two thousand words, which were given to him, in the same order.

Hortensius kept in his memory all the prices paid on a day of auction.

Hugo Grotius, on being present at a review of some regiments in France, recalled all the names of the single soldiers which were there called up.

Justus Lipsius ventured to rehearse the works of Tacitus from the first word to the last, forward and backward, even when somebody was standing before him with a drawn dagger, to pierce him at the very moment he had forgotten but an only word!

A Venetian lady, well known by her erudition, when asked for the sermon she had attended in church, repeated scrupulously every word.

Racine knew by memory all the tragedies of Euripides, Bayle the whole work of Montaigne, Hughes Doneau the Corpus Juris, Metastasio the entire Horatius, and Carteret, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, all the New Testament, from the first chapter of Matthew to the end of Apocalypse. The learned Scotchman, Thomas Dempster, affirmed he knew not what it was to forget; and Scaliger is told to have apprehended within twenty-one days the whole Homerus, and within four months all the Greek poets.

The notorious and mysterious Count of St. Germain surpasses them all. Any newspaper he read once he knew by memory, and was furnished with such a gigantic comprehensive power of numbering that he retained a series of a thousand numbers, which he could recite forward, backward, and pulled out from the middle. From the court of Henry III. in Cracow, he demanded one hundred packs of picket-cards, mixed them together in disorder, let him tell all the succession of the cards, ordered it to be noticed exactly, and repeated their following one after the other, without being wrong once.

He played almost every musical instrument of the world, was an excellent painter, and imitated any handwriting in the most illusive manner. He had but one passion—playing all games with absolute mastery. In chess no mortal has vanquished him, and in faro he could break every bank by calculation.

Archdeacon Jefferson says: "For one really converted Christian, as the Society of Missionary labor, the drinking practices of the English have made fully one thousand drunkards."

A fast in a high station is like a man on the top of a high mountain—every thing appears small to him, and he appears small to every body.

A London paper suggests that the celebrated Mr. Spurgeon be engaged to preach in the Leviathan—the obstinate monster that refuses to be launched because he has had another precious man any body of the present day in "moving position."

The editor of the New Idea, at Sandia, Shelby County, Iowa, advertises for somebody to purchase a half interest in his establishment. The wife of the present owner has a half an idea.

A Detroit paper mentions the arrest of a woman in that city, "with nothing on her person but a love-letter and a superscription." Rather a "poetical" and "picturesque" costume.

The Tampa Peninsular gives a curious account of the destitute state they were in when a part of their stock had been thrown into spasms from a small quarter snake having been swallowed by a cow. The cow was immediately attacked by the snake, and her actions were such as to create the utmost consternation and scattering of her body in all directions, during her head forward, with an attempt to produce a hissing noise.

EPITAPH FOR A VERY HONEST MAN.

An honest fellow lies below,
His debts in full he always paid;
And what's more true, his neighbors tell us
He sent back borrowed umbrellas.

ILLEGAL CORN MEASURE.—A tight shoe.

ORNAMENTAL FEED-TROUGH.—The eyes of your beloved after she has been crying.

THE HIGHLAND VOLUNTEERS.—In the eighteenth century, the volunteers were generally composed of men who, on checks as raising a certain number of men for the army. An English officer, who was recruiting among the Highlands to receive recruits, inquired, "Where are the volunteers?" "All ask," was the reply; "they are tied up in the barn!"

"Teddy, my boy, just guess how many cheeses there are in that bag, and I'll give it to you when I've done with it." "Five to be sure."

"Arrah, the new owell had luck to the man that told me."

Coleridge once gravely recommended a Canterbury attorney of his acquaintance to take a house in the Cathedral Close, in order that his constant companionship and large object might neutralize the contracting influence of professional habits upon his mind.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, February 1, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week were very quiet for Breadstuffs, the receipts of which were light. Flour was in stock limited, and but little now see, at reduced prices. Wheat was sparingly purchased at lower former rates. Rye continues was transacted in Corn, which closed with an upward tendency. Oats were in fair demand, and prices were steady at quotations. Cotton has been more sought after and advancing prices. Provisions have been in fair demand, for market closing pretty firmly at the following rates for leading kinds.: Rio Coffee was more freely dealt in, and it improved 1 c. per pound. ... Sugars were in moderate request at higher rates. ... Molasses was inactive and steady. ... A fair inquiry prevailed for Spirits of Rye within our range. ...Hay and Hops were salable and steady. ...Hemp, Grass Seeds and Tobacco were as in previous figures. ...Tobacco was in moderate demand, but was somewhat less firm. ... Thus all the leading articles of Dry Goods during the past week have been to a moderate extent, and prices have been steadily sustained, owners in their movements to the requirements of the trade. The week has been moderate. Some brown Cottons have been purchased for export. Prints and Woolens have not been heavy, but in the absence of an active distributive movement they have been maintained by moderate supplies. A slightly improved demand has prevailed for the leading Dress Goods, with steady prices generally. There is no apparent expression among factors to dispose of stocks of desirable fabrics in the anticipated revival of business, it is thought, will furnish a more satisfactory market for such. The same sales of the week are the best of no remarkable interest. The week's import of Foreign Goods was $1,000,000 less than 1857, ($1,071,151 over) reducing the total from January 1 to date to $1,595,344 against $10,266,495 same period last year. The movements in the Woolen trade are moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations. ... We present a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$4 15 @ $4 55
Superfine State, per bbl.	4 30 @ 4 60
Extra Western Flour, per barrel.	4 30 @ 4 60
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel.	4 65 @ 5 00
Superfine Extra Canadian, per barrel.	4 30 @ 4 60
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel.	4 50 @ 8 00
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 90 @ 4 00
Corn Meal, per barrel.	3 00 @ 3 50
White Wheat, per bushel.	1 11 @ 1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel.	1 00 @ 1 30
New Corn, per bushel.	63 @ 65
Rye, per bushel.	70 @ 72
Barley, per bushel.	70 @ 75
Western Oats, per bushel.	45 @ 46
State Oats, per bushel.	45 @ 46
Prime and Choice Timothy Seed, per bushel.	3 00 @ 3 25
Southern Oats, per bushel.	40 @ 42
Cotton, middlings, per pound.	10½ @ 11
Mess Pork, per barrel.	15 75
Prime Pork, per barrel.	13 00 @ 13 50
Country Mess Beef, per barrel.	9 00 @ 10 00
Country Prime Beef, per barrel.	6 00 @ 6 50
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce.	18 00 @ 24 00
New Mess, per barrel.	16 00 @ 17 00
Old Mess, per pound.	6 @ 8½
Lard, per pound.	7½ @ 8
Butter, per pound.	13 @ 24
Cheese, per pound.	7 @ 11
Hams, per pound.	8 @ 9
Rice, per 100 pounds.	3 50 @ 5 50
Tobacco, Kentucky, per pound.	10 @ 11
Cuba Sugar, per pound.	4½ @ 4½
Cuba Molasses, per gallon.	28 @ 30
New Orleans Sugar, per pound.	4½ @ 7
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon.	30 @ 35
Crown Teas, per pound.	55 @ 75
Young Hyson Teas, per pound.	35 @ 55
Common Whiskey, per gallon.	21½ @ 23
North River Hay, per 100 pounds.	75 @ 85
Shipping Hay, per pound.	5 @ 6
Kentucky Hemp, per ton.	170 @ 175
Rope Yarn Tobacco, per pound.	10 @ 11
Ale, Hump, undressed, per pound.	100 00 @ 110 00
Ale, Hump, dressed, per ton.	160 00 @ 165 00
American Fleece Wool, per pound.	37 @ 45
American pulled Wool, per pound.	29 @ 33
Pod Ashes, per 100 pounds.	5 @ 6
Pearl Ashes, per 100 pounds.	5 50 @ 6
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon.	43 @ —

Freights continued quiet. Engagements getting full rates: for Liverpool, Cotton, 5-16d. per pound; Flour, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Grain, 44d. @ 5d. per bushel; Beef, 4s. @ 4s. 6d. per tierce; Beef and Pork, 5s. per barrel; Beef, 4s. @ 4s. 6d. per tierce; Provisions, 5s. per barrel. ... The number of vessels in the port of New York on Saturday was 317 of all classes.

The Live Stock Markets last week were heavy for Beeves, of which there was an adequate supply available. Cows were in good demand, and sold at about the full figures, while on common and inferior grades there was a decline of about half cent per pound on the estimated net weight, with the estimated weights favoring purchasers. ... There was increased dullness in the trade in Milch Cows, owing, in part, to the depressed state of the beef market. Milkmen retain Cows when they think they can sell milk for beef and buy fresh ones. ... Veal Calves were in good supply, and sold at about the full figures. ... Sheep and Lambs were now less abundant, and, with a good inquiry, prices were firm. ... Swine were in fair supply, and sold at about former quotations. ... The reported receipts of Live Stock at the following points for the week ending January 30, were:

	Week ending Jan. 30.	Week ending Jan. 23.
Beeves	2,940	3,749
Milch Cows	113	97
Veal Calves	341	373
Sheep and Lambs	7,061	6,819
Swine	1,322	1,459

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were reported:

New York	823	Indiana. 145
Illinois	284	Ohio. 1,000
Kentucky	236	Virginia. 54

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the Forty-fourth Street Market last Wednesday were as follows:

Poor to Premium Beeves, per pound	$9 @ 10½
Common to Milch Cows, per head	19 00 @ 60 00
Veal Calves, per pound	7 @ 8
Sheep and Lambs, per pound	7 @ 8½
Live Swine, per pound	6 @ 7
Dressed "	8½ @ 9

The Country Produce Markets are well stocked with farm and dairy produce. The demand is limited, and has to be put in the hands of commission merchants for buyers. ... Poultry is less abundant, and prices have declined somewhat. Game is on the fowl which is now in good order. Much of what comes from the West arrives in bad condition. The range of prices is:

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel.	$2 50	@ $4 50
Apples, dried, per pound.	3	@ 4
Peaches, dried, per pound.	17	@ 19
Cherries, dried, per pound.	25	@ 30
Hickory Nuts, per bushel.	1 87	@ 2 00
Chestnuts, per bushel.	1 50	@ 2 00
Peanuts, per bushel.	70	@ 1 12
Potatoes, per barrel.	2 00	@ 2 50
Potatoes, per barrel.	1 75	@ 2 12
" sweet, per barrel.	50	@ 75
" sweet, per barrel.	4 50	@ 6 00
Onions, per barrel.	2 50	@ 3 00
Turnips, per barrel.	75	@ 1 00
Cabbages, per dozen.	50	@ 75
Pumpkins, per 100.	15	@ 20 00
Beets, per barrel.	1 25	@ 2 00
Parsnips, per barrel.	1 50	@ 2 00
" per bushel.	75	@ 1 00
Parsley, per barrel.	1 75	@ 2 00
Carrots, per barrel.	1	@ 1 50
Eggs, per dozen.	2 75	@ 3 00
Celery, per dozen.	50	@ 75
Turkeys, per 100	9 00	@ —
Lugs, Lined, per dozen.	10	@ —
Ducks, per pair.	75	@ 1 00
Chickens, per pound.	11	@ 11
Fowls, per pound.	11	@ 11
Geese, per pair.	75	@ 1 00
Ducks, per pair.	44	@ 87
" per pair.	75	@ 1 00
Turkeys, per pound.	11	@ 13
Geese, per pound.	11	@ 12
Pigeons, per dozen.	1 75	@ 2 50
Partridges, per pair.	1 50	@ 2 00
Partridges, per pair.	50	@ 75
Rabbits, per pair.	25	@ 50
Quails, per pair.	25	@ 50
Squirrels, each.	2	@ 4
Venison, per pound.	8	@ 11
Bear Meat, per pound.	12	@ 16

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Feb. 1, 1858.

The foreign import trade of the port continues to show a gradual but positive increase as the following extracts as follows with those of the week previous:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Jan. 29, 1858	$1,844,950	$1,419,697
Corresponding week, 1857	3,031,096	833,559
Decrease of Imports	$1,117,639
Increase of Exports		$1,031,461

A corresponding increase of Exports and a decrease of Imports, is the natural result of foreign imports on a large and regular scale:

Imports at New York for Jan. 1851 ..... $6,230,614
" " " 1857 11,666,761

At this rate we shall soon have a large balance in our favor on the foreign account, notwithstanding the low prices of produce.

There was only about $50,000 in specie sent abroad last week, and that was to meet, not to pay for, goods. Boston, most of which was for export from there. Take it all in all, considering the excessive importations, however, it is not likely that the Bank statement this evening can show any serious decline. Money continues to harden steadily easier: it is very hard to lend at six per cent., and in Wall Street large amounts are daily destined by the brokers. Exchange closed on Saturday at 109 @ 110 on London, and 5 3-16 @ 5 3-8 on Paris. The banks of Baltimore and Philadelphia resume specie payments this week, and will be able to handle their own business with those cities.

Trade is at the street is one of extreme buoyancy. All stocks have risen, some of the dividend-paying railroad stocks especially. The idea prevails that the country is going to remain very cheap all spring and summer, and that it must necessarily be invested in or lent out on stocks.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A. BLY & CRAGIN,
COUNSELLORS AT LAW,
No. 59 Nassau Street, corner of Liberty, New York.
Special attention given to matters connected with Pension Laws, and to Claims against the Government.

A TIMELY ADMONITION.—The learned, the scientific in chemistry and the medical world-informed, the ignorant and illiterate, will all find in BRANDRETH'S Pills a remedy which will go at once to the root of their several afflictions, and eradicate them from the constitution. These pills are equally beneficial for the body or the mind, because they purify the blood, and restore the physical as well as the mental energies to their natural vigor. Sold at 274 Canal Street, New York, and all druggists. If you are out of health, should head this as a voice from Heaven.

SAMUEL R. HALL, 178 & 180 Fulton Street, and 57 Gold Street. Sold also at No. 796 Broadway, No. 91 Division Street, No. 1 Astor House, Brooklyn, and Hoboken Ferry, 175 Fulton Street, Brooklyn. 25 cents a box, with full directions.

NEW BOOK, by the Author of "THE DEAD SECRET."
HIDE AND SEEK;
A NOVEL.
By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Dead Secret," "Arthur Darke," &c.
Price 50 cents.

In speaking of the above work by this author, The Hollies Journal says:

"The Dead Secret has already been widely read and warmly admired. It is a powerful book. A painful interest surrounds the terrible secret on the very threshold of the story, and keeps the mind of the reader excited until he has mastered the mystery. The plot is very artistically constructed—keeping one in suspense till the last chapter.—Home Journal.

In Press,
"AFTER DARK," By WILKIE COLLINS.
HURD & HOUGHTON, 459 Broadway, New York.
Also for sale by all Booksellers.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready, and will be sent by mail, post-paid, to applicants for it, who inclose five cents in addition to the postage prepaid by the publishers.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, desiring to form Libraries, or enrich their literary collection, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to include a very large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—constituting, with very few exceptions, the books which are selected, in most instances, at less than one half the original cost of publication in England.

No Literature of any value connected with Religion, Science, &c., who may desire to add to their collection, is omitted in this Catalogue of literature. It is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a guide to purchasers.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, wherever books can not be had through any local bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.

SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY LEECH, ALKEN, AND OTHERS.
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

THE FIRST VOLUME
OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY,
Handsomely bound in Cloth and Half Morocco, may be had of the following Booksellers:

IN BOSTON.
A. WILLIAMS & CO.,
JOHN J. DYER & CO.,
FREDERICK PARKER.

IN PHILADELPHIA.
A. WINCH,
H. B. ZIEBER.

IN NEW ORLEANS.
J. C. MORGAN,
M. NORMAN,
GEO. ELLIS.

IN ST. LOUIS.
JAMES M. CRAWFORD,
E. K. WOODWARD.

IN CINCINNATI.
W. H. MOORE & CO.

And of Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada.

THE NEW EDITION OF
DR. LIVINGSTONE'S JOURNAL
IS NOW READY.

MISSIONARY TRAVELS AND RESEARCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA, including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence Across the Continent, down the Rivers Leambye and the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., &c. With Maps by ARROWSMITH a Portrait on Steel, and numerous Illustrations. One Volume 8vo, $3 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers
Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of Three Dollars.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.

HELPS'S SPANISH CONQUEST.

THE SPANISH CONQUEST IN AMERICA, and its Relation to the History of Slavery, and to the Government of Colonies. By ARTHUR HELPS. Illustrated Maps, &c. 2 vols. Large 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

FLORIMEL. A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

This exquisite bouquet is so highly concentrated that a single drop will leave its peculiar and delightful fragrance for a day upon the handkerchief.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by all Druggists.

MRS. SIGOURNEY'S LUCY HOWARD.

LUCY HOWARD'S JOURNAL. By MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Booksellers will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT DISCOUNT.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET PAID FOR IT.—A plan so Agency for our Publications, that any person can work. There is no capital of fees. LIBERY PAMPHLET will be glad to obtain some of this kind. Address, with stamp,
FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

THE HASHEESH EATER. Being Passages from the Life of a Pythagorean. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of One Dollar.

AUTOGRAPHS, AUTOGRAPHS
NOW READY, NORTON'S CATALOGUE
OF 1000 Autograph Letters, Documents, Maps, Coins, &c., for sale by the Author, being the most complete collection ever offered for sale. This catalogue will be mailed to buyers who address, on receipt of Three cents postage.
CHARLES B. NORTON, Agent for Libraries,
No. 70 Nassau Street, New York.
Also, NORTON'S Catalogue of Works.

ISAAC TAYLOR'S WORLD OF MIND.

THE WORLD OF MIND: An Elementary Book. By ISAAC TAYLOR, Author of "Natural History," "Loyola and Jesuitism," "Natural History of Enthusiasm," &c. 18mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of One Dollar.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.
A concentrated extract, antiseptic, and restorative properties of this invaluable remedy, which has been used for forty years by the people of Florida, Cuba, and Mexico, and numerous Ulcerous and Impetus Diseases. Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

BARTH'S NORTH AND CENTRAL AFRICA.
TRAVELS AND DISCOVERIES IN NORTH AND CENTRAL AFRICA. Being a Journal of an Expedition undertaken under the Auspices of H.B.M.'s Government, in the Years 1849–55. By HENRY BARTH, Ph.D., D.C.L., Fellow of the Royal Geographical and Asiatic Societies, &c. &c. Map and numerous Illustrations. Vol. I. to be completed in 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50 a Volume. [Now Ready.] Vol. II. [Nearly Ready.] Vol. III. [In English Edition] now ready.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of Two Dollars.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!
BULWER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, and WILKIE COLLINS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," will be commenced in the February Number. The Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER NUMBER of HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE, and is the thrilling story from her vigorous pen will be found in the February Number.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE DEAD SECRET," will be found complete in the February Number.

The above three Novels are written exclusively for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE LARGEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" is contributed to the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the author. Subscribers in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or More Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for Every Club of Ten Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
One Copy for Three Years 6 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE Subscribers.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth, Price $2 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound at the Office of Publication, price fifty cents. Direction allowed to Booksellers and Postmasters.

The Volumes of "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at Two Dollars per Volume.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage upon HARPER'S MAGAZINE is Twenty-four and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

The Postage upon HARPER'S WEEKLY will remit, when prepaid quarterly in advance, Twenty-six Cents a year. MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American Continent.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

LADY OF THE HOUSE. "Hoity toity, indeed! Go and put up those Curls directly, if you please. How dare you imitate me in that manner? Impertinence!"

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE PAST.

MR. PIPES (Retired Merchant). "Sally, my dear, these big Mirrors ain't a bit better than the little 8 by 12 Looking-glass, with a picter on top, that we used to have in the back room, behind the Store, you know—that you used to fix all off with Paper fixings of Flowers, Hearts, &c.—eh!"

MRS. PIPES don't recollect any thing about it; no, indeed!

HOME ADVICE, with Whispers to Epicures. A Receipt-Book. By a Lady. With Notes for the Dyspeptic. By a Physician. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of 75 cents.

THE MOTHER AND HER OFFSPRING. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

DR. TYLER has rendered an important service by the preparation of this work intended for the use of young married females and young mothers. He was eminently qualified for the task by his professional knowledge and experience, and he has the entire confidence of the Christian public. The work is highly commended, and will doubtless be of great utility.—N. Y. Observer.

Amid the multiplicity of bad books, made by bad men and sold for bad ends, we are glad to see one on the subject written by a physician every way respectable—good book, made by a good man for a good end. Its instructions, intelligently followed, will prevent much of the concision a vast amount of suffering.—Independent.

We have seen no book on Medicine, written for popular use, which appears to us unobjectionable in points where nearly all such books are objectionable, as judicious in its counsels, and so full in the details of the exact information wanted, as this.—Springfield Republican.

An invaluable treatise, written with skill, sense, suavity, and solemnity; combining just such advice as a Christian physician would give a mother in reference to the best physical training of herself and her little ones. Its thorough study in every young family would be a safeguard against a host of ills, not many a semi-idle, and many a death.—Congregationalist.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

LIFE STUDIES; or, How to Live. Illustrated in the Biographies of Burnett, Verstegen, Montgomery, Perkins, and Mrs. Winslow. By the Rev. CHARLES BALLARD, Author of "Memories of Hewitson," "Adelaide Newton," &c. 16mo, 365 pages, Muslin, 75 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Forty Cents.

THE SORROWS OF A COUNTRY APPRENTICE IN NEW YORK.

BOSS. "Say, Sam, if you don't get that Bottle filled pretty smart, you're a goner!"

BOSS'S WIFE. "Ah! you Villain, I've caught you again. I'll teach you to bring Liquor in here!"

DEBIT AND CREDIT. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. By L. C. C. With a Preface, by CHRISTIAN D. ARGES, JOHAN DEWEY, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

This novel is the most successful attempt at the romance of commercial life which has hitherto been made. As such, it is important, and should be read by every old and every young man in business.

The most popular German novel of the age.—Cincinnati Gazette.

A careful, generous, and truthful picture. . . . Introduces the book—the picture-making is admirable.—Athenæum.

The work is, we have no doubt, destined to create a sensation in this country.—Notes and Queries.

A story of uncommon fascination.—Albion.

Frank, rich in incident, vital with character, thought, and story. It is an uncommonly genuine, interesting book.—London Leader.

Will win the admiration of literary readers. A deep interest pervades every chapter.—News of the World.

Essentially a romance of the ages—almost of the hour. We can not give any idea of the variety, vivacity, intensity of this admirable story.—Statesman.

The masterly key to his latent and meaning, furnished by Buchan.—Clerical Journal.

The novel of Debit and Credit is one which we can cordially recommend to the English reader. * * The translation before us, by L. C. C., is very spirited and agreeable.—Blackwood's Magazine for Jan. 1858.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

JOURNEYMAN. "Sam, if you don't go and steal me a Sausage, I'll not leave a whole bone in your body!"

SAUSAGE DEALER. "You varmint! at it again? Now I'll just teach you to steal Sausages."

MISS FLORA MCFLIMSEY'S MARRIAGE.

By LESLIE GOODWYN.

Air.—"Sea Bell."

Don't you remember the maiden, Tom Vine,
The maiden so richly attired,
Whose delicate face, as she leaned on my arm,
You and all who beheld her admired.
To that maiden I'm going to be wed, Tom Vane,
The wealthiest heiress in town,
She owns a neat palace in Madison Square,
And the breakfast is ordered by Brown.

The way of my wooing was this, Tom Vane,
That benefit of passion and truth,
I never deceived her, nor tried to deceive,
Nor ever pretended to wealth:
But my love was sincere as the heavens, Tom Vane,
And she knew not at first I was poor,
For in buying my locks, I still kept them from EVANS,
And thus I did HIDE GIFTS secure.

She had wealthier beaux by the score, Tom Vine,
But the trinkets and presents they brought
Were nothing to those which in EVANS'S store,
From the kind hand of FORTUNE I caught!
And she cried, "you pretend to be poor, my love,
And yet demand, for presents for me,—
Well—I've more than enough for the pair of us dear,
So you'll ORDER THE BREAKFAST FROM BROWN!"

Our New and Descriptive Catalogue, containing Testimonials of Character and full particulars, will be mailed free to any address upon application.

Address EVANS & CO.,
61 Broadway,
New York City.

GEO. W. THORNE, AGENT, BOOKBINDER.

Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY. All descriptions of binding done in the best style and at the lowest rates.

No. 321 PEARL STREET,
Three Doors below Harper's Building.

THE BOWER OF GENIUS.

Came to the bower with jewels hung,
Where Literature reposes,
And showered silks, old and young,
On wrinkles and on roses,
Presents of silver, gems, and gold,
In many a glancing cluster,
With flocks and hoops piece-meal sold,
The best the world can muster.

At the American Gift and Jewelry Co., No. 23 Broadway, a beautiful gift is guaranteed with every dollar purchase. Gift sent free of charge. Prospectus, no disappointments. Descriptive Catalogue free to all.

Address A. RANNEY, Agent.

OUR ILLUSTRATED FAMILY JOURNALS.

"The most beautiful weekly in the Union."—R. J. Bellarmine.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED.—A First-Class Pictorial Family Newspaper, which ought to be read by every family in the land. Weekly, at $2 a year, or $1 for half a year. FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

THE WATER-CURE JOURNAL,

Devoted to Hydropathy, its Philosophy and Practice: to Physiology and Anatomy, with numerous illustrations; and those laws which govern Life and Health. $1 a year.

THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL,

Devoted to all Progressive measures for the Elevation and Improvement of Mankind. Amply illustrated with Portraits and Literary Engravings. $1 a year.

FOR THREE DOLLARS ($3), in advance, a copy of each of the above Periodicals will be sent one year. Specimens sent, when desired. Address,
FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WING'S FARINA CRACKERS, so highly endorsed for their great nourishing and healthful properties as an article of food, may be procured, at Wholesale, only of
A. N. THOMPSON & CO.,
Nos. 211 and 213 Fulton Street, N. Y.

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA, is now ready. Price $2 50.

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, L. I.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies 8 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal, MRS. T. F. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 59.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

PUBLISHERS' CARD.

MR. THACKERAY'S new Story, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many spirited illustrations by the author, will be commenced in the DECEMBER number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets, received from the author in advance of publication in England; for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of $3,000.

☞ With the full knowledge of this arrangement, the proprietors of the New York Tribune, who have been leading advocates of an international Copyright Law, and profess the warmest regard for the interests of British authors in this country, have begun, and, falsely asserting that they received from a London edition,

☞ CONTINUE ☜

TO COPY THIS STORY FROM OUR MAGAZINE into their paper, though without the author's admirable illustrations. The same parties, under the same circumstances, reprinted upon us Mr. Dickens's "Little Dorrit," for which we paid the author Two Thousand Dollars.

No American publisher can afford to give two thousand dollars for early sheets of a Foreign work which is instantly reprinted upon him by a rival in business.

The course of the Tribune is, therefore, decidedly calculated to deprive the British author of the only compensation he can get, in the present state of the copyright law.

THE HONORABLE EDWARD EVERETT.

NEITHER foreigners nor natives —so far as we have seen—have ever remarked that one of the most striking characteristics of eminent Americans is their aptitude for oratory. Public speaking has grown to be so common an accomplishment, that there are but few citizens of the United States who are not prepared to deliver an impromptu stump speech on some topic of general interest. With us, grocers, mechanics, editors, lawyers, physicians, are always prepared, as a general thing, to harangue. The reverse is the rule abroad; in France and England the men who can speak in public are counted on the fingers.

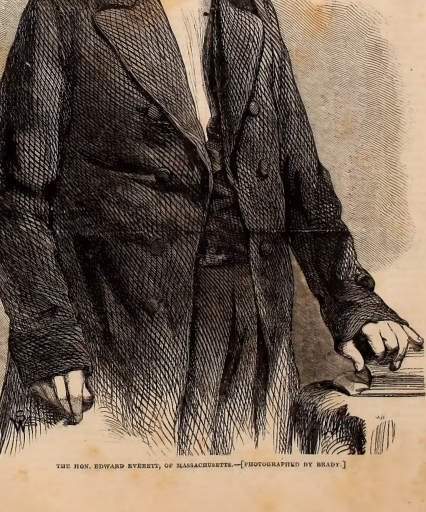
In itself the art of speaking fluently in public is nothing; it does not imply profundity of thought, and, except in few cases, is no indication of the gift of eloquence. It is an accident proceeding from our system of self-government. But it is natural that, where all can speak, many should speak well; and, further, that of these many some few should be excellent orators. There may seem to be vain boasting in the remark that the United States probably contains more masters of eloquence than any other country in the world; but there is reason to suppose that such is the case.

Of all our orators, the foremost, by general consent, is EDWARD EVERETT. He is the "golden-mouthed orator" whom young aspirants to fame strive to imitate. He is the type of the finished and perfect rhetorician. He was a famous speaker when the present generation lay paling in the cradle. He has made oratory the business and end of his life. For forty years he has been a laborious student, accumulating facts, principles, and doctrines. For forty years he has made learning and oratory the business of his life; dipping into political life by the way just to borrow from it whatever it had at the service of its peculiar aim, and relinquishing it when he had sucked it dry. It is natural that he should be at the present time the most perfect orator not only of the United States, but perhaps of the world.

His life has been remarkably serene, and happily contrived for his favorite pursuits. Born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, in 1794, the son of a New England clergyman, he was educated with the care which such a father was likely to bestow on his son. So precocious was he, that at thirteen he matriculated at Harvard, and graduated with honors four years later. His aptitude as a linguist was so notorious that the ruling powers of Harvard College kept their eye on him; and soon after he left the University, before he was twenty-one, he was offered the professorship of Greek, with the condition that, if he accepted it, he must spend some years in European travel in order to fit himself for his duties. How few young men at the present day have such offers extended to them! And how far-sighted was Harvard in this remarkable liberality to young Everett!

The years 1815 and 1816 were spent at the great seat of classical learning in Germany, Göttingen. Paris was exhausted in the winter of 1817–18. The spring and summer of 1818 were devoted to a closer analysis of the fruits of Oxford and Cambridge learning, and to delightful recreation in the society of Sir Walter Scott, Lord Byron, Lord Jeffrey, Sir Humphrey Davy, Sir Samuel Romilly, and others of equal merit; the autumn and winter were given to a thorough exploration of Italy and Greece. Let us pause a moment to dwell upon the completeness of this training. What man, having graduated at Harvard, spending afterward four years in the society of the ablest men of France, Germany, and England, and in the elaborate study of the great monuments of learning which preservations have erected in Europe, could fail to make his mark when he came home? How few at the present day enjoy such advantages! Young men in our time are in such a hurry to commence the actual business of life, that they are ingloriously every thing which adds to their apprenticeship. How few, too, will reach the eminence on which Edward Everett stands!

It was in 1819 that Mr. Everett entered upon the discharge of his duties as Professor of Greek at Harvard. It is not likely that the chair was ever filled by a Professor so thoroughly fitted for the place. The duties, however, were not sufficient to engross the leisure of so active a mind as Mr. Everett's. The editorship of the North American Review falling vacant, he was invited to become a candidate for the vacancy, and the preference was at once given to him. Of the merit of his performance as editor of that periodical, it is enough to say that he raised the Review to the position it occupied some years since, and that its subsequent circulation has been mainly due to the prestige of his efforts. Stress has been laid by biographers of Mr. Everett upon the success with which he vindicated the United States from the criticisms of foreign writers; he deserves the compliments they have paid him, but his replies to foreign critics are but an atom in the mass of his services to American literature and the American mind. The North American Review, under his direction, was a fit compeer of the Edinburgh, and Everett no whit inferior to Sydney Smith and Jeffrey.



In 1824, when Mr. Everett was thirty years of age, he began, simultaneously, his career as a politician and as an orator. An oration which he delivered in presence of the venerable Lafayette in that year attracted universal attention by his extraordinary powers; and from that time forth he became the orator of Massachusetts—a rank which even Daniel Webster proudly conceded to him. In the same year he was sent to Congress from Middlesex. In the House he was chiefly noted for his industrious habits and vast learning. He was an invaluable man on committees, and frequently did the whole work of the committee of which he was a member. On all debates of importance his voice was heard; but he never sought to make speeches. What he said was brief and to the point. Strangers, especially from New England, frequently thronged the House when he was to speak, in the expectation of hearing a grand oration; but they were invariably disappointed. Mr. Everett seemingly considered that there was a place for all things, and that Congress was not the place for set orations.

After ten years arduous labor in Congress, Mr. Everett was elected Governor of Massachusetts, which office he filled to the satisfaction of the people of that State for four consecutive years. In 1839 he was again a candidate, but was defeated by one vote out of over 110,000 cast. This defeat happily left him free to accept the mission to England, which was tendered him by the administration of General Harrison in 1841.

He was absent four years, during which time he won golden opinions from persons of every class in England. It is doubtful whether any American statesman stands as high as Edward Everett in the British judgment at the present time. He was described by an Englishman as a man firm and unbending as a rock on important questions, yet so conciliatory as to lead every one to suppose that he was ready to yield every point in dispute: keen and close in argument, "stuffed full of facts," and "as estimate a Yankee as you could meet with in a month's journey in New England."

On his return to his own country (which was a matter of deep regret to the British aristocracy and government), he assumed the Presidentship of his old University at Cambridge. A fortunate marriage—fortunate in every respect—had happily placed him beyond the necessity of daily labor for a livelihood. He was enabled to devote to his heart's content to the studies which were dear to him, and which are the best solace of life. Four years of retirement with his books must have proved a delicious recreation to the statesman and orator.

Accident disturbed his pleasing labors. He was unexpectedly called to fill a leading office in the Cabinet—the Secretaryship of State. He abandoned his library, and betook himself to the drudgery of official life with as much cheerfulness as he had displayed when his first public honors burst upon him. His most important public act—his letter on the Fishing question—was indited and published after his resignation of office; but the character of the man gave it as much importance as any official tenure could have imparted; and there is reason to believe that it was not without influence on the mind of the leading statesmen of England. A subsequent brief senatorial career justified the expectations which had been entertained of Mr. Everett. He always proved himself a philosopher and a sage. He held himself aloof from the petty squabbles of politicians, and rose above the body with which he was associated and the questions on which he was called upon to give his vote.

THE HON. EDWARD EVERETT, OF MASSACHUSETTS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

His subsequent career has been tranquil. He has appeared in public as an orator only. His oration on Charity, which he last delivered in this city on the 2d inst.; his oration on Washington, the profits of which are destined for the Washington Monument, and which has done more for that structure than all the private contributions of the public put together; his oration on Astronomy at the opening of the Albany Geological Hall, in August, 1856, are master-pieces of eloquence which will live for centuries after Burke, and Sheridan, and Patrick Henry, and will be learned by boys in schools in ages far hidden in the future. The writer had the good fortune to be in company with the eminent Professor Bache at the opening of the Geological Hall in Albany. Professor Bache introduced Mr. Everett, and in a few words, admirable as every thing Professor Bache says, described the emotions which the "golden-mouthed orator" had awakened in his young heart when he, a boy at West Point, had heard him deliver an oration there twenty years before. As the Professor regained his seat tears rolled from his eyes—tears of gratitude—as honorable to him who shed them as to the great man whose career caused them to flow.

Like most finished orators, Mr. Everett does not trust to the inspiration of the moment. He composes his speeches deliberately in the cabinet, writes them out, commits them to memory, and repeats them before his audience. Nothing—not even his gestures—are left to chance. Every thing is elaborately studied. He respects the public too sincerely to run the risk of disappointing them in any particular. Those who heard his oration on Tuesday will confirm the assertion that he never does disappoint his hearers; that in every respect—thought, matter, manner, and delivery—he realizes the beau-ideal of the PERFECT ORATOR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1858.

THE FRACAS IN CONGRESS.

ON Saturday morning, at two A. M., a personal rencontre took place in the Hall of Representatives between Messrs. Keitt, of South Carolina, and Grow, of Pennsylvania, in which the former gentleman had the misfortune to be knocked down. Other members, among whom was Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, mingled in the fight, and for some moments a regular pugilistic affray took place under the Speaker's nose.

The newspapers are, very naturally, indignant at the violation of decency involved in this appeal to brute force on the floor of the House. What they say is very just and proper. At the same time, it may be well to remember that violent party controversies are usually accompanied, in every country, by personal conflicts. Political business, of an ordinary routine character, can be, and usually is, transacted with gravity and decorum in this country as abroad. But history does not bear witness to any violent and bitter political controversy—especially if extensive personal property were involved—in which the hot blood of some of the controversialists did not lead to personal rencontres. Nor is there any reason to hope that there can be much improvement in this respect, so long as the imperfections of our nature endure. The old common law of England, on which our laws are based, directed that soldiers should not be stationed within three miles of a polling booth on election-day; in order, as the old lawyers say, that the voters might evince their sincerity and earnestness by hard knocks, if they were so minded. There is no generic distinction between the electors and the elected to justify the idea that the latter need no vent for their "sincerity and earnestness."

In England and France, in times of great political excitement, the duel has carried off the superfluous rage of the combatants. Under the last republic in France, just before the empire, duels were of daily occurrence; and when the English have any exciting question before their Parliament they will have duels too. In these Northern States the duel has become obsolete; hence the occasional interruption of legislative debates by explosions of personal violence. They are very much to be regretted; but so long as Congress is engaged with the Slavery question they must be expected.

UNIFORM CURRENCY.

THE movement for a uniform currency and uniform weights and measures among all commercial nations gains ground. Our neighbors, the Canadians, have adopted the decimal currency; the old pounds, shillings, and pence are rapidly disappearing from their commercial and financial ledgers. The Prussians are about to take steps to place their currency and weights and measures on a footing similar to the French. An association has been formed in England with a view to the same reform.

The difficulties which the various systems of coinage, weights, and measures throw in the way of commercial intercourse can hardly be exaggerated. A pound English is not a pound out of England; an American ton is a ton here, but less than a ton every where else. Between the United States and England there is no common measure of weight or unit of currency. The exchanges are so intricate that it is a special business to know them. An individual requires to undergo an apprenticeship to know how much a ton, a bushel, a pound, an ounce, a dollar, a cent will prove to be in foreign countries.

Some years ago the American Association for the Advancement of Science appointed a standing committee to inquire into the feasibility of a uniform currency and uniform weights and measures for the commercial world. Gentlemen of the highest scientific standing were appointed members of the committee. If they have done any thing the fact has not been made public. Possibly, as a committee of the Association, they felt that respect for the example set them by the parent body ought to forbid their doing any thing but talk.

Individuals here and there, however, have devoted attention to the subject. The eminent Dr. Lieber, late of Columbia, South Carolina, now of Columbia College in this city, is known to have collected a quantity of valuable statistics on the point; he is believed to have digested a plan for the reduction of the weights, measures, and currency of all commercial nations to one uniform standard. We are not acquainted with the features of his scheme; but it is to be presumed that it is a decimal one, and that it proposes to borrow from the French the best features of their system.

When Congress has quite settled the Kansas question perhaps it might be worth while to devote a little time to this topic. A man like Dr. Lieber, authorized by Congress to proceed to Europe to negotiate with the foreign Governments, might achieve valuable results. At any rate, the experiment would be worth trying.

PROHIBITIVE LEGISLATION.

WE have, on the statute book, several laws designed to put a stop to gambling in stocks. We have a law which declares that the sale of liquor by retail is an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment. We have other laws against gambling houses and lottery offices. We have laws against prostitution in any and every shape. Yet, in the face of these laws, prostitution, lottery offices, gambling houses, liquor selling, and stock speculation flourish to an unexampled extent.

A bona fide attempt has recently been made, by the Mayor of New York, to put down gambling houses. Policemen, duly armed with authority and prepared to execute the laws, have made descents upon well-known gambling establishments; they have not, in any single instance, found any thing to justify a seizure. When they made their appearance the most notorious dens of gamblers presented an aspect of primeval innocence. After heroic exertions they have been compelled to confess themselves beaten, and the Mayor's aim has, for the time, been defeated. It is needless to add that, after a convenient delay, the gambling houses will resume operations without let or hindrance.

The last Mayor of New York, Fernando Wood, began his career with a like display of virtuous vigilance. He, too, undertook to execute the laws and to abate nuisances. But the desire did not last long. He soon abandoned a hopeless and thankless contest with the vices and propensities of the people. We are doing no injustice to Mayor Tiemann when we say that he will follow the example. He will discover, before a fourth of his term has elapsed, that the evils against which the laws we have enumerated are directed are beyond the reach of law and police to eradicate. And, like a sensible man, he will confine his efforts to the pursuit of objects and reforms which are humanly feasible.

We, in this State of New York, lying midway between the large liberality of the South and the narrow precision of New England, are constantly wavering between the two. At regular intervals the Puritan spirit gains the ascendant, and laws are enacted which only differ in degree from the Blue Laws of Connecticut. Our worthy friends of the rural districts want to put down the bar-rooms which defile their respective villages; they want to put an end to the depreciation of their railways by the stock-gamblers of Wall Street; they are shocked by the brazen spectacle of vice which disgraces our streets at night; they have a private grudge against our gambling houses; and the plan they adopt is to make stringent laws against these various evils, and to leave their execution to the magistrates. If ladies were unduly kissed at Auburn and Schenectady, we should have a formal statute imposing fine and imprisonment on those who indulged in the profane diversion of kissing.

It is pretty well established that while the Puritan spirit may at times predominate in the country, the latitudinarian spirit is always in the ascendant in the cities; and thus, while our country friends amuse themselves by making laws, we in the cities divert ourselves by breaking them. We have, in large cities, certain habits and modes of thought and action; these can not be altered or modified by any law or statute. The only effect of prohibitive legislation in reference to these settled and inherent vices is, first, to induce concealment with its obvious concomitant evils, and, secondly, to engender a contempt for the law. There is no instance where a rooted habit among the people of a large city has been eradicated by legislation.

The fact ought at least to suggest to the Legislature the propriety of carefully considering any prohibitive laws which may hereafter be proposed. To load the statute book with laws which can not be executed, can not be agreeable to any mind. Whether a less direct opposition to unconquerable evils would achieve the end sought, may possibly be inquired with advantage.

IS CONGRESS CORRUPT?

MUCH ado has been caused at Washington by the proceedings of one J. D. Williamson, who hails from this city, and has figured first as a contumacious, and finally as a very willing witness before the Committee of Investigation now sitting at the Federal Capital. Mr. Williamson did not know any thing about the matter in hand—namely, the alleged corruption of Congress by the woolen manufacturers last year—but he volunteered the assertions that he did know that members of former Congresses had been bought up; that the tariff of 1846 had been carried by British money, contributed by British manufacturers; and that persons now occupying very high stations indeed had received money to influence their course on other prominent topics.

The question which has naturally arisen, on the publication of these statements, is—Who is J. D. Williamson? And up to this time that question has not been satisfactorily answered. It is said that he is a secret agent of somebody; but who that somebody is, wherein Williamson's duties as agent consisted, and why the agency was to be a secret one, remain matters of mystery.

During the investigation which led to the expulsion of three members of the last Congress, a new and seemingly popular vocation for gentlemen of easy virtue and ample leisure was introduced to public notice. This was bribery brokerage. It was made evident that there was a class of persons among the lobby agents in Washington who carried on a trade in members' votes. Some were ready to contract to sell so many votes for or against a bill; while others confined themselves to the safer department of holding bribes in trust for purchasers and vendors of votes. It has been asked—Does Mr. Williamson belong to this class of persons? If he does not, he ought to say so, to clear his skirts and silence calumny; if he does, he does himself injustice, in a business point of view, by remaining in obscurity.

There are many men living who sat in Congress when the Tariff bill of 1846 was passed, and who voted for that measure. It devolves upon them to call this Mr. Williamson once more to the stand, and to compel him to designate the names of the members who were on that occasion bought with English money. Until this is done, wherever Williamson is believed suspicion will rest upon every member who voted with the majority in favor of the tariff of 1846.

THE LATEST MEXICAN REVOLUTION.

THE advices from Mexico represent the whole country as being in a state of revolution; the mails regularly robbed; every considerable city in the hands of insurgents; the capital disputed inch by inch at the cannon's mouth by the two parties; foreigners and natives murdered without a chance of redress; all business, trade, and industry brought once more to a stand.

Of course, coming from a Spanish-American country, the news takes no one by surprise. We should be more astonished if we heard of a stable government being established, and enjoying the respect and obedience of the people of the country. Mexico, like France, is subject to chronic revolutions; but, as becomes the restlessness of her people, the periods of revolution recur at least three times as frequently as they do in France.

However similar the outward phenomena, the real difficulties in France and Mexico are widely different. France is a democratic country, of liberal instincts, seeking naturally, at regular intervals of a generation or so, a change of government; and the genius of French statesmen has never provided any means for such a change short of a revolution. In Mexico, the case is totally different. There the Church is the chief obstacle to good government. The Mexican Church is immensely rich; the people and the Government are poor. The public revenues fall far short of the public expenditure; and an increase of customs duties—which in this country would be successfully resorted to in case of need—would simply lead there to a curtailment or cessation of imports. Hence, the Government is naturally driven to lay imposts on those wealthy corporations which enjoy the benefits of government without contributing to its charges; in other words, to make the Church contribute out of its substance to maintain the existing authorities. This the Mexican clergy—with true ecclesiastical avarice—have never consented to do; and whenever the question has been pressed, they have contrived by their influence over the people to excite a revolution. This is the history of all the revolutions which have taken place in Mexico during the past quarter of a century; it is the secret of the contest now being waged. It is, moreover, the history of a contest which has been fought out in every European country, from Great Britain to Spain and Portugal. There is not a Christian country in whose history the successive accumulation of wealth in the hands of the Church, and the spoliation of that Church by the secular power, have not formed prominent incidents.

Some day a man will be placed in the Presidential chair who will have nerve to undertake and strength to carry out a thorough spoliation of the Mexican Church. He will make the Church pay the expenses of the war. He will strip the fat cathedrals and swollen abbeys remorselessly. Then, perhaps, it may be possible for a good government to exist in Mexico. But till that is done, revolution must continue to be the usual rule, and stable government the exception.

THE LOUNGER.

WANTED A WIFE—BADLY.

A WORTHY man advertised for a wife. She was to be between seventeen and twenty-five, and a good seamstress. Also, she was never to have been married, although the advertiser himself was a widower—but men are the lords of creation. He bravely confessed that he was neither rich nor handsome, but would treat his wife well.

A wicked wag wrote a reply to the advertisement, which drew the following answer from the wife-hunter.

N.B.—Grammar no object.

Washington City DC januay 17th 1858

Mrs or Dear madam From your first leter you stated to that you prefer akind and True friend to one of riches or Beauty iam the very Man for your Mind my first and Greatest Care is Pay attention to the Every Wants and Comfort and happines of awife my first wife used to say She had Engoyed more happiness in 3 months after imarried her than she Engoyed in 7 years iam amost Powerful and a splendid Provider without any Stint for Whatever Now as thousands upon 1000s Can Testify of this fact iam aman of all Stiring Preservance and industrious and temperate Sober upright and honest in all My Dealling ineither Drink or Smoke or Chew Tobaco or Go to any Places of amusement and as for Swearing i have not Sworn abad Word Sence 1842 ibelong to the episcopal Church first-Ward all this What ihave Said is areality ihave no temper to guard ido not Believe in aquareling life iam one of the Most Peacebel and Quiet men Now living and ihave to much respet for awife to Treat her Bad i have Ben Wownded in the texican War 1836 so iam not called hansome as all Can see awound on on My face you will know me By the red Stripe an red Calico vest milatory Cap With asilver star Before my Cap this is no hoax neither Do i wish to take any advantage of your frankness but Will Protect at my peril So help me God Now Misess if you are the very indentical Lady who have riten to me about our union do Come at all harzard Call at my residence Between —— and —— Streets
Name over the Door or rite to me through the Postoffe but iwould rather Call you must Excuse me for this leter

OUR OWN JOHN THOMAS JENKINS.

THE Lounger's Washington correspondent is very anxious not to be outdone in discrimination by his talented contemporaries. He writes, under a late date:

"The speech of Mr. A., on Monday, was acknowledged to be the finest speech ever delivered in Congress. Mrs. B.'s party, the same evening, was the most successful fête ever known in Washington. Mr. C.'s speech in committee, on Tuesday, is, beyond question, the greatest Congressional effort on record. Mrs. D.'s ball, on Tuesday evening, was confessedly the most brilliant in the social annals of the metropolis. Guests came even from Georgetown, Capitol Hill, and the next street. The gowns were gorgeous. Hon. Mr. E. will speak to-morrow, and his speech will undoubtedly be the feature of the session. It will surpass all that has been heard upon the subject. Mrs. F. has cards out for to-morrow evening. It will probably be the most recherché affair ever known in the fashionable circles of the Federal metropolis. Mrs. Secretary G. is going to wear her grandmother's brooch upon the occasion; and Mrs. Senator H. has turned her yellow satin, to grace the festive halls. Mrs. Jenkins has been darning my best trowsers, and washing out my white cotton gloves, that I may be all ready. The fashionable world is on the qui vive. Several quarts of ice-cream are known to be already ordered. There is going to be TERRAPIN and a real lord! J. T. J."

BAYARD TAYLOR'S NEW BOOK.

IN the absence of any winter of our own, Bayard Taylor hands us his pictures of a Norwegian and Finnish and Lapland winter, colored with that cheerful, rosy enthusiasm which makes his descriptions of all scenes in all countries poetic and exhilarating.

His northern journey was a rapid flight across snow and ice, through black forests and obliterated fields, under stars and a midnight sun and the northern lights. He drove reindeer—he froze his nose—he and his companion almost lost their wits in the cold—he ate fat, and drank unknown drinks—he saw dirty and ignorant, cheery and honest people—and he has thrown all into a book which flashes before the mind like a shifting, dazzling phantasmagoria of icicles and snow, and lights rich as rainbows, streaming over all.

The same genial intrepidity and universal adaptation—the genius of taking every thing as he finds it, and making the most and the best of it—the same facility of address and unconquerable good-humor, without which no man can travel with advantage, and with which Bayard Taylor always travels, are as evident in his new book as in all his old ones.

Certainly, since John Ledyard, there has been no American traveler who loved travel for its own sake so truly as Bayard Taylor. His sympathies are so quick, his perception so just, his appreciation so generous, his imagination so warm, that he is at home every where, and tells the story of his wandering with a manly simplicity which well accounts for his great popularity as an author. Of all the younger American writers he is the best known and the most eagerly sought; and when he has been every where, and seen every thing—as, of course, he must do—his complete record of travel will be the most cheerful cosmorama in literature.

?

"Auburn, January, 1858.

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—I have always taken the Tribune, and have always liked it. I agree with its sentiments about copyright and the honesty of giving authors their own. I have, therefore, watched with surprise its course in relation to Thackeray's 'Virginians,' and observe that it makes no reply to the plain statement of the Weekly, some two weeks ago. Does the Tribune mean to have the friends who have stood by it, and believed in it through thick and thin, especially upon the copyright question, understand that it advocates picking the pockets of an author, because the law which it advocates for his protection has not yet been passed? If it has done wrong in this matter, why will it not say so?

"Your obedient servant,

"—— ——."

A NEW POEM BY MRS. KEMBLE.

Rachel is gone; but a great dramatic interpreter yet remains. The spell which Fanny Kemble cast upon this country when she first came to it, more than twenty years ago, still binds it fast; and her readings of Shakespeare awaken, in their way, the same enthusiasm which her acting of Shakespeare excited years ago.

Her reading is an astonishing monologue. She sits quietly at a table, but she looks and speaks and acts all the characters in the play, each one as distinctively drawn by her inflection of voice and expression of face as if the name were previously announced. Her reading of Shakespeare is that of the school whose name she bears. It is Siddonian; it is the reading of John Kemble's descendant. It is the reproduction, by one Kemble reading, of a whole stage full of Kembles acting.

It is, therefore, a close following of the conventions of the English school. It is mannered, as Rachel's recitation of the French Alexandrines was, and as, perhaps, all reading and acting must be. But her profound appreciation of the varying shades of character, the conviction of the listener that she enjoys the reading herself, as if she were a third party, her incredible resources of tone and implied action, and the deep, rich, musical modulation of her voice, make the golden evening "all too swiftly sped," as Longfellow says of her in his sonnet.

Fanny Kemble is, without doubt, the greatest living interpreter of Shakespeare. A woman of quick intellect and passionate genius, she has the deepest reverence for the great master—a tender veneration, of which the following sonnet, now for the first time published, is the exquisite expression:

TO SHAKESPEARE.

Oft, as my lips I open to rehearse
 Thy wondrous spells of wisdom and of power,
And that my voice and thy immortal verse,
 On listening ears and hearts, I, mingled, pour:
I shrink dismay'd, even as the sound I hear,
 From the presumption of my own rash deed;
Thy glorious spirit seems to mine so near,
 That, suddenly, I tremble as I read:
Thee, an invisible auditor, I fear.—
Oh if it might be so, my master dear!
 With what beseeching would I pray to thee,
To make me equal to my noble task:
Succor from thee how humbly would I ask,
 Thy worthiest words to utter worthily.

TIT PRO TAT.

In speaking of Rachel last week the Lounger said that in this country, however tolerably we might commong voo porty voo, we could not speak French. On the other hand, the following note from Monsieur Crapeau shows the difficulties that environ our dear vernacular when approached by the Gallic genius:

"St. Louis, Missouri, January, 1858.

"Monsieur the Lounger.—Three years ago I did arrive in this very admirable republic. I came with the intention chiefly to acquire your (pardonnez!) d—d language, and thought at last, by much study of the dictionary, that I had learned him pretty good without the aid of a teacher. So, after practicing with my own countrymen for much period, I naturally cogitate that I be well 'posted.' I then take board in an American hotel, and, on the vigor of my knowledge, enter liberally into conversation with my fellow-boarders. Ah! I soon detect that they make jolly about me. And yet I speak always like Noah Webster's Dictionary says—Parbleu! My pronunciation is akin to perfection, all people say, and yet they make a large quantity of derision when I shall talk in the English language—Sacre! I know not what to do to help myself, your tongue is so intricate!

"I have frequently observed, by example, that the mother of a pretty little girl is pleased when her daughter is called 'a charming little puss,' or 'a kitten.' One day, desiring to compliment an American lady who is acquainted with me, and who possesses two fine children, I applied the term to her daughter; she appeared gratified. Thinking to get still more into her good graces, I patted her small boy on the head, and called him 'a promising young puppy.' To my much amazement, the lady became indignant, and sailed out of the room, muttering something that had the sound of 'Brute!' She has not spoken at me since, and I can not conceive how I injure her sensibility.

"On another occasion, a new-married gentleman introduced to me his wife—a very delicious woman. After the interview he wanted to be cognizant of my opinion of her. 'Isn't she a duck of a girl?' he ask, with raptures. Wishing to make him feel good, and also to surpass him in his comparison, I bethought me of a prettier bird than the duck, and, with gallantry, replied, 'Yes, my friend, she is a regular goose of a girl.' Would you believe it, Mister the Lounger, this compliment procured for me a broke head? Without doubt, did it!

"In fact, whenever I project to be peculiarly correct or elegant, I, without variation, place my feet into him.

"And then I hear every day so odd expressions which my dictionary do not explain to me. The boys so much say, 'Go it, boots!' sometimes adding, 'for wooden legs are cheap!' I can not for my life understand in what particular manner boots are thereupon expected to perambulate (eh! is that last word correctly applied?), nor how their going could possibly be affected by the price of wooden legs. 'Go in, lemons!' they cry, too, very much. Do the juvenile Americans thereby mean to advise that the person addressed shall actually enter that fruit, or is 'Lemons' merely a familiar nickname for any body that exhibits a disposition to fight? Begar, it is totally incomprehensible to me!

"By confound it! your droll English tongue is so full of incongruity! I never shall be able to talk him with agility. What shall I do? By pshaw! I entertain much notions to manufacture tracks back to La belle France.

"I remain, Mister the Lounger, all days yours,

"Jean Crapeau."

MORE HOGS?

A frightened friend writes to the Lounger that a horrid thought has entered his mind. Upon taking the Fourth Avenue cars the other morning to come down to the Park, whither his duties call him for the purpose of settling great differences among mankind, by the aid of jurisprudence, he found himself compelled, by an event which occurred during the ride, to ask himself, Can it be that the family, of which the males smoke and spit in the ladies' cabin of the Brooklyn ferry-boats, and occupy several seats in railroad cars when they have paid for one, has also female members? Are there female Hogs?

If not, says this excited man, what am I to make of the person in female clothes who stepped into the crowded car and took a gentleman's seat—which was most courteously offered her—without a solitary word or look of recognition and gratitude in reply?

"Madame," said genial C. S., whom the pleasant homes of wooded Berkshire, where he lived, shall long remember—"Madame," he said to a person in female clothes, to whom he had given his seat in a car, and who at length felt nervous from his looking at her, and asked him if he had left any thing in the seat, or were waiting for any thing—"Madame, I have left nothing; I am waiting to hear you say 'Thank you!'"

BALMORAL OR IMMORAL.

The suggestion of O. Law Ray, in a late Lounger, of a new science of costume to be called Phylactrology, is already received and approved, and the practice has already begun. At least, so far as this—that, if skirts are not to be the cause of reading in others, they are to be well red themselves.

The Queen of England walks in summer mornings over the Scottish heather, wet with dew, clad in a red p—tt—t, like a sensible woman, that she may not soil the snowy edges of the august p—tt—ts which she is wont to wear upon domestic occasions. Thereupon American ladies in Broadway must immediately gird themselves with colored p—tt—ts also; and that article of feminine costume, of which no man is supposed to know more than a vague tradition that there is such a garment, is forthwith discussed in the newspapers, and every masculine eye is turned toward the lower edge of every lady's toilet, to ascertain whether the p—tt—t is red.

It is an immense excitement. There are, at a moderate computation, ten thousand of these daring garments already made up in the city, and ready to be worn the moment any lady of sufficient ton will show her blushing ankles. Let us hope the blush will go no lower than the ankles. Having deserted the cheeks, it is truly sad to think that it may be trampled under foot altogether.

The Lounger is assured that the p—tt—t in itself is a perfectly harmless garment, and innocent also. But it instinctively goes under cover, and delights in concealment. What wonder, then, that it grows so very red upon being publicly talked about in the newspapers! If you happen to see it as you go up town, and it looks fiery, remember it is only coloring at your impertinence in staring at it. To speak lightly of its blushes is the act of a betrayer of innocence. Pass it gently without notice or remark, and who knows but it may recover all its pristine purity—a purity which could not blush, because it knew and suspected no evil.

OUR LETTER-BOX.

Μι Δεαρ Σιρ,—I σηε ιν αν αρτικλε σιγνεδ "Κολλεγιαν," αν ιντεντιον ον θε παρτ οφ υρ κορρεσπονδεντ το δεπρεσιατε θε σταιδινγ οφ οθερ σοσιετιες;—Ιφ ιν θε "Κολλεγιαν's" αδμιρατιον οφ θε "ΦΒΚ's" θε "ΨΧ's" θε "ΨΥ's" ανδ οθερ πετ σοσιετιες θε "Κολλεγιαν" κουλδ ρεφραιν φρομ τρεαδινγ ον θε κορνς οφ θε "ΘΔΧ's" ανδ οθερ ρεσπεκταβλε κολλεγε σοσιετιες, υρ ρεαδερς μιγτ κομε το θε κονκλυσιον θατ "Κολλεγιαν" υας νοτ α πυφερ γενεραλ το θε φιρστ μεντιονεδ σοσιετιες ανδ α σεκρετ φοε το θε "ΘΔΧ's."

Υρς ρεσπεκτφυλλιε

Γραδυατε.

—This learned letter must finally dispose of this exciting subject. Our Letter-Box has been in flames several times in consequence of the fiery nature of the communications dropped into it concerning the societies which are interested in the Greek alphabet. A dead language, indeed! The Lounger knows of nothing so lively at this moment, except a wonderful Stilton cheese of his friend Sparrowgrass's!

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—You see that I live at a good distance, and that it takes your wonderful paper a long time to reach me, consequently the news has almost just got to me that 'Mr. O'Rumpkin looks at Mrs. Catherine and wonders what has become of little Kate.'* I might fear that you had had time to forget that he ever did look at her and wonder such dreadful things, but then I know that nobody could, you know.

"Now a state of perpetual wonder is an awkward, disagreeable, and stupid state to be in, consequently I feel a quick sympathy for Mr. O'R. I have been all my life wondering at something. When other children of my age were thinking of nothing, I lent all the powers of my young mind to discover why a certain bird upon my curtain did not jump, when he looked as if he wanted to—so badly. When people have grown lean before my eyes, I have wondered where the fat went; when they have spread out (I mean before hoops came up), I have wondered whence the superfluous flesh came. I have wondered what becomes of all the pins, needles, and fine bonnets, which are made in the world; I have wondered what a score of my gentlemen acquaintances could see in a few of my female friends to charm them so; and I have given the matter serious consideration, when I have heard it said that Miss Brown had nerves because she fainted, and Miss Jones had nerve because she didn't faint.

"I have not been able to 'hazard even a wide solution' to any of these mysteries, so much of grave philosophy lurks in the simple questions; but when I heard of Mr. O'Rumpkin's difficulty, it struck me at once!!

"If Mr. O'R. had not given such a full description of his dress, manner, and feelings in his wooing days, I might have been a little confused; but as it is, it is as clear as day!

"I don't know if you can do it, Mr. Lounger, but I want you to take a full view of Mr. O'R. on his wedding day, then follow him up (or down) through the years, to that very morn upon which he sent you that wondering letter. Have you done it? Well! can't you see? He made her Mrs. Catherine.

"Little Kate, struck cold and silent at the thought of being married to one person, whom she had supposed some one else, lies at this moment well-nigh dead in the very bottom of Mrs. Catherine's heart.

"She deserted her post? No! she had to get out of the way! Did she marry a man with a nightcap on? Would she have stood at the altar with Mr. O'R. if she had known who it was? Bless you, no! I can't say that Mr. O'R. has any power to go where little Kate is to look for her. If he longs for her very much—as he says he does—he may try. He must take off his cap, change his voice's tone—in fact, he must pretend to be somebody else again, or she won't come back—even if she is still alive.

"Do you really believe all that about Mr. O'R.'s nursing the baby? Well! don't any more—it's all, all stuff! How do I know? O'Rumpkins are not sealed books to me! I have had my experiences. O'Rs are not the Innocents they pretend to be to unsuspecting Loungers.

"Don't believe those hints about the traps which little Kates lay for O'Rumpkins. Little Kates don't lay traps; if they did would not O'Rs jump into them gladly? There are numerous traps laid for O'Rs through life I admit, but if they never fell into any but those they fell into unwillingly, how Virtue's list would grow, to be sure!

"Dear, unsuspecting Lounger, let me open your eyes! I can tell you all about the O'Rumpkins, and as for little Kates—I know their sad history well.

"To Mr. O'R. I would say, that if little Kate is alive she would like to come back. She likes nice, cosy firesides (such as people promise on their wedding-days) much better than a bitter bed of tears in a lonely heart. She will come back with the person she married—not Mr. O'R.

Yours, respectfully,

"Sagacity Ironsides."

"Dear Lounger,—I was so much pleased with the remarks you made in reference to that public benefactor who has rarely been invited to eat in honor of his fame and services—the artist. Oh, I would like so to talk with you about him, he is such a modest being; he comes not forth to the public halls to be seen and heard of men, neither do they put him in high places. But, why not? 'Painting is the poetry of religion.' Is this true? It comes not in the whirl and roar of commerce, therefore we see it not. The poetry of religion? This may in a degree account for its exceeding retirement. Who studies, toils, and labors like as he, with so little encouragement? None! no not one! His intellectual gems come forth, we look upon them and are pleased, that is all. His sermons from the whispering brook, the golden fields of summer, or the wild glee of the terrible ocean, go forth upon their exalted mission, but we think not of it. Yes, I would like so to converse with you a long time of his glorious art—to talk with you often. Would you be pleased to have me chat with you? V. de V."

—Simplicity, O V. de V., whether in painting, poetry, or prose is the great excellence of art. Why not say of the painter that "he paints pictures?" What do you mean by saying that "his intellectual gems come forth?" How could you suppose any Lounger would be able to sustain conversation at that height?

The expression "Painting is the poetry of religion" which you quote, means as much as Byron's platitude, "Ye stars, which are the poetry of heaven!" (the Lounger hopes he doesn't misquote the noble lord.) It is not a beautiful, but a Bulwerian expression, and there is a great difference between beauty and bulwer (with a small b).

"V. de V."—might the Lounger dare to think of Lady Clara Vere de Vere?—must not be wroth with his friend for "blowing out" in this way. The old sculptor said to his pupil, "First, form; and second, form; and third, form; those are the rules of sculpture." And so simplicity in all the places, first, second, and always, is the rule of good writing.

Don't say that if that be so you won't come to school to the Lounger, for you have come to his school, and he hopes you will come again.

* See Harper's Weekly for November 7th and 14th, 1857.

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

"WHITE LIES."

There could not have been selected a more appropriate title for this novel than that of "White Lies." The characters are always telling lies to each other; the friends of the author told lies when they denied that its plot was taken from Auguste Maquet's play "Le Chateau de Grantier;" the Pecksniffian management of the city theatre, where "White Lies" has been produced as a drama, told a lie when they announced that the dramatic version, by some unknown scribbler who perhaps does not exist after all, "had been prepared under the supervision of the author by a distinguished member of the London Dramatic Authors' Society." The evening papers allowed correspondents to tell lies impugning the motives of two of the gentlemen who write theatrical criticisms for the leading journals. This was the more unjust because these gentlemen, being private persons, have no opportunity to reply, and yet, being in some measure separated from the public, they can not come out from their anonymity to defend themselves. The charges are, as I happen to know, all lies from beginning to end. As to the charge that the criticisms were influenced by the fact that the critics were vexed because they had been anticipated in the work, I can only say that a good version would now be successful, while that which has already been performed was a miserable failure. And, further, I will guarantee that Harper's youngest apprentice shall take the novel, and in forty-eight hours get out a better dramatic version of it than that played at ——'s Theatre.

It speaks well for the comity of the press when a respectable journal like the Evening Post allows anonymous correspondents to assail though its columns gentlemen whose veracity, rectitude, and reliability have never been impeached in the course of several years of journalistic life. One might have expected it from the Tribune, which, with its customary fellow-feeling for thieves, says, "Whether or not Mr. Reade stole this play from a French play we don't care." Being "in the same box," the organ of the faro gamblers "don't care," of course. In fact, rather likes it.

I have said more about this than I intended, but I only desired to show how one lie makes many. It is well, however, that the play failed. Our young women are quite bad enough now. They do not need to be told that a woman like Josephine may make love to two men at the same time—marry, cheat, and swindle them—and absolutely be rewarded for so doing by receiving the hand of her favored lover through the "magnanimity" of the first husband, then living. If the stage is to inculcate such lessons as these, "under the patronage of our first families," I shall begin to think there is too much truth in the denunciations leveled against it by the religious press.

LE JUPON ROUGE.—SYMPTOMS OF REBELLION.

"What do you suppose," said I to Ethelinda, "they wore those horrid red caps (bonnets rouges) for in the time of the French Revolution?" "Why," said the brightest and best, "because they wouldn't show dirt. Don't you know that the color of the Bourbons was clean, gentlemanly white? But cleanliness was too aristocratic for such nasty fellows as Marat; and they took red, white, and blue, the lowest and dirtiest adopting red alone, because, as I said before, it would not show dirt nor blood—two Red Republican essentials." "Then," I insinuated, "I presume you don't like the scarlet petticoat?" "Like it!" returned the most magnificent, "I should think not. It is a base conspiracy against soap and water—a scheme to deter the use of detergents. Besides that, it is not pretty for the drawing-room, and in the street every body would say, 'There goes a red petticoat!' 'That's the most disagreeable thing in the world!' 'There goes a new bonnet!' or 'What a splendid dress!' A lady who has good taste will dress herself unobtrusively and nicely throughout, so that one article of her costume shall not predominate over the other, and attract marked attention. If the Queen of England, to make a little popularity in Scotland, sees fit to wear peasants' clothes, well and good for her; if the ladies in Canada, who are continually walking, or riding, or skating, or sleighing, or doing some awful thing or other in the open air like them—that is well also. They are quite suited to the climate. But no person of taste, none of our set, I'm sure, will ever have one in the world."

I presume that matter is quite settled. A bas le jupon rouge! Vive le jupon blanc!

BAVARIA IN HOPE CHAPEL.

The erratic Countess, the wandering dancer, the wife of many husbands, has been guilty of many audacities. She has, they say, snubbed royalty to its face; she was frequently in the habit of horse-whipping colonels of dragoons; with many more minor exploits in the same line. This chief of the female Bohemians has lately, however, overtopped all of her previous achievements in the way of impudence, and has absolutely delivered a lecture to the ladies of this city upon the proper method of preserving their beauty. As if they were not handsomer and cleverer than any other women in the world! As if they ever were obliged to resort to any of those mysterious toilet appliances by which European dowagers get up a feeble imitation of the bloom of youth! There was, to be sure, some good advice in the lecture. Ladies were told to take long walks—not in Broadway (I should really like to know where any decent person can walk in this city unless it is in Broadway, and one or two streets up town)—and to do various other things, which they will do—if they like. Is it necessary to say that the lecture was clever, pointed, epigrammatic, and well delivered? and that the great exiled looks precisely the same as she did ten years ago? Well, that is the case.

THE CALICO BALL

Has come and gone, and was a great success in every way. There was a good deal of humbug about the calico part of it, as every body expected; and the few cheap dresses that were worn disappeared at midnight, when the ball really commenced. There was a good deal of "sham" about the poem by "a distinguished literati" (whatever that is), but it was quite up to the average of such efforts. The Seventy-first Regiment kept the floor in good order; and it was a capital idea to have the men there. I never knew before that militia soldiers could be made of any use. But the Age of Wonders is evidently at hand. Ethelinda says she made a member of Congress useful the other day. After that we may expect any thing.

I am very glad that the Ball was so successful. It will net a handsome amount of money, as well as many donations of clothes—all highly necessary just now; for I hear, in my wanderings, of a great deal of distress in that class of poor people who will not apply for relief, but who are sought out by some truly benevolent ladies—angels of mercy who are satisfied to have the reward of their own consciences. Let us hope that the blessings showered upon their heads will be returned ten-fold.

THE RED PETTICOAT AND ITS PEDIGREE.

"It is our painful duty to announce the death, this week, at her lodgings, from fever, produced by overanxiety, of the celebrated mantua-maker, Mrs. Selby, the inventor of the hooped petticoat."

Thus the London Weekly Journal for the first week in January, 1717, near a century and a half ago. And hence the acute reader may learn how old is every thing under the sun; for not only doth this long-forgotten Mrs. Selby strip our modern milliners of every claim to originality, but, if the truth were known, she herself, in her day, was regarded by the erudite as an ignoble plagiarist from some long-buried female Snip of foreign extraction. Let us be content with whispering that there is in that bloody city of Delhi a female idol—say a Vishnu—which was made no long ago that the creation is an affair of yesterday in consequence, and which wears a full-hooped hoop.

Every body knows that if Madame de Montespan had never added to the pretty large family of her lord and master the king, hooped petticoats would never have become fashionable. At least, the chances would have been against them. But Madame de Montespan loved her lord, and was shame-faced. "I see that Madame de M—— has put on her robe bottonée, therefore she must," etc., says the babbling old Duchess of Orleans. So the fashion spread across the Channel, and was even brought across the Atlantic, to Virginia, in some of the fortunate ships which were freighted with persons of the better condition.

The idea of expanded skirts—with a view, seemingly, of giving an appearance of solidity to the female figure by enlarging its base—was familiar to the fashionable world as early as the days of Raleigh. But the expansion was not circular; the skirt hung from two or more projections proceeding from a belt round the waist; and the belt and projections were known by the inelegant but intelligible name of "pairs of hips."

"I faith, Maria," says the young lady in the shocking old play, "some varlet has run off with my new hips."

Our artist has sketched for us a figure in the expanded skirt of Elizabeth's time, and another in the long, graceful, flowing train, which was worn at court for so many years, and which, so far as appearance goes, strikes us as by far the most artistic and beautiful costume ever worn by a lady.

If people will go to the Astor Library and examine old books of costume, and especially caricatures, they will perceive that the hoop of the eighteenth century was not only similar in appearance to that of the nineteenth, but that it gave rise to precisely the same jokes and just as many witticisms as have been freshly received about it in our day. Nearly all the jests about hoops are to be found in the Spectator, the Tatler, the Examiner; one of the very best facetiæ of the Tatler—the trial of a young lady for constructing the tagtway with her hoops—was the other day modernized and adapted into a Boston paper, whence it has gone the rounds of the press of the Union.

Between the hoop of Madame de Montespan's day and that of our own the female skirt has fluctuated prodigiously. It ebbed back at one time, until, under the French Empire, the waist was under the arm-pits, and a lady duly provided with skirts needed, for the fashion of the time, little or no other clothing. Then the ebb proceeded from the other extremity, and gradually fair ankles were suffered to be seen and the extremity of a tapering leg. Against this enormity moralists long protested in vain. They might indeed have preached till doomsday—so inexorably obstinate is the female sex—but for one accident: how shall we describe it? Nature, jealous of her gifts, has not been so prodigal of graceful ankles as the fashion of thirty years ago would have required. First one fine lady, then another, blushing for undue solidity where grace requires tapering form, let fall her dress to within an inch or two of the ground. They say that Queen Victoria, whose example has been so recently followed in another novelty, was one of the first to adopt the fashion of long dresses. But who shall dare to criticise a monarch's ankle? Whether that gracious potentate was or was not led by vulgar considerations of what her courtiers might think of her foot and the adjacent premises, it is undoubted that, with the courage of her character, she took an early lead in adopting the long skirt, whereupon all good Englishwomen followed suit; and the rest of the female world, brought to consider first the grace of the long skirt, and next its convenience for the bulk of Eve's daughters, frankly adopted it too.

Hoops succeeded at an interval of nearly twenty-five years, as a substitute for the load of heavy skirts which fashionable ladies felt bound to wear in order to produce the requisite expansion in the skirt. And last of all came the latest novelty, the Scarlet Petticoat.

Every body has read how Queen Victoria, sojourning at Balmoral, and grievously impeded in her mountain walks over the dewy heath and grass by the flapping of a bundle of wet skirts at her heels, was struck by the advantage which the short petticoat of the Highland girls gave them over the fashionables of the court; how she instantly resolved to borrow the convenient article of raiment; how Prince Albert, who, in the intervals of the severe labors which are known to engross his time, had once or twice, not oftener, noticed the petticoats of the aforesaid Highland girls, declared that the attire was good, not only in shape but in color; how the Queen ordered half a dozen red petticoats with stripes; how every body in England flew into red skirts directly; how the French took it up with the ardor and vivacity of their character; and finally, how Lady Cora Dundey, as the lawful representative of Her Majesty in the United States, formally introduced the garment at Washington, and our ladies straightway pronounced the verdict that it would do. Every body knows all this. People may not know, however, that within the past few weeks over ten thousand of these scarlet petticoats have

LADY OF FASHION A.D. 1660.

FASHION OF 1690.

THE MODERN HOOP.

COURT DRESS A.D. 1730.

PARIS FASHION, 1825.

THE SCARLET PETTICOAT.

been made here and elsewhere. The finest are of an all-wool material, consilierably thicker than flannel; the color is generally dark crimson, with black, green, or purple stripes; they are usually embroidered at the bottom. Others again are of cheaper material, with bayadere stripes, and sometimes stamped with a border of palm-leaves round the lower edge. The price varies from three to twelve dollars.

Every one who has watched the miseries of our New York ladies on a muddy day will wish well to the scarlet petticoat. It seems to be the only contrivance by which dirt and decency can both be regulated.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

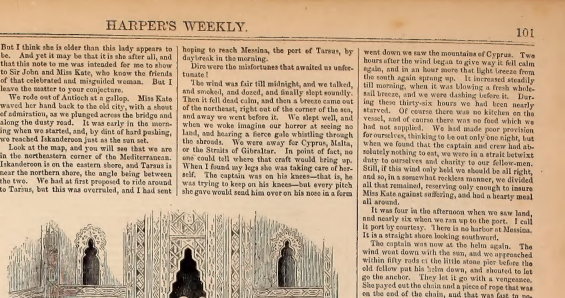
NO. XXVII.

Leaving Antioch.—My mysterious Friend again.—A Note.—Lady Ellenborough.—Our Ship.—A Change of Wind.—Drives out to Sea.—Cyprus.—A great Mountain.—Another Change of Wind.—The Port of Tarsus.—Arab way of letting go an Anchor.—A Wreck.—Landing at Messina.

THERE was a gay scene in the old Square of Antioch the morning that we left. Some of these Oriental scenes I would like to impress on my mind so that I should never lose them. The queer men who look into one's face out of those sleepy eyes, the flashing orbs of the women, now more fully exposed than in former years—for fashion has so changed the Oriental customs that even the faces of the women are almost visible through the thin laces that are the substitute for the old yashmak—the mixture of nations, the strange and varying costumes, all these go to form the scene; but it is necessary to a perfect realization of it that you should hear the Babel of voices which make the air ring in an Eastern market-place.

We were all on horseback. The baggage was on the mules, and the train was about to move off, when a small, old, Arabic-looking fellow, a weasel-faced specimen of the Eastern beggar, approached me and slipped into my hand a piece of paper. I grasped it eagerly, for it was folded precisely as one I received a week before had been folded, and I knew instinctively that it came from my beautiful entertainer, or captor, of the previous week. The contents ran thus:

"Should you ever, in your Western wanderings, meet any one who speaks our tongue, and who, knowing you as an Eastern traveler, asks if by chance you ever met me—say that I am well, am beautiful, am happy; for all this I know that I am. I wait for you, not only that I might have the pleasure of an evening such as we passed together, but because, having learned the names of your party while you were resting at Iskanderoon, I knew that you would one day meet those who once loved me, but who have cast me off as I them. For I know who you are, though for the present you know me only as



"HAFIZA."

That is the note. Now help me if you can. Print it, and let it be seen, that if by any chance there is an American family who have a wandering daughter like this, they may know that she is proud, haughty, beautiful, and queenly; and whether she is saint or sinner, on my faith I know not.

Perhaps she is English. I have never seen Lady Ellsborough, and I have thought it barely possible she may have come up here from Palmyra. But I think she is older than this lady appears to be. And yet it may be that it is she after all, and that this note to me was intended for me to show to Sir John and Miss Kate, who know the friends of that celebrated and misguided woman. But I leave the matter to your conjecture.

We rode out of Antioch at a gallop. Miss Kate waved her hand back to the old city, with a shout of admiration, as we plunged across the bridge and along the dusty road. It was early in the morning when we started, and, by dint of hard pushing, we reached Iskanderoon just as the sun set.

Look at the map, and you will see that we are in the northeastern corner of the Mediterranean. Iskanderoon is on the eastern shore, and Tarsus is near the northern shore, the angle being between the two. We had at first proposed to ride around to Tarsus, but this was overruled, and I had sent down to engage a boat of which I had heard while at Antioch. It was waiting for us.

AN EASTERN RECEPTION.

Pray to be delivered from a voyage in such a boat. I had been as grossly cheated as if I were the greenest of Howajjis, instead of an old stager in the East.

It was an open, single-masted speronare, with a lateen sail. She would measure, perhaps, seventy feet over all, and might go sixty, seventy, or a hundred tons. But she wouldn't go any where but before the wind, that is very certain. At first we abandoned any idea of the voyage. Then the captain grew eloquent and persuasive, and a fresh breeze springing up from the southward, we yielded to the temptations of the devil and went on board. The horses were stowed pretty well forward, and so barricaded in that they could not well be harmed by a sea. The after-part of the ship we cleaned out and made as comfortable as possible, and at eight o'clock, or thereabouts, with a moon in the clear sky over us, we set sail from Alexandretta, hoping to reach Messina, the port of Tarsus, by daybreak in the morning.

Between the misfortunes that awaited us unfortunate!

The wind was fair till midnight, and we talked, and smoked, and dozed, and finally slept soundly. Then it fell dead calm, and then a breeze came out of the northeast, right out of the corner of the sea, and away we went before it. We slept well, and when we woke imagine our horror at seeing no land, and hearing a fierce gale whistling through the shrouds. We were away for Cyprus, Malta, or the Straits of Gibraltar. In point of fact, no one could tell where that craft would bring up. When I found my legs she was taking care of herself. The captain was on his knees—that is, he was trying to keep on his knees—but every pitch she gave would send him over on his nose in a form not within the postures of prayer prescribed by Mohammed.

The sailors were not given to praying. Two of them were fair enough sailors. The rest were landlubbers. With John Steenburger's help we got some sort of trim on the ship, and stowed the cargo, which was rolling in all directions. I then took the helm myself, and steadied the vessel a little. But it was of no use. She would go before it, and no other way would she go. So we let her go before it.

It can not have failed to strike you that in all the ancient accounts of the Mediterranean, in the voyages of Paul, and in profane writers, the suddenness of the changes of wind is spoken of as a characteristic of this sea. It is no less so now. A light southerly breeze is usually followed by a stiff norther, which may last a few hours or may blow for days.

Fortunately for us, the gale was a brief one. It went down with the sun that night, and before it went down we saw the mountains of Cyprus. Two hours after the wind began to give way it fell calm again, and in an hour more that light breeze from the south again sprung up. It increased steadily till morning, when it was blowing a fresh whole-sail breeze, and we were dashing before it. During these thirty-six hours we had been nearly starved. Of course there was no kitchen on the vessel, and of course there was no food which we had not supplied. We had made poor provision for ourselves, thinking to be out only one night, but when we found that the captain and crew had absolutely nothing to eat, we were in a strait between duty to ourselves and charity to our fellow-men. Still, if this wind only held we should be all right, and so, in a somewhat reckless manner, we divided all that remained, reserving only enough to insure Miss Kate against suffering, and had a hearty meal all around.

It was four in the afternoon when we saw land, and nearly six hours when we ran up to the port. I call it port by courtesy. There is no harbor at Messina. It is a straight shore looking southward.

The captain was now at the helm again. The wind went down with the sun, and we approached within fifty rods of the little stone pier before the old fellow put his helm down, and shouted to let go the anchor. They let it go with a vengeance. She payed out the chain and a piece of rope that was on the end of the chain, and that was fast to nothing.

Then they cursed and swore, and called on their prophet. I think I never heard such fellows at an oath as are these Mohammedans. I have heard a Mississippi boatman, an Albany hackman, and a Buffalo canal-boy swear, but their oaths are child's play to an old Moslem when he begins to pull his turban to pieces. Meanwhile we forged ahead in the trough of the sea, and then brought up in the wind's eye.

You may imagine our position. A pretty heavy sea running, a light breeze blowing us on a lee-shore, a sail that could not be made to work the vessel to windward, and no anchor.

I suppose it does not require much seamanship to foresee the result of that state of affairs. The only question was, which was the softest place on shore, and the hardest end of our craft.

There was by this time a crowd on shore watching and shouting to us, and in a few moments two stout boats pulled off through the surf to our assistance. They got alongside with some caution, and we put Miss Grunilion and Sir John, with the luggage, into one of them, and my tent and furniture into the other. Steenburger and myself resolved to stick to the ship, and rescue our horses. I would certainly have saved my Tiger-Lebel at the risk of my own life, and here was but the risk of a swim in the surf.

Hortense followed, we prepared a way for the horses from their pens to the side of the boat. Then one at a time we lowered them and led them to the edge, and they plunged in unhesitatingly, my own mare last of all. Rising on the waves they saw the shore, and struck out bravely for it.

Then John and I stood on the low end of the old craft as she swung sullenly and heavily in toward the beach.

She struck first a hundred yards from the shore, and as she thumped we went over into the boiling surf. It reminded me of old days at Cape May. It was but a few stout strokes and we touched bottom, ran swiftly up through the undertow, and stood at length on the dry sand, in the centre of our group of horses, who now surrounded us, and of the townsmen of Messina, who were watching the vessel in the process of going to pieces.

FOUNTAIN AT ANTIOCH.

Such was our landing at the port of Tarsus, whence came the great Apostle.

LITERARY.

DR. BARCLAY'S new work, JERUSALEM, THE CITY OF THE GREAT KING (published in New York by William C. Church, Spruce Street), is not only valuable to the student of Oriental geography and topography for its learning, research, and observation, but is also made particularly interesting to the general reader by the number and elegance of its illustrations. The author resided several years in "The Holy City" as a missionary, and during this time had of course ample opportunity for study, examination, and reflection. His daughter, who is evidently a young lady of remarkable talent, lent him much assistance by her skill in drawing, as well as by her courage in penetrating into many forbidden places, disguised as a Turkish lady. To her the public are indebted for the fine colored lithograph of the Moslem "Tomb of David," on Mount Zion. She is probably the only Christian who has ever seen this mysterious chamber, of which she gives a graphic description.

The value of Dr. Barclay's book consists chiefly in the careful and apparently accurate measurements he has made in and about the city, in his remarks on the Mesjid el Aksa, the site of the Temple of Solomon, which he had abundant opportunity to study; and in his discussions of the water-supply of the city, the wells, fountains, and pools, which have long afforded subjects of discussion to Eastern travelers. In these portions of the book we find great reason to regret that he has been compelled to abridge his notes, and we hope that he may be induced to give hereafter another volume on these particular subjects.

The whole world turns devoutly to the "Holy City." At no time within our knowledge has such deep interest been felt by the public in all that relates to it. The man who has seen Jerusalem finds eager listeners to the story of his pilgrimage, and books on the Holy Land find abundant readers. There has been, too, a revival of the discussion on the locality of the Holy Places, to which Dr. Barclay will lend new interest, since his theories are absolutely Ishmaelitish—against every one else who has had any theories.

At one blow he knocks Dr. Robinson and Chateaubriand out of his way. No former belief has any favor in his eyes by reason of its antiquity. He leans toward no one, but walks up and down and around the city establishing theories of his own as it pleases him, in the most independent way.

We commend Dr. Barclay's work to the attentive perusal of all who feel an interest in Jerusalem. It is valuable, learned, and it is interesting. But we must at the same time add that he is given over wholly and entirely to the hatred of all so-called Holy Places, and has, like Dr. Robinson and some few other travelers, a holy horror of a tradition.

It is to be regretted that such is the case, since it leads him at times to the commission of grave errors. Thus, in the great question of the locality of the Sepulchre, the author falls into the usual mistake of supposing that its genuineness is a question of tradition, and he attacks the received locality with all the thunders of anti-tradition argument and outcry, forgetting entirely that tradition has nothing more to do with it than with the settlement of Massachusetts or New York. Dr. Barclay admits that the spot now pointed out is that selected by Eusebius and Macarius and Helena, about A.D. 326. So far there is no tradition; it is all history. The only question is, were these persons correct? And no one pretends that they relied on any tradition. They judged from such evidence as then existed. So that tradition has nothing to do with it. The most surprising part of Dr. Barclay's work is, that he does not believe Eusebius and Jerome capable of distinguishing between monkish fraud and historical truth, within three hundred years of Christ, when the walls of Jerusalem were lying, and the towers and western wall were standing, all around them; yet he, in this nineteenth century, deliberately selects a probable site of the crucifixion, and argues in its favor until he satisfies himself that it is the spot! Dr. Barclay is not alone in this same way of arguing—with one breath proving that it was impossible Eusebius could have had any satisfactory evidence in the fourth century, and with another contending that even at this late day it is possible to select and point out the place of the Sepulchre! Others have made the same curious error.

Our readers will perceive from what we have said that Dr. Barclay is no friend to the so-called Holy Places. Many of his ideas of the hills and valleys of Jerusalem are novel and interesting, and will repay an attentive perusal.

As a whole, the volume is a most important addition to our stock of knowledge of Jerusalem, and the public owe a debt to the learned author which we hope he will find abundantly repaid.

THE WORLD OF MIND, by Isaac Taylor, published by Harper & Brothers, is an excellent elementary treatise on metaphysics, which teachers and college professors will find worthy their careful examination. In some respects its plan is novel and worthy of commendation. It leads the mind of the student in a more familiar, and on that account perhaps a more intelligible, way into the ordinarily difficult paths of mental philosophy. There is none of the usual mass of references, nor of the too-frequent loads of foot-notes and comments, which burden such books. The work is intended for students, not for scholars, and is admirably calculated for them.

HUSBAND versus WIFE is an amusing satire, in the "Nothing-to-Wear" style, published by Rudd & Carleton, and illustrated by Hoppin. The prologue is a very good parody on Leigh Hunt's "Abou Ben Adhem," of which one Abel M'Adam is the hero, and the conclusion is a new adaptation of the rhythm of "Brahma."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, 1st February, in the Senate, Senator Doolittle presented a petition for the acquisition of Cuba. After some routine business, the consideration of the Army Increase Bill was resumed, and speeches made by Senators Houston, Davis, and Wilson. The latter Senator moved an amendment empowering the President to call for 5000 volunteers. Senator Douglas moved that the bill admitting Minnesota be taken up. This led to a long discussion, in which Senators Green, Crittenden, Seward, Douglas, Mason, Wilson, Hale, Brown, etc., took part. Senator Mason intimated that it might be necessary to couple Kansas and Minnesota together.——In the House, a resolution was adopted directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring J. B. Williamson before the Investigation Committee. The bill to provide additional funds for the national armories, and the Printing Deficiency Bill, were discussed. The State Constitution of Oregon was presented by Mr. Lane. Resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas protesting against the Lecompton Constitution were presented by Mr. Parrott, and read, after an ineffectual attempt of Mr. Craig to prevent their being received.

On Tuesday, 2d, Senator Wilson presented a memorial from Dr. Livingston, praying to be employed to index the papers of the United States. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, by Mr. Mason, reported a bill to indemnify the owners of the Amistad—Senators Seward and Foot presenting a minority report in the opposite sense. Discussion on the Army Increase Bill being resumed, speeches were made by Senators Seward and Hale. A Message from the President was received, recommending the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution. Remarks thereon were made by Senators Bigler, Trumbull, Douglas, and Toombs.——In the House, the Printing Deficiency Bill, appropriating $700,000, was rejected. The President's Message on Kansas having been received, a warm discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Hughes, Harris, Grow, and others took part. Mr. Stephens moved that the Message be referred to the Committee on Territories; Mr. Harris, that it be referred to a select committee of thirteen.

On Wednesday, 3d, in the Senate, the bill for the payment of Invalid and other pensions was passed. Senator Wilson moved the reference of the President's Kansas Message to a Select Committee. Senator Trumbull desired to have the dispute respecting the contested seats of Senators Bright and Fitch, from Indiana, settled first, but after some remarks from Senators Bayard, Brown, and Bright, he withdrew his motion, and speeches were made on the Kansas Message by Senators Wilson and Brown.——In the House, Mr. J. D. Williamson was brought to the bar by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and certain questions put to him to be answered on the following day. The Army Appropriation Bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. Two reports from the Naval Committee were presented, one censuring, the other (the minority report) applauding, Commodore Paulding for the arrest of Walker. A Pension Bill was reported by Mr. Savage. Some debate took place on the contest between Messrs. Campbell and Vallandigham for a seat from Ohio.

On Thursday, 4th, in the Senate, resolutions from the Legislature of Iowa, instructing their Senators to oppose the Lecompton Constitution, were presented by Senator Jones, who declared that he would not be bound by them. A resolution of inquiry was adopted, on motion of Senator Mason, seeking information as to the delegation by Turkey of a naval officer to this country to obtain information about ship-building. Another resolution, inquiring what amounts have been spent in printing and advertising by the departments, was adopted on motion of Senator Stuart. The French Spoliation Bill was reported by Senator Crittenden. A resolution of Senator Trumbull's, providing for the decision of the contested election case from Indiana, was tabled. The Kansas Message was then taken up, and speeches made by Senators Brown, Stuart, Wilson, Green, Bigler, Collamer, and Douglas.——In the House, the witness Williamson submitted an answer to the questions put to him by the House, denying the right of the House to make him divulge private transactions; on which Mr. Wright moved that he be committed to jail for contumacy. After debate, in which Messrs. Stanton, Millson, Cox, Davis, Burroughs, Hughes, Wright, and Cochrane participated, the witness obtained leave to amend his answer. The remainder of the day was employed in unimportant matters.

On Friday, 5th, the Senate not being in session, it was decided that no further time be granted to take testimony in the Ohio contested election case. An amended answer was put in by the contumacious witness, Williamson, and on the statement of Mr. Stanton that the witness had appeared before the Committee and answered all questions, he was discharged from custody. The President's Kansas Message was then taken up, and speeches made by Messrs. Grow, Harris, and others. The vote, on the motion of Mr. Harris, for a select committee, was staved off by the intervention of numerous calls for the yeas and nays on frivolous questions, and, after a tedious night's work, the House adjourned at 6.30 A.M. on Saturday, on motion of Mr. Quitman, with the understanding that the vote on Mr. Harris's proposition was to be taken on Monday morning.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON KANSAS.

On Tuesday, as stated above, the President sent the Lecompton Constitution to Congress, with a Message urging the admission of Kansas under it. After ascribing all the difficulties which have arisen in Kansas to the treasonable action of the Topeka party, he goes on to say:

"It is manifest that the Lecompton Convention, according to every principle of constitutional law, was legally constituted and invested with power to frame a Constitution. The sacred principle of popular sovereignty has been invoked in favor of the enemies of law and order in Kansas; but in what manner is popular sovereignty to be exercised in this country if not through the instrumentality of established law? In certain small republics of ancient times the people did assemble in primary meetings, passed laws, and directed public affairs. In our country this is manifestly impossible. Popular sovereignty can be exercised here only through the ballot, and if the people will refuse the exercise of it in this manner, as they have done in Kansas at the election of delegates, it is not for them to complain that their rights have been violated.

"The Kansas Convention, thus lawfully constituted, proceeded to frame a Constitution, and, having completed the work, finally adjourned on the 7th of November last. They did not think proper to submit the whole of this Constitution to the popular vote, but did submit the question whether Kansas should be a Free or Slave State to the people. This was the question which had convulsed the Union, and shaken it to the very centre. This was the question which had lighted the flames of civil war in Kansas, and produced dangerous sectional parties throughout the confederacy. It was of a character so paramount in respect to the condition of Kansas as to rivet the anxious attention of the people of the whole country upon it alone—no person thought of any other question. For my own part, when I instructed Governor Walker in general terms in favor of submitting the Constitution to the people, I had no object in view except the all-absorbing question of Slavery. In what manner the people of Kansas might regulate their other concerns was not the subject which attracted my attention. In fact, the general provisions of recent State Constitutions—after an experience of eighty years—are so similar and excellent, that it would be difficult to go far wrong at the present day in framing a new Constitution. * * *

THE REMEDY OF THE PEOPLE OF KANSAS.

"The only remedy for the people of Kansas in this case is that which exists in all other similar cases. If the delegates who framed the Kansas Constitution have in any manner violated the will of their constituents, the people always possess the power to change their Constitution or laws according to their own pleasure. The question of slavery was submitted to the election of the people on the 21st of December last, in obedience to the mandate of the Constitution. Here, again, a fair opportunity was presented to the adherents of the Topeka Constitution, if they were the majority, to decide this exciting question 'in their own way,' and thus restore the peace of the distracted Territory; but they again refused to exercise the right of Popular Sovereignty, and again suffered the election to pass by default. I heartily rejoice that a wiser and better spirit prevailed among a large majority of these people on the first Monday in January, and that they did on that day vote under the Lecompton Constitution for a Governor and other State officers, a member of Congress, and members of the Legislature. This election was warmly contested by the parties, and a larger vote polled than at any previous election in the Territory. We may now reasonably hope that the revolutionary Topeka organization will be speedily and finally abandoned, and this will go far toward a final settlement of the unhappy differences in Kansas. If frauds have been committed at this election by one or both parties, the Legislature and People of Kansas, under their Constitution, know how to redress themselves and punish these detestable but too common crimes without outside interference. * * *

THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

"It has been solemnly adjudged, by the highest judicial tribunal, that Slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. Kansas is, therefore, at this moment, as much a Slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. Without this, the equality of the Sovereign States composing the Union would be violated, and the use and enjoyment of a Territory acquired by the common treasure of all the States would be closed against the people and property of nearly half the members of the Confederacy. Slavery can, therefore, never be prohibited in Kansas, except through the means of a Constitutional provision, and in no other manner can this be obtained so promptly, if the majority of the people desire it, as by admitting her into the Union under her present Constitution. On the other hand, should Congress reject the Constitution, under the idea of affording the disaffected in Kansas a third opportunity to prohibit Slavery in the State, which they might have done twice before if in the majority, no man can foretell the consequences. * * *

THE PRESIDENT TAKES HIS GROUND SQUARELY.

"For my own part, I am decidedly in favor of the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton Constitution, and thus terminating the Kansas question. This will carry out the great principle of Non-Intervention sanctioned by the organic act, which declares in express language in favor of the non-intervention of Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, leaving the people 'perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way subject only to the Constitution of the United States.' In this manner, by localizing the question of Slavery and confining it to the people who are immediately concerned, every patriot anxiously expected that this question would be banished from the halls of Congress, where it has always exerted a baneful influence throughout the country.

* * * * * * *

"The speedy admission of Kansas into the Union will restore peace and quiet to the whole country. Already the affairs of that territory have engrossed an undue proportion of public attention, have sadly affected the friendly relations of the people of the States with each other, and alarmed the fears of patriots for the safety of the Union. Kansas once admitted, the excitement becomes localized, and would soon die away for want of outside aliment, and then every difficulty could be settled by the ballot-box. Besides, and no trifling consideration, I shall then be enabled to withdraw the troops from Kansas, and employ them on a service where they are much needed. Kansas once admitted, it is believed there will no longer be occasion there for the troops."

AN AFFRAY IN THE HOUSE.

An affray took place on Saturday morning in the House of Representatives between Messrs. Grow and Keitt. A member of Congress, who was witness to the difficulty, gives the following particulars: "Mr. Grow objected to Mr. Quitman's making any remarks. Mr. Keitt said, 'If you are going to object, return to your own side of the House.' Mr. Grow responded, 'This is a free hall, and every man has a right to be where he pleases.' Mr. Keitt then came up to Mr. Grow and said, 'I want to know what you mean by such an answer as that.' Mr. Grow replied, 'I mean just what I say. This is a free hall, and a man has a right to be where he pleases.' Mr. Keitt (taking Mr. Grow by the throat) said, 'I will let you know that you are a d—d Black Republican puppy.' Mr. Grow knocked up his hand, saying, 'I shall occupy such place in this hall as I please, and no nigger driver shall crack his whip over me.' Mr. Keitt then again grabbed Mr. Grow by the throat, and Mr. Grow knocked his hand off, and Mr. Keitt coming at him again, Mr. Grow knocked him down. The fight took place at twenty minutes to two o'clock."

THE ASPECT OF THE HOUSE.

The House of Representatives presented a singular appearance during the Friday–Saturday séance. Many members lay stretched on the sofas half-asleep; others had arranged themselves for slumber at their desks. About a hundred persons remained in the galleries, most of whom went to sleep there before morning. One lady was noticed among them. Many fair jokes were made during the contest. A member inquired if it would be in order to send for a photographer, and have the scene daguerreotyped. The Speaker replied, "Not yet." Several clerks broke down in calling the Yeas and Nays, and the Speaker himself was obliged to resign the chair to Mr. Bocock of Virginia.

THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

It is stated that the contumacious witness, Williamson, who was forced last week to answer the questions of the Investigating Committee, declared that he knew nothing of any corruptions practiced during the last Congress, but that he knew of members of former Congresses receiving money—and particularly from British manufacturers, to aid the passage of the Tariff of 1846. Williamson describes himself as a secret commercial agent of some foreign houses. The Committee refused to listen to his tales. Mr. J. W. Wolcott, of Boston, is now before the Committee.

THE UTAH AFFAIR.

The latest news from the Utah expedition reports the health of the army good, and no new incidents. At Washington, Dr. Bernheisel, of Utah, is said to have proposed terms of accommodation to President Buchanan, with a view to the withdrawal of the troops; but it is understood that the President's reply was that he could entertain no negotiation from the delegate, and that matters must now take their course.

MRS. COBB'S RECEPTION.

"Jenkins," the correspondent of the Herald, thus describes Mrs. Cobb's ball on 3d: "Last night was the second public 'reception' of Mrs. Secretary Cobb, née Lamar, a charming type of the true 'Southern matron.' The Secretary of the Treasury is extremely popular, and his house (consecrated last session by the hospitalities of Governor Aiken, of South Carolina) very much resembled the entrance to the upper room at a court ball at the Tuileries, so dense was the mosaic of bright eyes and brighter gems, floral head-dresses à l'Orphelia, epaulets and eagle buttons, diplomatic decorations and dresses tres decoltes. The prominent group was the White House party: Miss Lane, still in mourning, being escorted by 'rotated' (and would be 'rotating') George Plitt; while Mrs. Plitt was on the arm of J. Buchanan Henry, the popular Private Secretary of him whom the Indians call 'Chinquinilla'—the 'great Buck.' Marshal Hoover was, of course, in attendance, as the 'usher of the gold stick' should be.

"Colonel May and his lady (she looked queenlike in black velvet) were there in all their majestic proportions; Mrs. Secretary Thompson is ever fascinating in appearance as in conversation; Mrs. Squiers looked charmingly in white; and as for Mrs. Clayton (the lady of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury), she always looks well, and always is in the best of spirits. Lord Napier came alone, and did not appear to be overhappy, although the fate of Mister Davis warns him to be prudent. The Misses Gordon, of this city, are ever attended by admirers; and there are those on Governor's Island who will not be surprised to learn that Miss Fanny Randolph, of Georgetown, was bewitching. The belle of the Cabinet, Miss Saunders, was not there; but the Post-office Department was well represented by the gifted and pretty Miss King, daughter of the Assistant Postmaster-general. With this array of 'maidens fair,' with many others in the full glory of irreproachable toilet, there was, of course, no lack of beaux, and gallantly did the latter organize themselves into foraging parties to make Balaklava charges through hosts of crinoline to the bounteously spread supper-tables."

STATE LEGISLATURES.

The Pennsylvania Legislature has directed the committee on Kansas affairs not to report till 10th March. The Lecompton Constitution has been denounced in the New Jersey and Rhode Island Legislatures.

THE $8000 AFFAIR.

The Journal of Commerce denies that it received the $8000 paid by the Middlesex Mills Company for editorial services in this city, or that it came into its treasury. The Journal also has the following:

"Now a word for our worthy commercial editor, David M. Stone, who for many years past has faithfully served us and the public on a salary. His familiarity with commercial statistics and with the principles of political economy, and his known opinions on the matter in question, which were and are the opinions of the Journal of Commerce, naturally directed toward him the attention of Mr. William W. Stone, of the firm of Lawrence, Stone, & Co., as a fit person to aid in the diffusion of intelligence and arguments designed to influence the public mind in favor of the changes proposed in the Tariff. Accordingly, he edited and issued several pamphlets and other documents, one or more of them bearing his signature, of which large editions were published. They were not printed in the office of the Journal of Commerce, nor had we any thing more to do in getting up or publishing them than any other paper in the United States. For this service he received from Mr. William W. Stone, of the said firm of Lawrence, Stone, & Co., such pecuniary acknowledgment as they saw fit to render. Whether it was too much or too little we know not, nor do we know what it was. We presume the items will be stated in the Report of the Congressional Committee of Investigation.

"If any body thinks that because Mr. D. M. Stone is connected with a newspaper he should, therefore, in another service entirely, be expected to work for nothing and find himself, we are not of the number.

"The following letter was not written for publication, but its insertion under existing circumstances will not, we trust, be objected to by the writer:

"'NEW YORK, January 18, 1858.

"'DAVID M. STONE, Esq.

"'DEAR SIR,—So much is said in the newspapers about money paid by the late firm of Lawrence, Stone, and Co. for "Editorial services," that I deem it proper to say (not for your information, as you know it already, but for that of your friends to whom you may show this note), that no money was paid you for editorial services in The Journal of Commerce, or on account of your connection with that paper. The money I sent to you was solely for editing the several pamphlets and circulars, and collecting statistical information for our circulation.

"'Yours truly, WM. W. STONE.'"

PERSONAL.

The Washington Star, an Administration paper, says: "It having been asserted in newspapers, that Mr. Stone (of Lawrence, Stone, & Co.), in his testimony recently given before the committee to investigate the Middlesex Manufacturing Company's $87,000 transaction, has alleged that the firm loaned to ex-Speaker Banks $7000 of the money in question, we have made inquiry into the facts, and have satisfied us that Mr. Stone made no such statement. He alleged that Mr. Banks had borrowed $700 only of the firm, more than two years ago, to pay off the bills of carpenters that had made some improvements on his house, for the repayment of which he (Mr. Banks) had given ample security. However much we may differ from Mr. Banks politically, we see no good end to be attained either for the democratic party cause or that of public morals, by circulating unfounded imputations on his personal integrity, such as this we thus explode."

The Hon. A. C. Dodge, American Minister at Madrid, has transmitted to the Hon. B. F. Hallett, of Boston, a copy of the pardon granted by the Queen of Spain, through the Minister of State, to John Campbell of Boston. This young man, the son of a widow, was one of the crew of the ship Waverley at the time of the horrible act by which two hundred Chinese Coolies were destroyed in the port of Manilla by the cruelty of the commanding officer, French. The crime having been committed within the Spanish jurisdiction of the Philippine Islands, the master and seamen of the Waverley were tried before the legal tribunal there, and sentenced to the galleys. Among the prisoners was the young man Campbell, who was sentenced to three years' punishment in the chain-gang. A year ago his mother applied to Mr. Hallett, then United States Attorney, who voluntarily made the proper representations through the State Department to Mr. Dodge, American Minister, to intercede with the Queen for the pardon of Campbell, who was in reality not guilty, having acted ignorantly under the orders of the captain. Mr. Dodge has devoted himself with untiring energy and zeal to effect the pardon, which he has at last obtained, obviously as a mark of respect to his distinguished interposition.

The Hon. Charles Sumner left Boston for Washington on Wednesday, in order to attend to his Senatorial duties at this important crisis.

Ex-Governor Walker has arrived in town, and will spend a few days at his brother-in law's, General Cook, of Hoboken.

Ex-Secretary Stanton has also arrived, and is stopping in Brooklyn with his brother-in-law, E. V. Perrin.

James W. Grimes, just elected United States Senator from Iowa, for six years from the close of the present Congress, March 3, 1859, has just retired from the office of Governor, to which he was elected in August, 1854. He is a native of New Hampshire, about fifty years of age, is a lawyer and farmer, formerly Whig and now Republican in politics, and was the first man of that political stripe ever chosen Governor of Iowa. He takes the place of George W. Jones, a Nebraska-Lecompton Democrat.

It is stated that the late Mr. Blennerhasset, of St. Louis, who is mentioned as the nephew of Hermann Blennerhasset who was made so famous by Wirt, had in his possession the manuscript journal kept by Hermann throughout all his transactions with Burr; the same document from which Mr. Davis, in his Life of Burr, has given several extracts. It is said that it is the intention of a member of the family at St. Louis to edit and publish that journal, together with some letters throwing a light on a transaction in which American people, especially of the West, will never cease to take an interest.

Palmer, the Albany sculptor, says the Boston Transcript of the 3d, is hard at work on the "White Captive," a female nude figure intended as a companion to the "Indian Girl." She is supposed to have been taken captive by the Aborigines, and to be the daughter of a pioneer. Palmer is bestowing infinite care in the modeling of this figure—the subject giving full scope to his beautiful and refined manipulation. It is worthy of remark that chiefly through his influence a successful Art Exhibition has been opened at Albany this season.

Parton, in his "Life of Aaron Burr," represents his hero as the father of filibusterism and first of filibusters in America; whereupon the Southern Citizen suggests that this Life of Burr was prepared "for the express purpose of discrediting all extension southward, by fathering that idea upon Burr."

Colonel Inglis, whose defense of Lucknow is likely to rank among the most memorable instances of gallantry and endurance in English martial history, is a son of the late Right Rev. Dr. John Inglis, Bishop of Nova Scotia.

A private letter from Mr. Bryant, dated Naples, January 7, 1858, announces the arrival at Marseilles, on their way from Spain, of himself and family, two days previously at that place.

Rev. Dr. Haight has sailed for Europe with his family, in order to recruit his health. Trinity Church supplied him with the necessary means. There is no doubt that with all her faults Old Trinity takes good care of her clergy. Her charities to them ought to cover a multitude of her shortcomings.

The Legislature of Virginia has appropriated $5000 for the purchase of Mr. Barbee's statue of "Young America."

E. J. M'Lane, Esq., a magistrate at Brownsville, Texas, was shot dead at that place by a Mexican, and the latter was immediately hung by the enraged citizens. The New Orleans Picayune obtained the facts from an officer of the steamer General Rusk, who says it occurred on the 13th instant. Mr. M'Lane was a lawyer by profession, and a native of Maryland, where he has numerous relatives and friends. He had resided for several years at Brownsville, was much respected, and, according to the Picayune, had rendered himself a perfect terror to all the desperadoes in that place. For his energy in enforcing the laws, and the determined spirit he manifested in bringing their violators to justice, the citizens of Brownsville recently elected him to the office of magistrate. On the 25th ult. he shot and killed, in self-defense, a desperado named Robinson, and when he met his death he was trying to restore peace between the Mexican and his wife.

Ex-Governor Gaines, of Oregon, whose death was announced by the last arrival, was a native of Virginia. He served in the war of 1812 at the battle of the Thames, and in the war with Mexico. During the latter war he was taken prisoner and confined for several months in the City of Mexico, but finally made his escape and joined the American army. He was frequently a member of the Kentucky Legislature, and was twice elected to Congress from that State. He was appointed Governor of Oregon in 1849, by President Taylor, and served out his full term.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE APPROACHING WEDDING.

AT latest dates festivities in honor of the approaching nuptials of the Princess Royal were the dominant topic. A great array of distinguished visitors from the Continent, including the King of the Belgians and numerous Prussian princes, were the guests of the British court. State balls, concerts, and banquets at Buckingham Palace, and festival performances at Her Majesty's Theatre followed each other in rapid succession. The Prince of Prussia arrived in England on the 19th ult. on his way to court to claim his royal bride.

HOW THE QUEEN IS GOING TO LOSE HER JEWELS.

The official Journal of Hanover gives the following account of the great jewel case:

"When the Guelph family ascended the throne of England in 1714, they took over a portion of the Crown jewels with them to London. While on a visit which his Majesty George II. paid to his hereditary dominions in 1751, he executed a last will and testament in German, in which he made the disposition that all the jewels which he had bought with his own money, or which he had inherited from his ancestors, should be a perpetual fidei commiss (entailed in perpetuity) in his family, and should descend to his successor in his hereditary kingdom of Hanover. His Majesty King George III. presented his consort, Queen Sophia Charlotte, with various jewels and other articles of value, but subsequently in two wills, a German one, dated May, 1765, and an English one, dated July, 1770, he alluded to these valuables in a manner which was open to doubt. Her Majesty Queen Sophia Charlotte also, in a will made in November, 1818, settled all the jewels thus presented to her, and all others at that time in her possession, on her own descendants and successors in the hereditary territories of Hanover. When the two crowns of Hanover and England became separated by the death of King William IV., it became necessary to separate the jewels that belonged to Hanover. In the negotiations that were carried on in connection herewith, diverging views obtained with the two Plenipotentiaries as to what jewels had been designated by King George II., and also as to what influence the testamentary dispositions made by King George III. ought to have upon the jewels left by Queen Charlotte; moreover, there were, in consequence of the lengthy period that had in the mean time intervened, very considerable difficulties in ascertaining the identity of certain jewels. The two sovereigns eventually came to an understanding to submit the inquiry into and the decision of these questions to three English jurists, who in fact were nominated in 1843. While the preliminary inquiries into the subject were still going on, various changes in the persons of the commissioners hereto appointed were necessitated by death, and the whole inquiry came to a stand-still, until at length, in the middle of December, 1857, a decision was come to by a fresh committee recently nominated, viz., that the testamentary dispositions made by King George II. had reference only to the jewels inherited by him from his ancestors, or purchased by him with money derived from his hereditary dominions in Hanover, and that, on the other hand, all the jewels that belonged to Queen Charlotte are entailed and settled on the Crown of Hanover. Now that a basis of decision has been obtained through the conciliatory disposition shown by the royal relations on both sides, the final separation and setting aside of the jewels that fall back to Hanover will be simple, and not productive of any great loss of time. Although the statement of the Globe that the jewels in question are of enormous value, exceeding a million sterling, is excessively exaggerated, it is nevertheless matter of very great satisfaction, apart from their money value, that such highly-prized souvenirs from the hands of glorious ancestors, so well calculated to add brilliancy to the crown, should thus revert to our most gracious royal house."

A MODEL MAYOR.

The first official act of the new Mayor of Cork was to visit the city jail, from whence he liberated all the pauper debtors there confined, he paying the demands against them. He also set at liberty a number of poor people who were under a rule of bail.

WHEN STARVATION WILL FILL.

From the celebrated experiments of Chossat on Inanition, it appears that death arrives whenever the waste reaches an average proportion of 0·4; that is to say, supposing an animal to weigh 100 pounds, it will succumb when its weight is reduced to 60 pounds. Death may, of course, ensue before that point is reached, but not be prolonged after it. The average loss which can be sustained is 40 per cent.; sometimes the loss is greater, especially if the animal be very fat: thus, in the transactions of the Linnæan Society, a case is reported of a fat pig which was buried under thirty feet of chalk for 160 days; his weight fell, in that period, no less than 75 per cent. Curiously enough, as an illustration of what was just said respecting time not being an index, fishes and reptiles were found, by Chossat, to perish at precisely the same limit of weight as warm-blooded animals; but they required a period three-and-twenty times as long to do it in: thus, if the experiment be performed of starving a bird and a frog during the warm weather, although both will perish when their loss of weight reaches 40 per cent., the one will not survive a week, the other will survive three-and-twenty weeks.

FRANCE.

OPENING OF THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

The French Legislative Assembly was opened on 18th January by Napoleon in a long speech, in which he alluded to more repressive measures. Four Italians who attempted his life are to be tried this month.

THE EMPEROR ON THE CRISIS.

In the course of his speech the Emperor said: "The increase in the price of all necessaries has compelled us since last year to augment the salaries of the lesser functionaries; the rations of the soldiers have been improved, and the pay of subalterns increased. The budget of 1859 provides for better payment for teachers and professors, and for magistrates. I may point out an increase of charitable societies—in the country those of the medical corporations, and in the towns the establishment of soup kitchens. One million has been distributed in relief of the populations which have suffered most from want of work. The budget of 1859, which will be laid before you, will show a balance in favor of receipts, and the action of the sinking fund can be renewed. On the close of accounts a reduction of the floating debt was assured. Commerce recently suffered a check, but the firm position it took up in the midst of what may be termed a universal crisis is, in the eyes of all, an honor for France, and justifies the economical principles advised by the government in matters of commerce, finances, and credit. The increase of direct and indirect revenue during the past year was 30,000,000 francs.

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE EMPIRE.

"What is the empire? Is it a retrograde government, an enemy of progress, desirous of suppressing generous impulses and of impeding the pacific extension of the great and civilizing principles of 1789? No; the empire inscribes these principles as the motto of its constitution. It frankly adopts every thing of a nature to ennoble the heart or exalt the mind for what is good; but it is also the enemy of every abstract theory. It seeks a strong power, capable of overcoming the obstacles which might stop its advance, for—let us not forget it—the advance of every new power is a long struggle. Moreover, there is a truth inscribed upon every page of the history of France and of England—namely, that liberty without obstacles is impossible as long as there exists in a country a faction which obstinately disowns the fundamental bases of the government; for then liberty, instead of enlightening, controlling, ameliorating, is nothing else in the hands of factions but a weapon of destruction. Therefore, as I did not accept the power of the nation with a view to acquire that ephemeral popularity, the paltry prize of concessions exacted from weakness, but with a view one day to deserve the approbation of posterity by founding something lasting in France, I do not fear to declare to you to-day that the danger, no matter what is said to the contrary, does not exist in the excessive prerogatives of power, but rather in the absence of repressive laws. Thus, the last elections, despite their satisfactory result, offered in many localities a sad spectacle. Hostile parties took advantage of it to create agitation in the country, and some men had the boldness openly to declare themselves the enemies of the national institutions, deceived the electors by false promises, and, having gained their votes, then spurned them with contempt. You will not allow a renewal of such a scandal, and you will compel (obliger) every elector to take an oath to the constitution before presenting himself as a candidate.

THE LATE ATTEMPT ON HIS LIFE.

"I can not conclude without alluding to the criminal attempt which has just taken place. I thank Heaven for the visible protection with which it shielded the Empress and myself, and I deplore that so many victims should be made when only one life was aimed at. Yet these plots bring their lessons with them. Firstly, they prove the weakness and impotence of the parties who have recourse to assassination and such desperate means; secondly, that no assassination, even if successful, ever served the cause of those who hired the assassin. Neither those who slew Cæsar nor those who assassinated Henry IV. derived any advantage from their crime. God sometimes allows the just to fall, but He never allows the cause of crime to triumph. These attempts, therefore, neither shake my security in the present nor my faith in the future. If I live, the empire will live with me; and if I should fall, my very death would only tend to strengthen the empire, for the indignation of the people and of the army would be an additional support to the throne of my son."

ARREST OF THE ASSASSINS.

The effect of the explosion of the three projectiles proved on investigation to be far more disastrous than was at first supposed. The number of persons more or less wounded, fell little, if any, short of one hundred and fifty, and six had died of the injuries they sustained. Five minutes previous to the explosion an Italian named Pierri, who was expelled from France in 1852, was recognized by the police and arrested. He was armed with a six-barreled revolver and a dagger, and was the bearer of a bomb similar to those exploded. Count Orsini, who was arrested at his lodgings upon information given by his servant, is said to have confessed that he threw one of the bombs. These parties, and two others named Gomez and Da Silva, alias Rudio, also in custody, are supposed to be the chiefs in the affair. A police officer from London had arrived in Paris, for the purpose of identifying Pierri and Orsini as having been connected with the affair of Toschini, who escaped from London some time since.

The Paris correspondent of the London Globe says: "Rudio, the youngest of the assassins' gang, has turned Emperor's evidence and revealed all. The trial comes on on the 8th or 10th February."

THE INSTRUMENT OF DEATH.

The Droit says: "The bombs were of cast-iron, oblong, and in the form of a pear, and, in the widest part, from four to five inches in diameter. The shock of one of the caps, of which each had several, on a hard substance necessarily caused an explosion. The bombs were loaded with detonating powder. The first thrown at the carriage of the Emperor was just after the vehicle entered the Rue Lepelletier; it did not touch the Emperor, nor even the vehicle; but it wounded about twenty persons. On this the coachman whipped up his horses; but almost immediately a second bomb burst, and one of the horses being struck by three projectiles fell to the ground. A third bomb, thrown with more precision, fell beneath the carriage itself and burst with tremendous force, smashing part of it in pieces. The splinters of this bomb wounded the second horse, which expired some hours after. The coachman, named Ledoux, was wounded in the hand. The only person in the carriage with the Emperor and Empress was General Roguet, and he, as already stated, received a slight injury. The escape of their majesties was quite miraculous. The Emperor received a slight cut on the side of the nose by a piece of glass from the carriage window. Another piece of glass struck the Empress at the corner of the left eye, but left no trace. Superintendent Hebert, of the police, who opened the door of the Emperor's carriage at the moment of the third explosion, was dangerously wounded. The carriage itself was yesterday taken into the court-yard of the Tuileries, and visited by great numbers of persons. All the under part and front of the carriage had the appearance of being blown to pieces."

THE ASSASSINS.

The correspondent of the London Times says: "When Pierri was taken to the guard-house, near the spot where he was arrested, the explosion had not yet taken place. In two minutes, however, it reached his ear; he cried out to the guard, 'Do what you like with me; I am content—the blow is struck!' He appeared certain that it had taken effect, but was dismayed when he heard of the Emperor's escape.

"The person named Orsini is, it seems, the same whose extraordinary escape from the prison of Mantua, as recounted in the papers about a year ago, excited so much curiosity. He had been condemned to death by the Austrian tribunals. He had taken a very active part in the Italian revolution in 1848. During the Mazzini domination at Rome Orsini was sent as Commissioner to Ancona to inquire into the assassinations which were of frequent, and even daily, occurrence there. He has been mixed up in various attempts at insurrection since the fall of the Roman Republic. After the explosion of the projectiles he made his way to his lodgings in the Rue Monthabor, and it was owing to the inquiries of his servant at the guard-house of the Rue Lepelletier, who, with agony depicted on his countenance, demanded of the by-standers where his master was, that he was apprehended. He was asked, 'Who was his master?' He remained silent, and fainted. This gave rise to suspicion; he was arrested, and disclosed his master's address. I have heard little of what may be relied upon respecting the two others, named Gomez and Da Silva, otherwise Rudio. They are said to be of an inferior class of men. It is still affirmed that the persons directly and most deeply implicated in this nefarious transaction are Italians. I should add that Orsini had long broken off, at least in appearance, with Mazzini. He was very badly wounded on Thursday night by the explosion."

SUSPENSION OF TWO NEWSPAPERS.

The Revue de Paris and the newspaper Le Spectateur (formerly the Assemblée Nationale) have been suppressed for the publication of articles upholding republican principles. The conductors of the Estafette newspaper have been condemned to two months' imprisonment and 500 francs fine, "for an outrage on public morals and religion."

LAST MOMENTS OF RACHEL.

M. Sardoux, proprietor of the house at Cannes where Mademoiselle Rachel died, has written the following letter to M. Mario Uchard:

"CANNES, January 4, 1858.

"I do not remember the date of my last letter, my dear Mario, but it must have prepared you for the fatal dénoûement. On Friday, when exchanging the compliments of the New Year, poor Rachel embraced me with so much emotion that I saw she was thinking of an eternal farewell in answer to our salutations. Dr. Bergonnier, however, assured us that we might hope still for some days of her life. On Saturday no new incident occurred. Rachel remained as usual in a sort of stupor caused by weakness, from which she was from time to time aroused by intolerable suffering. At last, about midnight, she awoke calm, as if from a deep sleep. She conversed tranquilly with those who were around her bed, and wished to write to her father, but she had not the strength. She then began to dictate a letter, in which her last wishes were expressed. She could not finish it, and fell back to the state of prostration and suffering in which you have seen her. They tried at various times to get her to take some nourishment, but succeeded only with much difficulty; the functions of the stomach, which had hitherto continued sufficiently, had failed in their turn. At eleven o'clock on Sunday expectoration became difficult, and there were fears of suffocation, when a fortunate effort relieved the respiratory organs, and a calm succeeded this crisis. Rachel then desired to resume the letter to her father; she dictated it to the end, re-read it, and then exclaimed, 'Ah! my Rebecca, my dear sister, I am going to see you again; how happy I am!' She then added some words to the letter, signed it, and appeared to fall asleep. This state lasted several hours. Up to this time Sarah had hesitated about calling in the succor of religion, but having witnessed this transport of Rachel, she telegraphed to the Consistory of Nice, who immediately sent ten persons, males and females. They arrived about eight o'clock, and were told to wait a while, fearing that their arrival might produce a fatal excitement. At last, about ten o'clock, a crisis similar to that of the morning occurred, and alarmed the whole house. The physicians declared it would be the last. The religious persons were then admitted. The women and an aged priest drew near the bed and began to chant the prayers for the last agony, in Hebrew. Rachel turned her face toward them, radiant with celestial light, pressed the hand of Sarah, and died with a smile upon her lips. When I arrived, a few hours later, I found every one impressed with the token of divine support that God had given to Rachel. I was not there, my dear friend, but I doubt not Rachel died in the hope of another life."

RACHEL AND DR. VERON.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald tells the following story: "It appears that on Rachel's first appearance, at a minor theatre in Paris, the Gymnase, she failed, or rather fell far below her own hopes of success. At this juncture came forward the well-known 'man about town,' familiar to Parisian eyes, and covered with political prestige, by name Louis Véron. His position in the artistic world, to say nothing of his influence over the press, was that of a Jupiter, and is it to be wondered at that when he presented himself before the Leda of the Gymnase, offering her his august patronage, and an engagement at the Théâtre François, that she yielded, like her mythological prototype, but from far other motives, for Monsieur Véron never bore the least resemblance to a swan. A solemn compact, however, was entered into on the occasion, and Monsieur Véron bound himself in honor never to divulge the liaison. Rachel's fiery genius, favored by all the critics of Paris (Monsieur Véron being the bellows-holder), soon dazzled the imagination of the electrified public, and she became the acknowledged Queen of Tragedy. Fame decked her brow, and wealth flowed into her coffers. La donna e Mobile sings the tenor in 'Rigoletto,' and so it was in this case; for Rachel, tired of her secret liaison, notified the luckless Véron of its discontinuance. Now, mark the desperate vengeance of the discarded opera-manager. He forthwith assembled all the penny-a-liners of the Parisian press at a sumptuous dinner at the Café de Paris, who little dreamed of the volcano in the breast of their Amphytrion. While the repast was gayly going on Monsieur Véron dispatched a note to the ill-fated actress, mentioning the journalists and 'men about town' he had gathered about him, and declaring that if she did not return instanter to her allegiance he would break all vows and disclose to his company the fact and proofs of their connection. Rachel recoiled before the menace. Things went on as before for a time, when again she closed her door to Monsieur Véron, who went through just the same ceremony as the first, but this time with a bold defiance from his victim. The ex-retailer of cough lozenges was as good as his threat, and he told at once, with vindictive flourish, the story of poor Rachel's weakness, which next day flew all over Paris, and cut her off, finally, from all the association with the refined and distinguished of her own sex. This pitiful tale has a moral, but so palpable that all may scan it."

WHO IS THE FATHER OF RACHEL'S CHILDREN?

The Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, in a letter of recent date, says: "Rachel's eldest son, a boy about fourteen, whose father is Count Walewski, is being educated at Geneva, and knew nothing of his mother's death. A friend of mine was requested to see the Minister of Foreign Affairs on this subject, and inquire from him if he did not think it fitting that the boy should be present at the funeral, which takes place to-morrow; but Count Walewski said he did not deem it by any means necessary, and that it would cause the child a sad and disagreeable impression. Most people imagine that the real fact is, that the Minister for Foreign Affairs does not choose that the crowd at Rachel's funeral should say, 'There, that young lad who is chief mourner, and Rachel's son, is the son also of M. Walewski, the first Minister of the Empire.' Besides this, many would have added, 'Ten or twelve years back that boy's father persecuted Rachel, the actress, to become his wife; and what was then termed her good sense, and her friends who surrounded her and besought her not to think of such a thing, alone prevented the marriage.' All this might not be particularly flattering to M. Walewski just now; so the young Alexander Napoleon Viscount Walewski (for he is perfectly acknowledged) is left in school at Geneva, and kept from the public eye."

The Court Journal says the recognition by Prince Napoleon of one of the children of the late Mademoiselle Rachel has caused an immense sensation.

THEATRICAL APPLAUSE IN PARIS.

The following story is going the rounds of the Paris papers: "Rachel was in the habit of showing her confidential friends some of the singular epistles which occasionally found their way to her, addressed by all sorts of persons; and the annexed was perhaps the not least curious of them all. The great tragedienne had made some complaint touching the strength of the applause provided by the manager as being inadequate to the efforts she was making in creating a new character. She was informed that the chief of the claque had been indisposed, and that it was the fault of his deputy. Hearing of Rachel's complaint, this personage addressed her as follows: 'Mademoiselle—I can not remain under the obloquy of a reproach from lips such as yours. The following is an authentic statement of what really took place: At the first representation I led the attack in person not less than fifty-three times; we had three acclamations, four hilarities, two thrilling movements, four renewals of applause, and two indefinite explosions. In fact, to such an extent did we carry our applause that the occupants of the stalls were scandalized and cried out à la porte. Some were positively exhausted with fatigue, and even intimated to me that they could not again go through such an evening. Seeing such to be the case, I applied for the manuscript, and after having profoundly studied the piece I was obliged to make up my mind, for the second representation, to certain curtailments in the service of my men. I, however, applied them only to MM.——; and if the ad interim office which I hold affords me the opportunity, I will make them ample amends. In such a situation as that which I have just depicted, I have only to request you to believe firmly in my profound admiration and respectful zeal, and I venture to entreat you to have some consideration for the difficulties which environ me. I am, Mademoiselle,' "etc.

CHRISTMAS FOUNDLINGS.

A touching custom has prevailed at Lyons for many years. The first child that is abandoned to the care of the Foundling Hospital the eve of Christmas Day is received with peculiar honor, and attended to with every care. A very handsome cradle, prepared beforehand, receives its little body, the softest coverings give it warmth, the kindest solicitude watches over its slumbers. The whole is designed to present the strongest contrast to the scene in the stable in which the Saviour was received in entering on his earthly existence, and to show that the being condemned here below to perish the victim of vice or misery is saved by the birth of Him who was sent on earth to inculcate charity and good-will among men.

M. GUIZOT'S MEMOIRS.

"M. Guizot, who returned to Paris some days ago," says a correspondent of the Emancipation of Brussels, "has delivered to the printer the manuscript of the first volume of his Memoirs. This volume, the publication of which is announced for the 15th January, comprises the political period from 1814 to 1816, that is to say, the time included between the residence of Louis XVIII. at Ghent and the accession of M. Decazes to power."

GERMANY.

MARSHAL RADETZKY SELLING HIS BODY TO A CREDITOR.

The Evening Post says: "German papers state that the veteran Radetzky, who it seems was constantly in debt, sold his body, some time previous to his death, to one of his creditors, a linen-draper of Vienna, named Barkfrieder. It appears that Barkfrieder, who had acquired an immense fortune from contracts for furnishing goods to the army in Italy, was desirous of attaining a position among the dignitaries of the Court, and determined by a master-stroke to accomplish his elevation from the plebeian ranks. Radetzky figured extensively in the linen-draper's books—the latter offered to cancel the obligations if the Field Marshal would place his body, after death, at his disposal, to be buried in his country seat at Watzdorf, promising, at the same time, that the veteran's grave should be surmounted by a handsome monument. Radetzky readily assented, and signed a written agreement to that effect. The old soldier now slumbers in the grounds of M. Barkfrieder, whose country seat has become the Mecca of princes, dukes, barons, counts, and generals. The linen-draper's scheme has been crowned with success—members of the imperial family and titled nobles have necessarily become his guests, and he is a member of the 'Court circle.'"

ITALY.

THE EARTHQUAKE AT NAPLES.

The Times correspondent gives the following, as part of an account of a tour through the district affected by the earthquake: "On entering S. Pietro, which is a suburb of Polla, and is separated from it by a river, they saw a wall, about 10 feet high, cracked from top to bottom, with an image of the Virgin let into it. Both S. Pietro and Polla have suffered awfully; one half of the houses were prostrate; the roofs of all had fallen in, and those which were standing were unsafe. Out of a population of 7000, 1000 have certainly fallen victims; 507 bodies have already been taken out and buried, and on Friday last the horrid work of disinterment was going on. During this day three severe shocks of earthquake were felt throughout the district; the first occurred before daybreak, the second about half-past 12 P.M., when they were standing on the ruins of a church examining the melancholy scene around them. Suddenly the ground began to heave violently, and a heavy sound was heard underneath; the cry of 'Earthquake!' was raised, and they all fled. The wall of a belfry-tower, which was still standing, fell almost upon their heels, and a house close by, which had been leaning out of the perpendicular, also fell, within 20 feet of them. It is difficult to describe the consternation of the people; all ran to the temporary building where Divine service is performed, and the crucifix and the image of the Madonna being brought out all followed in procession, priests and all scourging themselves with ropes."

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

Our dates from Calcutta are to 24th December. The Furukabad rebels have been defeated in two engagements, in the latter of which, on the 18th, the dispersion of the enemy was complete. Their guns were captured; British loss is trifling. No further intelligence from Oude. The 11th Cavalry mutinied on the 1st of December. They were overtaken near Purneah. Eleven were killed, but the remainder escaped. The 17th Native Infantry are under orders for China. A small force from Delhi, under Colonel Seton, encountered a body of rebels at Guingeree on the 15th December, took the guns, and killed 150 men. The English lost few men and three officers. Again, on the 11th December the same column attacked a strong force of the enemy intrenched at Putalem, near Futteghur, killed about 600 of them, including many chiefs; took eleven guns with their camp, and parted (pursuing?) the routed enemy seven miles. The British loss was trifling, including only one officer killed.

THE AMERICAN MISSIONARIES.

The Newark Advertiser says: "Nothing definite is yet known concerning the fate of the Jersey missionaries in India, though it is supposed they left Futtehgarh on the 2d or 3d of June last and fled down the River Ganges, in company with other missionary families. About this date, according to information furnished the Somerset Whig, a large company, composed of the wives and children of the officers, etc., of the East India Company, also left Futtehgarh, and were taken prisoners by Nena Sahib, and were all butchered at Cawnpore.

"It is rumored that the smaller company, in which Mr. Freeman was, were taken and imprisoned a few days and then beheaded. The belief of the relatives now is that they were probably killed at the time of the massacre of the other party. The last intelligence from them was dated in June, at which time they were at Futtehgarh, and in expectation of falling at every moment into the hands of the rebels.

"Mrs. Freeman was a daughter of the Rev. John S. Vredenburgh, formerly pastor of the First Dutch Church in Somerville. After the death of Mr. Vredenburgh she removed to Elizabeth. Mrs. Freeman was, in 1850, married to Rev. Edgar Freeman, a native of New Jersey, and sailed in July for India, where they have since remained, laboring as missionaries of the Presbyterian Board."

HOW THE LADIES WERE DRESSED AT LUCKNOW.

An officer writes: "We have all vacated Lucknow, and some or all are going to Cawnpore. The ladies had to walk out, and I went to see them, expecting to find them looking very miserable. Instead of that they looked quite well, dressed up with white kid gloves, and made me feel quite ashamed of my dirty appearance, as I had been sleeping on the ground in the dirt for several nights. When Sir Colin Campbell went into the Residency he dined there, and they offered him Champagne and claret, which he refused.

CHINA.

MEDIATION BY THE U. S. COMMISSIONER.

Our advices from China are dated at Hong Kong on the 16th of December. The Canton River was declared in blockade by the French naval commander, and Lord Elgin had sent in a British ultimatum to the Chinese authorities, which was to be accepted or rejected in the space of ten days. The Anglo-French force had occupied the Island of Donan, opposite to Canton. A report was circulated to the effect that an offer of mediation, made by the Russian Minister, had been rejected, but that a proposal to that effect, made by the Hon. Mr. Reed, the United States Commissioner, had been accepted.

ST. VALENTINE AND VALENTINES.

The observance of St. Valentine's Day among Christian nations is probably a relic of an ancient Roman custom. The Lupercalia, Roman feasts in honor of Pan and Juno, were held on this day, and among the ceremonies was a game wherein young persons of opposite sexes jocularly chose each other for the year, by lot.

St. Valentine, who has, probably very much against his will, lent his name to the day among Christian nations, was a presbyter of Rome, who was beheaded under the Emperor Claudius.

Birds are supposed to choose their partners about this time of the year, and hence, it is commonly supposed, originated the custom of young people also choosing partners for the year; or, as it is now observed, of sending anonymously amatory or flattering effusions to the objects of their preference.

Whatever may be the moving cause, lovers have observed the day from time immemorial. In England, shortly after the Reformation, it was "a ceremony never omitted among the vulgar," says Bourne, "to draw lots on the eve before Valentine Day. The names of a select number of one sex are by an equal number of the other put into some vessel, and after that every one draws a name, which for the present is called their Valentine, and is looked upon as a good omen of their being man and wife afterward." The interchange of amatory epistles on Valentine's Day seems to this day to be thought "of omission" of hymeneal consequences.

A REMINISCENCE OF ST. VALENTINE.

THE PURCHASER OF THE COMIC VALENTINE.

THE PURCHASER OF THE SENTIMENTAL VALENTINE.

In the days of the Spectator Valentines partook of the courtly character of the literature of the day. Instead of the caricatures and comic verses which now-days form the staple of Valentine literature, were then circulated courteous professions of attachment and devotion from young man to young maiden, honeyed with compliments to her various perfections, and expressive of an humble hope for the love of the fair one addressed. Fancy Sir Roger de Coverley indicting a Valentine!

In parts of England there is at this day a superstition that the first unmarried person of the male sex met by a young girl on St. Valentine's morning, on walking out, is the destined husband of the fair maid.

In Scotland, on St. Valentine's morning, the lower surprises his mistress, and blindfolds her with his hands, saying—

"Guess, and guess truly, lady mine,
Who is abroad as thy Valentine?
Where are the fingers, and where is the vow,
That press on thy forehead, that bloweth thee now?
Love for such love hath no need of his eyes,
To the loving no lover is known by his signs.
Oh! for a spell on thy lips of love's art!
Say, to my name, dearest! writ on thy heart!"

"Surely thy soul and thy brow understand
The voice of my spirit, the clasp of my hand.
Oh! if they nod not my ridd'n this morn,
That bond must be widow'd, that spirit forlorn.
This is the first when in city and grove
Love is a wanderer seeking for love.
Who is thy fond one now pleading for thine?
Guess, and guess truly, my own Valentine!"

With us, and at the present time, St. Valentine's Day is held sacred to anonymous practical jokes. Ere yet the present system of prepaying postage was inaugurated rival lovers were wont to victimize each other with bulky parcels duly directed in mock feminine hand, as coming from the disputed lady, and slyly committed to the charge of the village postmaster, who took care to levy sufficient postage upon the luckless recipient, whose curiosity was sure to overcome his cupidity. Exaggerated caricatures have taken the place of heavier parcels; and many a spiteful thought, slumbering quietly the year through, finds vent on St. Valentine's Day in anonymous satire.

Yet doubtless many a match has been made even among ourselves by the aid of a "sentimental Val," gratifying the vanity and touching the heart of the wished-for maid, by praising, in second-hand third-rate rhyme, the cool black eyes, the raven tresses, the cherry lips, the pearly teeth, the fawn-like form, and siren voice supposed to be part and parcel of said fortunate young lady. The "sentimental Val" is by no means the least powerful weapon in Cupid's armory. In fact, no history of love can be said to be complete without it. There is something so delightful in the anonymity of the shot; and then what fair one having a dozen lovers, and receiving a dozen Valentines, but chooses her favorite Valentine from the assortment, and in that very deed commits her heart to him whose compliment has best pleased her fancy?

They say "set a thief to catch a thief." How know so well how to use the artillery of love as those who have once won the great battle. This will account for that not unreasonable fear in which widowers are held by prudent bachelors—vide Samuel Weller, Sen., in Pickwick Papers—as well as for the general success of "eligible" widowers in remaking at the expiration of the usual year of sorrowing remembrance.

And we hereby caution all fair maidens among our readers to steel their hearts against all Valentines which do not certainly emanate from one or other of their lovers. Thus was our fair friend, Amelia F——, whose curls were laid upon our table but two weeks ago. One year ago Miss Amelia was wont to inform her friends, with an air of the utmost sincerity, that she had determined to live an old maid. She is a fruitful girl—and no doubt she thought as she spoke. Two weeks ago the fair Amelia was married to one who had long sued cheerily and hopelessly for her hand.

"How did it come about?" we asked her father, as we sat lately in his study, smoking a post-prandial Havana. He laughed and disclosed the plot. The old fox had seen for a long time the love which young Harvey bore the fair Amelia. He knew that she returned it, but, with the obstinacy peculiar to some young fellers, refused to give her suitor an opportunity to "pop the question." Harvey was about giving up in despair, and things had come to a dead lock, when a happy inspiration brought the old gentleman to a stand in the midst of Wall Street.

It was the eve of last St. Valentine's Day. He rushed up to Cozzns's, and expended—I won't tell how large a sum—in the purchase of the most extraordinary "sentimental Val" of the season; inscribed upon the blank leaf some touchingly tender but manly verses "To Amelia," directed the parcel to "Miss Amelia B——, —— Street," and committed it to the tender mercies of the postman.

"That did the work, Sir," said the old fox, triumphantly. "My young lady was brought to her senses. She supposed, of course, that the Valentine came from Harvey; was touched with the manly devotion of the verses, received Harvey favorably when I sent for him to spend an evening with us—permitted him to declare his love; and now, Sir," concluded the old gentleman, throwing the stump of his cigar into the grate, "the happy couple are off for Havana together. Wouldn't I like to be behind the door when Amelia comes to talk about her Valentine!"

What shall we say about feminine motch-making after that?

Every body has noticed the eruption of Valentines on shop windows and counters a few days before the memorable 14th. For guess the amount of capital invested in the manufacture of these missives—amatory and otherwise—or the vast number sold and dispatched each year.

The head-quarters of the manufacture is in New York. Five firms—Messrs. P. C. Cozzns, H. W. Strong, Fisher and Brothers, M'Laughlin and Brothers, and J. Wrigley—have the business chiefly in their hands. There are, besides these, five or six small manufacturers in New York, one at Worcester, Massachusetts, and two in New Hampshire. To Mr. Cozzns we are indebted for some interesting statistics of the present condition of the trade, embodied below. It is only about eighteen years ago that Valentines were first made popular throughout the Union. At that time the manufacturers sent traveling agents through the South and West with samples; and these gentlemanly fellows received, in a majority of cases, a reception to those with whom they wished to deal the ure to be made of the curious missives, and to make a minute of the particular season for which they were prepared. At that time cheap Valentines were very high priced—the commonest "colored comics" being sold from twenty-five to fifty cents. The original "sentimental Vals" were not then made. The "motto" seem took however, there being sufficient mischief in it to make it palatable to human nature. The demand increased so fast that the manufacturers extended their operations, and, by reducing the prices of their wares, soon brought them into almost universal use.

THE RECIPIENT OF THE COMIC VALENTINE.

THE RECIPIENT OF THE SENTIMENTAL VALENTINE.

MAKING VALENTINES.

Although the machinery needed for the manufacture of Valentines is of the simplest description—consisting, in great part, of a few embossing presses, some glue, water colors, and the nimble fingers of expert young ladies (the process of manufacture is shown in our engraving)—the capital invested in the business in America amounts to the large sum of $70,000. The profits, to all concerned, from the manufacturer to the smallest retail dealer, are very large. The sales for the last year amounted to over $2o,000, exclusive of the lace and embossed paper and embossed envelopes used by those who prefer originality to second-hand wit — which, counted in, would bring the amount up to $3 0,000. A vast sum to be expended in the idle gratification of what has, somehow, become a national whim.

There were sold, we are assured, last year, over three millions of Valentines, ranging in price (retail) from three cents to thirty dollars. Of this, one would think the great bulk should be comic. But the manufacturers assert that the race is very equally divided between "comical" and "sentimentals;" the actual sale being about one and a half millions of each kind, and the sentimental valentines outvaluing the others very largely.

The manufacturers lead the taste of the public in the way of novelties; but it is curious to know that certain parts of the country demand their wares at certain prices. In the Northern and New England States, it is stated, the demand is chiefly for Valentines ranging in price from three cents to three dollars. In the South and West the favorites sell at from twenty-five cents to twenty dollars each. In the large cities a few are sold each year at prices ranging from twenty to fifty dollars each. The Valentines which sell from two dollars upward are mostly inclosed in fancy boxes, which are imported from Paris for the purpose.

Besides these boxes the lace paper, gold and silver Lion paper, rice paper, satin and crape, are likewise imported. The finest lace and embossed paper, curiously enough, comes from England, the French being inferior to their neighbors across the channel in this branch of mechanic art. Paper flowers, gold and silver embossed ornaments, mottoes, and medallions of different kinds are also imported. The embossed envelopes and much of the plainer embossed papers are also manufactured in New York, and the verses, vines, beads, etc., lithographed in colors, with which Valentines of all prices are decorated, are also prepared here.

Altogether about one hundred hands find employment, the year round, in preparing, assorting, and arranging the materials, and in the embossing, coloring, painting, and other labors which are necessary to complete the three millions of Valentines sold yearly. Of these seventy-five are women, and seventy-five boys and men. The women receive wages according to their taste, skill, and speed in workmanship, varying from three to eight dollars per week. Milliners are counted the best hands, as these have some practice in the arrangement of artificial flowers, and the pleasing combination of colors, on which depends, in great measure, the success of a pattern — as well as greater nicety in handling the minute specimens of decorative art which, properly arranged, make up the high-priced "sentimental Val." Men are employed to move the embossing presses, and boys to dash the "cheap comics," wherein the infamous artist belle hath her pet vex some haughty maiden.

Imported Valentines do not succeed. Many of those containing moving figures are brought from England; but even these ingenious contrivances do not obtain the approval of Brother Jonathan, whose idea of a joke is evidently something entirely different from that of his cousin John Bull. About ten thousand dollars' worth of various styles of Valentines were imported last year, but the venture does not pay. The rule principle is strictly adhered to by our manufacturers. One firm employs three travelers, who start out in October of each year, and return in February, sending home orders meanwhile, and securing trade. The annual rush of business lasts generally about ten days — that is to say, four days before the 14th, and five days after.

In the opinion of our informant, the students of the University of Virginia display uniformly the best taste in their selections, and the orders filled for their use have to be chosen with more care than any others.

BOARDING-SCHOOL ON ST. VALENTINE'S MORNING.

We trust the young gentlemen of the University will do honor to our mention of them, by answering more than usual care bestowed after upon their selection of Valentines. Their cheap comics should be funnier than ever; their "moving figured V.'s" should move to risibility not only themselves, but also their recipients. And as to their "sentimental V.'s," if they do not, in their choice of them, display the most faultless taste and judgment, they may expect the compliance of their young lady friends to be warmly entertained by the Lounger of Harper's Weekly.

In this matter of selecting Valentines we trust all our readers will do justice, not only to themselves, but also to their victims. There should be some point to the joke when young Smoky sends a "cheap comic" to his crusty neighbor over the way. In such case even old Crusty may be induced to laugh, and have a better opinion than before of the wit of his vivacious. And we may be permitted to suggest that there is no point, not even the last end of a joke, when Mr. Impudence sends a hideous caricature of a crea female to Miss Arrabina, his kind old maiden aunt. He may laugh over his ill-natured jest now. He will not laugh some day, when, looking over the papers of the kind old lady, he shall find these such Illustrated "cheap comic," but, tied up with ribbon of faded rose color, the courtly proffer of some old-time lover's love, which the good soul could not accept, but valued yet enough to lay away among her hidden treasures.

As for young William's choice of a "sentimental Val" for his adored Anna Maria, that is altogether too solemn and important a matter for us to venture advice upon; and we leave that young man to his fate, with the ardent hope that he may get through the important operation without breaking his heart or spoiling his mustache. One thing, however, he should not attempt; namely, to originate the rhymes with whose jingle the musical ear of Anna Maria is to be made captive. Let him take advice in this particular at least, and borrow of Byron or Moore that which, if constructed by himself will only proclaim him a donkey.

THE FIRST VALENTINE.

HAVELOCK.

[From Punch.]

He is gone. Heaven's will is best:
Indian turf o'erlies his breast.
Ghoul in black, nor fool in gold
Laid him in yon hallowed mould.
Guarded to a soldier's grave
By the bravest of the brave,
He hath gained a nobler tomb
Than in old cathedral gloom,
Nobler mourners paid the rite
Than the crowd that craves a sight,
England's banners o'er him waved—
Dead, he keeps the realm he saved.
Strew not on the hero's hearse
Garlands of a herald's verse:
Let us hear no words of Fame
Sounding loud a deathless name:
Tell us of no vauntful Glory
Shouting forth her haughty story.
All life long his homage rose
To far other shrine than those.
"In Hoc Signo," pale nor dim,
Lit the battle-field for him,
And the prize he sought and won,
Was the Crown for Duty done.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XV.

"When God wills, all winds bring rain."—Ancient Proverb.

The manager had not submitted to the loss of his property in Sophy and £100, without taking much vain trouble to recover the one or the other. He had visited Jasper while that gentleman lodged in St. James's, but the moment he hinted at the return of the £100, Mr. Losely opened both door and window, and requested the manager to make his immediate choice of the two. Taking the more usual mode of exit, Mr. Rugge vented his just indignation in a lawyer's letter, threatening Mr. Losely with an action for conspiracy and fraud. He had also more than once visited Mrs. Crane, who somewhat soothed him by allowing that he had been very badly used, that he ought at least to be repaid his money, and promising to do her best to persuade Mr. Losely to "behave like a gentleman." With regard to Sophy herself, Mrs. Crane appeared to feel a profound indifference. In fact, the hatred which Mrs. Crane had unquestionably conceived for Sophy while under her charge, was much diminished by Losely's unnatural conduct toward the child. To her it was probably a matter of no interest whether Sophy was in Rugge's hands or Waife's; enough for her that the daughter of a woman against whose memory her fiercest passions were enlisted was, in either case, so far below herself in the grades of the social ladder.

Perhaps of the two protectors for Sophy—Rugge and Waife—her spite alone would have given the preference to Waife. He was on a still lower step of the ladder than the itinerant manager. Nor, though she had so mortally injured the forlorn cripple in the eyes of Mr. Hartopp, had she any deliberate purpose of revenge to gratify against him? On the contrary, if she viewed him with contempt, it was a contempt not unmixed with pity. It was necessary to make to the mayor the communications she had made, or that worthy magistrate would not have surrendered the child intrusted to him, at least until Waife's return. And really it was a kindness to the old man to save him both from an agonizing scene with Jasper, and from the more public opprobrium which any resistance on his part to Jasper's authority, or any altercation between the two, would occasion. And as her main object then was to secure Losely's allegiance to her, by proving her power to be useful to him, so Waifes, and Sophys, and Mayors, and Managers, were to her but as pawns to be moved and sacrificed, according to the leading strategy of her game.

Rugge came now, agitated and breathless, to inform Mrs. Crane that Waife had been seen in London. Mr. Rugge's clown had seen him, not far from the Tower; but the cripple had disappeared before the clown, who was on the top of an omnibus, had time to descend. "And even if he had actually caught hold of Mr. Waife," observed Mrs. Crane, "what then? You have no claim on Mr. Waife."

"But the Phenomenon must be with that ravishing marauder," said Rugge. "However, I have set a minister of justice, that is, ma'am, a detective police, at work; and what I now ask of you is simply this—should it be necessary for Mr. Losely to appear with me before the senate, that is to say, ma'am, a metropolitan police court, in order to prove my legal property in my own bought and paid-for Phenomenon, will you induce that bold, bad man, not again to return the poisoned chalice to my lips?"

"I do not even know where Mr. Losely is—perhaps not in London."

"Ma'am, I saw him last night at the theatre—Princess's. I was in the shilling gallery. He who owes me £100, ma'am—he in a private box!"

"Ah! you are sure; by himself?"

"With a lady, ma'am—a lady in a shawl from Ingee. I know them shawls. My father taught me to know them in early childhood, for he was an ornament to British commerce—a broker, ma'am—pawn! And," continued Rugge, with a withering smile, "that man in a private box, which at the Princess's costs two pounds two, and with the spoils of Ingee by his side, lifted his eye-glass and beheld me; me in the shilling gallery, and his conscience did not say 'should we not change places if I paid that gentleman £100?' Can such things be, and overcome us, ma'am, like a summer-cloud, without our special—I put it to you, ma'am—wonder?"

"Oh, with a lady, was he!" exclaimed Arabella Crane; her wrath, which, while the manager spoke, gathered fast and full, bursting now into words—"His ladies shall know the man who sells his only child for a show; only find out where the girl is, then come here again before you stir further. Oh, with a lady! Go to your detective policeman, or, rather, send him to me; we will first discover Mr. Losely's address. I will pay all the expenses. Rely on my zeal, Mr. Rugge."

Much comforted, the manager went his way. He had not been long gone before Jasper himself appeared. The traitor entered with a more than customary bravado of manner, as if he apprehended a scolding, and was prepared to face it; but Mrs. Crane neither reproached him for his prolonged absence, nor expressed surprise at his return. With true feminine duplicity she received him as if nothing had happened. Jasper, thus relieved, became of his own accord apologetic and explanatory; evidently he wanted something of Mrs. Crane. "The fact is, my dear friend," said he, sinking into a chair, "that the day after I last saw you, I happened to go to the General Post-office to see if there were any letters for me—you smile, you don't believe me. Honor bright—here they are," and Jasper took from the side-pocket of his coat a pocket-book—a new pocket-book—a brilliant pocket-book—fragrant Russian leather—delicately embossed—golden clasps—silken lining—jeweled pencil-case—malachite penknife—an arsenal of nick-nacks stored in neat recesses; such a pocket-book as no man ever gives to himself. Sardanapalus would not have given that pocket-book to himself! Such a pocket-book never comes to you, oh, enviable Lotharios, save as tributary keepsakes from the charmers who adore you! Grimly the Adopted Mother eyed that pocket-book. Never had she seen it before. Grimly she pinched her lips. Out of this dainty volume—which would have been of cumbrous size to a slim thread-paper exquisite, but scarcely bulged into ripple the Atlantic expanse of Jasper Losely's magnificent chest—the monster drew forth two letters on French paper—foreign postmarks. He replaced them quickly, only suffering her eye to glance at the address, and continued: "Fancy! that purse-proud Grand Turk of an infidel, though he would not believe me, has been to France—yes, actually to * * * * *—making inquiries evidently with reference to Sophy. The woman who ought to have thoroughly converted him took flight, however, and missed seeing him. Confound her! I ought to have been there. So I have no doubt for the present the Pagan remains stubborn. Gone on into Italy, I hear; doing me, violating the laws of nature, and roving about the world with his own solitary hands in his bottomless pocket, like the Wandering Jew! But, as some slight set-off in my run of ill-luck, I find at the Post-office a pleasanter letter than the one which brings me this news: A rich elderly lady, who has no family, wants to adopt a nice child, will take Sophy; make it worth my while to let her have Sophy. 'Tis convenient in a thousand ways to settle one's child comfortably in a rich house—establishes rights, subject, of course, to cheques which would not affront me—a Father! But the first thing requisite is to catch Sophy; 'tis in that I ask your help—you are so clever. Best of creatures! what could I do without you? As you say, whenever I want a friend I come to you—Bella!"

Mrs. Crane surveyed Jasper's face deliberately. It is strange how much more readily women read the thoughts of men than men detect those of women. "You know where the child is," said she, slowly.

"Well, I take it for granted she is with the old man; and I have seen him—seen him yesterday."

"Go on; you saw him—where?"

"Near London Bridge."

"What business could you possibly have in that direction? Ah! I guess, the railway-station—to Dover—you are going abroad?"

"No such thing—you are so horridly suspicious. But it is true I had been to the station inquiring after some luggage or parcels which a friend of mine had ordered to be left there—now, don't interrupt me. At the foot of the bridge I caught a sudden glimpse of the old man—changed—altered—aged—one eye lost. You had said I should not know him again, but I did; I should never have recognized his face. I knew him by the build of the shoulder, a certain turn of the arms—I don't know what; one knows a man familiar to one from birth without seeing his face. Oh, Bella! I declare that I felt as soft—as soft as the silliest muff who ever—" Jasper did not complete his comparison, but paused a moment, breathing hard, and then broke into another sentence. "He was selling something in a basket—matches, boot-straps, deuce knows what. He! a clever man, too! I should have liked to drop into that d—d basket all the money I had about me."

"Why did not you?"

"Why? How could I? He would have recognized me. There would have been a scene—a row—a flare up—a mob round us, I dare say. I had no idea it would so upset me; to see him selling matches, too; glad we did not meet at Gatesboro'. Not even for that £100 do I think I could have faced him. No—as he said when we last parted, 'The world is wide enough for both.' Give me some brandy—thank you."

"You did not speak to the old man—he did not see you—but you wanted to get back the child; you felt sure she must be with him; you followed him home?"

"I? No; I should have had to wait for hours. A man like me, loitering about London Bridge!—I should have been too conspicuous—he would have soon caught sight of me, though I kept on his blind side. I employed a ragged boy to watch and follow him, and here is the address. Now, will you get Sophy back for me without any trouble to me, without my appearing? I would rather charge a regiment of Horse Guards than bully that old man."

"Yet you would rob him of that child—his sole comfort?"

"Bother!" cried Losely, impatiently: "the child can be only a burden to him; well out of his way; 'tis for the sake of that child he is selling matches! It would be the greatest charity we could do him to set him free from that child sponging on him, dragging him down; without her he'd find a way to shift for himself. Why, he's even cleverer than I am! And there—there—give him this money, but don't say it came from me."

He thrust, without counting, several sovereigns—at least twelve or fourteen—into Mrs. Crane's palm; and so powerful a charm has goodness the very least, even in natures the most evil, that that unusual, eccentric, inconsistent gleam of human pity in Jasper Losely's benighted soul, shed its relenting influence over the angry, wrathful, and vindictive feelings with which Mrs. Crane the moment before regarded the perfidious miscreant; and she gazed at him with a sort of melancholy wonder. What! though so little sympathizing with affection that he could not comprehend that he was about to rob the old man of a comfort which no gold could repay—what! though so contemptuously callous to his own child—yet there in her hand lay the unmistakable token that a something of humanity, compunction, compassion, still lingered in the breast of the greedy cynic; and at that thought all that was softest in her own human nature moved toward him—indulgent—gentle. But in the rapid changes of the heart-feminine, the very sentiment that touched upon love brought back the jealousy that bordered upon hate. How came he by so much money? more than days ago, he, the insatiate spendthrift, had received for his taskwork? And that Pocket-book!

"You have suddenly grown rich, Jasper?"

For a moment he looked confused, but replied, as he re-helped himself to the brandy, "Yes, rouge-et-noir—luck. Now do go and see after this affair, that's a dear, good woman. Get the child to-day, if you can. I will call here in the evening."

"Should you take her, then, abroad at once to this worthy lady who will adopt her? If so, we shall meet, I suppose, no more; and I am assisting you to forget that I live still."

"Abroad—that crotchet of yours again. You are quite mistaken—in fact, the lady is in London. It was for her effects that I went to the station. Oh, don't be jealous—quite elderly."

"Jealous, my dear Jasper; you forget. I am as your mother. One of your letters, then, announced this lady's intended arrival. You were in correspondence with this—elderly lady?"

"Why, not exactly in correspondence. But when I left Paris I gave the General Post-office as my address to a few friends in France. And this lady, who took an interest in my affairs (ladies, whether old or young, who have once known me, always do), was aware that I had expectations with respect to the child. So, some days ago, when I was so badly off, I wrote a line to tell her that Sophy had been no go, and that but for a dear friend (that is you) I might be on the pavé. In her answer, she said she should be in London as soon as I received her letter; and gave me an address here at which to learn where to find her when arrived—a good old soul, but strange to London. I have been very busy, helping her to find a house, recommending tradesmen, and so forth. She likes style, and can afford it. A pleasant house enough; but our quiet evenings here spoil me for any thing else. Now get on your bonnet, and let me see you off."

"On one condition, my dear Jasper; that you stay here till I return."

Jasper made a wry face. But, as it was near dinner-time, and he never wanted for appetite, he at length agreed to employ the interval of her absence in discussing a meal, which experience had told him Mrs. Crane's new cook would, not unskillfully, though hastily, prepare. Mrs. Crane left him to order the dinner, and put on her shawl and bonnet. But, gaining her own room, she rung for Bridgett Greggs; and when that confidential servant appeared, she said: "In the side-pocket of Mr. Losely's coat there is a Pocket-book; in it there are some letters which I must see. I shall appear to go out, leave the street-door ajar, that I may slip in again unobserved. You will serve dinner as soon as possible. And when Mr. Losely, as usual, exchanges his coat for the dressing-gown, contrive to take out that pocket-book unobserved by him. Bring it to me here, in this room: you can as easily replace it afterward. A moment will suffice to my purpose."

Bridgett nodded, and understood. Jasper, standing by the window, saw Mrs. Crane leave the house, walking briskly. He then threw himself on the sofa, and began to doze: the doze deepened, and became sleep. Bridgett, entering to lay the cloth, so found him. She approached on tiptoe—sniffed the perfume of the pocket-book—saw its gilded corners peep forth from its lair. She hesitated—she trembled—she was in mortal fear of that truculent slumberer; but sleep lessens the awe thieves feel, or heroes inspire. She has taken the pocket-book—she has fled with the booty—she is in Mrs. Crane's apartment, not five minutes after Mrs. Crane has regained its threshold.

Rapidly the jealous woman ransacked the pocket-book—started to see, elegantly worked with gold threads, in the lining, the words, "Souviens-toi de ta Gabrielle"—no other letters, save the two, of which Jasper had vouchsafed to her but the glimpse. Over these she hurried her glittering eyes; and when she restored them to their place, and gave back the book to Bridgett, who stood by, breathless and listening, lest Jasper should awake, her face was colorless, and a kind of shudder seemed to come over her. Left alone, she rested her face on her hand, her lips moving as if in self-commune. Then, noiselessly she glided down the stairs, regained the street, and hurried fast upon her way.

Bridgett was not in time to restore the book to Jasper's pocket, for when she re-entered he was turning round and stretching himself between sleep and waking. But she dropped the book skillfully on the floor, close beside the sofa; it would seem to him, on waking, to have fallen out of the pocket in the natural movements of sleep.

And in fact, when he rose, dinner now on the table, he picked up the pocket-book without suspicion. But it was lucky that Bridgett had not waited for the opportunity suggested by her mistress. For when Jasper put on the dressing-gown, he observed that his coat wanted brushing; and, in giving it to the servant for that purpose, he used the precaution of taking out the pocket-book, and placing it in some other receptacle of his dress.

Mrs. Crane returned in less than two hours—returned with a disappointed look, which at once prepared Jasper for the intelligence that the birds to be entrapped had flown.

"They went away this afternoon," said Mrs. Crane, tossing Jasper's sovereigns on the table, as if they burned her fingers. "But leave the fugitives to me. I will find them."

Jasper relieved his angry mind by a series of guilty but meaningless expletives; and then, seeing no farther use to which Mrs. Crane's wits could be applied at present, finished the remainder of her brandy, and wished her good-night, with a promise to call again, but without any intimation of his own address. As soon as he was gone, Mrs. Crane once more summoned Bridgett.

"You told me last week that your brother-in-law, Simpson, wished to go to America, that he had the offer of employment there, but that he could not afford the fare of the voyage. I promised I would help him if it was a service to you."

"You are a hangel, Miss!" exclaimed Bridgett, dropping a low courtesy—so low that it seemed as if she was going on her knees. "And may you have your deserts in the next blessed world, where there are no black-hearted villings."

"Enough, enough," said Mrs. Crane, recoiling, perhaps, from that grateful benediction. "You have been faithful to me, as none else have ever been; but this time I do not serve you in return so much as I meant to do. The service is reciprocal, if your brother-in-law will do me a favor. He takes with him his daughter, a mere child. Bridgett, let them enter their names on the steam-vessel as William and Sophy Waife; they can, of course, resume their own name when the voyage is over. There is the fare for them, and something more. Pooh, no thanks. I can spare the money. See your brother-in-law the first thing in the morning; and remember they go by the next vessel, which sails from Liverpool on Thursday."

LOTTY LOWE.

Lotty Lowe, Lotty Lowe,
You know my love, you know my woe,
I think of you where'er I go
You charming, wicked Lotty Lowe!

Lotty Lowe, Lotty Lowe,
See the crested corn-cobs grow—
My love for you grows twice as fast,
But at this rate things can not last.

Lotty Lowe, Lotty Lowe,
I wonder if your tears will flow
If you some day behold a grave
Down by the red Missouri's wave.

Ah, Lotty Lowe, the summer flies!
Ah, Lotty Lowe, the green leaf dies!
I need not fall, I need not flee,
If you a summer make for me!

WHAT A BOTTLE OF BRANDY DID.

AN EPISODE IN THE "PATRIOT WAR."

"We came more than once very near fighting," said the Canadian Colonel, as we watched the first "regular train" crossing the Niagara Suspension Bridge.

"About the Caroline affair, do you mean?"

"No. That was not the most critical time, though Sir Francis Head, the most wrong-headed fellow in her Majesty's service, did his best to put things into a muddle."

"Was it when we caught that poor fool M'Leod, and came so near hanging him?"

"No. It was before that. Both Governments had time to get cool, and saw that it was folly to go to war about him."

"Still, if he had been found guilty of the murder of Duffy, we must have hung him; and as your Government had assumed the responsibility of the affair, how could you avoid making it a case of war?"

"A little diplomacy settled all that. We agreed to find witnesses who would swear to an alibi, and you agreed to believe them. Upon my honor, I think you undertook the more difficult task."

"How and when was it that we came so near coming to blows? and what prevented the catastrophe?"

"It was prevented by a bottle of bad brandy. The affair is a portion of the unwritten history of the times, and is worth the telling."

"How was it, Colonel?"

"It was not long after the burning of the Caroline, and there was excitement enough on both sides of the line. We had a couple of thousand men, and the Patriots were encamped on Navy Island. We had no very definite information as to their numbers. Some said there were five hundred; others guessed them at three times as many. But few or many, they had plenty of artillery and small arms, as I once came near finding out to my cost when I approached the Island in command of a reconnoitring force. They peppered away at us, and it is a wonder that we were not blown out of the water. We had fitted out an armed flotilla, consisting of two schooners and a couple of scows, for the purpose of covering a landing upon the Island. But as we could not at the time command a sufficient number of boats, our squadron lay inactive in the river a few miles above. Your Government had in the mean time sent General Scott to the frontiers to try and keep the peace. A noble fellow is the General! He has saved you and us more than one war. Don't you think your Government is acting rather shabbily, quibbling about a few dollars more or less?"

"It looks like it, Colonel. But depend upon it, all will be right at last. The country knows too well what it owes to the old veteran to suffer any injustice to be done to him."

"Well," continued the Colonel, "we lay in the river commanding the access to Navy Island, and General Scott had erected a battery on the shore commanding us, and within point-blank range. About this time the little steamer Barcelona dropped down from Buffalo to Fort Schlosser, carrying, as every body supposed, recruits and supplies to our neighbors on Navy Island. However, we ascertained from our spies that her papers were all regular—a peaceful trader plying between two American ports—and we could not interfere. We afterward learned that she had commenced running between Schlosser and Navy Island on 'picnic' excursions and such-like peaceful errands. We had no means of hindering that, and said nothing.

"One day intelligence reached our head-quarters at Chippewa that the Barcelona was about to ascend the river to Buffalo for further supplies. To do this she must come within reach of our flotilla, and our commander, Captain Graham, received orders from Colonel M'Nab and Captain Drew to arrest her. But on the very day before she was to ascend, Colonel Hughes of the 24th arrived at Chippewa; and as he outranked M'Nab, he took the command. His first step was to forbid Captain Drew to interfere with any vessel ascending the river under American colors. Much against his will the Captain was forced to send an order to this effect to the commander of the flotilla.

"At dinner Colonel Hughes changed his mind, and sent to Graham an order to 'Stop the Barcelona, peaceably, if possible; but at all events to stop her.'"

"The mess must have had very good Port," suggested we.

"Very likely they did; and it came near costing us dear," rejoined the Colonel. "I am an old soldier now, and may safely own that I did not at all relish our position. It was easy enough, to be sure, for us to stop the Barcelona. We could have blown her out of the water in two minutes; but, unluckily, Scott's battery could do us the same kind turn in about three-fourths of the time. We soon had evidence that he was quite determined to do so if necessary. For hardly had we received our orders to stop the Barcelona, before a boat approached the flotilla from the American shore with a message from General Scott to the effect that, if we interfered with the steamer, he should consider it equivalent to a declaration of war, and would sink our squadron instanter. We were very well aware that a couple of rounds from his battery would be quite sufficient for the purpose.

"Our bluff Captain replied that he had orders to stop the Barcelona, and stop her he would. So we took a quiet glass of brandy and smoked a cigar with the very gentlemanly young American officer who had brought us General Scott's message, which, under the circumstances, was equivalent to our death-warrant. He took a very courteous leave of us and returned to the American side.

"'Old Graham,' as we called him, now issued his orders to the vessels of the squadron. We were to put springs on our cables, so as to be able to engage the American battery, after we had taken the Barcelona. Considering how completely we were in its power, this would have appeared a capital joke, had it not been a matter of life and death.

"I very well knew that Old Graham would go to the bottom before he would swerve from obeying orders; but being, as I have said, a young officer, it would not do to show any alarm; so I turned in to what was likely to be my last night's sleep.

"The morning broke gloriously. The thermometer stood a number of degrees below zero, and a sharp north wind blew away the mist, and showed the trees on both banks glittering in the rays of the rising sun, as though every twig was hung with diamonds. By-and-by we saw the Barcelona shoot out from the island, and move slowly up stream toward us. Orders were passed to light our slow matches, in readiness for action. At this moment the bugles in the American batteries sounded a call; we could see the gunners fall into their places, load their pieces, and bring a couple of them to bear directly upon each of our vessels. We were so near that we could actually see them light their slow matches.

"All this time the Barcelona kept creeping up toward us. She was a slow boat at best, and wind and current being against her, she did not make more than a couple of miles an hour; but even at this rate, half an hour would bring her up to us, when we were sure Graham would order us to fire upon her; which we were just as sure would be followed by Scott's firing upon us, and sending us to keep her company at the bottom. It would have been an even chance which of us went first over the Falls.

"Just at this moment we saw a dragoon on our side hailing us, and holding up a dispatch from head-quarters. A gig was sent, and the document was brought on board. It was from Colonel Hughes, and was short, and to the point:

"'Under no circumstance will Captain Graham interfere with any vessel bearing the American flag.'

"I am not now afraid to own that I was delighted at this new order, though I would not then have acknowledged it for the world. Graham swore like a trooper, but had no other alternative than to give orders to the commanders of the other vessels to let the Barcelona pass. They swore too, and seemed vastly grieved that they had lost such a capital chance of going to the bottom.

"Meanwhile the Barcelona puffed lazily up, and as she passed between our vessels we were saluted with a cheer from her decks, which in no wise tended to soothe our ruffled feelings.

"Hardly was the steamer out of sight, when a boat was seen approaching us from Chippewa. It bore an officer charged to arrest Captain Graham for disobedience of orders and neglect of duty in suffering the Barcelona to pass. He was sent to head-quarters to give an account of himself. He produced the dispatch forbidding him to interfere with any vessel under American colors. Its purport was unmistakable, and there was no doubt of the genuineness of the signature of Colonel Hughes; but it was neither dated nor numbered.

"The whole matter was soon explained. It seems that Captain Lockwood was in command of a troop of dragoons, who were on patrol duty along the river. Happening early in the morning to enter a small grog-shop midway between Chippewa and the station of the flotilla, he espied a dragoon stretched out on the floor, as drunk as a lord. Upon searching him an order was found on his person, directed to 'Captain Graham, in command of the flotilla.' Lockwood at once dispatched this by his own orderly, the original bearer being too drunk to explain how long it had been in his possession. It turned out to be the first order of Colonel Hughes, sent before dinner on the preceding day; and to which he had fortunately forgotten to affix any date or number. Graham receiving it the day after, very naturally concluded that it was subsequent to the one ordering him to stop the Barcelona; and so, sorely against his grain, he allowed her to pass."

"Had the dragoon kept sober, he would have delivered his dispatch the day before?" suggested we.

"And Graham would have stopped the Barcelona, and—"

"Scott would have fired upon your flotilla, and—"

"I should not have had the pleasure of narrating this incident to you."

"War would have been inevitable, think you?"

"How could it have been avoided, with Sir Francis Head to give his version of the story to our Government, and the red-hot 'sympathizers' on your side?"

"We should have 'annexed' the Canadas," said I, confidently.

"Perhaps so, and perhaps not. At all events not before our fleet had bombarded New York and Boston," replied the Colonel.

"If you had gone to war with us seventeen years ago, you would hardly have been in a condition to have fought Russia, just now."

"Nor would you have cared to fight Mexico, and the gold of California would not have been discovered."

"Quite possibly," assented we.

"So," moralized the Colonel, "that bottle of bad brandy has changed the course of the world's history for a century."

THE PILOT'S WIFE.

Bravely the Pilot sailed to sea,
  Down the Bay and out of the Narrows;
His sails were trim, and the wind was free,
  And his crew were merry as morning sparrows;
But none were blither of heart than he,
  As he went sailing out of the Narrows.

He sailed to meet the mighty ships,
  From distant countries across the ocean,
With a jolly sea-ditty upon his lips
  That sang of a sailor's brave devotion.
So with trolling tongue, and hands on hips,
  The Pilot went sailing over the ocean.

But by-and-by the sky grew black,
  And he heard the growl of the fierce nor'wester;
So he looked to his boat, and altered her tack,
  And cried, "Now, boys, we're about to test her;
For, sure as I float, we're right in the track
  Of a tearing, swearing old nor'wester!"

The clouds came down like a wild-fowl flight,
  And the north-winds roared their awful chorus;
The lightning flashed through the stormy night,
  Till the skies themselves seemed split and porous;
And the brave boat sank in that ocean white,
  While crew and captain prayed in chorus!

But the Pilot's wife, from red sunrise,
  Sits at the Battery, waiting gravely
To see her husband's number arise
  When he shall sail through the Narrows bravely.
Ah! how patient and calm her eyes,
  As she sits at the Battery, waiting gravely!

The boatmen loafing on bench and grass,
  As they look on her feel their heart-strings soften;
They touch their hats when they see her pass,
  To the sad look-out where she sits so often.
"Poor thing!" they cry, "she is crazed, alas!"
  And their rough old hearts on a sudden soften.

LEAVES FROM A CHRISTMAS-TREE;

OR, THOUGHTS THAT HANG ON PLAYTHINGS.

Pleasure is but a ball that a child runs after so long as it keeps rolling, but which he kicks away from him the moment it stops.

The character that has holes pierced in it isn't worth a pin, and you can say the same of a child's drum.

The child takes a pleasure in blowing its trumpet. What is music to itself is discord to others; and yet it will persevere for hours. The man becomes often as great a nuisance when he allows his vanity to be incessantly pushing him before others to blow his own trumpet!

A gong that is sounded too loudly only startles people. So, in sounding your praises, you can not do it with too light a hand. If you sound them too thumpingly persons will only run away from you, or else put their fingers in their ears, to prevent their being bored with such empty noise.

The performer on a tin fiddle reminds one of the prosperous fool who is always boasting of having accumulated a large fortune.

We generally make the most of any little danger. We shriek one moment and laugh at our fears the next, like young ladies pulling bonbon crackers. Most apprehensions have a ridiculous or a pleasant termination. The end is generally a motto or a sweetmeat.

The doll that speaks too frequently ends badly. The possession of its gift is the cause of its destruction. To find out the secret of its inspiration it is picked to pieces. It is the fate of genius all over.

Scandal flies much like a kite, according to the length of the tale it has to carry.

At Christmas-time, in the society of children, every one is presentable; but more especially he who comes laden with presents.

Whipping may make a humming-top go spinningly enough; but it is thrown away on boys. Xerxes, after his ships were wrecked, flogged the sea; but we never heard of the sea having taken a moral turn from that moment. In the same way many boys are wrecked at school, and the schoolmaster in his rage flogs the boy for it.

The full mind, like a money-box that is full, makes no noise; but the empty mind, like a money-box with only two or three coins in it, keeps up such an incessant rattle that its emptiness soon betrays itself to all.

A wooden sword has this advantage—that it doesn't wear out the scabbard. The same can be said of a body with a wooden soul in it!

It is pleasant to see a green old age, like a Christmas-tree, comfortably boxed in at home. It is pleasant to see its trunk, bent beneath the weight of riches, surrounded by a host of happy children. It is pleasant to see it stretching out its hospitable arms to all, as though it were anxious to embrace the entire party. It is pleasant to see it blossoming with generous things, and shedding a cheerful light on the gay circle it delights in drawing around it. And it is pleasant to see it distributing with a lavish hand the treasures it has accumulated on all branches, and to notice its head rising higher every time it parts with a fresh gift!

THE WRONG BURGLAR.

"Perhaps I should say the 'wronged' burglar," said my friend Barrister H—— (from whom I received the following narrative as we were steaming down from Albany last week behind the locomotive "Superior"); "wronged, because he was legally convicted of one burglary, when he was only morally guilty of another."

Returning from the Court of Appeals, we had been giving reminiscences of our early professional career. What preceded the story is unnecessary to recount.

"I had unsuccessfully defended him before Recorder Riker, nearly a quarter century since, for breaking into a Pearl Street store"—was the point at which I pursue my friend's narrative. "The testimony fixed him in the vicinity of the crime, and he could not explain his presence there, nor could he give testimony of that good character which the Judges in Cancemi's case have just held of such weight—so much so, that we shall never again convict men of a first offense! But he was not guilty, and why not I will tell" (continued H——), "as I paraphrase his own story, narrated in his cell the night before he went up.

"'Stony Davis and I,' said the culprit, 'and by Stony Davis I means the hard-faced man as brought you the fee (we've been pals for thirty years), were agoing that night to pay a sort of outside visit to a German store in Maiden Lane. When we looks around a place to see about bolts, and inside fixins, and who leaves last and cums fust, and where the safe-keys are left, and all sich-like things, that's wot we calls an outside visit. It's never policy to go into a store and take things fust off: that ought to be left to another time—and the blowing, washy nights, them's the times for a full crack! Well, Stony Davis and me was there with our jimmy and lantern when the alarm from Pearl Street was given, and Stony was fool enough to run, instead of dodging into an area. Of course I had to follow, and that made the pavement tramp the harder; but as Stony ran fastest he got off. I was nabbed with the jimmy, and that killed me on the trial, as you sed it would. But the porter's gabber about recognizing me in the daytime prowling about the store was lively fancy, cos I never seed the place nowise. It was good retribution, as the Judge called it, though; for among my first burglaries in London, afore I come over, I shot one of his tribe—one of those porter men: and I dare say I'm to be punished for that after all the years gone by since it wer done. When that thing happened, they arrested no end of wrong chaps for that, and the Coroner blundered hisself into a mess. This was the way. The store had a little house next to it. Stony Davis and I hired rooms there, as emigrants just come over from Antwerp, and the rooms were against the store. Maybe we didn't look German though, with our false beards and pipes. The big chests over which the landlord and the carriers sweated were filled with pieces of scrap-iron! We kept up a very good character there for a week, and made one or two visits inside of the store about a bogus draft we had, and looked around pretty well fust. But one Saturday night, about midnight, we began operations. The windows were hung with sheets and heavy brown paper, and the door was well stuffed. The feather-bed spread on the floor was to catch the pieces of mortar; and, by good luck, the floor of the second story of the store started from about my height. Stony Davis had laid in a good five gallon of ale, and we went at it by turns. There was two walls to break through, and we couldn't give hard blows, but had to pick as it were. The fust wall must have been built fifty years—the mortar was a sight harder than the brick. So it was ten o'clock Sunday morning, at least, afore we got a hole through, and we were pretty near gone—nothin' but the ale kept us up. Next we had to widen the hole by chunking and scraping it, but that was not so bad; still it was afternoon before we got it well through. Stony Davis was tougher than I—there's where he gets his name from—so he went in fust, and I followed. We struck a light, and, blazes! what a sight. They had been taking what the tradesfolk call "account stock," and there had been no end of measurin' and unfolding. The shawls and silks and satins were piled on the counters. Stony Davis fairly hugged me, and sez he, "Plimmy, my dear, we can go half over England and not find this, and now we shall live like publicans!" So we went right to work. Shawls we gave the go-by—they are too bulky, and don't sell to the nunkies and fences so well. Velvets, them's the go! So are satins. They make sweet packages, and stow away like ribbons! It didn't take long to get the scrap-iron out of one chest, and put in the things. The papers said what was right: every blessed bit of velvet and satin went, and how we lost them too you'll see in a minute. When the chest was full, we agreed to send Stony Davis off t'other side of Holborn, to Jew Mose, and fence the swag. We dressed up German again, as if "mine frien" was going away. There was a carrier hard by, although it was Sunday—he had been carrying a small-pox corpse to a grave-yard, and was in spirits for a job to ventilate himself—so we got him. Blowed if the street warn't charmed with the tears I shed over "mine frien" at the door as we parted. I kissed him on the nose and ears and every where—false hair and all, I was so sorry; even the carrier thought we were parting forever. And then, Stony off, I went back to my lonely German exile, alias (as indictments say) the store, to stow away some light stuff in a bundle—ribbons and such things. I don't know what possessed me, but I thought I would go down stairs and examine the safe. Taking my lantern, jimmy, file, oil bottle, and some vitriol in its stone case, I went down stairs, and, to my delight, found, by turning my master wire about, that the double lock was not turned—only the upper padlock held. Them was the infancy of safes, and afore Hobbs's time of day. In an instant, regardless of every thing, I applied the vitriol to the padlock, and filled the socket full so as to soften the hasp. I sat down on a chair to wait a bit. That was as bad a piece of bad luck as ever comes to a cracksman. I had been hard at work nearly twenty hours, and the excitement was wearing away. What wonder I fell asleep? I dreamed I was in a bank vault with nothing but gold. I tossed it—I tumbled it about—I scooped it up—I shoveled it with my boots—I laid down and kissed it—I filled my pockets with it—and then fell to counting it, by thousands, into bags! It was a glorified dream. I have had many such—even in prison. Talk of sperrits or wines! There's nothing like the sight or touch of gold to bring the reel to a cracksman's brain.

"'I awoke from it!

"'Horrible! Not three feet from me stood a man. I shall never forget the smile upon his face as he looked. There was triumph and glee in every line of his lips as they worked up and down sort of maliciously like—just the smile which you see on a policeman's face when he sez to himself, "Now, my fine fellow, I've got you foul!" I looked for but an instant. I saw the thing at once, and how, betrayed by the yawning muss, I had been discovered. Just as quick as I strike my knee with this hand I sprang for his throat and caught it. He dropped like a plummet in water when it sounds "thug," and my free hand was got over his mouth. The lantern was just going out; but over his shoulder I could see a streak of light as if from a street lamp. That told me he had come in and left the front door ajar. I thought for another instant had he persons in company? for if he had I would have let him go. To kill him at such odds would have been a fearful waste of my life. I held him so, by throat and mouth, for full three minutes, and listened eager-like. He seemed paralyzed. I heard nothing near by; but a clock began to strike nine a few streets away. Then he began to struggle. I collected all my strength and turned him to the floor. "Are you alone?" said I. He wheezed a fearful "Yes." So much the better, thought I to myself. The lantern-wick gave a spiteful sputter—flashed up and went out. By the flash he must have seen the resolution on my face, for he gave a fearful roll and freed his mouth; but my grip weakened his voice to a whisper. There we were—in the dark—and oh, so dark! and he so near the great dark! He whispered, "I'll—open—the—safe; I'll—give—you—all; but—spare—my—life." For a moment I relented. I had never exactly killed a man—only stood by at it—but I knew what I'd suffer if I let him go. So I knelt upon his breast, tightened his throat, and held him. How he rolled! It seemed a year before he was still—and then he was very still. I didn't need to light a match to look at him, as I first tho't I would do. I felt his look, and saw the smile stiffen into a spasm. Then I stepped softly to the door, shut it, and went out. I forgot about ribbons, safe, hole in the wall, and every thing after that.

"'I walked boldly away for a few blocks, and then ran for it three miles over to Jew Moses's. Stony was there with the chest, and the bargain was being struck. That rascal, Moses, saw by my face something had happened. Indeed my right palm was bloody where the blood must have run from the man's nose. "Holy Abraham!" said the infernal rascal, "have you been at dog's mischief?" I nodded. "Then I gives you up. These trifles here—found in your house as they will be—may hang you." I broke in, "and if you dare to Jew me I'll blab the fust!" Stony stepped in and the quarrel was stopped; but the upshot of that business was, the Jew got all the goods—moved off to where we never knew—which was lucky for all of us when the carrier turned up—and we got not a farthing. They wos worth £1000; for the papers the next day was full of the thing. It is nigh ten years ago at this time of my tellin' you; but I remember the whole matter. It seems the porter was found in the morning dead. The holes in the wall explained every thing as to how and why he died. It seemed too, from his wife's story, that he remembered in evening church about the safe, and went down to lock it. There was fifteen thousand sovereigns in gold in it, paid into the store after bank hours Saturday. Stony Davis and I grieved over the thing more for the gold than the man. We went off to Liverpool and so to Dublin. How little we made by that night's work has been often talked over by Stony Davis and I since we've jobbed together in 'Meriky.'

"I was more shocked by his hardness of soul than I can now tell you" (concluded H——); "but it had just this effect with me—I never again defended a villain. First offenders and the unfortunate I always attended to, but never rascals. Perhaps, too, that incident gave me my taste for prosecutions— But here is Thirty-first Street; and now to supper and bed with what appetite we may."

LOOKING INTO THE WELL.

I.

Up in the maples the robins sung,
  The winds blow over the locusts high,
And along the path by their boughs o'erhung
  We wandered gayly—Lulu and I—
Wandered along in pleasant talk,
  Pausing our nursery tales to tell,
Till we came to the end of the shaded walk,
  And sat, at last, by the moss-grown well.
She was a child, and so was I,
  It mattered not that we told our love—
Whispered it there, with no one nigh
  Save birds that sang in the trees above.
I looked down into her shy blue eyes,
  She at my face in the shaded well;
I saw the glow to her fair cheek rise,
  Like red in the heart of an ocean shell.

II.

Again in the trees the robins sung—
  The gold had deepened upon her hair—
The locusts over the pathway hung,
  To look at her face, so still and fair.
I said no word—I sat by her side,
  Contented to hold her hand in mine,
Dreaming of love and a fair young bride—
  Visions that truth had made divine.
The robin's song took a clearer tone,
  The sky was a tenderer, deeper blue;
Her face in the limpid waters shone,
  I thought her eyes were holy and true.

III.

I walked alone to the shaded well,
  When locusts bloomed in the next year's June—
The shadows along my pathway fell,
  The wild birds sang a sorrowful tune.
She had given her shining hair's young gold,
  Her holy brow and her eyes of blue,
The form I had scarcely dared to fold,
  To a wealthy suitor who came to woo—
Sold, for jewels and land and name,
  Youth and beauty and love and grace—
Alone I cursed the sin and shame,
  And started to see my own dark face
Mirrored there in the well below,
  With its haggard cheek and its lines of care,
Where I once had seen a girlish brow,
  And shy blue eyes and golden hair.

IV.

Years have passed since that summer day
  Went over the hills with its silent tread:
I walk alone where its glory lay—
  I am lonely, and Lulu is dead.
Dust is thick on her shining hair,
  A shroud is folded across her breast,
The winds blow over the locusts where
  She lies at last, alone and at rest.
Youth and beauty, and love and grace,
  Wealth and station, joy and pain;
If she dreams at all in that lonely place,
  She will know, at length, that her life was vain.

V.

I do not think of her heart's disgrace,
  Looking into the waters there,
For I seem to see once more a face
  With shy blue eyes and golden hair.
Out among men she walks by my side—
  For me she lives whom the world call dead—
I talk, at night, to my shadow bride,
  And pillow, in dreams, her golden head.
They broke her heart—so the gossips tell—
  Who sold her hand for wealth and a name;
But I see her face in the cool, deep well,
  And its virginal beauty is still the same.

Miscellany.

A CHILD'S LAUGHTER.

Is there any thing like the ringing laugh of an innocent, happy child? Can any other music so echo through the heart's inner chambers? It is sympathetic, too, beyond other melodies. When the father sits absorbed over his book, which seems to concentrate every faculty, he hears his little boy laughing in his sports, and laughs also, he knows not wherefore. The bright being, continually gathering intelligence, casts around us gems of thought and pearls of affection, till our paths seem paved with precious stones from Heaven's treasury. No day of storms is dark where he is, no wintry evening long. A young child is a full fountain of delight to the house and heart.—Mrs. Sigourney's "Lucy Howard."

JUBA AT A FRENCH WATER CURE.

Then there were riddles, guessing of proverbs, and various plays attended by forfeits. It was once allotted to me as a punishment to dance some ridiculous dance; and having, in the leisure of my boyhood, mastered the negro Juba, I gave it out with marked emphasis. It proved a season hit; it was comique! charmant! tres curieux! Not only was I called on for a repetition night after night, but several persons wanted to learn the step of me; and one of the most fanatical in carrying this point was a severe Swiss minister, a man of the Boanerges type, with stern black eyes, and a long black beard of apostolic dignity. Over and over again did my reverend disciple carefully watch my feet while I danced the Juba, and then set himself, with solemn perseverance, to imitate the complicated caper. Such a blessing followed his efforts that he very soon had the step at his fingers' ends, or rather at his toes' ends; and day after day I used to hear him double-shuffle, or hoe corn and dig potatoes around the billiard-room and down the passage, by way of a reaction after his bath. He told me that he wanted to amuse his children with the dance; and I only hope that it diverted them as much as it diverted their papa.—De Forest's "European Acquaintance."

TALKING NONSENSE.

"To write or talk concerning any subject," says Coleridge, "without having previously taken the pains to understand it, is a breach of the duty which we owe to ourselves, though it may be no offense against the laws of the land. The privilege of talking, and even publishing, nonsense is necessary in a free state; but the more sparingly we make use of it the better."

GENTEEL RECOVERY OF A SNUFF-BOX.

Among his Italian court gossip, Dutens has a good story of an incident which happened to a young English nobleman who was introduced at an assembly of one of the first ladies of Naples by a Neapolitan gentleman. While he was there his snuff-box was stolen from him. The next day, being at another house, he saw a person taking snuff out of his box. He ran to his friend—"There," said he, "that man in blue, with gold embroidery, is taking snuff out of the box which was stolen from me yesterday. Do you know him? Is not he a sharper?" "Take care," said the other, "that is a man of the first quality." "I do not care for his quality," said the Englishman; "I must have my snuff-box again; I'll go and ask him for it." "Pray," said his friend, "be quiet, and leave it to me to get back your box." Upon this assurance the Englishman went away, after inviting his friend to dine with him the next day. He accordingly came; and, as he entered, "There," said he, "I have brought you your snuff-box." "Well," said the Englishman, "how did you obtain it?" "Why," said the Neapolitan nobleman, "I did not wish to make any noise about it, therefore I picked his pocket of it."

FLUTE PLAYING.

Lord Brougham, in his Life of Priestley, lets us into the secret, perhaps, of the general prevalence of bad flute playing in the world. Priestley, we are told, sought relaxation from music, and learned to play on the flute, in which there would have been nothing amiss had he not taken pains strongly to recommend the habit to students, especially, he adds, with a charming simplicity, to such as have no fine ear, "for they will be the less annoyed by bad music!"

HARD STUDY AND GOOD HEALTH.

Hard study is generally thought to be adverse to health; and, conversely, unhealthy students are thought, or think themselves, to be identical with hard students. Paleness of countenance, nervous weakness and headaches are cultivated or affected, because they are supposed to indicate superior intellectual gifts. Dangerous fallacy which has cost many a good fellow his life! No man, or woman either, ever killed himself or herself with hard study. Not a bit of it; but many a lazy fellow, fond of intellectual occupation, with physical inaction, has fallen a victim to disordered digestion and crazed nerves, all the time laboring under the grievous mistake that he was one of those favorites of the gods who die young, because they are of too ethereal a temper to stand the rude shock of such a miserable world as this! Why, the world is a brave world—worthy to be the dwelling-place of the noblest creatures God ever made! It is too good for the simpleton who does not know how to take care of himself; who mistakes neglect of body for culture of mind; who goes moping and moaning about, because his breakfast sits uneasily upon his weakened stomach, thinking it to be the proof that he is too delicate or too refined for the hardships of human condition. Up, man, dreamer, fool; go plunge into the health-giving, joy-inspiring waves of yonder ocean, while summer lasts; take a cold shower-bath in winter. Walk long distances, if you have the time; swing the dumb-bells if you have not. Cold water, vigorous exercise, hard study—these are the conditions of moral, mental, and bodily health. All kinds of devils, as well as blue devils, flee before these mighty enchanters: even the leader of them all, the old Prince of Darkness, fears dumb-bells, cold water, and an active brain more than he did Martin Luther's inkstand.

BLUE STOCKINGS.

Miss Edgeworth justly considered the defense of the Edinburgh wit to be complete when he gave utterance to the lively and happy observation, "I do not care about the blueness of a lady's stockings if her petticoats are only long enough." It is the ostentation of knowledge, and not the knowledge itself which disgusts, and is doubly offensive when female aspirants are voluble upon subjects of which they understand little except perhaps the jargon. Pretension is repulsive where we look for reserve, and the woman purchases knowledge too dearly who exchanges for it the attributes which are the charm of her sex. Her native virtues are of more value than acquired learning. The Marchioness du Châtelet, who translated and annotated Newton's Principia, was one of these pedantic ladies, who studied science that it might minister to vanity; and Madame de Staël, the bedchamber-woman of the Duchess de Maine, well known by her lively memoirs, has handed down some traits of her character, which should scare away imitators, as the drunken slave scared Spartana from intoxication. She arrived on a visit at midnight the day before she had settled to come, occupied the bed of another lady who was hastily displaced, complained of her accommodation and tried a fresh room on the following night, and, still dissatisfied, inspected the whole of the house to be sure of securing the best apartment it contained. Thither she ordered to be carried half the furniture of the place, chose not to appear till ten o'clock at night, when she made her company less agreeable than her absence, by her arrogance and dictation; could endure no noise, lest her ideas should be disarranged; and, some ink being spilt upon a piece of her translation, raised more disturbance than Newton did himself when his store of invaluable manuscripts were burned. She complained that she found in her bedroom smoke without fire; and methinks, says Madame de Staël, it was the emblem of herself. She expected to excite homage, and provoked contempt. Her knowledge was doubted, her airs ridiculed, and she was not more hated than she was thoroughly despised.

SWEET-HEARTS AND WIVES.

You all are apt to complain (writes a lady, addressing her own sex) that lovers, when they become husbands, can not unite the two characters. You lay this mostly to the men's charge. Do you think it is their fault entirely? I am disposed to say no. I will tell you why. Before marriage, you take the greatest pains to elevate yourselves into goddesses, and desire to be worshiped accordingly. Men—especially those possessing superior intellectual qualities and refinement of nature—favor these views, and treat you as something nearer to heaven than themselves; and lo! no sooner has the honeymoon passed than your husbands discover, by imperceptible but sure degrees, that you are (though in a somewhat inferior ratio to themselves) of the "earth, earthy." Happy the woman who has the wit to contrive that, in her married life, the same halo shall surround her in her husband's eyes that existed before their union! The thing—in the intimacy of commonplace, everyday life—may be difficult, but is by no means impossible to achieve. Your own neglect of all those cares and arts by which you won the lover, causes commonly the early estrangement of the husband.

How frequent is the spectacle of neat, scrupulous maidens, who, when they become wives, neglect their personal appearance; and who, if asked why they do so, would answer, "Oh, I'm married!" showing plainly that their care and trimness formed no part of their natures, but was a trap, a cage, spread for the lure and destruction of men. Pretty Mrs. Spider! when your careful, fine-spun web caught the credulous fly, your object being effected, good-by to neatness, good looks, care, and refinement. What more had you in the world to do? Your unfortunate husband finds the very qualities which most likely influenced his choice have vanished, "like the baseless fabric of a vision," and which, to paraphrase the poet, "leaves but a wreck behind."

"MARRIAGES AND MARRIAGES."

Let people prate as they will, the woman was never born yet who would not cheerfully and proudly give herself and her whole destiny into a worthy hand, at the right time, and under fitting circumstances; that is, when her whole heart and conscience accompanied and sanctified the gift. But marriage ought always to be a question, not of necessity, but choice. Every girl ought to be taught that a hasty, loveless union stamps upon her almost as foul dishonor as one of those connections which omit the legal ceremony altogether; and that, however pale, dreary, and toilsome a single life may be, unhappy married life must be ten-fold worse—an ever-haunting temptation, an incurable regret, a torment from which there is no escape but death.

HOW LOVE SHOULD THRIVE.

I dreamed that love
Should steal upon the heart, like summer dawn
On the awakening world, soft, gradual;
First hailed and welcomed by the mountain-peaks,
The loftiest aspirations of the soul;
Then, slowly spreading downward o'er the slopes
Of intellectual intercourse, so flood
At length the very plains and vales of sense
With beauties of its sunshine; one by one
Kissing awake all spirit buds and flowers,
To pour their fragrance forth in gratitude.
I had forgot that perfect love like this
Could be the portion but of perfect souls!
I had forgot to estimate how far
My own heart fell below the standard raised
By my presumption, when I deemed its pulse
Should never quicken, save to one whose touch
First waked the highest, holiest chords that thrill
In heart of mortal; deemed I must be wooed
As angels woo, won as might angel be.

TOAD-WORSHIP.

The practice, which seems so unaccountable, if it be once seriously thought upon, of worshiping some of the lower animals, was not unknown on the coast of Cumana, and their treatment of toads may be mentioned as a ludicrous instance of that kind of superstition. They held the toad to be, as they said, "the lord of the waters," and therefore they were very compassionate with it, and dreaded by any accident to kill a toad; though, as has been found the case with other idolaters, they were ready, in times of difficulty, to compel a favorable hearing from their pretended deities, for they were known to keep these toads with care under an earthen vessel, and to whip them with little switches when there was a scarcity of provisions and a want of rain. Another superstition worthy of note was, that when they hunted down any game, before killing it they were wont to open its mouth and introduce some drops of maize-wine, in order that its soul—which they judged to be the same as that of men—might give notice to the rest of its species of the good entertainment which it had met with, and thus lead them to think that if they came too they would participate in this kindly treatment.—Helps's Spanish Conquest in America.

NEVER DESPAIR.

Many of our readers have heard the anecdote of the cool composure and resignation of Sir Isaac Newton, when his little dog overturned a lamp, and burned up his papers, the fruits of many years' labor. But they may not be so familiar with a similar anecdote of Audubon, when his valuable drawings had been destroyed by Norway rats.

Returning from Philadelphia, after an absence of several months, absorbed in the newly-found delights of home, he failed to inquire the fate of a certain wooden box, which, before his departure, he had intrusted to the care of a relative, with the strictest injunctions as to its safety. At last, on interrogation, this treasure was produced, the dearly-prized deposit of all his drawings, more cherished than a casket of rarest jewels. It was opened, and what was Audubon's dismay to perceive the misfortune which had befallen it! A pair of Norway rats, having taken possession and appropriated it, had reared there a whole party. A few gnawed bits of paper were the only remains of what, a few months before, had been a thousand marvelous representations of the curious inhabitants of the air. The shock of such a calamity was too much even for the fortitude of Audubon. Like an electric stroke, it thrilled his whole nervous system, and for some time caused the entire prostration of his physical powers. A burning heat rushed through his brain on the discovery—the discovery of the entire wreck of the result of all his efforts and his patience. For nights he could not sleep, and days were passed with listless apathy, till at length invigoration of mind and frame gradually, under kindly influences, returned. He once again took up his pencils, his note-book, and his gun, and went forth to the woods. Then, consoling himself with the reflection that he could make much better drawings than before, he persevered untiringly for three whole years, until his portfolio was replenished.

SONNET.

BY ELIZABETH BARRET BROWNING.

Say over again, and yet once over again,
That thou dost love me. Though the word repeated
Should seem "a cuckoo song," as thou dost treat it;
Remember, never to the hill or plain,
Valley and wood, without her cuckoo-strain,
Comes the fresh Spring in all her green completed!
Beloved, I, amid the darkness greeted
By a doubtful spirit-voice, in that doubt's pain
Cry—speak once more—thou lovest! Who can fear
Too many stars, though each in heaven shall roll—
Too many flowers, though each shall crown the year?
Say thou dost love me, love me, love me—toll
The silver iterance! only minding, dear,
To love me also in silence—with thy soul.

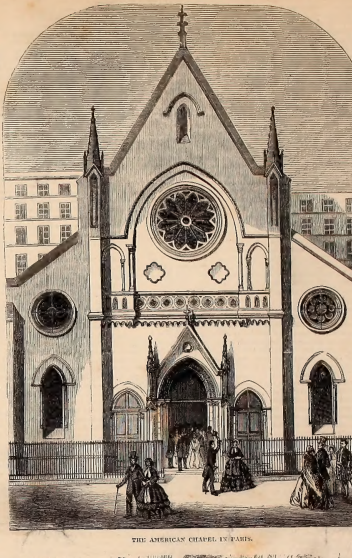
A MUSIC LESSON.

A Highland piper, having a scholar to teach, disdained to crack his brains with the names of semibreves, minims, crotchets, and quavers. "Here, Donald," said he, "tak' yer pipes, lad, and gie us a blast. So, verra weel blawn, indeed; but what's a sound, Donald, without sense? You may blaw forever without making a tune o't, if I dinna tell you how the queer things on the paper maun help you. You see that big fellow, wi' a round, open face (pointing to a semibreve, between two lines of a bar), he moves slowly from that line to this, while ye beat ane wi' your fist and gie a long blast; if, now, ye put a leg to him ye mak' twa o' him, and he'll move twice as fast; an' if ye black his face, he'll run four times faster than the fellow wi' the white face; but if, after blacking his face, ye'll bend his knee, or tie his leg, he'll hop eight times faster than the white-faced chap I showed you first. Now, whene'er you blaw your pipes, Donald, remember this—that the tighter those fellows' legs are tied, the faster they'll run, and the quicker they're sure to dance."

HOW OUR ANCESTORS BRIBED ELECTORS.

There is a variety most creditable to English invention in the way in which our ancestors administered their bribes, says the Quarterly Review. At one place a mysterious person used to arrive with the cash, known as the "Man in the Moon," who approached at nightfall, and was at once met with, "What news from the moon?" This was a poetic form. Then there was the humorous form. "I'll lay you five guineas," said a celebrated canvasser in Fox's contest of 1784, "and stake the money in your own hands, that you will not vote for Mr. Fox." "Done!" says the free and independent, and wins his bet and bribe. Another playful plan was to buy the elector's canary at a price that would have been handsome for a bird of Paradise—a very pretty kind of bird fancying! Sometimes men showed perfect genius in availing themselves of professional advantages. Thus a military gentleman employed in the recruiting service once stood for Great Grimsby, and enlisted a majority of the voters for soldiers with a liberal bounty!

Such anecdotes as these constitute the literature of electioneering; and there is probably not a town or county in England where there is not an elderly gentleman with a small batch of them. In a contest a good many years ago in North Briton, one of the parties had strong reasons to suspect a particular voter of having taken a bribe —a considerable bribe, too—for votes were valuable. A sharp scrutiny was resolved to make an attempt on him. Accordingly, as the man entered the poll, he whispered rapidly—"They're making a fule of ye, Jock; they are a' bad." "The scoundrels!" exclaimed the dupe; and down on the table he flung a batch of notes. They were impounded at once by the authorities, and the man's suffrage was invalidated.



THE AMERICAN CHAPEL IN PARIS.

We give on this page a cut of the newly-erected American Chapel at Paris. Those of our countrymen who have recently visited Paris, and the religious community at large, will be glad to see it.

This is, we learn, the first American place of worship ever erected in Europe. When the idea first suggested itself to the American in Paris and their friends in the American and Foreign Christian Union here, their attention was naturally directed to the English Church in the rue d'Aguesseau. The owner—or, a party claiming to be owner—of that building gave them the refusal of it at a certain price; but after examining his title, and discovering that the British Embassy intended to contest it, Dr. Kirk, who was sent out to Paris to establish the church, preferred to erect a new building. A site was selected in the Rue de Berry, and a contract made with Mr. Salmon, a leading architect, for the erection of a suitable edifice. The whole cost, we believe, was under $50,000.

Some difficulties arose in the course of the work. The Government, in reply to an inquiry from the Americans in Paris, informed them that the American and Foreign Christian Union could not hold real estate in Paris. This was got over by placing the title in the name of the minister, Dr. Kirk, who gave a contre lettre to the Society. Another difficulty, which jarred against the religious scruples of the minister and his friends, was the reluctance of the French workmen to give up working on Sunday. To induce them to do so, Dr. Kirk agreed to pay them for being idle as if they had worked; thus the chapel was built without Sabbath-breaking.

The American Chapel in Paris is in every way creditable to the gentlemen and clergymen who have been instrumental in founding it. It is not sectarian; the services are to be such as to shock the opinions of no sect of Protestants; it will be the place of worship of many of our countrymen in Paris, and, with the English Church in the Rue d'Aguesseau, and the Wesleyan Chapel, which has been established for many years, will fitly represent Anglo-Saxon Protestantism.

THE AMERICAN CHAPEL IN PARIS.

THE YELLOW FEVER AT LISBON.

New York has so recently recovered from a yellow fever panic that the subject is still generally interesting, and we therefore draw attention to the picture given below, which represents a procession of the Lisbon clergy, in atonement of the sins which are supposed to have brought upon the city the late fearful yellow fever epidemic.

It was in September last that the yellow fever broke out at Lisbon. It is supposed to have been brought to Portugal by a ship from Brazil, which is the more readily believed as the first persons who were attacked were the director and officers of the custom-house. From the custom-house the epidemic spread to the adjacent streets, which are chiefly devoted to business offices and cheap lodging-houses; and from thence it gained the higher parts of the city, ravaging palace and cottage with the same severity. Lisbon is so dirty a city, as a general rule, that it is not surprising that, notwithstanding the rigorous measures which were at once taken to cleanse and purify the streets, the epidemic should have made fearful progress before any thing was achieved toward checking it. Over eight thousand persons are said to have died, among them several of the nobility, the higher ranks of the clergy, and the professions. The bulk of the wealthier population, to the number of thirty or forty thousand, took refuge at Cintra, a beautiful and healthy retreat some twenty miles from Lisbon, and beyond the reach of the disease. But the young King, to his honor be it said, his vicinity with the physicians in his fearless exposure to the danger. He has visited the hospitals almost daily; pressing the hands of the sick and the dying, and comforting all with kindly and generous words. One evening Dom Pedro, the King, was on his way to the opera; suddenly calling to the driver, he bade him turn about and drive to the hospital. Attended by a single servant he walked through each ward, and spoke to many of the sick persons, promising among other things that their families should be cared for if they died. At one bedside he found a city physician feeling a man's pulse with his gloves on.

"Sir," said the King, with great severity, "take off your gloves—we are not at a ball."

Dom Fernando, the King's father and regent, has been equally prominent in works of charity and kindness.

The clergy, acting upon the belief that all epidemics are special visitations from the Deity which may be averted by ecclesiastical intercession, have organized repeated public processions to propitiate the favor of the tutelar saints of Lisbon. The oldest priest takes the lead, and is followed by numbers of penitents singing penitential hymns. The processions are grand and imposing, and the spectacle, as they pass through the silent and awe-struck city, with people on either side kneeling in respect, is very striking. It is such a spectacle which is portrayed below.

The latest news from Lisbon is that the fever has passed its climax and is rapidly disappearing from the city.

PENITENTIAL PROCESSION AT LISBON DURING THE YELLOW FEVER.

The Spanish Peninsula has been twice visited by yellow fever during the present century. In 1803–5 most of the cities of Spain suffered severely; Malaga was positively depopulated. In 1819 the disease reappeared, and Cadiz and other ports were severely attacked.

A BABY VALENTINE.

BY THE LATE MRS. F. S. OSGOOD.

TO LITTLE ERNEST.

They all are writing Valentines—
  Mamma and Ellen too;
And even May a lover has—
  Suppose I write to you?

They tell me I had only left
  My home of joy above
A month or two, and lighted here—
  A messenger of love—

When you came down—a cherub wight,
  With glance of heavenly glee;
Perhaps, my friend (oh, am I right?),
  You came to look for me!

At all events, don't give your heart—
  Your precious heart—away
Until you've met, and tried to love,
  Your little Fanny Fay.

February 14, 1847.

MODERN GHOSTS.

We invite the attention of the impartial reader to some anecdotes which have struck us as sufficiently remarkable to induce us to rescue them from the fate attending all oral tradition, i. e., amplification and distortion. They are simple and circumstantial statements, the actors in which may be relied on as trustworthy witnesses.

Mrs. A——, a lady who has well earned her world-wide reputation, related to us the following anecdote, herself. She had been spending a summer's day with a party of friends among some ruins, whence they adjourned to the mansion of a Quaker gentleman in the neighborhood, where they all dined. During dinner, some one asked whether the ruins were haunted, when Mrs. A—— observed that the various members of their host's family looked grave, and the son, a young man who sat near her, was beginning to explain, but his father sternly reproved him for vain talking, and the conversation dropped. But woman's curiosity was naturally excited, and when they adjourned to the garden after dinner, Mrs. A—— questioned the young man as to the inhibited story. "The fact is," he replied, "we have a ghost in our village, or are supposed to have one, and it has been the cause of a great deal of gossip lately. The story is a strange one. Many years ago a carter, John ——, whose cottage you see yonder there, gleaming through the trees, 'kept company' with a girl in the village; but as neither of them had any money, she prudently accepted a well-to-do Londoner who came down to these parts, married him, and disappeared until last year, when she returned a rich widow, on a visit to her friends. John, who had never left his native place, and never taken unto himself a wife, revived the old flame in the widow's heart, and in the course of a short time they were married. It was necessary that she should go back to London after the wedding to wind up her affairs there (I believe it was the sale of certain houses, in which her property chiefly consisted), before returning to her new home. She never did return. She was missing for some time; no one knew what had become of her, until it was discovered that she had been murdered, no doubt for her money, as she was known to have had a large sum upon her, which the sale of her houses had realized. John benefited in no way by her death. He was soberly sorry for that event, but nothing would induce him to go up to London, in the prosecution of justice, whereat the neighbors were somewhat scandalized. Perhaps he thought that the same fate that had befallen his poor wife awaited him in the great Babylon. 'What good could he do? He couldn't call her back to life. No, decidedly, he wouldn't go to London.' But whether this preyed upon his mind, or from whatever other cause, all his friends could not fail to remark that John grew thinner every day, and seemed ill at ease. They questioned him, and at last he confessed that he could get no sleep, on account of his wife, who, every night, came and stood at the foot of his bed. She said nothing, but there she remained looking at him; and he seemed to take it very ill of her. He would not mind it in the daytime, he said, if she came and stood by him while he was at work, but it was very hard that she could not let him sleep in peace at night. All this happened some months ago, but John persists in saying that his ghostly visitant still comes to him occasionally, and the excitement in the village upon this subject is consequently kept up. Of course the neighbors declare they have seen the ghost, and the belief in it is universal." "I should very much like to see this John, and have a talk with him," said Mrs. A——. "Could we go down to his cottage?" "I am afraid he will be away at this hour, but we can try." And a party of five, three besides Mrs. A—— and her young host, walked to the cottage, which was about a quarter of a mile distant.

It was then between seven and eight o'clock; a clear summer's evening. Mrs. A—— described John's dwelling as forming one of a row of three or four cottages, having small gardens, of some ten or twelve yards in length, between them and the road, and a separate little wicket to each. While the young man went up to the door to see if John was at home, Mrs. A—— and her three companions remained outside the wicket. The door was locked. John was evidently out, and had given the key to a neighbor, as was his custom; but to make sure of this, the young man went round to the back of the cottage to try the other door. It was then, as I have said, still perfectly light. He was scarcely out of sight, when the four persons who were outside the gate saw the figure of a woman inside the cottage, passing slowly by the window—a thin woman, dressed in a cotton gown of a lilac color, her profile turned toward them; this was how they all subsequently described the figure they saw there, so distinctly and unmistakably, that there was a simultaneous exclamation of "Oh! you see there is some one in the cottage, so we shall get in." But a minute afterward the young man returned. As he had expected, the back door was locked, showing the cottage to be empty. Impossible! they had just seen some one inside. The neighbor who had charge of the key was then applied to; the door was opened, and every corner of the cottage explored—in vain. It consisted of only three rooms, and there was but one other exit, which was fastened on the inside. It was, therefore, equally impossible that any one could have entered or left the cottage without being seen by the four persons who now felt so eagerly anxious to solve this mystery. They questioned the neighbors as to the personal appearance of the murdered woman, and it tallied precisely in the particulars above-mentioned with the figure they had seen. On the minds of three of its witnesses that strange event produced a powerful effect; the fourth, a young artist, who had turned the whole story into ridicule beforehand, still endeavored to laugh it off. But we have reason to know that he subsequently confessed himself deeply and painfully impressed by an occurrence which he could neither deny, nor reason upon, nor explain away.

We have very few observations to offer on this story. Two things will strike every one as distinguishing it from the generality of supernatural experiences: the fact of its happening in still clear daylight, and the concurrent testimony of no less than four witnesses. It may be objected that the imaginations of these persons were prepared to receive what they went "out into the wilderness for to see." But we have shown that in one, at least, the predisposition was quite the other way; and it is remarkable that, at the moment, they none of them connected the figure with the rumor belonging to the house, or were in any way disconcerted at its appearance. These are the simple facts. Some readers will account for them, no doubt, in a manner highly satisfactory to themselves, and we willingly leave in their hands the solution of a mystery which we confess ourselves unable to explain.

Tales of "foreshadowings" and "warnings" are not uncommon among us, and, as a striking example of coincidence between the phantasmagoria of the brain and a contemporary event (such we are disposed to consider it), we may mention a singular circumstance that happened not long ago in Dorsetshire to the wife of Major B——. That gentleman was awoke in the middle of the night by his wife's terrified inquiry as to whether he saw any thing? "There, there, at the foot of the bed!—James, the coachman, with his throat cut—staring at me!—can't you see him?" Her nervous terror increasing, Major B—— got up, lit a candle, and searched the room—of course in vain. His wife was now tranquilized in a degree, though still by no means convinced that what she had beheld was simply an effect of the imagination. You may guess in what light she regarded it when, the following morning, she and her husband were roused by the intelligence that the coachman had actually been found in bed with his throat cut! It may be supposed that Mrs. B—— knew the poor fellow to be in low spirits, and that a dread of this calamity preyed on her mind and haunted her dreams. It does not appear that such was the case. We believe that no apprehension of the kind existed in the household. But among the many thousand presentiments, omens, and warning-dreams that bear no fruit, it is enough that one, as in this case, shall seem to have direct connection with the actual, for us to regard it as a spiritual manifestation in our behalf. The Emperor Napoleon's death was predicted for this year: had it come to pass, the chance hit of a false prophet would have counted as the bull's-eye of a true one. The terrible dreams our friend Smith relates over the breakfast-table happily remain unrealized; and Jones returned in rude health from Jerusalem, though he confided to us when he embarked that the figure of Death on a portmanteau had appeared to him on the preceding night. We can not accept such instances as the above, therefore, in any other light than as remarkable coincidences.

But distinct from these again, and to be approached with bated breath, as too solemn for discussion, however skeptical we may be, are the many stories on record (that of Lord T—— is among the best known) of spirits appearing to the objects of a strong attachment at the moment of dissolution, though absent from them in the flesh. There is something profoundly touching in this idea of the soul on its passage from its earthly tenement, flying toward the beloved object, lingering around that one spot, and struggling, as it were, to retain the only link that still holds it to this earth. We know too little of the mysteries of our being to deny that this is possible; perhaps our eyes are darkened to such spiritual presence when our hearts are yearning toward the absent on the battle-fields of India! The apostles of Mesmer may very plausibly assume, regarding the stories of such appearances, that the powerful influence of animal magnetism, exercised over the spirit, is able to draw it toward the magnetizer at the extreme hour—and by an unconscious effort, it may be, on his part—the intense sehnsucht of the Germans. We do not advance this as a theory of our own; for, of course, upon the principle with which we started, these experiences of highly excited imaginations can not be received as facts: we do no more than touch on them.

We now come to a tale of a very different complexion, the scene of which should be a "moated grange" rather than a prosaic dwelling among the dingy streets of London. I am sorry I may not indicate more particularly the house in which the events I am about to record took place, as it is a locality well known, by name at least, to all.

Captain C—— received a lucrative appointment some three years since, attached to which was the disagreeable condition of a residence in the heart of the city. He was lately married, and after the honeymoon he and his bride removed to their future home, bent on making that gloomy abode as cheerful as might be. It had one spare bedroom, which was to be dedicated to the use of Mrs. C——'s father, an officer commanding at ——, during his occasional visits to London. The first of these visits took place shortly after the C——s had arrived in their new house. The old gentleman was inducted into his room, which it was understood he was to occupy for some weeks. The next morning, however, he appeared grave and silent, and after breakfast he said to his daughter—

"I have been thinking, my dear, that perhaps it is hardly right that I should remain away from my command. I am not quite comfortable about it. It is, fortunately, so near London that I can run up and see you whenever I like, and back the same day; but I think it is better that I should not be absent at night, so I shall return to-day."

Captain C—— and his wife were surprised at this sudden whim of her father's, but all their arguments to persuade him to remain were unavailing, and he departed.

A few weeks after this a young Swiss lady, with whom Mrs. C—— had been educated abroad, came to England, and her first visit naturally was to her old friend. She came, after the manner of her sex, accompanied by sundry boxes, indicative of a lengthened stay, and the spare room seemed now sure of an occupant for some time. But the morning after her arrival she set out to Kensington to visit some friends there, and two or three hours later Mrs. C—— received a note from her, saying, that as her friends had pressed her to remain with them, she had promised to do so, and would thank Mrs. C—— to send her boxes. The latter felt naturally indignant at such extraordinary conduct, and was for giving the young lady "her mind" on paper, when Captain C—— observed—

"There is more than meets the eye in this, I feel sure. This is the second time it has happened. Do you remember the sudden way in which your father left us? Perhaps there is something disagreeable about the room—a drain, or a dead rat—which drives away our guests in this manner. Let me advise you to go yourself with the boxes, and ask Miss ——, frankly, the reason of her leaving you in this way, as, of course, there must be a reason."

Mrs. C—— acted on her husband's advice, and the young lady, after some hesitation, said—

"I will candidly confess to you that nothing would ever induce me to pass another night in that room. What I suffered it is not in the power of words to describe. I will, however, try and give you an idea of what I saw. I put out my candle last night carefully before getting into bed. It stood on a table facing the bed and between the windows; I feel quite sure I put it out. I suppose it was about the middle of the night that I suddenly started up, feeling a cold wind near my face, and dimly conscious that there was a bright light in the room. The candle opposite was burning; that, however, was not what lit up the room. Between the candle and the bed stood a figure, a dark shadow, and yet, horrible to say! its spine appeared to be of fire; the candle was dim beside it. I could not scream; I was choking, without power to utter a sound, while the figure bent over me, and seemed about to encircle me in its shadowy grasp. I had just strength to draw the coverlet quickly over my head and crouch down under the clothes. There I lay gasping, trembling, with eyes tight shut, though I need hardly say, sleepless, until morning. I have told you all. Are you surprised now when I say I had rather do any thing on earth than pass another night in that room?"

Upon Mrs. C——'s return home she wrote to her father, simply begging him to let her know whether there was any reason which he had not named to her for his sudden departure from their house, some weeks before, as she had a very particular reason for the inquiry. Her father, in his answer, said he had not breathed on the subject to any one, nor should he have named it now but for his daughter's urgent request. As she wished it, however, he would confess that he had never passed such a night in his life as the one spent under her roof. Whereupon he described, in almost identical terms, the apparition which had produced such an effect on Mrs. C——'s young friend. Here was a hale man, of vigorous mind, and by no means imaginative, as his daughter knew, corroborating a girl's statement, which Captain C—— naturally enough had regarded as foolish and fanciful. It was passing strange: it must be looked to: and he and half a dozen of his friends in turn tried their fate in the haunted room, with varied success. To some the spirit of the place appeared in much the same form as it had done to the two first occupants of that chamber. For others, and Captain C—— among the number, it was invisible. But no additional evidence in this case would be of much importance. The room already enjoyed the reputation of being haunted; and the imaginations of its occupants were stimulated in a particular direction. It must be remembered that in the first two instances there was not only no rumor of this nature to put them on the qui vive, but the whole aspect of the room, as well as its position in the heart of the noisy, bustling city, was ill calculated to inspire terrors of a ghostly nature. Once inspired, however, they were not so easy to be allayed. Several of the workmen on the premises took fright, and struck work. All Captain C——'s efforts to account for or throw discredit on the tale which had got wind in connection with his house were ineffectual. They only brought to light another tale which was almost forgotten, that a murder had been committed in that room many years ago, since when it had never been inhabited.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Dr. South says, "The tale-bearer and the tale-hearer should be hanged up both together—the former by the tongue, the latter by the ear."

"How did you like that clam song?" asked an old lady of her daughter, as they stepped with the crowd out into the open air after a popular concert. "Clam song!" exclaimed the young lady, in astonishment; "why, what do you refer to, mother?" "Why, the first one he sung." "Oh, you mean 'Shells of the Ocean,' don't you, mother?" "Well, yes," said the old lady, "I do think that was it: it was something about clams, any way, and you know I like clams so well! Didn't you like it?"

The most astonishing instance of a man's regard for his word was recently given by a man who killed his wife, whom he did not like. When asked "why he didn't go off and leave her instead of killing her," he replied, jocosely, that "he had promised on the wedding-day to live with her until death should part them, and that he wasn't the man to break his word!"

How much of character lies in a laugh! It is, in fact, the cipher key, oftentimes, wherewith we decipher a man. As a late writer observes: "You know no man until you have heard him laugh—till you know how and when he will laugh. There are occasions—there are humors—when a man with whom we have been long familiar will quite startle us by breaking out into a laugh, which comes manifestly right from the heart, and yet which we had never heard before. And so, in many a heart a sweet angel slumbers unseen, until some happy moment awakens it.

Dr. M—— coming out of a coffee-house, J—— C——, a perfect stranger to him, begged him to lend him five guineas. "Sir," said the Doctor, "I am surprised that you should apply to me for such a favor, who do not know you!" "Oh, dear Sir," replied J——, "it is for that very reason; for those who do won't lend me a farthing."

"Hallo, my friend, I see you are losing flesh." (Old Gentleman, indignant at the familiarity of his supposed friend, sputtering most fearfully.) "W—what? losing flesh! you impudent scoundrel! I'll let you know, Sir, I'm not, Sir. I, Sir, last night, Sir, was weighed, Sir, and had gained ten pounds, Sir. Very pretty state of affairs, if a person has to be insulted in this manner!" "Well, my friend, all that I can say is, if you look behind you will find it to be true." (Old Gent. discovers a small dog making a violent assault on his market basket.)

There is a lady in New York who will not permit her children to eat any thing of which Indian meal constitutes an ingredient, for fear it will make them savage. She must be the same lady who would not let her children eat spinach, for fear it would make them green.

The man who was "filled with emotion" hadn't room for his dinner.

When is a horse not worth a shilling?—When it's worth less (worthless).

"Don't rob yourself," as the farmer said to the lawyer who called him hard names.

A rather thick-headed witness in the police-court was asked the question whether So-and-So stood on the defensive? "No, Sir," he innocently replied, "he stood on a bench."

Love Morals.—A sweet heart is sometimes companion to a bitter tongue.—Crosses in love are better than strokes in matrimony.—They who court for gold more than a wife will be fortunate if they have not to count more disappointments than sovereigns.

BRUTE versus BIPED.

I saw a damsel holding by a string
  A little puppy, who, disposed to stray,
Checked at restraint and made a frequent spring,
  In effort vain to tear himself away.
But yet the more he strove the more he choked,
  Until he deemed his conduct wouldn't pay,
And moved along as though he were provoked,
  And held his head down in a sullen way.
My soul was touched the emblem thus to see
  Of life's too frequent scene, where, day by day,
Strings clog the spirit's elasticity
  And kill the willingness that would obey.
Men, like the puppy, follow at a word,
But try to drag them and their dander's stirred.

Reventlow, the notorious Danish mnemonical artist, published a work containing the rules and principles of his system of memory. A man bought the book, and after he had studied it a year, he held himself to be entirely initiated and lent it to a friend, but on the next morning could not remember to whom it was lent.

Aristotle, speaking of the subjects of imitation, observes that men must be represented either as they are, or better, or worse; and gives instances of painters, then of poets. Homer, he says, has made men better, other poets worse, others again as they are. In this very thing lies the difference between Tragedy and Comedy; for comedy endeavors to represent men worse, and tragedy better than they are.

Among writers of tragedy Sophocles was the first that did not act his own plays, having but a weak and unharmonious voice. He introduced three actors upon the stage, which critics imagined sufficient to be brought together in conversation in one scene; for more, they supposed, would occasion embarrassment and confusion.

Rabelais tells us that Nero was a fiddler in the infernal regions, and that Trajan was an angler. That Shakspeare was a reader of Rabelais may be proved from the following extract from King Lear, Act III.:

"Edg. Fraterretto calls me, and tells me Nero is an angler in the lake of darkness."

Muggins says Job's turkey was fat compared with an old gobbler he shot last week on the Devil's Fork. That was so light it lodged in the air, and he had to get a pole to knock it down!

At his boarding-house the other night Jenkins's landlady complained that something stopped the nose of the tea-pot, as it would not pour. Jenkins suggested that he had observed it growing very weak lately, and he presumed it was unable to run any longer. "Madam," said Jenkins, the next evening, "if I see proper to help myself to this milk, is there any impropriety in it?" "I don't know what you mean; but if you mean to insinuate that there is any thing nasty in that milk, I'll give you to understand that you've struck the wrong house! There ain't a first hair in the milk; for as soon as Dorothy Ann told me the cat was drowned in it, I went and strained it over!" The horrified young man declined partaking.

The art of kissing is daintily expressed in the following little poem:

Kiss me, darling! when I kiss you
  Kiss me back and back again!
Lips are only rosy petals,
  Kisses drops of fragrant rain!

Where's the harm, then? I could give you
  Reasons, dear! for every one,
Only that I may not tell them
  In the broad and garish sun.

Take, at least, I think, a sweet one!
  And I know you'll think with me,
'Tis the Scripture:—"Do to others
  What thou'dst have them do to thee."

That was a wise nigger, who, in speaking of the happiness of married people, said, "Dat ar' pends altogedder how dey enjoy demselves."

Not a thousand miles from Oneida County, a coroner's jury lately rendered a verdict that a certain deceased man "came to this death by excessive drinking, producing apoplexy in the minds of the jury."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Franklin Square, Monday, Feb. 8, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port, continuing in the course of contraction we have noticed during the past few weeks, compares as follows with the corresponding week of last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Feb. 6, 1858	$2,213,846....	$1,347,316
Corresponding week, 1857	6,411,241....	1,242,446
Decrease	$4,197,395
Increase		$104,870

The export of specie last week fell but little short of three millions, and the banks will probably show a slight decrease. Money, however, continues to be superabundant, and can be had readily at 6 @ 5 per cent. Stocks continue to improve, and the public begins to purchase more freely.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Monday, February 8, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week exhibited more general animation. Breadstuffs arrived rather sparingly, while the leading kinds, especially Flour and Corn were in good request, closing with increasing firmness in prices....Cotton was pretty freely dealt in at advancing rates....Provisions were in fair demand, and the tendency of the market was mainly in favor of sellers....Rio Coffee, New Orleans Molasses, and Rice attracted more attention at improved quotations, while other kinds of Groceries were in pretty good demand at uniform figures....Naval Stores were brisker and dearer, with less offering....Spices were more sought after, and prices favored sellers....Tobacco was quiet at old rates....Wool was moderately dealt in, and Domestic Pulled increased in value....The week's import of Dry Goods amounted to $1,611,618 against $4,156,018 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $4,477,772 against $14,542,494 same time in 1857....The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$4 15	@	$4 55
Superfine to fancy Western do. "	4 15	@	4 40
Extra Western Flour, per barrel	4 40	@	8 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	4 30	@	6 50
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel	4 15	@	6 00
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	4 50	@	7 50
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 00	@	3 75
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 00	@	3 50
White Wheat, per bushel	1 10	@	1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 00	@	1 20
New Crop Corn, per bushel	64	@	67
Rye, per bushel	70	@	—
Barley, per bushel	70	@	80
Western Oats, per bushel	44	@	45
State Oats, per bushel	41	@	43
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	33	@	39
Southern Oats, per bushel	27	@	35
Cotton, middlings, per pound	10½	@	11¼
Mess Pork, per barrel	15 25	@	15 50
Prime Pork, per barrel	12 00	@	12 25
Country Mess Beef, per barrel	9 00	@	10 00
Country Prime Beef, per barrel	6 00	@	7 00
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce	18 00	@	24 00
Beef Hams, per barrel	15 00	@	17 50
Cut Meats, per pound	6	@	8¼
Lard, per pound	9	@	9¼
State Butter, per pound	13	@	24
Western Butter, per pound	11	@	16
Cheese, per pound	6	@	8
Rice, per 100 pounds	2 75	@	3 62½
Rio Coffee, per pound	8¼	@	11¼
Cuba Sugar, per pound	4¼	@	7
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	17	@	23
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	4¼	@	7
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	28	@	30
Hyson Teas, per pound	25	@	65
Oolong Teas, per pound	30	@	60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	21	@	21¼
Bale Hay, per 100 pounds	50	@	70
Hops, Crop of 1857, per pound	5	@	10
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6¼	@	18
Seed Leaf Tobacco, per pound	9	@	35
Am. Hemp, undressed, per ton	100 00	@	110 00
Am. Hemp, dressed, per ton	140 00	@	165 00
American Fleece Wool, per pound	27	@	45
American pulled Wool, per pound	20	@	32
Pot Ashes, per 100 pounds	6 00	@	—
Pearl Ashes, per 100 pounds	6 12½	@	—
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	45	@	46

Freights were pretty brisk. Shipowners were getting ful rates.

Stock of several Articles on hand, in New York, about February 1.

	1857.	1858.
Ashes, barrels	825	2,100
Coffee, packages	106,357	91,979
Cotton, bales	89,979	10,020
Hemp, tons	50	550
Hemp, bales	17,141	20,482
Hides, number	84,500	357,883
Leather, Sole, sides	19,300	340,950
Molasses, hogsheads	1,963	1,075
Molasses, barrels	825	1,811
Pork, barrels	14,831	9,092
Beef, tierces and barrels	21,672	27,723
Rice, tierces	5,885	6,584
Rice, bags	2,700	4,629
Sugars, hogsheads	6,835	7,962
Sugars, boxes	18,171	4,760
Tobacco, Crude, hogsheads	5,547	8,967
Tobacco, Crude, bales	3,350	6,480
Tobacco, Manufactured, packages	37,150	41,244

The Live Stock Markets were moderately supplied with Beeves last Wednesday, and as a pretty active inquiry prevailed, prices exhibited somewhat greater firmness....There was continued dullness in the trade in Milch Cows....Veal Calves were less freely offered, and were in demand at full rates....Sheep and Lambs were also less abundant, and, with a good inquiry, prices ruled firm....Swine were in fair supply and good request at firmer quotations....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Jan. 27.	Week ending Feb. 3.
Beeves	2,739	3,067
Milch Cows	203	116
Veal Calves	312	382
Sheep and Lambs	6,879	5,624
Swine	1,480	2,102

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Ohio	633	Kentucky	185
New York	639	Indiana	121
Illinois	363	Texas	78

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound	$ 6	@	$ 11½
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00	@	60 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5	@	8
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 00	@	8 00
" " per pound	7	@	11
Live Swine, per pound	4¼	@	5½
Dressed " "	5¼	@	7

The Country Produce Markets are moderately active, and prices are firm for most kinds of produce. Apples and potatoes bring a slight advance on previous quotations.

Wholesale Prices obtained by Producers at Washington Market.

Apples, per barrel	$2 50	@	$4 75
Apples, dried, per pound	5¼	@	7¼
Peaches, dried, per pound	17	@	19
Plums, dried, per pound	18	@	19
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	2 00	@	2 25
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 00	@	2 25
Peanuts, per bushel	70	@	1 00
Cranberries, per barrel	7 00	@	11 00
Potatoes, per barrel	1 75	@	3 75
" per bushel	55	@	1 00
" sweet, per barrel	4 50	@	5 00
Onions, per barrel	1 25	@	3 00
Turnips, per barrel	25	@	50
Squashes, per barrel	2 25	@	2 50
Pumpkins, per 100	25 00	@	30 00
Beets, per barrel	1 25	@	1 50
Cabbages, per 100	2 00	@	4 50
" Red, per dozen	75	@	1 00
Parsnips, per barrel	1 00	@	1 25
Carrots, per barrel	1 25	@	1 50
Leeks, per 100	3 00	@	4 00
Celery, per dozen	50	@	75
Garlic, per 100	5 00	@	—
Eggs, Limed, per dozen	10½	@	11
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	14½	@	15
Chickens, per pound	11	@	13
Fowls, per pound	10	@	14
Guinea Fowl, per pair	44	@	50
Ducks, per pound	13	@	17
" per pair	75	@	1 25
Turkeys, per pound	11	@	15
Geese, per pound	8	@	13
Pigeons, per dozen	1 75	@	2 50
Prairie Hens, per pair	75	@	1 00
Partridge, per pair	65	@	75
Roasting Pigs	1 25	@	2 50
Rabbits, per pair	25	@	30
Hares, per pair	31	@	38
Squirrels, each	4	@	7
Venison, per pound	8	@	12
Bear Meat, per pound	12	@	16

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE CRY IS, STILL THEY COME.
Air—"Young Lockinvar."

Oh! they rend from the south, from the east, from the west,
To RANNEY'S Gift Bookstore, of all stores the best,
Where, as bribes to peruse the rare volumes they sell,
Gold and jewels, "free gratis," they offer as well.

Every mail brings of orders a hundred or more,
Every day brings fresh crowds to the favorite's door;
And there's not in the city, nor likely to be,
A number more sought for than Two Ninety-three.

The great American Gift and Book House, No. 293 Broadway, New York, is now doing a larger retail business in Books of all descriptions than any other establishment in the Union. A present, in value from 25 cents to $200 is given with every book sold. Descriptive catalogues, offering liberal inducements to agents, sent free to all. Address A. RANNEY, Agent.

GEO. W. THORNE, Agent, BOOKBINDER.
Special attention given to the binding of Harper's Magazine and Weekly. All descriptions of binding done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
No. 321 PEARL STREET,
Three Doors below Harper's Building.

THE FULTON DEMOCRAT, Lewistown. Illinois.

"HALL'S JOURNAL OF HEALTH, NEW YORK," never advises a dose of Medicine. $1 a year. Specimen Numbers 10 cents.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.
Selected from Drawings by
LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.
containing
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.
FIRST SERIES
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.
For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

DUPUY'S NEW PERFUME FOR THE SEASON.
KISS-ME QUICK.
Distilled from Fragrant Tulips.
E. DUPUY, Chemist, 609 Broadway.
Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1858, by Eugene Dupuy, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the U. S. for the Southern District of New York.

CRANBERRY CULTURE.—The Subscribers have issued a Circular on the Cranberry and its Culture, and will forward them to all applications free of charge. Also will forward the plants by express in a fresh state to all parts of the United States. Price $5 per 1000. Address SULLIVAN BATES & CO., Bellingham, Norfolk Co., Mass.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA. Will speedily purify the blood, remove all unhealthy secretions, and simultaneously produce a healthy action of the stomach and bowels.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

THE REAL FRANGIPANNI PERFUME is manufactured only by Messrs. Piesse & Lubin, of London, and they take this opportunity to caution purchasers against imitations, of which there are none, however, approach in any degree the exquisite fragrance as made by P. & L.
Their appointed Agent for the United States, E. DUPUY, 609 Broadway, late (Inger).

A NEW PERFUME.—Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co. have produced a new and most delightful perfume for the handkerchief, for which they have chosen the very appropriate name of "Florimel." Its odor is that of an exquisite bouquet of choice and delicate flowers, without too much of that peculiar sweetness so common in French Extracts, which satiates and sickens the senses. It is very neatly put up in bottles, which sell at fifty cents each, and may be had of the principal Druggists and Perfumers.—Transcript.

TIGHTNESS OF THE CHEST.—We sneeze, a slight, thin, sharp, ichorous matter comes from our nose; we have heaviness of the head, great oppression of the chest, some tightness, and a little tenderness in the region of the lungs. Now attention must be given to this state of facts, or inflammation of the lungs, or congestion may take place, and death be with us before we are aware. BRANDRETH'S pills—say two, four, or six, according to age, sex, and constitution, must be taken. They must purge very freely, drink warm drinks while the fever lasts, and as a diet eat plenty of good Indian meal gruel, or chicken broth with plenty of rice in it. By this treatment on the second or third day the disease will be cured. The wise will have Brandreth's pills where they can be easily laid hold on. Principal office, 43 Brandreth Building. Sold also at 296 Bowery and 241 Hudson Street, 52 Division Street and 66 Houston corner of Lewis, and 175 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.

WHEELER & WILSON MANUFACTURING CO'S
SEWING MACHINES,
Office 343 Broadway, New York.
Agencies throughout the Union.
Highest Premiums again awarded by the American Institute, New York; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, and Illinois State Fairs.

We prefer the Wheeler and Wilson sewing machines for family use. They will force the industry of woman into a thousand new channels, and emancipate her from the cramped posture and slow starvation of needlework. —N. Y. Tribune.

Wheeler & Wilson's machines are the favorites for families, being especially adapted to that purpose. They work more rapidly, with less friction, and with a greater economy of thread than most, if not all others.—N. Y. Times.

The Wheeler & Wilson machine has secured and justly maintains the pre-eminence for sewing every kind of material. It works equally well upon silk, linen, woolen, and cotton goods; seaming, quilting, gathering, hemming, &c., with a strength and beauty superior to any hand-work.—N. Y. Express.

While one female operator on a machine, such as is generally used by shirt manufacturers (Wheeler & Wilson's), can with ease stitch from two to three dozen shirt bosoms per day, the same woman, although she might be an extremely good and quick hand at the needle, would have great difficulty, by constant work, to stitch three of the same kind of bosoms in the same time, if, indeed, she could do it at all.—N. Y. Herald.

The sewing machine promises permanent relief to the wearisome bondage of the sewing woman. Its celerity is incredible. Each one of Wheeler and Wilson's is calculated to do the work of ten ordinary sewers. Women's powers, whatever their cultivation, are unable to compete either in rapidity, precision, or finish; from one to two thousand stitches per minute is not unusual. On shirt bosoms the number per minute is about fifteen hundred. —Journal of Commerce.

Wheeler & Wilson's is, beyond all question, the machine for family use.—Life Illustrated.

The Wheeler & Wilson is the machine, par excellence, for family use, and we recommend it most emphatically. —Advocate and Journal.

In our own family we use one of Wheeler & Wilson's machines, and we can not imagine any thing more perfect.—Editor N. Y. Evangelist.

The Wheeler and Wilson Machine ranks high in the community for family use, for which purpose it is admirably adapted.—N. Y. Chronicle.

There is not an invention of this inventive age which honors American genius more than the sewing machine. No family ought to be deprived of its benefits.—Independent.

A sewing machine is among the most useful and economical articles housekeepers can purchase. In looking out for the best, it would be well to see the machines of Wheeler & Wilson before purchasing elsewhere.—Examiner.

Wheeler & Wilson's machines are the best ever offered to public patronage. They are simple and durable; easily kept in repair; work without noise; sew with great rapidity; make an even and firm stitch on both sides, that will not rip; economize thread, and are applicable to every purpose and material common to the art in question.—Christian Inquirer.

Wheeler & Wilson's machines combine every thing that can be required in the manufacture of garments. Our friends abroad may be assured that they will give entire satisfaction, and that to purchase one of them is a safe investment.—Observer.

For family use, the Wheeler & Wilson machine justly maintains the pre-eminence. It is remarkable for elegance of model and finish, simplicity and thoroughness of construction, lightness and rapidity of operation, ease of management, economy of thread, and firmness and durability of seam.—Day Book.

The Wheeler and Wilson sewing machines are the principal supply of the vast demand of the fashionable world, and as they are adapted to every style of sewing, they are of vast importance.—Daily News.

Wheeler and Wilson's machines combine all the improvements that have been invented for sewing, and are the machines par excellence for family sewing, and for manufacturers generally. Indeed, we see nothing to add or abate, and consider them a triumph of mechanical genius.—N. Y. Journal.

The Wheeler and Wilson celebrated machines are pre-eminently calculated for family use, and for this purpose have no equal.—Musical World.

Full examination has resulted in a most thorough conviction of the superiority of Wheeler and Wilson's machines, and of their perfect adaptation to family sewing in all its varieties. The speed averages about twelve hundred stitches per minute, though they may run at double this. Fifty dozen of shirt collars, or six dozen of shirt bosoms, are a day's work. Their efficiency is equal to at least twelve seamstresses. Sewing is rendered a pleasing and healthful employment.—Golden Prize.

The whirr of the pretty, useful, perfect, magical, labor-saving sewing machines invented by Wheeler and Wilson remind one so much of the hum of the dear old Connecticut spinning-wheel.—Frank Leslie's Gazette.

The desideratum is a stitch that will not ravel. The Wheeler and Wilson machine makes the only stitch that answers precisely the conditions required. It can not be raveled or ripped, and forms a seam alike on both sides of the fabric sewed, with great economy of thread, more firm, durable, and beautiful than hand-sewing.—Family Magazine.

We confidently assert the excellence and pre-eminent superiority of the Wheeler and Wilson machine for family use, and for sewing generally.—Lady's Visitor.

Of the Wheeler and Wilson machine we can speak with entire clearness and confidence, after the use of one four years or more in our family. We look upon it as one of the benefactions of the age, and one which will constitute an era in the history of woman. Its song should be:

Click! click! click!
While the cock crows loud and free,
And click! click! click!
Is a merry sound to me.
With bodies trim and neat,
I seam and gusset and band,
With my dainty slippered feet,
And a small white-fingered hand,

I stitch to the click of the steel,
And never an aching head,
While I turn the gliding wheel,
With the gleaming silver thread.
Oh! woman, no more a slave
To seam, and gusset, and band,
Shall beautiful grow and brave,
In the light of our happy land.

—Mrs. E. Oakes Smith, Emerson and Putnam's Magazine.

Send for a Circular.

MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER.
The Leading and Largest Circulated Agricultural, Literary, and Family Newspaper.

The Rural. Our Rural. Your Rural. The Rural. Our Rural. Your Rural.

"EXCELSIOR" ITS GLORIOUS MOTTO, and "Progress and Improvement" its laudable Objects, the Rural New Yorker continuously excels in Merit, Circulation, and Usefulness. For evidence that it is the Standard in its Sphere, please compare it, in both Contents and Appearance, with any other extant—and you will coincide with its Patrons and the Press in pronouncing it, of its Class,

THE BEST WEEKLY IN AMERICA!
As an Agricultural, Horticultural, Literary, and Family Newspaper, combined, the Rural has long been unequaled. It employs the best talent, and is illustrated with numerous COSTLY AND APPROPRIATE ENGRAVINGS! Embracing in one a greater number of Important, Useful, and Timely Topics than several ordinary journals—including Rural Affairs, Science, Mechanic Arts, Education, History, Biography, Moral Essays and Tales, Poetry and Music, Reading for Youth, News of the Day, Market Reports, &c.—it is emphatically and economically

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES!
Every Family can Afford the Rural, for such an eminently Instructive and Entertaining paper is not a luxury, but a necessity.—Indeed, all who desire a High-Toned, Progressive, and eminently Practical and Useful FARM AND FIRESIDE JOURNAL—one which ignores trash, humbug, and deception, and seeks to enhance the Best Interests and promote the Home Happiness of its tens of thousands of readers, of various occupations, in both Town and Country—are invited to try the Rural.

The Ninth Volume, for 1858, is superior in both matter and manner—printed on new type and fine white paper, profusely illustrated, and otherwise improved.—Published Weekly, each No. comprising Eight Large Double Quarto Pages (Forty Columns). ☞ Now is the Time to Subscribe and form Clubs.

SPLENDID CASH AND OTHER PREMIUMS.
All who wish to do good and benefit themselves will please note that we offer and shall pay a large amount in Cash and other Premiums for obtaining subscribers to the Rural previous to April 1st, 1858.—The premiums range from $1 to over $300 00, and the list is so arranged that every person who sends for six or more copies, at the club price, is sure of a valuable reward! Send for the Premium List.

TERMS OF THE RURAL:—$2 a year—$1 for six months. To Clubs and Agents: Three Copies one year for $5—Six Copies for $10—Ten Copies for $15, and any additional number at same rate ($1 50 per copy). As we pre-pay American Postage on papers sent to British Provinces, $1 62½ per copy is lowest club price to Canadians. Club papers sent to different post-offices, and names added at any time. Bills on all solvent Banks in U. S. and Canada taken at par.

☞ Specimen Numbers, Show Bills, Premium Lists &c., furnished free to all disposed to compete for the Premiums, and thus aid in extending the usefulness of the Best and Largest Circulated Rural Literary and Family Weekly. Address,
D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

WING'S FARINA CRACKERS, so highly celebrated for their great nourishing and healthful properties as an article of food, may be procured, at Wholesale, only of
A. N. THOMPSON & CO.,
Nos. 221 and 223 Fulton Street, N. Y.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!
BULWER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, and WILKIE COLLINS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE
MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets —received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.
MR. CHARLES READE'S NEW STORY, entitled "JACK OF ALL TRADES—A Matter of Fact Romance," written exclusively for Harper's Magazine, was also commenced in the December Number.
MRS. GASKELL, Author of "Mary Barton," has become a contributor to Harper's Magazine, and a thrilling story from her vigorous pen will be found in the January Number.
MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S POWERFUL TALE, entitled "THE MARRIAGE TRAGEDY," appears complete in the February Number.
The above three stories are written exclusively for Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
Five Cents a Number; $2 50 a Year.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in Harper's Weekly simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. Twenty-five per Cent. Discount allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at Four Dollars a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the Magazine and Weekly can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "Harper's Magazine" and "Harper's Weekly" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the Magazine, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the Weekly.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the Magazine, and Twenty-six Cents on the Weekly, for the American postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

BOUDOIR SEWING MACHINE.

(BA'DE), HARRIS, PATENTEE.)

THE BEST AND ONLY RELIABLE SHUTTLE THREAD MACHINE YET OFFERED TO THE PUBLIC.

PRICE FORTY DOLLARS.

The Public guaranteed under a license from Elias H ow, Jr., I. M. Singer & Co., Wheeler and Wilson Manufacturing Co., and the Grover and Baker Sewing Machine Co., and each machine warranted in all respects.

464 Broadway, New York.

FRANCIS GOULD, Agent.

IMPORTANT TO BOOK BUYERS.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for Distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter (post paid), inclosing a postage stamp.

The attention of gentlemen, in town and country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at prices greatly below the cost of similar productions in England. The Catalogue, when compared with Catalogues of other connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have at on ce a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller in the usual agent, applications be made direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT. Embracing The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton.—Mr. Gilfil's Love Story.—Janet's Repentance. (Originally published in "Blackwood's Magazine.") 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. (Just ready.)

THE WORLD OF MIND. An Elementary Book. By ISAAC TAYLOR, Author of "Wesley and Methodism," "Loyola and Jesuitism," "Natural History of Enthusiasm," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. (This week.)

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE. Rough Sketches of People in Europe. By J. W. DE FOREST. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents. (This week.)

FOWLER'S ENGLISH GRAMMAR FOR SCHOOLS. The English Grammar in its Elements and Forms. With a History of its Origin and Development. Abridged from the Octavo Edition. Designed for General Use in Schools and Families. By WILLIAM C. FOWLER, late Professor of Rhetoric in Amherst College. 12mo, Sheep, $1 00. (Just ready.)

THE SPANISH CONQUEST IN AMERICA, and its Relation to the History of Slavery and the Government of Colonies. By ARTHUR HELPS. New-Edition, large, duo decimo, 2 vols. Large 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

DEBIT AND CREDIT. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. By L. C. C. WHITE. With a PREFACE by HYDERACHARIES JOSIAH LEWIS, LL.D., D.C.L., and D.D. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

A New Edition of this excellent work is now ready, containing, by the Chevalier BUNSEN, to be the most popular German novel of the age, will be ready in a few days.

THE HASHEESH EATER: Being Passages from the Life of a Pythagorean. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. (Now Ready.)

MRS. HIGGINEY'S LUCY HOWARD. Lucy Howard's Journal. By Mrs. L. H. HIGGINEY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents. (Now Ready.)

LIVINGSTONE'S SOUTH AFRICA. Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa; including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., Missionary to the Bechuanas. With Portrait on Steel, and numerous Illustrations. One Volume 8vo. Price $3 00. (A New Edition just Ready.)

GUY LIVINGSTONE; or, "Thorough." A Novel. 3d Edition. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

HONOR TO THE BRAVE!

THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION.

Baa! Baa! Black Sheep!
Have you any Wool?
Yes, Sir; I have
Three bags full:

One for the Senate,
One for the House,
And one for a little Newspaper Mouse.

A. B. ELY & CRAGIN, COUNSELLORS AT LAW, No. 13 EXCHANGE STREET, Boston Mass. Special attention given to matters connected with Patent Laws, and the adjustment of claims from abroad.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA, is now ready. Price $2 50.

LIDDELL & SMITH'S SCHOOL HISTORIES OF GREECE AND ROME.

SMITH'S HISTORY OF GREECE. A School History of Greece, from the Earliest Times to the Roman Conquest, with Supplementary Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By Wm. SMITH, LL.D., Classical Examiner in the University of London, and Editor of the "Classical Dictionaries." Revised, with an Appendix, by GEORGE W. GREENE, A.M. Illustrated by 100 Engravings on Wood. (Uniform with "Liddell's Rome" and "The Student's Gibbon.") New Edition. 679 pages, Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

We have much satisfaction in bearing testimony to the excellence of the plan on which Dr. Wm. Smith has proceeded, and the careful, scholarlike manner in which he has carried it out. The great distinctive feature, however, is the chapters on Literature and Art. They give it a decided advantage over all previous works of the kind.—Athenæum.

LIDDELL'S HISTORY OF ROME. A School History of Rome, from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Empire, with Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By HENRY G. LIDDELL, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. Illustrated by numerous Wood-cuts. (Uniform with "The Student's Gibbon" and "Smith's History of Greece.") 778 pages, Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

This excellent History of Rome, from the pen of one of the most scholarly writers of the day, will supersede many a fair work on the subject. The volume conforms with the "History of Greece," by Dr. Wm. Smith, in typography, plan, literary method, and illustration.—John Bull.

SMITH'S STUDENT'S GIBBON. The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By EDWARD GIBBON. Abridged. Incorporating the Researches of Recent Commentators. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D., Editor of the "Classical Dictionary," and "A Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities." Illustrated by 100 Engravings on Wood. (Uniform with "Liddell's Rome.") 705 pages, Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Dr. Wm. Smith has drawn up an admirable abridgment of Gibbon's Roman Empire, using, as far as possible, the language of the original, and adopting the plan of omitting or treating briefly circumstances of inferior importance, to that the great events which have influenced the history of the world may be narrated at length.—Cambridge Chronicle.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

GET THE BEST!

BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES.

COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND: In Four Books: With an Analysis of the Work. By WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, KNT., one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas. With the last Corrections of the Author, and Notes. From the Twenty-first London Edition. With copious Notes, explaining the Changes in the Law effected by Preceding or Statute down to 1854. Vol. I. By J. F. HANSON, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. II. By GEORGE SWEET, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. III. By I. CHITTY, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. IV. W. H. WALKER, Recorder of Chester. Together with Notes, adapting the Work to the American Student. By JOHN L. WENDELL, late State Reporter of New York. 4 vols. 8vo Law Sheep, $7 00.

In itself the work is indispensable; but the last London edition having been carefully annotated by four distinguished barristers of England, who, after each taking a volume of the Commentaries for service, have added copious notes in the text, explaining changes in the law which have been effected in England by statute or rhetoric down to the year 1854. To the work thus prepared, Mr. WENDELL has added, adapting it to the use of the American student, to show how far what it exists in this country under our institutions, and also to point out the diversities of the Common Law, as held in England and in this country, in the few instances in which a difference prevails.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of Four Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 60.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

THE picture on the preceding page will make the readers of the Weekly acquainted with one of the worthiest monuments that have ever been raised to the memory of the Father of the Country, and one of the greatest triumphs of American Art. We need hardly add that we allude to Crawford's Washington Monument, which is to be inaugurated at Richmond, Virginia, on the 22d inst.

The statue of Washington, on horseback, small as it seems in the picture, is twenty-five feet high. Among the figures who surround the base of the equestrian statue are Lee, Mason, Nelson, Patrick Henry, and Jefferson. Each is in an appropriate attitude: while Patrick Henry stands forward, with his arms outstretched as if in the act of addressing an audience, Jefferson thoughtfully studies, pen in hand, the Declaration of Independence.

It is known that the design of the Washington monument was completed in a few days by our illustrious countryman. He was, we are told, staying with some relatives at Bordentown, on the Jersey, when he noticed in a newspaper an announcement that the city of Richmond, Virginia, had appropriated a sum of money for a Washington Monument, and invited designs from artists. He hastened to Boston, made his design, forwarded it, and obtained the contract. It was, one can easily believe, a labor of love with him; and the result will do equal honor to his fame and to the liberality of the city in which the monument stands.

The death of Crawford was probably the severest blow ever inflicted on American Art. No American ever promised such a future. He had lived, it is the opinion of many of the best judges that he would have become the first of modern sculptors, and would have raised American Art at least to the European level.

Born in New York in 1813, he spent his childhood in poring over pictures and trying to imitate them. His father passed away in the midst of the monumental sculptors in this city; he was twenty-two when he realized his young dream of going to Rome. There he was taken kindly by the friends of the great Thorwaldsen, and there his real life began. The touching picture of his early struggles, his stupendous labors; his childlike devotion to art; his pinching poverty, so keen that it was truly said of him that he lived on a crust; his manly resolution to persevere to the end, no matter what cost, and either win immortality as a sculptor and do honor to his country, or to work himself to death in the endeavor; and his final, full, triumphant success—all this has been told in detail in the eulogy pronounced on his memory by his friend Mr. Bartlett, and it need not be repeated here.

It was in the heyday of his fame and his power —just as he was beginning to reap the reward of twenty years of arduous labor—that death struck into his studio. For a year or more the deadly disease was upon him before his agonized friends knew it. It seemed so trivial a matter—a sore eye—in comparison with the great works which he had to do before his life's race was legitimately run. And as the disease grew worse and worse; the eye slowly protruded from the socket, the most eminent surgeons ceased to secure the sufferer a few hours of peaceful sleep; pain of the most intense character became incessant; and at last a time came when it was a duty to tell the great sculptor that his hours were numbered, and he must die soon. His answer—worthy close to his heroic life—was simply, "God's will be done!"

The citizens of Richmond, Virginia, have done themselves honor in erecting their monument to Washington. The time may come when even the least attraction of their shy will be its possession of the last and greatest work of the great American sculptor, Crawford.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1858.

PROSPECTS OF A FOREIGN WAR.

IT is evident that the partisanship with which the Bill to increase the army is pressed upon the consideration of Congress has become deeper motive than the necessity of subduing the Mormons. No one seriously supposes that the present force at the disposal of the Administration is inadequate to bring Brigham Young to terms. Nor does any one who has formed person doubt that if additional force were requisite volunteers would answer the purpose better, and do the work more effectually, than servile troops. Still, Senator Davis and the friends of the Administration press their Army Bill forward, as though it was a matter of the greatest consequence to the Government and the country.

There may be good reasons for this. The relations between this country and Europe, or its neighbors are not in a situation to preclude the possibility of a recourse to hostilities within a brief period of time. It is impossible to foresee, even for a day what may take place in Mexico; what attitude the United States citizens the Administration may see be required to observe, or what measures it may not be compelled to take to compel the adherence of this or that revolutionary Government of Mexico to its plighted faith. The United States are on the verge of a war with the miserable despot who rules Paraguay, whose audacious shot who rules Paraguay, whose audacious outrages upon American citizens would, one two years ago, still remains unatoned for. In Central America all is utter confusion. No satisfactory assurance have ever been made by New Granada for the attack on the peaceful American Transit Company; and it is every prospect that the United States will be forced into collision with that or with some other American States as soon as a serious effort is made to reopen the Nicaragua Transit route.

On another hand, it is not to be supposed that the President has ever lost sight of the considerations which induced him, three years ago, to avow his opinion that Cuba ought to be part of the United States. That opinion is not lessened by to have been weakened by the discovery that last year Cuba was, next to Great Britain, our largest customer, and the largest consumer. Since the Ostend Manifesto has been made public, moreover, a startling change has taken place in the public sentiment of England, both with regard to the effect of the acquisition by the United States or the Island of Cuba. It is now the opinion of the London Times that Cuba is a convenient pretext for seizing Cuba, England, on all events, would stand aloof, and prepare to take commercial advantage of the event. Of course, British sentiment is of little consequence to the Administration of the United States; still, the President is not so wrong-headed as to abandon a design which he once strongly entertained because the English people are in a fright. Neither Senator Davis nor any of the friends of the Bill to increase the army have hinted at Mexico, Central America, Paraguay or Cuba. But it is possible that the peculiar state of these countries, and of our relations with them, may have some of the considerations which have induced the Bill. Five thousand additional soldiers would suffice for any immediate operations that might be required in the event of a serious rupture with Spain, Mexico, or any Central American State. And it may further be noticed, that, while a foreign war would, almost under any circumstances, be popular with the masses of this country, it would, just at present, possess the negative advantage of withdrawing attention from the slavery controversy—a consummation which the President must desire to attain.

If a foreign war should be the issue, perhaps the army may fall, if not in the Senate, at least in the House. But if it passes, it may not be absurd to prepare for trouble abroad.

THE LECOMPTON COMMITTEE.

SPEAKER ORR, in obedience to the command of the House directing him to select a committee of fifteen to inquire into the facts concerning the Lecompton Constitution, has composed his committee of nine Northern and six Southern members. Two of the Northern members chosen voted with the Administration and against the reference to a select committee, so that, in fact, a majority of the committee are opposed to the reference; but for this we presume that so experienced a man as Speaker Orr had no satisfactory precedent. The fact of the fact, that before the committee reports some days will elapse, is of consequence may take place among the members of the House; and while the suggestions of office and emolument may tell upon the weaker members of the opposition, Mr. Harris's motion, it is possible that the considerations of future re-elections may induce some of the Southern supporters of the Lecompton fraud to reconsider the votes they gave on 6th February.

For the present Kansas is shelved. Should the Committee of Investigation perform their task conscientiously much time will elapse before all its evidence they need can be obtained; and meanwhile such chances as imminent that the Gordian knot will be cut by the summons of a fresh Constitutional Convention by the legislature of Kansas, and the submission to the people of a new Constitution. This contingency would necessarily put an end to the entire agitation on the subject. If not at this, certainly at the next session of Congress Kansas would be admitted with her new Constitution, and that dangerous question would really be acceptable to the Free-Soil party, a basis for further contests would be wanting.

It remains to be seen whether the politicians for whom Kansas has been so valuable of late years will permit a pacific settlement of the dispute. It could be kept open by a report of the Lecompton majority of the committee, certifying that the Constitution now before Congress needs no investigation; it would continue, if the Republicans contrived, by a judicious absence from the House, to let the State of Kansas be admitted with the Lecompton Constitution. Unless one of these two courses be pursued, the Administration are, that in 1860, Kansas will be buried in oblivion.

WOULD WASHINGTON HAVE FOUGHT A DUEL?

WE are rather surprised to find the editors of the Express sitting in judgment upon what has been got up by a few obscure Irish papers against Mr. Thackeray's delineation of Washington in "The Virginians." That the Irish should dislike Thackeray is simple enough. No man living has made more fun of the Irish character than Thackeray, and our Hibernian friends have not yet learned enough to join in the laugh against themselves. But why the editors of the Express should come to the aid of Captain Costigan and Major MacBullwhackington is not so easily understood. They are men of the world, and must know that the public are willing to be led but little in matters of taste by the opinion of a few newspapers.

Some silly people have taken Thackeray to task for his making Washington command at a duel. These persons should read history and character. When they do, they will find that no man of Washington's standing could, in his time, have declined to fight a duel without losing his character and being cut by his acquaintance. The proscription of the duello is of modern date; in Washington's time it was universally recognized as a bonus vadis of personal differences; and a man who refused to fight with his equal when challenged was set down by the best men of that day as a poltroon unworthy of social recognition. It would be as sensible to call Washington a nincompoop for his very imperfect conception of the steamboat, as it is to make him for consenting to meet his angry young friend Warrington in a duel.

So far as we are able to judge, Thackeray's delineation of Washington will be the most perfect in existence. We design no injustice to the able men who have written biographies of the Father of the Country when we say that none of them have drawn a household picture of the man as he really was. We have the appearance of fancy sketches, and classic studies of the ideal Washington; but a life-like picture of the man as he lived, spoke, acted, thought, and demeaned himself in private, we have none. That deficiency in our literature it seems to us that Thackeray is about to fill. A true artist, deeply read in American history and biography; a profound observer of character, skilled in the detection of motives and the delineation of characteristics, a thorough democrat by conviction; a keen, yet wide-souled, generous man; Thackeray is admirably adapted for the great task which he has undertaken; and while some may regret that he has not left that task to some countryman of Washington's, it will soon be (if we mistake not) the universal sentiment of the educated people of this country, that he has achieved his performance so thoroughly and so perfectly that for many a year to come those who desire to know Washington will need to read Thackeray.

THE FAILURE OF THE COLLINS LINE.

THE Collins steamer which was advertised to leave this port on Saturday last did not do so. The reason assigned was that for the present the line will be discontinued; that since the reduction in the government allowance to the company it was ceased to be a paying concern. This is the first we have heard of the failure of the Collins Line. The idea that to ensure the British Government ought to grant to the Collins company a monopoly of the passenger business is too absurd to require consideration. The persons who seriously entertained it could not be expected to be capable of carrying on a successful business.

There is no reason why Government should grant indemnities to ocean steamers any more than to railroads, or canals, or manufactories. Let the ocean steamers be paid for carrying the mails, and let the price be regulated by the usual law of supply and demand. That which can be done for a thousand dollars should not cost five thousand, though by paying the larger sum the national vanity may perhaps be tickled by the construction of fine and fast-sailing ships. If the United States, with their peculiar advantages, can not maintain a line of ocean steamers without taxing the entire people of the Union to keep them afloat, then we had best stick to sailing vessels, and leave the steam navigation of the ocean to John Bull.

THE AMERICAN SHIP "ADRIATIC."

EVERY one has been glad to hear that the American Shipper has made its maiden sneer in French port to await the issue of a collision between the courts, and which, with the aid of a little management named the Adriatic, broke away from its moorings and made three capes to sea, has been overhauled and taken back to port by a French war-steamer. It is also satisfactory to know that the captain, who thus disgraced himself and his country, is in irons, and will probably suffer severely for his conduct.

Such acts as this of the captains of the Adriatic, and of the Shipper, are unaccountable, calculated to lower the American name abroad, and lessen the value of an American's word. We have been sufficiently frightened into apologizing all by the chevaliers d'industrie who have contrived to hang on, somehow, to our foreign embassies. This mean trick of these sea-captains will go to show that our politicians do not enjoy a monopoly of dishonesty. The Paris papers which we receive are already improving the affair by reiterating the sneers which were current in England ten or fifteen years ago, about the proverbial trickiness and unreliability of Americans.

It is to be hoped that the captains of these two ships may be thoroughly ashamed of themselves when they are, the action of the British Government in the case of the Prince Albert is passed by the people of the United States.

SAFETY AT SEA.

A VERY excellent bill has been introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. Scott to enhance the security of passengers on board ocean steamers. The bill renders it compulsory on the owners of such vessels to construct them with at least three water-tight compartments, and to provide them with boats sufficient to carry one passenger for every seven tons of the vessel's tonnage; it imposes a fine of $2000, with imprisonment from two to ten years, on any captain sailing from a port in violation of a steamer not thus constructed and provided. We trust the bill will pass. Nothing is more shameful than the recklessness with which, urged by many of the owners of our ocean steamers; useless, perhaps, it be the lax manner in which the laws are in force at present for the protection of passengers have been administered. We need hardly remind the public that no action has ever been taken to hold any one accountable for the lamentable loss of the Central America, though the report of the committee appointed to investigate the disaster pronounced it a perfectly clear case of gross negligence and practical unseworthiness.

THE LOUNGER.

THACKERAY'S WASHINGTON

MANY correspondents have asked the Lounger what he thinks of the portrait of Washington as appearing in "The Virginians," by Thackeray. Some of them are very furious in their denunciation of the novelist who has dared alone for the manner in which they conceive he has done it, but for undertaking to do it at all. "What right has he to meddle with Washington in any light?" they ask. As know about him, or about these early times in this country? He is an ill-bred, ungrateful, Irish Tory, who comes over to our shores to abuse, and then goes home and abuses us."

The Lounger's personal argument is not a very strong one. In the simplest view of the case a stranger is not responsible for your asking him to dinner. You do it of your own free will, and you take that the fact of the invitation, and the consumption of your wine, is a tacit law by the guest, has bound him to honor never to say or do any thing that you may not like to hear. The guest will probably differ from you. It is really quite difficult to say how a man may not say that the yellow fever is a very deadly disease if he has not been asked to dine by a yellow friend in New Orleans. When Dickens came to this country we all seemed to think that we had laid him under a profound obligation to pay only the lowliest things about us, by giving him so many hundreds of champagne suppers as we could. And we have never done abusing him because he didn't like the wine into his eyes and stuff the pudding into his hair. He was accepting our hospitality in a courtesy and not as a bribe, and spoke frankly of what he saw and heard.

The argument, in its plainest form, reads thus: "I paid your money to hear Thackeray's lectures, and what business has he to write a novel in which he introduces General Washington into it?"

Didn't you get your money's worth? Didn't the lectures show you how devotedly and lovingly the novelist had studied the life and manners of the last century? Is it "literary impertinence" to find an unusual skill in historical story? The truth is, there is no more certain test by which to gauge and study, to paint the life of the last century—and that the last century American life was only English colonial life—than Thackeray's novels. Long time, George Washington, of Virginia, was an English gentleman. Now, if it is possible for a novelist ever to use any real personage as an actor in his story, and of that there can be no serious doubt with inspired correspondent of the Express prior to any individual in the last century more conspicuously proper than George Washington to point the moral and adorn the tale? Of course the novelist undertakes it at his own risk. He measures himself by the highest standard that he can use to describe a person whose life is familiar to all his readers. If he succeeds, well; it is only because he is a man of very superior talent.

And what is the fact in the present case? Simply that the young Washington who is about twenty one or two years of age at the time described—is represented greatly as he stands in the mind of every thoughtful and intelligent American—young man "without a grain of wild oats," "simply," "splendid," "in love with Miss Warrington," who "always exhibited an extraordinary simplicity and purity of life," who "had studied his mother's and his family's affairs from a very early age, and was trusted by all his friends and the country of his country never more persistently than now," "anxious to serve his king and do his duty," who first is shot which he ever heard, and who "never was to last for sixty years, which was to cover his own country and pass into Europe, to cost France her American colonies, to free even England from her sway, and create the great Western Republic; to rage over the Old World, to wash entangled in the web of all the myriads engaged in the vast contest to leave the price of the greatest fame with him who stirred the first blow."

These are some of the author's words. They are always most respectful when speaking of the hero, but it is in the general tone of the portrait that the likeness lies. One friend writes us that he is represented as "a fortune-hunter!" Good friend, remember the Johnsonian story of not furnishing brains. It is a foolish Mrs. Mountain, another woman's body, and a morbid spelled son, who call him a fortune-hunter; and the point is in the contrast of his character with the body, and the spirit of the age in which he lived. Mr. Thackeray has not made the hero a fortune-hunter.

a challenge. Nothing can exceed the naturalness and probability of the scene, in view of the character of the young officer. Does any reader of history, who knows men, suppose for a moment that George Washington, an English colonial military officer at the age of twenty-two, a century ago, would have refused the challenge given under such circumstances as are related in the tenth chapter of "The Virginians"?

Whoever wishes to think of Washington as a prudent and accurate machine will not like any true biography of him. Those who love and appreciate the character of the man, and all the more that it was grave, and silent, and lofty, will delight to see his sparing of youth painted as it really was, finished with beautiful youthful feeling, but with all the germs of that grave repose which were afterward so majestically developed. George Washington was not a machine, but he was the first citizen of the United States. He belongs to history and literature, and any author in any country may write about him as of Julius Cæsar or Pericles, or as of Russell or Sidney. What his young countrymen to-day want, most of all, is a portrait of him, so painted that they may be ashamed not to be as he was. He was a good and great man, as he is already shown in this story. To deify him is to destroy his influence forever.

BLUE STOCKINGS.

"Is not too much trouble, I would like the Longer to answer the following question: What is the origin of the term 'blue stocking,' as applied to literary ladies? It is a lady who wishes a solution and a gentleman."

—In Boswell's Life of Johnson "a lady" will find an account of a club of literary ladies, who used to meet to converse with literary gentlemen. One of the latter was Mr. Stillingfleet, who always wore a splendid pair of blue stockings. Hence they became a prevery, "We can do nothing without the blue stockings;" and the name was gradually transferred to the club, and to the ladies who composed it.

ANNUAL VISITATION OF BISHOP VALENTINE.

Tiny good Bishop has just made his annual visit. He is the only Bishop who can be claimed by no sect, but who is welcomed in all houses of every faith. Whether he is one man or three, and if so or why he is so named, are questions which may disturb the speculations of daily papers, and even occasion an overflow of orthodoxy, but who cares to count the silver hairs, or watch for the accent, or invade the sweet privacy which hides his individuality? The gods came and went in state. They appeared and disappeared; and so, when the time is full, all the windows and doors and hearts burst in his blithe coming, and on one bright day the whole world is his diocese, and Valentine is all.

Some political newspapers are troubled because the designs that honor the day are not altogether beautiful. We do not like to encourage so heated a discussion, they can not allow for the imperfect effect, and on the ugly reverse they discover the deavor. Of course, political editors send only Shakespearian verses and Tirlemagne pictures upon parchment, perfumed with the balm of Gilead, to their valentines. But every thing in its kind. Grudge not the verses that he loves! are, we suppose, all the pleasure is proportioned to the excellence of the picture.

The fastidious daily papers complain of the hideous Valentine prints! They might as well grumble at the bird-painting perhaps because there are bitter days in March. If they wish comfort—if they wish to know what loyalty to Valentine yet survives—let them ponder the following tender and tremulous solicitation of destiny, which flutters on a soft, warm south wind into the Lounger's hand:

VALENTINE.

She is lovely and I love her, though as yet I dare not speak;
All were bad to me, perchance, should I my breathless silence break;
Joan, at least, I dare to gaze forever on that dear young face—
Dare to follow all her footsteps—dare to haunt her dwelling-place.

Is there love in those shy glances, as they gently rest on me?
Is there hope in those sweet blushes, as they deepen while they flee?
May I deem the first faint tremblings of that virgin heart are true?
Can I dare to trust the tenderness that lingers in her tone?

Dream thus fondly, dream thus ever, if thou canst—oh, weary heart!
Think not of the hopeless years that lie before thee when we part;
Let a long and weary future chase them with its promised bliss;
Youth is not forever vanished, or thou could'st not love this!

Even sun gazes on fondly, dressed, 'neath a care-worn, wrinkled face,
As before the locks that shadow them were silver-tinged or no race.
Yet thy wealth of youth and beauty, and thy spirit's glad and free,
Make my noble wish one who offers but a heart that yearns for thee?

If she loves me, I am old, and life's sweet spring is over;
If she loves me, at that moment I am young forever-more;
If she leaves me, I am old, and life's sweet spring is over;
Yet I linger, fearing ever, on the threshold of my joy,
Or perhaps beside the gateway that opens to eternity!

Let me bask a little longer in that pure and fearless smile—
Let me linger in the sunshine but yet a little while!
For cold the joints will gather round my pathway dark and slow,
When love sweet lips once have uttered a denial and a plighting No!

ALMS.

A certain club in a certain town writes to the Lounger that it has recently organized itself, and wishes to establish a reading-room—the only reading-room in the county—and will the Weekly be sent for nothing?

Now will the club look at it a moment? There is a certain county in a certain State in a certain country—a whole county—which professes to want a reading-room, and yet a county which can not pay two dollars and a half for the paper it wants. Why shouldn't every reading-club in every county, or village, in the country, ask the same thing? Why shouldn't the Lounger, in the name of the Weekly, ask the very people in the very county he is residing of who want the paper given to them, to send him a few barrels of apples, and potatoes, and meal, and a few years' supply of beef, and pork, and bread? It would be precisely what they ask the Weekly to do for them, and if it would not be the same in any thing, they why not send the equivalent in money?

The Lounger has not the slightest fifty cents a year. How much is that apiece for the inhabitants of the county?

The club may say that it merely asked for information. In that case the Lounger has great pleasure in communicating the intelligence that it is impossible to furnish the Weekly gratis—as the club will easily see if the members will apply the principle to it and meditate.

Secondly, the club may say that it asked because it supposed one or more of the numbers to be the publishers. But will any member, when he is next buying, step into Stewart's and ask for a pair of gloves for himself, as a silk dress is to his wife, on the principle that a single pair or a single dress makes up different in the case of the price?

Finally, for the information of all counties and clubs, the Lounger will state this great truth, free of charge (Lowell will make a bill of calculation and hard business, and until the farmer is willing to give the paper to the man who is the owner the publisher wants to suck cider, he has no right to ask the publisher to give him a newspaper whenever he wants to be a-dreaming.

TREASURE TROVE.

When a father sets his net, he does not know but he may catch a casket like that of the Arabian Tale. And why not? for the waters of Arabia are pearls and flowers, and why should not he be the lucky one to trap some?

"The pied things that be
In the hoeless mosses under the sea?"

But there are pearls and flowers of more value that have not the form of precious stones; there are deep-colored flowers that have no fragrance—for words may have the appearance of gems that are not such at all. Therefore, when the Lounger spread his net, in the form of a Letter-box, he knew that it might sometimes rare treasures; hoped that choice verses and dainty conceits and sweet fancies would come floating in—but he has rarely cast a net with more delight.

Last week he had the honor of introducing to the public another new poet, known by Mrs. Fanny Kemble; and this week he wreathes his column with two more garlands woven by the same hand.

LETTY'S LOVE AND LETTY'S DEATH.
BY FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE.

Oh, Lobkins! if thy faith were mine,
Thy faith, my love, as Summer Sea,
Seek for a slumber sound as thine,
Instead of this sick fantasy.

But though the waves, with death's control,
Might still the lover in each vein,
And they obey, my soul to thine,
The obedient of all my pain.

This weary, weary, restless strife;
I can not bear—I can not flee—
The more thou doubt'st, the all of life,
And parcel of eternity.

MORNING BY THE SEA.
BY FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE.

With these two lines on three eyes,
I melt thy doubts—like ice
For look, my Love, flushes his golden hand
His dark veil rends, and bares his face to me:
And springing from the blue deep gloriously,
He greets here and me, his and my troth-wed vows.
Now come his horses up all steeling fire,
The lovely rosiate Morning's golden car shoir
Of triumph, circle round the royal sun,
And the great pageant of the day begins!
Come! let me lock in mine thy hand,
And pace we with swift feet this smooth and sparkling sand.

See how the swollen ridges of the waves
Curl low and gleaming, and then sway
Rising and rounding,
Bulging and resonating,
Breaking and rebounding.
And melting into silver, creamy spray;
Sweep with their wavy line the far-indented bay.

The little bark, that by the sheltering shore
Pleased her with rocking, now with rocks no more,
Shakes out her pinions to the breeze once more,
And, like a sea-bird, dips, and rises on the deep.

Hail welcome day! hail miracle of light!
Hail wondrous resurrection from the night!
Hail picture-painter of the beauteous world!
Hail ye sweet breezes of fresh vital air!
And hail, my love! my life! my joy! my light!
Soul of my day! my morning, noon, and night!

ANONYMOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Dear Sallie, believe a venerable Lounger when he says that you are playing with edged tools. Of course a man who writes as your correspondent does is simply a fool to suppose you a friend in earnest. Young women, beware of the letters of the Alphabet when they advertise for wives, and send notes signed "Flib-Mantico," and "James Taylor," and "Smith," through the Postoffice. They mean nothing good or honorable. Before you suspect it you are in their power, and there is nothing so remorselessly despotic as "Your tenderly devoted A," and "Your sincere friend X." Never try to pull a rope of which the other end is held by a man you can not see. You will find yourself hanging, suddenly. Whoever means to play fair, plays in the daylight. May all the Lounger's friends, Sallie, remember it, and profit by it!

THE FOURTH ESTATE.

The most striking announcement in the programme of ceremonies for the marriage of the Princess Royal of England is, that the press may appear in their ordinary black dress-suits instead of in the court costume. The reservation is made for the press only. The diplomatic corps, the nobility, the ladies, must all attend in some kind of extraordinary clothing, but the journalists may come in black coats. It is the formal recognition of the fourth estate by the first. It is a reference to the supposed unwillingness of some of the nobility to wear a court dress for the day. To me, the sturdy democrats might argue that the prescription of any dress, even that of a black dress-coat, is the very assertion of their civic rights, a constraint upon the judgment of the independent press. But perhaps we reflect how inflexible is the etiquette of any court, and how little disposed courts have always been to concede any thing to the newspapers. An exceptional movement, at such a time, may be considered the high-water mark of the liberal and tolerant spirit of the age.

There must have been few sights so touching to the cogent censorship as the pure and beautiful Press of Paris, all covered with crape black.—

"Clothed all in lonesbirth with cheiver to the chin,
How d'ye do, and how d'ye do, and how d'ye do again?"

OUR LITTLE-BOY.

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—Please don't think me a frivolous fondist because I go to you "without an appointment," and the cause of my visit.

"I do want to know several things, and am sure that you can tell me if you will.

"It has been said by some wise people, you know, that Time is money, and that accurately now and then, I sent back to earth again. It was that smart clon't like to be wise, but I am. Herself, I believe, was engaged Uyses in Louis Philippe. He found this out before Mr. Louis left France so suddenly that day, or in night never knew. He discovered.

"Now 'I want to know' if any great spirits have come to you lately, and can tell me the names of whom we are, and explain, 'History is more beautiful than fiction'? Or, perhaps, you can summon earth with the fragrance of their deeds, as it were, thus bidding us love and hope the poor friendless and sick in the hour of pain.

"If Philip Sidney, Walter Raleigh, or Gonsalvo Cordova have come, please let them greet us by note to you; then, dear Mr. Lounger, let us somen know all they say. Perhaps, in this case, you will be a different style from that which the 'strong-minded' adopt.

"We want Mrs. Hemans to address Lucy pour answers us age, ugliness, poverty, and good sense—put down forever. If we have these, we shall be happy, and if we are hint at being young, they laugh; if we dress and strive to look young, they contemn us as sick. Yet if we are to pour to dress they neglect us, and if ugly or old they make horrid remarks about us. What are we to do?

"Do you ever see Carlotta? Is she not a dear one? They will know how to make the Whigknowledge feel that Bolivia, with her many sorrows, has not forgotten her great statesman, poet, and philosopher, whose armor too heavy for him, and strong pleasure speedily was. Then the knights—who never attack the defenseless—may tell the Widow-country that they are sovereign, and say to her when what it is which they hid seems to seek, in return for the noble example she has set, how valiantly endeavor to quicken in them. The knights will not say—I think—that man proves his manhood by the things which he sings which he seeks.

"Dear Lounger, I wish the gallant knights knew how much we women love gentleness and valor. How we need them both in such a world—for one to soothe, the other to protect. But we hope that some gallant souls have come back, and are now in our beloved country, to all that keep order and virtue.

"Do tell me if that sweetest oddity—that quietest, dearest blending of chivalry and patience—that girl Charles Lamb, I mean. I would wish a hundred years for word from her, and especially from the knights who sing.

"Yours, faithfully, Exactly Incognito."

—Surely Miss Incognito's experience ought to answer her letter. Can any thoughtful person (like herself) live to her years (number not stated) and seriously doubt either courtesy, enterprise, and quaintness—or, in other words, Sidney, Raleigh, or Lamb—are living?

Dear Madame, we all move in that fine society. The world was never fuller of brave men and lovely women than it is to-day. If you allow yourself to observe that the seams of some hero's coat are a little rusty, you may begin to doubt whether the Chevalier Bayard ever wore a soiled velvet doublet. But don't disbelieve in the hero. Believe in the hero if you don't yet see him. Never doubt the existence of the noblest men in every age, and remember that the Lounger has ears alone as brightly over you as they did over Greece two thousand years ago.

SAW-DUST LITERATURE.

One proof of the rapid advancement of the American Mind—whether it "advances backward" or forward I'll stick to Mr. Emerson to say—may be found in the current literature of the day—the newspapers, the ballads, the plays, and the playbills. We are growing extensively grandiloquent and florid in our style. We delight in words of many syllables, we rejoice to etc., victorious at hand, and to cull what are irreverently termed "jaw-breakers." I have given a week or two some choice bits from Mr. James Yellowplush's Washington correspondence, which illustrated what is called our "feature" of daily journalism. The Union would go to pieces did not Mr. Yellowplush tell us what Mr. Jones of Arkansas wore at the last dinner given by the wife of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the bonds of paternity between the North and the South would have been irremediably snapped had not the aforesaid Jeames been permitted to learn the particulars of Mr. Speaker's first dinner-party.

Jeames having saved the Union, has left Washington for a time, and has attached himself as private secretary to a showman. This showman, it appears, had, at Niblo's Saloon, "Jeames says that it, "although but a feeble conception of the days of classic splendor, serves to convey an idea of the manner of the tilt and tourney, the living panorama, the long line of trilliant simulations, the gilded canopies, the exciting entrances, the numerous strifes, the impassioned struggles for the crown of victory, being so back again to the days of knightly prowess, when bravery and valor actuated men to the accomplishment of deeds great and glorious."

If that is not "pretty" writing I have never read it. The author of "The Sanguinary Coleman; or, the Dentist's Revenge," or the poet who wrote "Sweeney sang the Martingale," could not do better. Mr. Ford, in his sad remember upon thrilling or elegant bit of description in Ethelinda's great work, for the publication of which subscriptions are coming in rapidly—but in which I can in when "things begin to expand." Young Foulis would subscribe for his son, by now, the Governor has gone and cut off every thing, and a fellow can't even get enough for his necessities (cigars and billiards), to say nothing of knowledge." I should like to see young Foulis the next time he enters the presence of the 1 eighteen or the last; Louis Napoleon in the Rue Lepellitier was a great deal safer.

However, the great work is only postponed through the "lightness" of the publishers. Jeames will "do" for the contemporary address of the public in the style of the above extract, and an eminent British critic (see Punch, of course), at present somewhat affected by pecuniary "crisis," has promised to "make it all right" with the Spanish Queen Isabel of Transversal Liberty of Spain, special New York correspondent of that able journal), for the ten dollars. "Cheap enough, I'm sure," said the fair authoress, to which I assented. They say that the men in the Custom-house "make a good thing of it, as a matter of course. That is a very comprehensive phrase; but I adopt it to illustrate my plan for the Queen of the great work, which the last Dresser says "is unequaled by waited for in literary and fashionable circles."

WHITE LIES.

The statement of Dr. Mackay (see Illustrated Notes) that the New York firemen have drinking-bouts in the "cellars" of their engine-houses.

That Lola Montes is an eloquent orator.

That Tammany Hall is to be moved to the corner of Lourteenth Street and Eighth Avenue.

That the daily papers have resolved not to write any thing more about Kossuth.

That the butcher's bill of a resident of the Fifth Avenue never amounts to over seven dollars per month.

That the musical critics have all committed suicide for fear of employment.

That the "first families" go to actresses' benefits "in full dress."

That the 22d petticoat is going to be the rage.

That the omnibus horses don't appreciate the literary efforts of the Metropolitan Pressmen.

That the "Bride of an Hour" has been recondoled to "George."

That rents will be lower after the first of May.

The statement of Colonel Bomb, of the Louisiana Pumpkins, that the senate will be reformed, and that then "something will be done for him."

That the Calico Ball was an economical affair.

That Professor Longfellow writes "My Lost Youth."

That the Harpers pay the writer of these papers one hundred dollars an article (which they ought).

THE BANNER OF PEACE.

Perhaps you don't know where Ludlow Street is. There are a good many ignorant people in the world, and as I don't wonder at your lack of topographical information, I will inform you that there are a great many things which I don't know. For instance, I never know what day of the month it is, and have great doubts as to what year we are in. Well, if you desire to find out Ludlow Street, look in the Directory. That valuable work advises, Ludlow Street, is just now the scene of one of the most interesting events of the day. Whenever a new general has hung out his banner, set to Elisabeth in Mexico, or to enlist men of battle to eat up the Mormons, it is a standard of public curiosity to see. There, a man of the people feels the peculiar throbbings of joy and without pride, it is very convenient to put his name in letters of gold, it will be proper, if you please, Mr. Glen, to write it in letters of silver. Jacob Wormser's banner, Ludlow Street. He has fitted up a neat room, where, from six in the morning to eleven at night, persons come every day, to dispense good, plain dinners to all who are poor and hungry. His dinner-parties number sometimes as many as four hundred guests, all of whom are treated with as much consideration as if they were Queens; would also have no one else to give me a special dinner at Delmonico's, which you don't, more's the pity (for you, of course). All the Ludlow Street boys for out of his own pocket, and gives his personal attendance. We read about people who devote themselves to the public service by making long speeches, taking large salaries, or killing a great many Indians; but if they are to be honored, what should be given to this man who, as they say, is only a mechanic? All will agree, save those who think that to display the highest traits of a true Christian gentleman. The blessings of the poor and needy are coming up like a cloud of sweet flowers to smooth the pathway of his glorious life. May he live a thousand years, and may his tribe increase!

THE OLD LULL HOUSE.

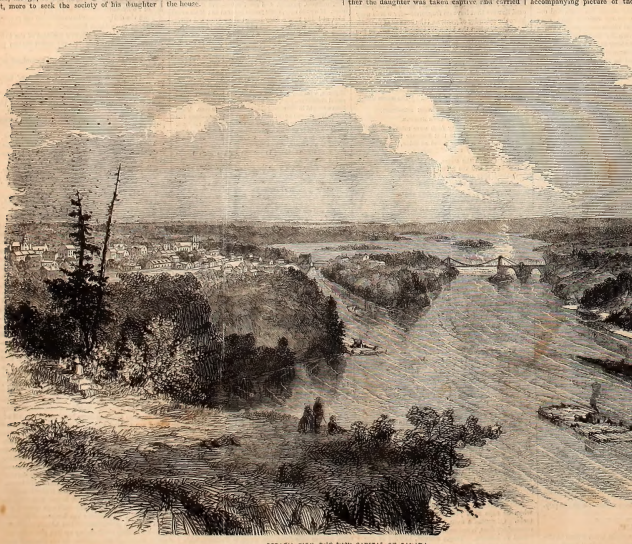
THE OLD LULL HOUSE.

THE accompanying very spirited and picturesque engraving represents the celebrated "Old Lull House," a relic of old Indian times, named after the family in whose possession it has been for more than a century. It stands in Byfield, a short distance from Newbury port, and is one of the most ancient houses in the country. It was built as early as 1660 for a garrison-house, and was the scene of the massacre, by the savages, of Goodrich, the chaplain of the garrison. He was shot while at prayer on Sunday evening, the ball passing through the first window on the right of the front door. His grave is underneath the small tree, which is seen in the picture, on the right of the house.

The house was built to resist a modern bombardment, instead of a flight of stone-headed arrows from the bows of the wild men. The timbers are of white oak, from a foot to twenty inches square, which have become hardened by age to the consistency of iron. The space between the posts is filled up with brick-work, which is exposed where the boarding has fallen off, as shown in the engraving. The whole being covered with a double course of boards of the same indestructible wood with the frame. The huge chimneys contain bricks enough to build quite a block of modern houses.

Thus runs the tale: Cantewit was a younger son of the chief of the Quescacunquen tribe of Indians, who inhabited the banks of the Parker River, where their remains, and many interesting relics of them, are still found in great numbers. He attracted the attention of Mr. Goodrich by his natural talents and his fidelity to the English, and became in time a constant visitor at the Garrison House, though, as Goodrich began at last to mistrust, more to seek the society of his daughter Anna, a girl of fourteen years, than to profit by the endeavors of the chaplain to convert him from the errors of paganism. Once when the good man was enlarging upon the beauties of the "New Jeruslem," and of the angelic inhabitants, Cantewit interrupted him with the question, "Do the angels look like Anna?"

Goodrich, however, did not aspire to an alliance with the sachem's family, and was at last obliged, in order to avoid the troublesome pertinacity with which the Indian pressed his suit, to forbid him the house.



This slight his majesty (?) laid up in his heart for future reference. About a year after this the attack on the house was planned by the New Hampshire Indians, a tribe who were friendly to the Quescacunquens; but whether they were incited to it by Cantewit, or whether it was a quarrel of their own in which our hero subsequently took a hand for the advancement of his own ends, is not known. At any rate he was in their confidence, and held a hand in the game which took the "queen of hearts." After the massacre of the father the daughter was taken captive and carried first to New Hampshire, and afterward, to elude pursuit, to Canada, with her Indian lover sitting in the company of her captors or following fast behind.

Time and the presence of the handsome young chief assuaged at length her grief at the loss of her father, and her own exile, and on Cantewit's consenting to adopt the habits of civilization, she gave him her hand, and for more than threescore and ten years lived with him as his wife.

At the age of ninety years, after Cantewit was dead and his tribe extinct, she bade adieu to her adopted home, and traveled back to the home of her childhood. The grandfather of the writer of this sketch, then a boy of a dozen years, led her through the once familiar rooms of the old house, and out to her father's grave. Strangers dwelt in those rooms. Strangers occupied the lands around which were rightfully her husband's inheritance; and the stranger's plow-share had even disturbed the sod over the grave of her sire. Every thing was changed. She remained for an hour in a state of intense distraction, then turning to my grandfather with a deep-drawn sigh, she said, "There is something wrong here—I must go home." She would have started the same night back to Canada, but was of course prevented, as the neighbors saw she was exhausted from travel, and that death at best was not far off. She retired to rest that night in the house of a friend, and in the morning was found lifeless in her bed. She had gone home.

THE NEW CAPITAL OF CANADA—OTTAWA CITY.

OUR Canadian readers will be glad to see the accompanying picture of their new capital, the city of Ottawa, on the river of the same name, in Western Canada.

OTTAWA CITY, THE NEW CAPITAL OF CANADA.

Ottawa City has just been selected by the government of Great Britain to be the capital of Canada. For the benefit of readers in the United States, a few words of explanation as to this selection may be necessary. Previous to the union of the provinces of Upper or Western, and Lower or Eastern Canada, each province had a capital of its own—the two fortunate cities being Quebec and Toronto. At the union of the provinces, which followed the rebellion of 1837–38, Montreal was selected as the capital of United Canada. In the course of a year or two, the Upper Canadians complaining that Montreal was not central enough, the seat of government was transferred to Kingston. There it remained some years; but two governors dying there, a prejudice arose against the place, and Montreal was once more chosen as the capital. In 1849 a mob in that city, in a fit of rage at the passage of an unpopular act of Parliament, burned down the Parliament Houses and mansion the Governor's life, upon which the government was removed from the place. To satisfy both extremities of the province, a scheme analogous to that in use by our Connecticut neighbors was adopted. It was determined that the government should be located alternately at Quebec and Quebec, each city holding the honor for four years. Accordingly, in 1849, the Governor and departments were removed to Toronto. In due time they migrated to Quebec, and again, at the quadrennial period, they relapsed to Toronto. This peripatetic system, however, was objectionable in many respects. The cost of each removal was very large, and there was no slight risk of losing valuable records in the transits. So, after two or three journeys to and fro, the legislative hotly of Canada, finding it impossible to persuade the members from the several districts of the province to agree upon any one city, decided to choose an outside arbitrator, and the Queen was naturally suggested for the office. She has decided as we said, in favor of Ottawa City.

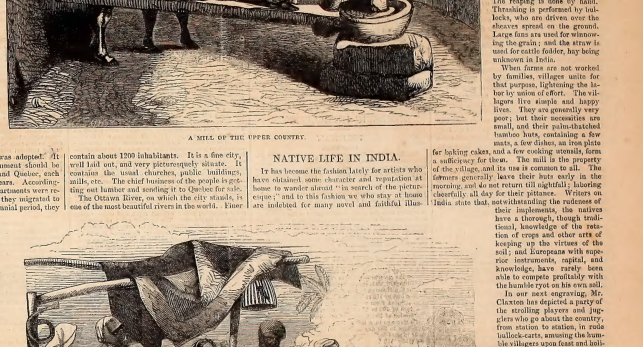
A MILL OF THE UPPER COUNTRY.

The first settler at or near Ottawa City was a Massachusetts man named Wright, who built his log-hut there in 1800, and brought up a large family on the border of the rapids of Ottawa. Subsequently, the war of 1812–14 teaching the British that it would be well for them to have a communication with the lakes which was not liable to a sudden interruption from Ogdensburg, an officer of engineers, named Colonel By, was directed to construct a canal through the swamps and lakes between Kingston and the waters of the Ottawa. He built the canal, which is known as the Rideau Canal; and a few huts, sheds, and store-houses, which were erected on the Ottawa at the terminus of the canal for the convenience of the men employed, were erected into a town by the name of Bytown.

In course of time the abundance of valuable timber on the upper waters of the Ottawa River attracted settlers to Bytown, and it became a thriving place. Portions of the adjacent land are fertile, and agricultural settlers were induced to prefer it to the favorite sites between the lakes. Several enterprising timber firms established agencies at Bytown, erected mills in the vicinity, and built slides for timber. A number of that valuable class of settlers—Protestants from the north of Ireland—selected the vicinity of the town as their home. Altogether, the site was fortunate, and the town prosperous.

In 1855 the progress of Bytown, was so marked that the people grew tired of the old name, and desired to disentangle their fortunes from the memory of the builder of the very ornamental, but not particularly useful, Rideau Canal. They obtained leave to call their city Ottawa City instead of Bytown, and at the same time they put in their plea as a candidate for the honors of the capital, urging the superiority of their town over other Canadian cities in view of its central location, its remoteness from the United States frontier, and the inoffensive character of its people. We have mentioned their second claim.

Ottawa City is supposed to contain about 1200 inhabitants. It is a fine city, well laid out, and very picturesquely situate. It contains also a few churches, public buildings, mills, etc. The chief business of the people is getting out lumber and sending it to Quebec for sale.



The Ottawa River, on which the city stands, is one of the most beautiful rivers in the world. Floor scenery than that which adorns its banks can not be found any where. Whether it derives its name from the old tribe of "Ottawas," who are now dying out on Manitoulin Island, in Lake Huron, or whether they borrowed their name from it, can never be known. The word signifies, strangely enough, "the human ear."

NATIVE LIFE IN INDIA.

